[A] Seated at Parkhall in Warwickſhire.] This family may well be ſtiled ancient, ſince it was ſeated hereabouts before the Conqueſt. Turchillus, in the reign of William Rufus, aſſumed, in imitation of the Normans, the ſirname of the family, de Arden, becauſe his eſtate lay in the wood lands (1). Mr. Camden, father dying when he was an infant of two years old, he became, before he inherited the eſtate of the family, the ward of Sir George Throkmorton, of Coughton, whoſe daughter Mary he afterwards married (b). In all probability, it was his engagements with this family, and being bred in it, that made him ſo ſtiff a Papiſt as he was (c). However that be, ſucceeding his grandfather Thomas Arden, Eſq; in 1562, in the family eſtate, he married Mary (Throkmorton) and ſettled in the country (d), his religion impeding his preferment, and his temper inclining him to a retired life. His being a near neighbour to the great Earl of Leiceſter, occaſioned his having ſome jars with him, who affected to rule all things in that county (e). Some perſons therein, though of good families, and poſſeſſed of conſiderable eſtates, thought it no diſcredit to wear that nobleman's livery (f), which Mr. Arden diſdained. In the courſe of this fatal quarrel, exceſſive inſolence on one ſide, produced ſome warm expreſſions on the other; inſomuch that Mr. Arden openly taxed the Earl with his converſing criminally with the Counteſs of Eſſex, in that Earl's life-time; and alſo inveighed againſt his pride as a thing the more inexcuſable in a nobleman newly created (g). Theſe taunts having exaſperated that Miniſter, he projected, or at leaſt forwarded, his deſtruction [B]. Mr. Arden had married one of his daughters to John Somerville, Eſq; a young gentleman of an old family, and good fortune, in the ſame county (h) [C]. This Mr. Somerville was a man of a hot raſh temper, and by many thought a little crazy. He was drawn in a ſtrange manner to plot (if it may be ſo called) againſt the Queen's life; and thus the treaſon is alledged to have been tranſacted. In the Whitſun-Holidays, 1583, he with his wife was at Mr. Arden's, where Hugh Hall, his father-in-law's Prieſt, perſuaded him that Queen Elizabeth being an incorrigible heretic, and growing daily from bad to worſe, it would be doing God and his country good ſervice to take her life away. When the holidays were over, he returned to his own houſe with his wife, where he grew melancholy, and irreſolute. Upon this, his wife writes to Hall, her father's Prieſt, to come and ſtrengthen the man. Hall excuſes his coming, but writes at large, to encourage Somerville to proſecute what he had undertaken. This letter had its effects, Somerville ſet out for London, but got no farther than Warwick, where, drawing his ſword and wounding ſome Proteſtants, he was inſtantly ſeized. While he was going to Warwick, his wife went over to her father's, and ſhewed him and her mother Hall's treaſonable letter, which her father threw into the fire; ſo that only the hearſay of this letter could be alledged againſt him and his wife, by Hall who wrote it, who was tried and condemned with them (i). But to return to Somerville. On his apprehenſion, he ſaid ſomewhat of den, and many of our authors after him, write this name Ardern (2), and it is true, that ſome branches of this family wrote it ſo (3). However, Mr. Dugdale, who was beſt acquainted with theſe things, always writes it Arden, and ſo this gentleman himſelf wrote (4). Parkhall had been for three hundred years the ſeat of the Ardens, and they had attained all the honours, which really give luſtre to any Engliſh line. In the the twelfth of Henry II. Henry de Arden was certified to hold five knights fees of the Earl of Warwick, and his brother Hugh as many (5). In the forty-eighth of Henry III. Thomas Arden had ſummons to attend the King in a Welſh expedition, which he did, but ſiding afterwards with the rebellious barons, was undone (6). However, in the third of Edward III. Sir Robert de Arden was allowed to fortify his houſe, and died poſſeſſed of a large eſtate (7). In the forty-eight of Edward III. Henry de Arden of Parkhall, was conſtituted conſervator of the peace, knighted the next year, and was knight of the ſhire in the firſt of Richard II. (8) Robert de Arden, in the ſixteenth of Henry VI. was ſheriff of this county and Leiceſterſhire (9). But in the thirtieth of Henry VI. he was attainted for ſiding with the houſe of York (10). His ſon Walter married the daughter of John Hampden, Eſq; of Hampden in Buckinghamſhire (11). His ſon John Arden, married Alice daughter of Richard Bracebrigge, Eſq; of Kingſbury, in Warwickſhire, and was ſquire of the body to Henry VII. (12) His ſon Thomas married the daughter of Thomas Andrews, Eſq; by whom he had many children (13). Of theſe the eldeſt, William, married Elizabeth the daughter of Edward Conway, Eſq; by whom he had our Edward, his only ſon (14). This Edward, though his grandfather was living at his father's deceaſe, became the ward of Sir George Throkmorton (15), whoſe daughter he married, and not Sir Robert's, as it ſtands in the pedigree drawn by Dugdale.

[B] Forwarded his deſtruction.] The warm expreſſions of Mr. Arden, mentioned by Camden, are proofs of his averſion, but they give us no light into the cauſes of his extraordinary hatred againſt the Earl of Leiceſter. In all probability, it was owing to his love for his wife's family, who were grievouſly perſecuted by that haughty Peer. Her brother, Sir Nicholas Throkmorton, was, in the opinion of the generality of the world, poiſoned at this Earl's houſe, in 1571 (16). Another brother, Sir John Throkmorton, Chief Juſtice of Cheſter, he perſecuted till he broke his heart; and purſued not only all ſuch as were related to, but alſo ſuch as had a friendſhip for, this family, with implacable vengeance (17). Probably this drew ſome marks of his diſpleaſure on Mr. Arden, for we ſhall ſee hereafter the whole family was caught in one net, and all brought to ruin together (18). It ſeems clear from the ſtories of thoſe times, that the Throkmortons were a ſtirring family; inſomuch that Camden remarks on the death of Sir Nicholas, after mentioning the common fame of his being poiſoned, that however he died, he certainly died in a critical ſeaſon for himſelf, being engaged in dangerous undertakings (19). Add to this, that Mrs. Arden, who was a Throkmorton, was made a deep ſharer in her huſband's ſufferings.

[C] Of an old family in the ſame county.] The Somervilles are a Norman family, and came over with the Conqueror (20). The Somervilles of Edſton, in Warwickſhire, are a branch of the Glouceſterſhire family of the ſame name, who have flouriſhed ſeveral hundred years at Aſton Somerville, in the ſaid county (21). This John Somerville came to his eſtate in 1576, and about the ſame time, married Margaret Arden, being then in his eighteenth year (22). He was of a warm fiery diſpoſition, as all writers agree, and Dugdale's account of the matter, is, that his prieſt, Hall, wrought upon his zeal for religion, and his hot temper, till he fell into this humour, which he did not deny. He came up to town in a paſſion, acted like a man diſtracted, and owned a deſign to kill the Queen, as ſoon as preſſed thereto, after his apprehenſion (23). But the beſt account duly weighed, is that of Lord Burleigh, which runs thus (24). To this number, they may, if they ſeek number, alſo add a furious young man of Warwickſhire, to increaſe the Kalendar of the Pope's martyrs, who of late was diſcovered, and taken in his way, coming with a full intent to have killed her Majeſty.

his father and mother-in-law, and immediately orders were ſent into Warwickſhire for their being ſeized, and impriſoned (k). October 30, 1583, Mr. Somerville was committed to the Tower for high-treaſon. November 4, Hall the Prieſt was committed alſo; and on the ſeventh of the ſame month, Mr. Arden (l). On the ſixteenth, Mary the wife of Mr. Arden, Margaret their daughter, wife to Mr. Somerville, and Elizabeth, the ſiſter of Mr. Somerville, were committed (m). On the twenty-third Mr. Arden was racked in the Tower, and the next day Hugh Hall the Prieſt was tortured likewiſe (*) [D]. By theſe methods ſome kind of evidence being brought out, on the ſixteenth of December Edward Arden, Eſq; and Mary his wife; John Somerville, Eſq; and Hugh Hall the Prieſt, were tried and convicted of high-treaſon at Guildhall, London (n), chiefly on Hall's confeſſion, who yet received ſentence with the reſt. On the nineteenth of December, Mr. Arden and his ſon-in-law Somerville, were removed from the Tower to Newgate, for a night's time only (o). In this ſpace, Somerville was ſtrangled by his own hands, as it was given out; but, as the world believed, by ſuch as deſired to get him ſilently out of theirs (p). The next day, being December 20, 1583, Edward Arden was executed at Smithfield with the general pity of all ſpectators. He died with the ſame high ſpirit he had ſhewn throughout his life. After profeſſing his innocence, he owned himſelf a Papiſt, and one who died for his religion, and want of flexibility, though under colour of conſpiring againſt the State. He ſtrenuouſly inſiſted, that Somerville was murdered, to prevent his ſhaming his proſecutors, and having thus extenuated things to ſuch as heard him, he patiently ſubmitted to an ignominious death (q). His execution was according to the rigour of the law, his head being ſet (as Somerville's alſo was) upon London bridge; and his quarters upon the city gates, but the body of his ſon-in-law was interred in Moor-fields (r). As for Mrs. Arden, ſhe was pardoned, but the Queen gave the eſtate which fell to her, by her's and her huſband's attainder, to Mr. Darcy. As for Hugh Hall, the Prieſt, he was pardoned too, but Leiceſter doubting his ſecrecy, would have engaged Chancellor Hatton to have ſent him abroad; which he refuſing, new rumours, little to that proud Earl's honour, flew about (s). Hollinſhed, Stowe, and ſuch writers, treat Mr. Arden as a traitor fairly convicted, and ſo have others who knew much better (t); but Camden was too honeſt to write thus, and there is good authority to incline our belief, that he died for being a ſtout Engliſhman, rather than a bad ſubject (u) [E]. His ſon and heir Robert Arden, Eſq; being bred in one of the Inns of Court, proved a very wiſe and fortunate perſon; inſomuch that by various ſuits he wrung

[D] Was tortured likewiſe.] I take this from a Diary of what paſſed in the Tower of London, from the 15th of June, 1580, to the 21ſt of June, 1585, written in Latin, added to Sanders's book De Origine & Progreſſu Schiſmatis Anglicani. In the preface there is a ſuccinct account of the inſtruments of torture, which were theſe, 1. The dungeon, which was without any light, twenty feet under ground. 2. A narrow room, in which a priſoner could ſcarcely ſtand upright, called thence Little-eaſe. 3. The rack, an engine with pullies, whereby men were disjointed. 4. Scavenger's daughter, ſo called, it is ſuppoſed, from the inventor: it was a circle of iron, whereby the patient's Head, Hands, and Feet, were grievouſly ſtretched. 5. Hand-ſcrews. 6. Irons for the Arms. 7. Irons for the Legs. And in the Diary, the days are ſet down, on which the ſeveral priſoners mentioned therein, are ſaid to have been racked, &c. The Papiſts made loud complaints of their treatment, to all the Chriſtian world; atteſting that, 1. They were perſecuted purely for conſcience ſake. 2. That they were driven to confeſs, by grievous tortures. In anſwer to theſe books, the Treaſurer Burleigh, cauſed to be written what Mr. Strype calls a State Book, cited above, which treats the firſt point; and ſoon after came forth a ſecond piece, intitled, A Declaration of the favourable dealing of her Majeſty's Commiſſioners, &c. (25): wherein it is ſaid, 'That none of them 'had been put to the rack, or torture, no not for 'treaſon, or partnerſhip of treaſon, or ſuch like, but 'where it was firſt known, or evidently probable, 'by former detections, confeſſions, or otherwiſe, that 'the party ſo racked or tortured was guilty, and did 'know and could deliver the truth of the things 'wherewith he was charged.' Which the Reverend Mr. Strype ſeems to think a full juſtification of the practice. Indubitably it ſhews there was ſuch a practice. Nay, we are further told by Whitlock, in his Memorials, that Queen Elizabeth, diſliking the thing, or fearing it might be abuſed, forbad the putting men to the torture, on any pretence whatſoever (26). Yet we know that Mary Queen of Scots objected to the evidence made uſe of againſt her, becauſe it was extorted by theſe methods, which have been, God be praiſed, long out of date.

[E] A ſtout Engliſhman, rather than a bad ſubject.] In this note, I ſhall fairly ſtate the evidence in favour of this judgment, and againſt it. The annaliſts, and public writers in thoſe times, treat Mr. Arden as a notorious traitor: they could do no otherwiſe. Lord Burleigh's pamphlet, Apology, or State Book, produces, alſo, the ſame charge againſt him (27). Immediately after the account of Somerville, he proceeds: The attempt not denied by the traitor himſelf, but confeſſed, and that he was moved thereto in his wicked ſpirit, by incitements from certain ſeditious and traiterous perſons, his kinſman and allies, and alſo by often reading ſundry ſeditious vile books, lately publiſhed againſt her Majeſty. There is yet ſomething ſtronger than this, viz. A confeſſion of the Papiſts themſelves, in a book called, Important Conſiderations: written and publiſhed by the ſecular Prieſts. Therein we read 'Mr. Arden and Mr. So-'merville were convicted by the laws of the land, to 'have purpoſed and contrived how they might have 'laid violent hands upon Her Majeſtie's ſacred perſon. 'Mr. Somerville's confeſſion therein, was ſo notorious, 'as it may not be either qualified or denied (28).' Yet, immediately after their death, all unprejudiced people doubted this buſineſs. Father Perſons's Greencoat, inſtantly interpoſed thus (29). 'What ſay you, 'to the device he had of late to entrap his well 'deſerving friend, Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, in the 'matter of Hall, his Prieſt, whom he would have 'had Sir Chriſtopher to ſend away, and hide, being 'touched, and detected in the caſe of Arden; there-'by to have drawn in Sir Chriſtopher himſelf, as 'Sir Charles Candiſh can well declare, being acceſſary 'to this plot, to overthrow Sir Chriſtopher.' In the copy I have, there is a marginal note in MS. in an old hand, referring to Dugdale and Camden. It appears from Strype, that the mouths of the people were open on this ſubject (30). Camden modeſtly, and plainly, ſays (31), 'That the head of Somerville 'was turned by certain Popiſh libels to ſuch a degree, 'that breathing nothing but ſlaughter, he came up 'to town to kill the Queen, and, like a mad-man, 'fell to cutting and hacking all he met. Being ap-'prehended, he owned the deſign he had to kill the 'Queen. Upon this, himſelf, and, in conſequence of 'his confeſſion, Edward Arden, his father-in-law, wrung from Edward Darcy, Esq; the grantee (x), most of his father's estates (y), and by marrying Elizabeth daughter of Reginald Corbet, Esq; one of the Justices of the King's Bench, he restored the credit and splendor of this ancient family, and was so happy to see Henry Arden, Esq; his eldest son, knighted by King James, and married to Dorothy the daughter of Basil Fielding of Newnham, Esq; whose son became Earl of Denbigh. The drawing this embarrassed account out of obscurity, cannot but be grateful to our curious readers, and will answer one great end of this work, the elucidating dark passages in English history, by a comparison of lights, a thing not to be expected in general collections, or even in the accounts of particular reigns.

(y) Dugdale's Warwickshire, Vol. ii. p. 931.

'a gentleman of antient family in Warwickshire, Mrs. 'Arden, the wife of Mr. Somerville, and Hall, a 'Priest, were convicted as accomplices. Three days 'after, Mr. Somerville was found strangled in prison; 'the next day, Mr. Arden was hanged and quartered; 'the woman and Priest were spared. Such was the 'fate of this gentleman, who was generally thought 'to have fallen a victim to Leicester's resentment; 'being circumvented by a Priest, whose evidence de-'stroyed him. Certain it is, Leicester hated him not 'without cause, because he opposed him all he could, 'openly inveighing against him as an adulterer, and 'an upstart.' Dugdale says, the inhabitants of Warwickshire who lived in those days, thought him murdered by Leicester (32); and the author of that nobleman's life, does not deny it was so (33). The authors who mention this fact, are, State Writers, Papists, or impartial Historians. The first were bound to defend it, whatever they thought of it; yet they own Somerville to have been crazy. The secular Priests flattered the government, and write on this head very artfully. Arden protested his innocence, as all the Popish writers attest. The moderate impartial Historians own without scruple, he died unjustly, and therefore we may well suppose it true. However, to clear this matter up as much as possible, let us consider a little, first, what appears as to the fact itself, and next, what credit is due to such as affirm Mr. Arden to have died justly. It is suggested, that Leicester prompted the Priest, Hall, he inspired Mr. Somerville with seditious notions, and thus the whole family were involved. Now all agree, that Hall was the author and mover of this treason, that he confessed and was pardoned; and Somerville, who was touched in the head, made a free confession, and was in all respects more worthy of a pardon, was destined to a shameful death, and was perhaps cruelly murdered. This has a bad aspect, and does not look like a free course of justice. Somerville was apprehended as he came, which looks as if they watched for him: But what seems to put the matter out of all doubt, is the timing of this business, just when the two Throkmortons were apprehended for conspiring to set the Queen of Scots at liberty. So that here were a gentleman and his wife, their daughter, their son-in-law, and two nephews, with Mr. Somerville's maiden sister, all clapped into the Tower at once, and Mrs. Arden saw her husband, and nephew, Francis Throkmorton, tortured in one day, executed within a few weeks of each other, and her husband's estate given to my Lord Leicester's creature. Does not this look like revenge on the Throkmortons, whom that Earl openly persecuted? Now as to the writers. In the common chronicles we look not for the springs of action, but bare acts; we read there that Lord Robert Dudley was made an Earl, Master of the Horse, Knight of the Garter; but not a word of his murdering his wife, or Mr. Arden: that would not suit the book. As to Lord Burleigh, he admits Somerville was mad. And Camden, who wrote by his directions, thought Arden a sacrifice; and, all things considered, so may we. It is one thing to write, or publish an apology, or, as Strype bluntly calls it, a State Book, as Lord Burleigh's was, and another to frame an impartial history like Camden's. That wise Nobleman did what was fit for the times in the first, and suffered what was fit for the knowledge of posterity, to be recorded in the second. C.

[We are not entirely satisfied with the apology which is here made for Lord Burleigh. If that great man was convinced of Mr. Arden's innocence, it was totally unworthy of his character to charge him with having been a traitor. It is more honourable, therefore, to Lord Burleigh's reputation, and more agreeable to probability, to suppose that he believed Mr. Arden to be guilty, at least in a certain degree, of evil designs against the Queen. Indeed, Arden was so bigotted a Papist, that it is not unlikely but that by some imprudent words, if not by actions, he might furnish a pretence for the accusations brought against him. We can scarcely otherwise imagine how it would have been possible for the government to have proceeded to such extremities. We do not mean, by these remarks, to vindicate the severity with which this unfortunate gentleman was treated; and we are sensible that, during Queen Elizabeth's reign, the jealousy and dread which were entertained of the Roman Catholics, occasioned some particular persons of that persuasion to be used with injustice and cruelty.] K.

ARGALL (JOHN), author of two tracts, the one intitled De vera Pœnitentia (a), the other Introductio ad Artem Dialecticam (b) [A], was the third son of Thomas Argall by Margaret his wife, daughter of John Talkarne of the county of Cornwall. He was born in London, and entered a student in Christ-church in Oxford towards the latter end of Queen Mary's reign. He took the degree of Master of Arts in 1565, and was Senior of the Act celebrated the eighteenth of February the same year. Afterwards he applied himself to the study of divinity, and, having taken Holy Orders, obtained the living of Halesworth in Suffolk. Being at a feast at Cheston, a mile distant from that town, he died suddenly at the table. His body was carried to Halesworth, and buried there, October 8, 1606. During his stay at the university, he was a noted disputant, and a great actor of plays at Christ-church, particularly when the Queen was entertained there in 1566. He was esteemed a very good scholar, and was so much devoted to his studies that he lived and died like a Philosopher, with a thorough contempt for the things of this world (c).

ARLOTTA, mother to William ſirnamed the Conqueror. In ancient hiſtorians we find her called by very different names; Abbot Bromton calls her Arlet, and ſo does the ancient chronicle of Normandy (a); Knyghton, Arlec (b); another ancient writer Herleva (c), which one would think was her true name, moſt of the French hiſtorians, eſpecially moderns, calling her Herleve. But writers are better agreed as to her family; for they ſay, in general, that ſhe was a Tanner's daughter. A French author of great integrity, however, reports the matter differently in all reſpects. He ſays her name was Helena, and that ſhe was not the daughter of a Tanner, but of one Foubert, valet de chambre to the Duke of Normandy, which Foubert was the ſon of a Tanner (d). That ſhe was within one deſcent at leaſt of a perſon of that trade, appears clearly, from an inſult offered to her ſon, when he was beſieging the city of Alençon (e). Two and thirty of the inhabitants, when he came firſt before the place, brought certain raw hides, and tanned, or made ſhew of tanning, them on the wall in his preſence, as well in contempt of his power, as in deriſion of his birth (f). Afterwards when he became maſter of the place, he cauſed the hands and feet of thoſe men to be cut off (g), which ſhews how much he was touched by this outrage. If this lady was really the daughter of the Duke's valet de chambre, yet ſhe was bred with her grandfather the Tanner, at Falaiſe, an ancient, ſtrong, and pleaſant town, in the Lower Normandy. There the Dukes of that country had a palace, to which they reſorted in times of peace for pleaſure; and were uſed to make it their conſtant reſidence in time of war, on account of its ſtrength. At this caſtle Duke Robert was in the year 1022, and being a Prince of a very debonnaire diſpoſition, was preſent at a place where the young maidens of the town were dancing, and there he ſaw the fair Arlotta, and being charmed either with her beauty or behaviour, fell deſperately in love with her (h). She was brought to his bed that night, and our graveſt hiſtorians, ſuch as Bromton (i), and Knyghton (k), tell us, that when ſhe had undreſt herſelf, ſhe tore her ſhift from the boſom down to the bottom, for which ſhe gave this reaſon, That it was neither decent nor fit, that what had touched her legs, ſhould come near the mouth of her lord (l). From this intercourſe ſhe became with child, and during her pregnancy, had a very extraordinary dream. Malmeſbury, Knyghton, and other authors ſay, that ſhe fancied her bowels dilated themſelves over all Normandy and England (m). But Bromton and others tell us, that ſhe ſaw in her ſleep a tree come forth from her womb, the branches of which overſhaded Normandy (n). At the birth of the child there happened a very odd circumſtance: through haſte or careleſſneſs, he was ſuffered to fall upon the ground, whence he took up, ſome ſay, a handful of ſtraw (o), others of duſt, which occaſioned the midwife to predict, that he would be a King (p). Certain it is, that the Duke was ſo much taken with her company, that he kept her about him as if ſhe had been his wife (q) [A], till the year 1030, when he took a reſolution of going to Jeruſalem: a thing not infrequent in thoſe days, in which it paſſed for a kind of penance. But authors ſeem to have a high opinion of this Prince's piety, when they gravely write, that it was to expiate his criminal converſation with Arlotta, which induced him to take ſo fatiguing a journey (r). Others think they have found a more probable cauſe, viz. regret for his brother Richard's death, whom he is ſaid to have poiſoned. However it was, at his departure, he cauſed his nobility to ſwear fealty to his ſon William, then a child about ſeven years old (s); and having appointed the Earl of Britanny to be his guardian (notwithſtanding he had ſet up a title to the duchy) and recommended him to the protection of the King of France, he ſet out on that expedition, from which he never returned, dying

[A] As if ſhe had been his wife.] As for this Duke of Normandy, who is uſually called Robert II. the founder of the ſovereignty, being ſtiled by the French writers Robert I. though his name be commonly written Rollo, he is, by antient authors, called Rodbert, and was very remarkable for his facetious humour, as well while he continued Duke of Normandy, as in his journey to the Holy Land, which, if the account moſt writers give us of his manner of living on the road be true, might with as great propriety be ſtyled a ramble for pleaſure as a pilgrimage (1). In the text we have followed the generality of Hiſtorians, and thoſe who are moſt in eſteem, yet there want not ſome authors, who tell us, the Duke took his Herleva, not from her father nor grandfather, but from the arms of a gentleman, who had made choice of her for his miſtreſs (2). Whether this be, or be not true, is not eaſily determined; nor indeed do we think it very neceſſary to determine. But as to her marriage, if that really happened before the Duke left Normandy, then we cannot but conclude that it was with his conſent; and that Arlotta behaved well towards her huſband, and maintained a tolerably fair character, we may deduce from the reſpect paid her by her ſon, and the great care he took of the reſt of her children.

As for Arlotta, ſhe married, ſome ſay in the Duke's life-time, but moſt writers, after his deceaſe, a Norman gentleman whoſe name was Herlaine, who had but a very ſmall eſtate (u). Her ſon paid her always a great deal of reſpect, and took eſpecial care of her children by her huſband, which were three (w). 1. Emma, who married the Count D'Aumale, though ſome of our Engliſh authors call him Earl of Avranches; but this I conceive to have been rather his ſurname: by which Nobleman ſhe had a ſon, Hugo de Abrincis, whom the Conqueror made Earl of Cheſter. ARMSTRONG (Sir THOMAS), who ſuffered for rebellion in the time of King Charles II. He was deſcended of an ancient and loyal family, and his father being in the King's ſervice abroad, he was born at Nimeguen in Holland (a), but the time cannot be certainly diſcovered. As he grew up, he diſcovered a vigorous, martial diſpoſition, which recommended him to the acquaintance and eſteem of many perſons of quality, who looked upon him as a man of a warm heart, and a good head. He was a very ſtirring and active Royaliſt during the exile of King Charles II., which expoſed him to the malice of the Protector, Cromwell, who cauſed him to be confined a year in Lambeth-houſe, which in thoſe times was a priſon (b). He ſuffered greatly in this impriſonment; for the Royaliſts were at that time ſo exhauſted, that how warm ſoever their charity might be in their hearts, its effects were but cold, and therefore Mr. Armſtrong was very near ſinking under this misfortune, when by ſome accident or other he recovered his liberty (c). This uſage, hard and cruel as it was, could neither break his ſpirits, nor abate his loyalty, which induced the principal friends the King had in his dominions, to make choice of him to go to his Majeſty, then at Bruſſels, with bills of exchange of great value, and other papers of ſtill greater importance, which commiſſion he executed with ſuch diligence and diſcretion, that he not only put the bills and papers ſafely into the King's hands, but brought home and delivered as ſafely the anſwers with which he was entruſted. But the Protector had ſo good intelligence, that within a week after he came back, he was ſeized and ſent to the Gatehouſe, where he ſuffered another ſharp impriſonment, and was in great danger of loſing his life (d). This ſervice was ſo acceptable to the King when performed, that he conferred on him the honour of knighthood; and yet the remembrance of it was ſo far from being of any ſervice to him in his troubles, that it was thought one principal reaſon for taking away his life [A]. After this he was again impriſoned in the Tower, and obtained his liberty only by the death of the Protector, and on his obtaining it, returned to the ſervice of his maſter, and was one of thoſe diſtinguiſhed Royaliſts, that ſigned that excellent addreſs to the Lord General Monk, that operated ſo ſtrongly in favour of the Reſtoration (e) [B]. On the King's return he was taken into great favour, was employed in many ſervices of importance, promoted to the rank of Lieutenant in one of the troops of horſe-guards, and was Gentleman of the Horſe to his Majeſty (f). The heat and vehemence of his temper betrayed

[A] The principal reaſon for taking away his life.] At firſt ſight this muſt appear extremely odd and ſtrange to the reader, but it is no very difficult matter to clear it up. It is well enough known, that the Protector had abundance of ſpies, and that his Secretary, Thurloe, was eſteemed the greateſt maſter of intelligence that ever filled that office. But the greateſt feats done in that way, were by corrupting Royaliſts, whom their neceſſities made diſhoneſt. One Manning, who was about the King's court, was detected and ſhot in the Duke of Newburg's country for his treachery, and was actually caught in the fact of writing a letter to England (1). Sir Richard Willis was another loyaliſt, who acted the ſame part, and was always impriſoned by Cromwell, to hide their intelligence on the diſcovery of the plots in which he was engaged (2). The Duke of Buckingham was deeply ſuſpected of behaving in this manner (3), and the great Chancellor Clarendon openly charged with it by ſome perſons of tolerable credit (4). We need not wonder therefore, if the King, upon ſome ſuggeſtion of that ſort, might be brought to ſuſpect Sir Thomas Armſtrong, and on his being detected in the conſpiracy for which he ſuffered, allow himſelf to believe his old ſuſpicions were juſt, though they might have been ſtifled and forgot before that unhappy affair recalled them to his memory. Biſhop Burnet tells us this ſtory in very ſtrong terms, and therefore it will be requiſite to give it in his own words. Speaking of the ſeverity with which Sir Thomas was treated, he ſays (5), 'The 'King had publiſhed a ſtory all about the court, 'and had told it to the foreign miniſters, as the 'reaſon of this extream ſeverity againſt Armſtrong. 'He ſaid that he was ſent over by Cromwell to 'murder him beyond ſea, and that he was warned 'of it, and challenged him on it, and that upon 'his confeſſing it, he had promiſed never to ſpeak 'of it any more as long as he lived: So the King 'counting him now dead in law, thought he was 'free from that promiſe.' We ſhall hereafter have occaſion to mention this ſubject again, when we come to ſpeak of Sir Thomas Armſtrong's dying ſpeech; and we ſhall then ſhew, that the Biſhop's ſtory is inconſiſtent with that ſpeech, notwithſtanding he appeals to it.

[B] That operated ſo ſtrongly in favour of the Reſtoration.] Upon General Monk's coming to London, it was found requiſite, in order to accompliſh his great deſign of ſettling the nation without effuſion of blood, that all parties ſhould make public declarations that this was their deſire; that they were truly ſenſible, as well as heartily weary of the mutations in government to which they had been expoſed, and that there was nothing they ſo ardently deſired, as the meeting of a free and conſtitutional Parliament. The Royaliſts among the reſt, declared their ſentiments in the paper here referred to, and which, as it is very ſhort, I think it may not be amiſs to inſert (6).

betrayed him however into ſome exceſſes, and particularly into one which was extremely fatal to his reputation, and, but for the King's favour, might have been fatal alſo to his life. This was the killing one Mr. Scroop in a play-houſe quarrel (g); which misfortune rendered it neceſſary, or at leaſt expedient for him to leave the kingdom; but he did it in an honourable way, and as an attendant upon the King's natural ſon, Mr. James Crofts, afterwards ſo well known to the world, by the title of Duke of Monmouth. He ſerved with him in Flanders with great reputation, and there acquired ſuch a degree of military ſkill, as made him be conſidered as an active and accompliſhed officer, which made him the more dear to thoſe noblemen of a martial diſpoſition who attached themſelves to that Duke. After the war was over he returned to England, and ſtood in all appearance in as high favour, and as great credit with the King, as ever. But this did not continue long; for the times growing troubleſome, and factions ariſing both in the Court and Country, he had the misfortune to fall into ſuch meaſures as diſobliged his maſter, drew upon him at firſt his coldneſs and diſpleaſure, and ended at laſt, in removing him from all his places, and in his total diſmiſſion from Court. The long intercourſe of friendſhip he had had with, and his great dependance on, the Duke of Monmouth, proved the firſt cauſe of his troubles, and in the end that of his ruin. He was naturally warm and zealous in whatever cauſe he engaged; and when the Court puſhed the Duke extremely, in order to detach him from the party he had embraced, Sir Thomas Armſtrong was indefatigable in his ſervices and ſhewed ſo much vigour and conſtancy in his attachment to that unhappy Duke, as made him be conſidered as one of his principal adviſers (b) [C]. In the conferences that afterwards happened between that Duke, the Earl of Shafteſbury, the Lord Howard, Lord Grey, and others, Sir Thomas Armſtrong was

A Declaration of the Nobility and Gentry that adhered to the late King, in and about the City of London.

'AFTER the miſeries of a civil war, and the many and fruitleſs attempts towards ſettlement upon ſeveral intereſts, and imaginary forms of government; it having pleaſed Almighty God, by unexpected and wonderful means, to give theſe nations a probable hope of being reſtored to thoſe laws and privileges, which have been tranſmitted to them from their anceſtors; we do declare, that we think ourſelves obliged, next to Divine Providence, to attribute this gracious work to his Excellency the Lord General Monk, who as he had the courage to aſſert the public liberty, and the prudence to carry it on againſt ſo many difficulties, he alſo had the happineſs to lead us thus far through the wilderneſs of confuſion, without paſſing the red ſea of blood; and becauſe the enemies of the public peace have endeavoured to repreſent thoſe of the King's party, as men implacable, and ſuch as would ſacrifice the common good to their own private paſſions: we do ſincerely profeſs, that we do reflect upon our paſt ſufferings from the hands of God, and therefore do not cheriſh any violent thoughts or inclinations, to have been any way inſtrumental in them. And if the indiſcretion of any ſpirited perſons, tranſports them to expreſſions contrary to this our ſenſe, we utterly diſclaim them; and deſire that the imputation may extend no farther than the folly of the offenders. And we farther declare, that we intend by our quiet and peaceable behaviour, to teſtify our ſubmiſſion to the preſent power, as it now reſides in the council of ſtate, in expectation of the future parliament, upon whoſe wiſdom and determinations, we truſt God will give ſuch a bleſſing, as may produce a perfect ſettlement both in Church and State.

'And as his Excellency hath not choſen the ſandy foundations of ſelf-government, but the firm rock of national intereſt, whereon to frame a ſettlement: it is our hope and prayer, that when the building comes to be raiſed, it may not, like Rome, have the beginning in the blood of brethren; nor like Babel to be interrupted by the confuſion of tongues; but that we may all ſpeak in one language, and be of one name; that all mention of parties and factions, and all rancour and animoſities may be thrown in and buried like rubbiſh under the foundation.'

This declaration was ſubſcribed by the Marquis of Dorcheſter, and about ſeventy more of the nobility and gentry, that had been in the King's ſervice; and therefore it is a very clear teſtimony in favour of Sir Thomas Armſtrong, who ſubſcribed among the reſt, that he was at this time conſidered as a very hearty friend to the conſtitution, and as a very loyal ſervant to the King his maſter.

[C] As one of his principal adviſers.] The Duke of Monmouth, by the influence of the Earl of Shafteſbury, and ſome other men of the ſame political views, had been drawn not only to differ with the court, and to give his father, King Charles II., a great deal of uneaſineſs and diſturbance, but had alſo had recourſe to abundance of popular artifices, in order to ingratiate himſelf with the people. At the time of the Oxford parliament, there was an attempt made by the Earl of Shafteſbury, to have procured an alteration in the ſucceſſion, in the Duke's favour. This, though a thing of great conſequence, and in a great meaſure the baſis of all his ſubſequent proceedings, is very little known, and therefore it will contribute not a little to the clearing up the Duke's, and Sir Thomas Armſtrong's deſigns to ſet this matter in a full light. On March 24, 1680-1, the Earl of Shafteſbury demanded an audience of the King, then at Oxford, on pretence of a letter he had received, containing an expedient for ſettling the nation, and ſupplying the excluſion bill, to which his Majeſty had ſhewn himſelf exceſſively averſe (7). The Earl was accordingly introduced to his Majeſty, and his expedient propoſed, which was to ſettle the crown on the Duke of Monmouth. The King ſurpriſed, told the Earl he wondered, that, after ſo many declarations to the contrary, he ſhould preſs him upon that ſubject. That if either with conſcience, or juſtice, or nature, he could do ſuch a thing, he would have done it before; it being reaſonable that, if he ever had a child of his own legitimate, he would much rather have him reign than his brother, or any of his brother's children. That his Majeſty was none of thoſe that grew more timorous with age; but that rather he grew more reſolute, the nearer he was to his grave. At that word, the loyal Earl was mightily concerned, and cried out, that it chilled his blood to hear of ſuch an expreſſion; telling the King, how earneſt the whole nation was for his preſervation, that in him were comprized all their ſafeties, lives, liberties, and religion, and their all. Yes, anſwered his Majeſty, and yet my Lord, I am the only arbitrary man in the kingdom. But aſſure yourſelves, I intend to take a greater care of my own preſervation, and that of my people, than any of you all, that pretend to ſo much concern for the ſecurity of my perſon: and yet as careful as I am of my own preſervation, I would much ſooner loſe this life, of which you pretend to be ſuch watchful preſervers, than ever part with any of my prerogatives, or betray this place, the laws, or the religion, or alter the true ſucceſſion of the crown; it being repugnant both to conſcience and law. For that matter, replied the Earl, let us alone, we will make a law for it. But the King told him, My Lord, if this is your conſcience, it is far from being mine, for

was very buſy and aſſiduous, as appears by all the trials in reference to what was then called a plot, and was in reality a deſign againſt the government, which was in agitation for ſeveral months, but whether it was or was not to be attempted by force, is not extremely clear (i). The ſhare which Sir Thomas Armſtrong was ſuppoſed to have in it, was chiefly with reſpect to the guards, which, as he had commanded, he was thought to be beſt acquainted with, and therefore, whenever the deſign of ſurpriſing them came upon the carpet, he was principally conſulted. It was ſaid by the Attorney-General, at the trial of my Lord Ruſſel, that Sir Thomas Armſtrong was one of the Council of Six (k), but there was no proof of it. The matter of fact which bore hardeſt upon him, and which induced the government to purſue him with ſo much eagerneſs as they did, was the poſitive proof of his being preſent at the fatal meeting at Mr. Sheppard's, in the latter end of October 1682, at which meeting, a deſign of riſing in Dorſetſhire was talked of, in which Mr. Trenchard had promiſed to aſſiſt, but then declined it, to which it ſeems Sir Thomas Armſtrong was no ſtranger (l). He likewiſe was ſaid to have ſeen a declaration, or repreſentation of grievances, that was produced and read at this meeting, and thoſe who diſcovered this plot affirmed, that he propoſed the attacking the guards, and, in company with the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Grey, went to view them at the Savoy and the Meuſe, and on their return reported, that the guards were very remiſs in their places, and not like ſoldiers, and the thing was feaſible if they had ſtrength to do it (m). The Lord Ruſſel himſelf afterwards owned, that there was ſome ſuch diſcourſe as this, but that it was a ſuppoſition only, a bare enquiry, whether the thing was poſſible, and not any formed or ſettled deſign [D]. But the Court had no ſooner received informations of this nature againſt Sir Thomas, than they took all imaginable pains to get him into their hands; but he having timely notice of the diſcoveries made againſt him, made his eſcape, and concealed himſelf for ſome time in England, during which he was ſo uneaſy, that Mr. Hampden, who viſited him, was of opinion, he would then have diſcovered any thing to ſave his life; but either Mr. Hampden

this cannot be done without overthrowing all religion and law. And in fine, aſſure yourſelves that, as I love my life ſo well as to take all the care in the world to keep it with honour, ſo I do not think it of ſo great value, after fifty, to be preſerved with the forfeiture of my honour, conſcience, and the laws of the land. But this flat declaration did not either ſatisfy the Duke or diſcourage the Earl who prompted him. On the contrary, they proſecuted their intrigues with greater eagerneſs and openneſs than ever. The Duke, for that purpoſe, thought it neceſſary to make a tour through ſeveral parts of England, under colour of horſe-races and other diverſions, which alarmed the court exceedingly. An eminent hiſtorian prefaces his account of what happened in 1683, by ſaying (8), 'The Duke of 'Monmouth had been the laſt ſummer diverting himſelf in the country, with Sir Thomas Armſtrong in 'his company: In his return toward London, he was 'taken into cuſtody of a Serjeant at Arms at Stafford. 'The Duke received the meſſage with great preſence 'of mind, and went along with the Serjeant to London; and offered himſelf to Mr. Secretary Jenkins 'to be examined, provided there were others of the 'council preſent; but the Secretary refuſing to let any 'of the Lords attend, the Duke would not be queſtioned by him; ſo the Secretary ordered a ſecond 'warrant to be drawn, for the Meſſenger's keeping 'him in longer cuſtody, which he did from Saturday 'till Monday, and then the Duke was bailed before 'Judge Raymond: His bail were, the Earl of Clare, 'the Lord Grey, the Lord Ruſſel, William Leviſon 'Gower, Eſq; and John Offley, Eſq; The firſt day of 'the term he made his appearance at the King's 'Bench Bar, according to his recognizance, and cleared his bail.' In all this troubleſome affair, and in all the tranſactions the Duke of Monmouth was engaged in with his party, Sir Thomas Armſtrong was conſtantly concerned, and carried moſt of his orders and meſſages.

(8) Compleat Hiſt. of England, Vol. iii. p. 409.

[D] The thing was poſſible, and not any formed deſign.] It is neceſſary upon this occaſion, to give a ſuccinct account of this contrivance, againſt King Charles II.'s government, in which this gentleman was unluckily involved, the rather, becauſe moſt of our hiſtorians make themſelves parties in their relations, and either wholly juſtify the court, or elſe declare the whole ſtory of this deſign a forgery (9). Of theſe neither is to be done, becauſe neither can be done with truth. But as we have not much room to ſpare, and ſhall be obliged to touch this ſubject again under various articles, we ſhall be very ſhort here. The views of thoſe who were involved in this unhappy plot, appear to have regarded three different objects. By blending and confounding theſe, the court lawyers endeavoured to repreſent all as equally guilty, of which, as they fell ſhort in proof, it afforded room to ſuggeſt that none were guilty at all. In the firſt deſign, which was for a ſort of general inſurrection, in order to obtain a redreſs of grievances, all the Lords, and Sir Thomas Armſtrong, were concerned. The ſecond project, was the killing the King and Duke, in their paſſage from Newmarket to London, from a malt-houſe that ſtood upon the road, and from its being called the Rye-houſe, gave name to the plot. The third deſign was in conſequence of this: for a fire happening at Newmarket, which obliged the King to leave that place ſuddenly and go to Cambridge, upon this, thoſe deſperate people who were in the Rye-houſe deſign, were for proceeding ſtill, and for attacking the King and Duke in their paſſage to London. It is neceſſary to obſerve, that there is ſome confuſion in the accounts we have, about the deſign of attacking the guards, for amongſt the Lords and other perſons of diſtinction, it had been talked of, but among the ſecond ſort of people who were engaged in the Rye-houſe ſcheme, it had been really agreed on. Biſhop Burnet who certainly knew this matter as well as any man, and very probably had all he ſays about it, from the mouth of Lord Ruſſel, gives the following account of the converſation at Sheppard's, which was fatal to that Lord, and to Sir Thomas Armſtrong (10). 'The 'Duke of Monmouth, ſays he, gave an appointment 'to Lord Shaftſbury, or ſome of his friends, to meet 'him, and ſome others that he ſhould bring along 'with him, at Sheppard's, a wine merchant in whom 'they had an entire confidence. The night before 'this appointment, Lord Ruſſel came to town on account of his uncle's illneſs. The Duke of Monmouth 'went to him, and told him of the appointment, and 'deſired he would go thither with him: he conſented 'the rather, becauſe he intended to taſte ſome of that 'merchant's wine. At night they went with Lord 'Grey, and Sir Thomas Armſtrong. When they 'came, they found none there but Rumſey and Ferguſon, two of Lord Shaftſbury's tools that he employed: Upon which they ſeeing no better company, 'reſolved immediately to go back. But Lord Ruſſel 'called for a taſte of the wines, and while they were 'bringing it him up, Rumſey and Armſtrong fell into 'a diſcourſe of ſurpriſing the guards. Rumſey fancied it might be eaſily done: Armſtrong, that had 'commanded them, ſhewed him his miſtakes. This 'was no conſultation about what was to be done, 'but only about what might have been done; Lord 'Ruſſel ſpoke nothing upon the ſubject: but as ſoon 'as he had taſted his wines, they went away.'

was miſtaken, or Sir Thomas changed his ſentiments afterwards, and that in a very great degree, ſince he ſhewed infinitely more courage when in cuſtody, and even to his laſt breath, than any who were engaged with him in that weak and raſh deſign (o). After ſome time ſpent, with as much ſecrecy as poſſible in England, he withdrew into Holland, and paſſed by the name of Mr. Henry Lawrence, and there thought himſelf ſafe; but Mr. Chudleigh, King Charles's Miniſter there, obtaining a warrant from the States, for apprehending ſuch of the conſpirators as had fled from England, he was ſeized at Leyden by the Schout of that place, an officer not unlike our Sheriff, who delivered him up to the King's Miniſter for a preſent of five thouſand guilders, which is about five hundred pounds of our money (o), and he was then put on board the King's yatch called the Catherine, Captain Davies Commander, in order to be ſent to England. He muſt have been in great confuſion, otherwiſe he might certainly have preſerved his life; ſince, as he was a native of Holland, the States, if they had been informed of it in time, would undoubtedly have protected him (p); but he was hurried on board by the great induſtry of the Miniſter, who was very deſirous of making his court at home, by giving ſo ſtrong a proof of his zeal and diligence, as he knew the ſeizing of Sir Thomas Armſtrong would be accounted. While this unfortunate gentleman was in Holland, an indictment was preferred againſt him in London, for high-treaſon, upon which he was outlawed, and upon his being brought home, it was reſolved to proceed againſt him upon this outlawry, without allowing him the benefit of a trial (q). It was with this view, that immediately on his arrival in England, a warrant was granted for his commitment to Newgate, by Sidney Godolphin, Eſq; Secretary of State (afterwards Earl of Godolphin, and Lord High-Treaſurer of England). This warrant was dated 10th June, 1684 (r), and upon the fourteenth of the ſame month, he was carried up to the King's-Bench-Bar at Weſtminſter, where Sir Robert Sawyer, then Attorney General, moved the court for an award of execution upon the outlawry. The Lord Chief Juſtice Jefferies on his motion ordered Sir Thomas Armſtrong to be arraigned on the outlawry, and demanded of him what he had to ſay, Why execution ſhould not be awarded: he pleaded the ſtatute of 6 Ed. VI. by which it was provided, that if a perſon outlawed, who was beyond the ſeas, rendered himſelf to the Chief Juſtice of England within one year, he might traverſe the indictment, or appeal, and have the benefit of a trial, which he claimed, by rendering himſelf there at the bar within the year. The Lord Chief Juſtice, however, being of opinion that his caſe was not within the ſtatute, becauſe he did not yield himſelf voluntarily, but was brought to the bar in cuſtody, was for awarding execution. Sir Thomas demanded Council upon the point of law, which was refuſed him. He then obſerved, that the King had been pleaſed to offer Holloway the benefit of a trial, if he deſired it, who was exactly in the ſame caſe with himſelf. To this the Lord Chief Juſtice anſwered, that what was done for Holloway, was purely through the grace and mercy of the King, who might extend the ſame favour to him if he thought fit, but that this was not the buſineſs of a court of law (s). The Attorney-General interpoſed, and ſaid, that the priſoner deſerved no indulgence or mercy from the King, becauſe it had appeared by the evidence given on the late conſpiracy, that after the fire at Newmarket had diſappointed the Rye-houſe ſcheme of killing the King, this gentleman was one of the perſons that actually engaged to go, upon the King's haſty coming to town, and to deſtroy him by the way (t). The Lord Chief Juſtice interrupted the Attorney upon this, and told him, that they could not conſider evidence but the outlawry, upon which he awarded execution on the Friday following. There were many circumſtances of apparent hardſhip in Sir Thomas's caſe. At the time he was taken he was ſtripped of his money, ſo that when the Privy-Council offered to hear Lawyers on his behalf, he could not procure Council, having no money to fee them (u). He was in a manner hurried out of his life; for on the tenth of June 1684, he was committed to Newgate; on the twelfth he was brought before the Council: this proceeding at the King's-Bench-Bar, was on the fourteenth, and the day fixed for his execution was the twentieth. He was loaded with irons in Newgate, where he was cloſely confined, and ill treated, the jaylor ſtriking his daughter, Mrs. Catherine Armſtrong, while on her knees aſking him bleſſing (w). His other daughter, Mrs. Matthews, was committed by the Lord Chief Juſtice in court, for expreſſing ſome impatience at her father's uſage; but ſhe was afterwards diſcharged without paying fees (x). The worſt of all was, the brutal manner in which the Chief Juſtice himſelf behaved, for, upon Sir Thomas's ſaying that he ought to have the benefit of the law, and that he demanded no more, Jefferies, with great indecency, anſwered, That you ſhall have, by the Grace of God. See that execution be done on Friday next, according to law. You ſhall have the full benefit of the law (y). Yet the point on which the priſoner depended, and which was clearly ſet forth, in a paper tendered to the Chief Juſtice and Attorney-General [E], was certainly

[E] Paper tendered to the Chief Juſtice and Attorney-General.] This paper was preſented by the Lady Armſtrong, on the behalf of her huſband, to the Lord Keeper North, the Lord Chief Juſtice Jeffries, and Sir Robert Sawyer; and ran in the following terms (11), viz. 'My Lord, I am informed, 'that, by the common law of England, any man 'that was outlawed in felony or treaſon, might 'bring a Writ of Error, to reverſe his outlawry; 'which was to be granted, ex Debito Juſtitiæ. certainly in his favour, and the court of King's-Bench have de[illegible] as much ſince, in caſes of the like nature, where priſoners have been admitted to a trial (z) [F]. The chief reaſon why the King ſuffered this gentleman to be ſo hardly treated, was expreſſed by the Attorney-General, as has been before ſhewn; but there were beſides ſome other reaſons, with which we ſhall not leave the reader unacquainted [G]. On Friday the twentieth

(z) See the remarks in note [F].

' it may be the manner of ſuing for ſuch a Writ ' of Error to the King, might be by way of petition, ' (as in a petition, or Remonſtrance de Droit, for lands, ' &c.) and ſo it was reſolved in Ninian Melvin's ' Caſe, Co. 4. Inſt. 215.

' Next, by the common law, if any man were in ' England, at the time of the Exigent awarded, and ' went out of the realm after that, and before the ' outlawry pronounced, he could never aſſign that for ' error, that he was beyond-ſea at the time of the ' pronouncing the outlawry; and the reaſon is, be- ' cauſe he was here at the time of the awarding ' of the Exigent, and might reaſonably have notice ' of it.

' On the other ſide, if any were out of England, ' during the whole proceſs and pronunciation of the ' outlawry, it was never yet a doubt, but that was ' an error, and might be aſſigned for error, either ' by the party or his heir, at the common law, and ' ſo continues to this day; and was not long ſince ad- ' judged in O'Kerney's caſe, the Iriſhman, who came ' in about two years after the outlawry.

' Then comes the Statute of 5 and 6 Edw. VI. ' Cap. ii. and enlarges the law for the benefit of the ' outlawed perſon, and gives him liberty to aſſign ' for error, That he was beyond-ſea, at the time ' of the outlawry pronounced; which he could not ' do by common law before the ſtatute: and ſo ' continues.

' Then comes the proviſo, and ſays, That he muſt ' come in within a year, and render himſelf to be ' entitled to the benefit of that Act; which was, to ' aſſign for error, that he was beyond-ſea at the time ' of the outlawry pronounced.

' So that, my Lord, upon this ſhort ſtate of the ' law, and my huſband's caſe, he being beyond-ſea ' all the time of the proceſs, and at the time of the ' outlawry pronounced; it is conceived, he is well en- ' titled to aſſign this for error at the common law, ' without any aid of the ſtatute, though the pro- ' viſo in that ſtatute ſhould be ruled againſt him: ' which (with ſubmiſſion) is the opinion of many ' learned perſons in the law, That he is within ' the intent and meaning of that proviſo, for many ' reaſons, too long to trouble your Lordſhip with ' now.

' Therefore, I do hope, that this caſe of my ' huſband, being the firſt caſe that any man was ' executed upon an outlawry (that did not deſire ' it) (12), may have that weight with your Lordſhip, ' that it deſerves; and do hope, that your Lordſhip ' will ſo adviſe the King, in matter of law (whoſe ' Council you are), that my huſband may have a ' Writ of Error granted him, and Counſel aſſigned ' him to argue theſe points, as the law has allowed ' to criminals in capital caſes, with whatſoever ' elſe ſhall appear upon the record of outlawry ' produced, which as yet my huſband, or any for him, ' never ſaw!'

(12) This refers to the caſe of Holloway concerned in the ſame Treaſon, who was offered a trial, refuſed it, and was executed on the Outlawry.

[F] Where priſoners have been admitted to a trial.] The ſtatute of which this gentleman claimed the benefit, was as clear and expreſs as any thing could be, as may appear by the following clauſes read at his trial (13). ' All proceſs of outlawry hereafter, ' to be made and had within this Realm, againſt ' any offenders in treaſon being reſiant or inha- ' bitant out of the limits of this realm, or in any ' the parts beyond the ſea, at the time of the out- ' lawry produced againſt them, ſhall be as good and ' effectual in the law to all intents and purpoſes, as ' if any ſuch offenders had been reſident and dwelling ' within this realm, at the time of ſuch proceſs a- ' warded, and outlawry pronounced.

' Provided always, and be it enacted by the autho- ' rity aforeſaid, That if the party ſo hereafter be out- ' lawed, ſhall within one year next after the ſaid out- ' lawry pronounced, or judgment given upon the ſaid ' outlawry, yield himſelf unto the Chief Juſtice of ' England, for the time being, and offer to traverſe ' the indictment or appeal, whereupon the ſaid out- ' lawry ſhall be pronounced as is aforeſaid: That ' then he ſhall be received to the ſaid traverſe, and ' being thereupon found not guilty, by the verdict ' of twelve men, he ſhall be clearly acquitted and ' diſcharged of the ſaid outlawry, and of all penal- ' ties and forfeitures by reaſon of the ſame, in as ' large and ample manner and form, as though no ' ſuch outlawry had been made? any thing herein ' contained to the contrary, in any wiſe notwith- ' ſtanding.'

(13) 5 and 6 Ed. VI., c. ii. § 3 and 4.

Yet it does not appear, that ever this point was fully and clearly ſettled till very lately, and that in the following caſe (14). King and Johnſon, Mich. 2 Geo. II. B. R. the priſoner, was allowed to be within the benefit of the proviſo; and though he had eſcaped out of priſon, and was re-taken in England, was admitted to prove himſelf beyond-ſea, at the time of the outlawry; and, upon proving that he was then at Middleburgh in Zealand, his outlawry was reverſed, and he admitted to a trial and acquitted: and on this occaſion Armſtrong's caſe was declared a precedent not fit to be followed.

[G] We ſhall not leave the reader unacquainted.] There are three cauſes aſſigned for the King's ſeverity, towards the unfortunate Sir Thomas Armſtrong. I. That he had been employed by Cromwell, to aſſaſſinate him while abroad, which it ſeems had come to Sir Thomas Armſtrong's ear; but as we ſhall ſee in the next note, it is far from being certain, either that the King actually believed this, or that Sir Thomas thought he believed it. II. The reaſon aſſigned by the Attorney-General, which was, that he was deep in the deſign againſt his perſon; and of this the Lord Howard gave the following account upon oath. ' Upon reflection, I am apt to think, that ' from this time (October 1683) and not before, the ' deſign of waylaying the King, in his return to ' London, was firſt meditated; and I am the more ' confirmed in this opinion, from the conſideration ' of the behaviour of the Duke of Monmouth, and ' the Lord Grey, who ſeemed to be very big of ' expectation, of ſome great thing to be attempted ' upon the day of the King's coming from New- ' market; upon which day Sir Thomas Armſtrong ' was not to be found, till the King's coaches were ' come into town, and I do verily believe, he was ' to have headed the party.' Col. Rumſey, as ſoon as he heard of Armſtrong's being taken, made oath in theſe words: ' Sir Thomas Armſtrong did come ' to me the Sunday night after the fire at New- ' market, and told me that he juſt came from Fer- ' guſon; and notwithſtanding the King and Duke ' were to return ſo ſoon, yet Ferguſon did not doubt ' by that time to have men ready to do the buſi- ' neſs, and deſired me to go with him to Ferguſon's ' lodgings in his coach, which I did. When I came ' there, Ferguſon told me the ſame, but that they ' wanted money. Upon which Sir Thomas deſired ' me to lend ſome, and he would ſee me repaid; ' and added, that if he had been in ſtock, he would ' have done it himſelf.' Biſhop Sprat, who by order of the King wrote the Hiſtory of this Conſpiracy, having mentioned theſe facts, proceeds thus, very probably by his Majeſty's direction (15). ' After ' this, the King could not think himſelf in the leaſt ' bound to go out of the way of the law, for ' ſhewing any diſtinguiſhing act of grace to Sir ' Thomas Armſtrong, eſpecially when it is manifeſt ' there was ſcarce a man living, who had more ' perſonal obligations to his Majeſty, than he had, ' and yet no man had made more ungrateful re- ' turns for them than he had done. Nor could his ' Majeſty forget how many other perſons, and ſome ' very near his Majeſty, Sir Thomas Armſtrong had ' been the chief inſtrument of perverting, upon which ' account his Majeſty had reaſon to look on him ' as the author of many more treaſons beſides his ' own.' This ſeems to be clear and ſatisfactory, and is moſt like to have been the true ground of the King's proceeding. III. But Biſhop Burnet gives twentieth of June, about nine in the morning, the Sheriffs of London and Middleſex came to Newgate, and demanded their priſoner, who was immediately put into a ſledge, and drawn to the place of execution, attended by a numerous guard. He employed the time he was drawing to Tyburn, in reading The Whole Duty of Man, till he came within ſight of the gallows, and then he laid it by, and with lifted-up hands and eyes, addreſſed himſelf to Heaven, till he came beneath the tree, where he remained about a quarter of an hour in the ſledge. Before he aſcended the cart that ſtood ready for him, he deſired the Sheriff to admit Dr. Teniſon to come to him, and having delivered a paper to the Sheriff, the Doctor kneeled down with the priſoner, and prayed with him about a quarter of an hour, during all which time, the priſoner preſerved a becoming and heroic countenance, little daunted with the terror of that fate he was in view of; but riſing from his devotions, he pulled off his cravat and hat, which he gave to his ſervant who attended him, and had followed him by the ſledge ſide, when kneeling down himſelf, he prayed for a ſhort time with fervency and devotion, begging pardon of God for thoſe manifold and crying ſins he had been too often guilty of, and concluded with a reſignation of himſelf to the God of Heaven and Earth, before whoſe judgment-ſeat he was forthwith to appear, deſiring that the whole world would forgive him, with whom he hoped he died in peace and charity. Having thus ended theſe devotions, he again ſtood up, and putting off his periwig, he had a white cap delivered to him, which he put on; and being ſoon after tied up, the chief of his diſcourſe was addreſſed to a gentleman who ſtood by him; and after a ſhort ſpace, holding up his hands, he again renewed his prayers; his viſage little changing all that time, till the very moment the cart drew away: the executioner having pulled the cap over his eyes, he continued his prayers all the time, and even whilſt he hung, as long as life was in him, and he had the command of his lips. After he had hung about half an hour, and the executioner had diveſted him of his apparel, he was cut down according to his ſentence, his privy members burnt, his head cut off and ſhewed to the people as that of a traitor, his heart and bowels taken out, and committed to the flames, and his body quartered into four parts, which, with his head, were conveyed back to Newgate, to be diſpoſed of according to his Majeſty's pleaſure; and were afterwards publickly expoſed (b), his head being ſet upon Weſtminſter-Hall, between thoſe of Cromwell and Bradſhaw, one of his quarters upon Temple-Bar, two others at Alderſgate and Aldgate, and the fourth was ſent down to Stafford, for which town he had ſerved in Parliament (c). The paper he delivered to the Sheriffs, contains in it ſeveral curious particulars worthy of notice, and as it has been very imperfectly printed elſewhere, we have preſerved it in the notes (d) [H]. We are informed by Biſhop Burnet, that he prepared another paper (e), but thought fit to quite another turn to this; he ſays (16), The Court had a mind to proceed in a ſummary way with him, that he ſhould, by the hurry of it, be driven to ſay any thing that could ſave him. This is viſibly that Prelate's own conjecture; and the reader will not think it very probable, if he conſiders, that Sir Thomas Armſtrong, who was the laſt perſon executed for this conſpiracy, could therefore ſay very little that was not known before; and that he never appears to have had the leaſt offer of mercy made him.

'I THANK Almighty God, though I have had but a ſhort time allowed me, I find myſelf prepared for death, and my thoughts ſet on another world; and I truſt in God's mercy, I am well weaned from ſetting my heart on this: Yet I cannot but give ſo much of my little time to ſet down in writing, my anſwers to ſome calumnies raiſed ſince my cloſe impriſonment, as well as what Mr. Attorney accuſed me of at the bar. I was told, a very great perſon ſaid, I was a ſpy of Cromwell's. I was ſent from England by the beſt and conſiderableſt friends the King had then, with bills of exchange, and letters of very great importance, to his Majeſty at Bruſſels; I appeal to his Majeſty if I delivered them not ſafe, and his anſwer to them, when I returned; which I had not been above ſix days, but I was clapped up a cloſe priſoner in the Gatehouſe, and in extreme danger of my life, for that journey. Before this, I had been a year in Lambeth houſe a priſoner; and after a priſoner in the Tower, when the Uſurper died, and near ſtarving in every one of them: very ill treatment for a ſpy and a penſioner! My Lord of Oxford, and many others of quality, will, I think, teſtify my innocence in this point. I proteſt before God, I was never a ſpy or penſioner to Cromwell or any other man. On Saturday laſt, I was brought down to the King's-Bench-Bar, on an outlawry for high-treaſon: I was aſked what I had to ſay for myſelf, that judgment of death ſhould not paſs? I anſwered, that I was beyond ſea when the outlawry came out; I thought the law allowed a writ of error to reverſe it: I prayed I might be allowed a trial for my life according to the laws of the land; I urged the ſtatute of Edward VI., which was expreſs for it; but it ſignified nothing: I was condemned and made a precedent, though Mr. Holloway a little before had it offered him. I cannot but think all the world will conclude my caſe very different: And why was it refuſed me? Mr. Attorney accuſed me there, for being one of thoſe that were to kill the King, as ſoon as he came back from Newmarket after the fire. I take God to witneſs, I never was in any deſign to take away the King's life: neither had any man the impudence to propoſe ſo baſe and barbarous a thing to me: neither was I ever in any deſign to alter the government of England. What I am accuſed of, I know no otherwiſe than by reports and prints: which I take to be uncertain, ſo that it cannot be expected I ſhould make particular anſwers to them. If I had been tried, I could have proved my Lord Howard's baſe reflections upon me, to be a notorious falſhood: for there are at leaſt ten gentlemen, beſides all the ſervants in the houſe, can prove I dined there that day.

'I have lived and now die of the reformed religion, a true and ſincere Proteſtant, and in the communion of the Church of England. I have found the great comfort of the love and mercy of God, in and through my Bleſſed Redeemer, in whom I only truſt; and I do verily hope, I am going to partake of that fulneſs of joy, which I believe is in his preſence; the hopes whereof do infinitely pleaſe me. I thank God, I have no repining at my heart for the condition my ſins have moſt deſervedly brought me to: I have deſerved much worſe at the hands of God: ſo that I chearfully ſubmit to this puniſhment, as being taken off but a ſmall time ſooner. I do freely for-

to lay it aſide, for reaſons with which that Prelate ſeems to have been well acquainted, and which are likewiſe of ſuch a nature, as that they deſerve to be conſidered [I]. The characters given of him are very different [K]. After the Revolution, all the proceedings on the Rye-houſe conſpiracy were taken up with great warmth, and an enquiry was ſet on foot, to diſcover who were the promoters of the deaths of Lord Ruſſel, Colonel Sidney, and Sir Thomas Armſtrong. Dame Catherine Armſtrong, who was the Earl of Clarendon's niece (f), ſhewed a great deal of zeal in proſecuting ſuch as had been concerned in bringing her huſband to an ignominious end, and for that purpoſe, preſented

'give all the world, even thoſe concerned in taking 'away my life. As for the ſentence of death paſſed 'upon me, I cannot but think it a very hard one; 'being denied the law of the land as I think. To 'conclude, as I never had any deſign againſt the 'King's life, or the life of any man; ſo I was never 'in any deſign to alter the government. I die in 'charity with all the world; and therefore, I heartily 'pray God to bleſs the church of Chriſt every where, 'theſe poor nations, and the King's Majeſty; and I 'heartily commend my ſoul to God's infinite mercy, 'through my bleſſed Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.'

[I] They deſerve to be conſidered.] In the firſt place, it is very evident from the drift of Sir Thomas's ſpeech, which is very ſerious, ſolemn, and well-ſuited to the occaſion, that he does by no means come up to what Biſhop Burnet aſſerts was his meaning. For after the ſtory tranſcribed from him in a former note (18), as to what the King ſhould ſay of his being employed by Cromwell to murder him, that prelate proceeds thus: '(19) Armſtrong took this heavily, and in one paper 'which I ſaw written in his own hand, the reſent-'ments upon it were ſharper than I thought became a 'dying penitent. So when that was repreſented to him 'he changed it: and in the paper he gave the Sheriffs 'he had ſoftened it much. But yet he ſhewed the 'falſehood of that report.' One cannot but ſtand amazed at this, when one conſiders the ſpeech itſelf, in which, as the reader ſees, there is not one word about his being charged with a deſign of killing the King when he went to him at Bruſſels, or any thing like it. All that it appears from his ſpeech Sir Thomas Armſtrong had heard, was his being charged with acting as a ſpy for Cromwell, which was (as he ſays) reported of him by a very great perſon, but plainly not the King, for it is to the King he appeals for his juſtification in this very point. As to another obſervation of the Biſhop's, that it was this paſſage in Armſtrong's ſpeech, that hindered the court from ordering obſervations to be made on it, as had been made on other ſpeeches; it is a very unnatural conjecture, ſince if the King had told ſuch a ſtory, he would certainly have juſtified, or elſe have directed Biſhop Sprat to have mentioned it in that part of his hiſtory of the conſpiracy, in which he particularly mentions the caſe of Armſtrong. As to the real cauſe of the court's publiſhing no reflections on this ſpeech, I really conceive it to have been the modeſty, plainneſs, and loyalty of the diſcourſe, that hindered its being animadverted upon. Sir Thomas Armſtrong diſavows the knowledge of any deſign againſt the King's life, but ſays nothing of the diſcourſe about the guards. He thought, like Lord Ruſſel, that attacking the guards, becauſe not eſtabliſhed by act of parliament, was neither levying war, nor compaſſing his death in the eye of the law. He likewiſe affirms, that he was in no conſpiracy for ſubverting the government. One would ſuppoſe therefore, the Duke of Monmouth was in no ſuch ſchemes either, and that this was what provoked the Earl of Shafteſbury to withdraw to Holland, as finding his friends differing from each other's opinion, and purſuing various ends, which he knew muſt iſſue in diſappointing them all. It ſhould ſeem therefore on the whole, if we give entire credit to Sir Thomas's ſpeech (as indeed we ought): I ſay it ſhould ſeem as if the Duke of Monmouth and his friends, had formed ſome ſuch deſign as proved fatal to Robert, Earl of Eſſex, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and this juſtifies the diſtinction we made before, of the ſtages and ſeveral ſchemes of thoſe who were involved in this unlucky contrivance. But with reſpect to Sir Thomas's complaint as to his hard treatment, take it in any light, and it muſt be allowed to be well founded: the offering Holloway his trial in the ſame condition, makes the caſe ſtill harder, and if the Attorney-General's proofs were ſo clear, that made it no leſs hard; as on the other hand, if Sir Thomas could have falſified Lord Howard's evidence, that made it hardeſt of all. But what ſhews there was ſome particular rancour againſt Armſtrong, was the indicting Mr. Joſeph Hayes (20) for remitting him one hundred and fifty pounds when in Holland, though outlawed, and trying him for high-treaſon, in which, however, the proof failed, Mr. Hayes was acquitted.

[K] The characters given of him are very different.] It was a point of great conſequence to the government, to convince the nation of the truth of this conſpiracy, and therefore the King not only publiſhed a very ſolemn declaration, in which he ſet forth moſt of the particulars, and ordered it to be read in churches, that the people in all parts of his dominions might be thoroughly informed of what it was deſired they ſhould know; but afterwards deſired Dr. Sprat, Biſhop of Rocheſter, to write the hiſtory of it, which he did with accuracy and elegance. His Lordſhip particularly aimed at drawing characters well; and that which he has given to Sir Thomas Armſtrong is conceived in the following words: 'Sir Thomas Armſtrong a de-'bauched atheiſtical bravo, one of thoſe, who, with 'an hypocriſy peculiar to this age, would have paſſed 'for the moſt forward reformer in Church and 'State, whilſt they themſelves, both in their practice 'and opinions, were the greateſt corrupters of vir-'tue and all good manners (21).' Throughout the whole of that hiſtory, his Lordſhip repreſents him as the moſt ſteady, and the moſt daring of all who were concerned in this deſign; and at the very laſt, when all their ſchemes were broken, inſiſting, that if but a thouſand men could be got together, with the Duke of Monmouth at their head, there might ſtill be ſomething done, adding, that at the worſt it was better to die like men, than to be hanged like dogs (22)—— There is plainly in this character, a mixture of great as well as bad qualities; and if we conſider the view with which the Biſhop wrote, and his being immediately under the influence of the King, for his hiſtory was finiſhed in the reign of Charles II. though publiſhed in that of King James; I ſay, if we conſider this, we cannot but allow, that whoever reads this character, will have no mean or deſpicable opinion of the gentleman on whom it is beſtowed. But let us now ſee what Biſhop Burnet ſays of him, who profeſſed a perfect acquaintance with all who were concerned in this affair, which he treats more at large, and with apparently greater labour than any other tranſaction mentioned in his firſt volume. 'Sir Thomas Armſtrong, 'ſays he, was truſted in every thing by the Duke of 'Monmouth, and he having led a very vicious life, 'the court hoped, that he not being able to bear the 'thoughts of dying, would have diſcovered every 'thing. He ſhewed ſuch a dejection of mind while 'he was concealing himſelf, before he eſcaped out of 'England, that Hampden, who ſaw him at that time, 'told me, he believed he would certainly do any 'thing that would ſave his life. Yet all were diſap-'pointed in him, for when he was examined before 'the council, he ſaid he knew of no plot but the Po-'piſh plot, he deſired he might have a fair trial for 'his life, which was all he aſked (23).—— His car-'riage during his impriſonment and at his death, was 'far beyond what could have been imagined; he turn-'ed himſelf wholly to the thoughts of God, and of 'another ſtate, and was praying continually. He re-'joiced that he was brought to die in ſuch a manner: 'he ſaid it was ſcarce poſſible for him to have been 'awakened into a due ſenſe of his ſins, by any other 'method. His pride, and his reſentments, were then 'ſo entirely conquered, that one who ſaw him, ſaid to 'me, that it was not eaſy to think it was the ſame 'perſon whom he had known formerly; he received 'the ſacrament, and died in ſo good a temper, and 'with ſo much quiet in his mind, and in ſo ſerene a 'deportment, that we have ſcarce known in our time 'a more eminent inſtance of the grace and mercy of 'God (24).'

on the twelfth of November 1689, a petition to the House of Commons, in the name of herself and her daughters; upon which a Committee was appointed to examine the matter, and to make their report to the House (g). They came also the same day to a resolution, that it should be an instruction to the same Committee, that they should enquire, who were the Judges that gave the sentence against Sir Thomas Armstrong, who were the prosecutors of him, and who had his estate, and how the petitioners may have reparation; and also to examine, what proceedings were in order to a Writ of Error by him desired, and how it came to be denied, and by whom. This affair being taken up with so much ardour, and the Committee being particularly directed to make their report with all convenient speed, one might naturally expect that the inquiry would have been attended with consequences of an extraordinary nature. The report, indeed, which was made on the nineteenth of November, promised as much. It was made by Mr. Chrisly, who informed the House, that, upon a full enquiry, the Committee had come to the resolutions mentioned in the notes [L]. There was about the same time an inquiry set on foot in the House of Lords, to inspect who were the advisers and prosecutors of the murders of Lord Russel, Colonel Sidney, Sir Thomas Armstrong, Alderman Cornish, and others, before whom several persons were examined, and amongst them Dame Catherine Armstrong, widow of Sir Thomas, Mrs. Jane Matthews, and Mrs. Catherine Armstrong, his daughters; but they proved no more than the refusing the writ of error, and the bad usage Sir Thomas had met with, so that it was not looked upon as sufficient evidence to ground any parliamentary proceeding upon, in regard to Sir Thomas, though the other attainders were reversed (b). On the twentieth of January 1689, Mr. Chrisly reported from the Committee to whom the bill for reversing the attainder of Sir Thomas Armstrong was committed, that they had made some amendments to the bill, and discovered who were his prosecutors, and what losses were sustained by his family; upon which Sir Richard Holloway, Sir Francis Wythins, the executors of the late Lord Jefferies, the executors of the late Mr. Justice Walcot, Mr. Graham, and Mr. Burton, were ordered to attend the House; and Mrs. Matthews being called in and examined, charged Sir Robert Sawyer, who at the time of the prosecution was Attorney-General, and then a member of the House, with being one of the prosecutors of her father, upon which, after she was withdrawn, he was heard in his place, as to what he was able to offer in his own defence, and then withdrew (i). The House upon a debate resolved, that his name should be added to the rest of the prosecutors of Sir Thomas Armstrong, and at the same time expelled him the House. On the twenty-fifth of the same month, Sir Francis Wythins, Sir Richard Holloway, Mr. Graham, and Mr. Burton, were examined, and the executors of the late Lord Jefferies were likewise called in, and asked what they had to say, Why reparation should not be made out of the estate of the late Lord Jefferies to the family of Sir Thomas Armstrong, for the losses they had sustained by his attainder. No persons appearing as executors to the late Mr. Justice Walcot, the House was acquainted that he died intestate, and that he had not left an estate sufficient to pay his debts (k). After all these persons had been heard and withdrawn, Mr. Blaney was called in, who gave the House a large account of the proceedings in the court of King's-Bench, on the awarding execution against Sir Thomas Armstrong upon the outlawry. The House then proceeded upon the amendments made by the Committee to the bill, and after inserting the name of Sir Robert Sawyer, Knt. as a prosecutor, they resolved, that the sum of five thousand pounds should be paid by the Judges and prosecutors of Sir Thomas Armstrong to his widow and children, as a recompence for the losses they had sustained, by reason of his

'I. That Sir Thomas Armstrong's plea ought to 'have been admitted according to the statute of 'Edw. VI., and that the execution of him, upon the 'attainder by outlawry, was illegal and a murder, by 'pretence of justice.

'II. That the executors and heirs of Sir Thomas 'Armstrong, ought to have a reparation of their losses, 'out of the estates of those that were his judges and 'prosecutors.

'III. That a Writ of Error for the reversal of a 'judgment in felony or treason, is the right of the 'subject, and ought to be granted at his desire, and 'is not an Act of Grace or Favour, which may be 'denied or granted at pleasure.'

To all which Resolves the House agreed.

The House being at the same time acquainted, that the Committee had received an account, that, at the time of his decease, Sir Thomas Armstrong stood possessed of 300 l. per annum real estate, bonds and securities for 4800 l. and an annuity of 500 l.

'That leave be given to bring in a bill to re-'verse the attainder of the said Sir Thomas Arm-'strong, and to make reparation to his widow and 'children, out of the estates of the judges and 'prosecutors, and that the Bill do pass without 'fees (25).'

[It hath been remarked to us, by a learned correspondent, that if, when it is said in the note [G] Sir Thomas Armstrong was the last person who was executed for the conspiracy, it was meant to insinuate that this was owing to the mercy of the Court, there is no reason to think that such was the case. Sir Thomas was the last that suffered, because the government was not able to find evidence against more offenders who could be reached. The same correspondent hath observed, with regard to the strictures upon Bishop Burnet, in the note [I], that Sir Thomas Armstrong, in his dying paper, says, he never was in any design to take away the King's life; which must imply Brussels, as well as Newmarket. Nothing but the strongest prejudices of party (to which, however, the most ingenious and worthy men may be subject) can induce any to soften the arbitrary and cruel measures of the latter end of King Charles the Second's reign. It is observable that three of our latest historians, Hume, Dalrymple, and M'Pherson, who will not be suspected of an intention to exaggerate matters against the government of that time, do uniformly concur in representing the treatment of Sir Thomas Armstrong as an act of injustice (26).] K.

attainder; and upon a debate, the bill was recommitted to the ſame Committee (l). But notwithſtanding all theſe vigorous reſolutions, there followed nothing from them, for the ſeſſion of Parliament ſoon after ended (m), and ſo the bill was loſt; and a new Parliament being called in the ſucceeding year, in which there was nothing done in matters of this nature, the attainder remained in full force, and the family of Sir Thomas Armſtrong continued under all the difficulties brought upon them by it, till, in the ſixth of William and Mary, it was reverſed upon a writ of error (n) in the King's-Bench, in which the error aſſigned was, that the record of the outlawry did not mention where the court of Huſtings was held, in which he was outlawed, the words pro civitate London, being omitted. Of this error Sir Thomas himſelf might have taken advantage, if he could have obtained ſuch a writ; but the doctrine in law then was, that a writ of error was a writ of grace, and therefore the Lord Keeper North ſaid, it was not in him, but in the King to grant it; ſo that the ſubject gained this advantage, by the parliamentary enquiry beforementioned, viz. that the Houſe of Commons by their reſolution eſtabliſhed the contrary doctrine, That a writ of error is a writ of right, and not of favour, which may be granted or denied at pleaſure (o). ARNULPH or EARNULPH or ERNULPH, Biſhop of Rocheſter in the reign of King Henry I., was a Frenchman by birth, and for ſome time a Monk of St. Lucian de Beauvais. Obſerving ſome irregularities among his brethren, which he could neither remedy nor endure, he reſolved to quit the monaſtery; but firſt he took the advice of Lanfranc Archbiſhop of Canterbury, under whom he had ſtudied in the abbey of Bec (a). That Prelate, who was well acquainted with his merit, invited him over into England, and placed him in the monaſtery of Canterbury, where he lived till Lanfranc's death. Afterwards, when Anſelm came into that See, Arnulph was made Prior of the monaſtery of Canterbury [A], and afterwards Abbot of Peterborough (b) [B]. In 1115, he was conſecrated Biſhop of Rocheſter, in the room of Radulphus or Ralph, removed to the See of Canterbury [C]. He ſat nine years and a few days, and died in March 1124, aged eighty-four (c). This Prelate wrote a book concerning the foundation, endowment, charters, laws, and other things relating to the church of Rocheſter [D]. There are extant beſides, Tomellus, ſive Epiſtola Ernulfi ex

[A] He was made Prior of the monaſtery of Canterbury.] Part of the cathedral church of Canterbury, built by Archbiſhop Lanfranc, being fallen to the ground, Arnulph rebuilt it, and beautified it with fine glaſs windows, a pavement of marble, and a painted roof; inſomuch that it exceeded all the churches in England in magnificence. This we learn from William of Malmſbury. Cantiæ dejectam priorem partem eccleſiæ, quam Lanfrancus ædificaverat, adeo ſplendide erexit, ut nihil tale poſſit in Anglia videri, in vitrearum feneſtrarum luce, in marmorei pavimenti nitore, in diverſicoloribus picturis, quæ mirantes oculos trahunt ad faſtigia lacunaris (1).

[B] —— and afterwards Abbot of Peterborough.] Malmſbury tells us, he increaſed the number of monks in that monaſtery, and regulated their behaviour: he likewiſe cleared away the rubbiſh of the old convent, which was fallen into ruins, and had almoſt built a new one; but a ſudden fire deſtroyed all he had done, and, before he could repair the damage, he was removed to the See of Rocheſter. *In Burgo Monachorum numerus auctus, religio bonis monitis confota; Ædium veterum ruderibus deturbatis, nova fundamenta jacta, culmina erecta. [C] He was conſecrated Biſhop of Rocheſter.] On the day of his election, he related to the monks of Rocheſter a viſion he had had a few days before, acquainting him with his approaching election into that See. The ſtory is told us by a contemporary writer as follows. 'Qui omni favore a ſuis acceptus, 'ipſo die electionis ſuæ dixit nobis: "Sciebam, in-"quit, Fratres, ante paucos dies me licet indignum "ad celſitudinem hujus ordinis in proximo promo-"vendum. Apparuit enim mihi dormienti, cum ad-"huc eſſem in loco meo, pater Gundulfus annulum "magni ponderis mihi offerens. Cumque ad grave-"dinem ipſius imbecillitas mea non ſufficere videre-"tur, me ad onus ejus ſtupidum et accipere renuen-"tem increpavit, et poſt increpationem annulum me "recipere coëgit; deinde non apparuit." Hæc ille, 'Nos autem qui præſentes ab eo hæc audivimus, in-'telleximus poſtea non fantaſticam eſſe illuſionem, 'quam vir ſanctus in ſomnis viderat; quia poſtmo-'dum factus Roffenſis Epiſcopus eundem annulum re-'cepit, quem Gundulfus Epiſcopus vivens Radulfo 'adhuc abbati ſed futuro Epiſcopo dederat (3). —— 'Arnulph being received by the Monks with all marks 'of reſpect, ſaid to us on the very day of his election: "Brethren, I had aſſurance given me a few days ago, "that, unworthy as I am, I ſhould ſoon be raiſed to "the dignity now conferred upon me. For as I ſlept "one night, Gundulphus (*) appeared to me, offer-"ing me a ring of great weight; which being too "heavy for me, I refuſed to accept it: but he, chiding "me for my ſtupidity in rejecting his preſent, obliged "me to receive it, and then diſappeared." This he 'related to us; and we were convinced it was no 'fantaſtical illuſion, which the holy man had ſeen in 'his ſleep, ſince, being made Biſhop of Rocheſter, he 'received that very ring, which Biſhop Gundulphus, 'when alive, had given to Ralph, then an Abbot, 'but afterwards Biſhop.' Malmeſbury tells us, that, though the long life of Gundulphus, and the care he took of his church, had ſcarcely left any thing for his ſucceſſors to do, yet that Arnulph made daily improvements in his See. Ibi quamvis omnia jam facta viderentur (prævenerat enim vivacitas Gundulphi cmnium ſucceſſorum diligentiam) tamen ſemper aliquid comminiſci, ubi virtus eniteſcere poſſet; firmare antiqua, moliri recentia (4).

[E] Tomellus, sive Epistola, &c.] This letter was written in answer to a question proposed to Arnulph by Walkelin, in a conversation which they had at Canterbury upon this subject; Whether a woman who had committed adultery with her husband's son by a former wife, ought to be separated from her husband. Arnulph maintained the affirmative, and Walkelin the negative. In this letter Arnulph endeavours to shew, that all the passages of Scripture, in which divorce is prohibited, are to be understood of a voluntary separation between persons not guilty of adultery. And in confirmation of his own opinion, he alledges farther, that it was the practice of the ancient Church to prohibit the use of marriage for ever to adulterers. He asserts, that there is no injustice in separating a man from his wife for a crime, in which he himself is no way concerned (7).

[F] Epistola Solutiones quasdam continens, &c.] This letter is an answer to five questions proposed by Lambert. The first is, 'Why the Eucharist was 'then given in a manner different, and almost con-'trary to that which Christ practised; it being the 'custom at that time to administer the Host dipt 'in wine, whereas our Saviour gave the bread and 'wine separately?' Arnulph replies, that our Saviour prescribed to mankind, what was necessary for the obtaining salvation, without mentioning the particular manner and circumstances of his injunctions: and that this is the reason why several practices, which were in use in the Primitive Church, had been a long time discontinued. The second question is, 'Why a 'third part of the Host is put into the chalice?' He answers, that this custom was introduced, that the Bishop or Priest, who celebrated, might communicate of that part, which he put into the chalice, and distribute the two others to the Deacon and Subdeacon, who were present. He adds a mystical reason for this practice; namely, that the body of Jesus Christ, which is offered upon the altar, is the sacrament or figure of the mystical body of Christ, which is composed of three orders, Superiors, Virgins, and Married Persons; or because it represents the mystery of the Trinity; or the three estates of our Saviour, his mortality, his death, and his resurrection. The third question is, 'Why the blood of Christ 'is received separately from his body, and whyi is 'administered without the body?' The answer is, that those who receive the Sacrament in both kinds separately, do it in imitation of our Saviour; and that though the body of Christ is received entire under each species, yet each species is received separately; because our Saviour has distinguished these two things, in order to represent to us, by the bread, his body such as it appeared, solid and entire; and, by the wine, his blood which was shed upon the cross. The fourth question is, 'Whether Jesus Christ is 'received, in the Eucharist, without a soul, or ani-'mated?' Arnulph answers, that such kind of questions are usually proposed by persons, who affect to appear learned, and endeavour to lay snares for the faith of the simple and unlearned, who believe with humility all that the Holy Ghost has taught them: that it is folly to pretend to dive into the incomprehensible mysteries of our religion; and that it is certain, that the substance of bread and wine, are changed into the body and blood of Christ, though it appears to the sense to be only bread and wine, and has all the qualities of those substances. The fifth and last question is concerning the sense of those words of the Prophet Joel, ch. ii. ver. 14. Who knoweth if he will return and repent, and leave a blessing behind him, &c.? Arnulph answers, that the change of God's determination consists in the remission of sin, which he grants to those who repent; and that the meaning of the words, leave a blessing behind him, is, that he will bless those who follow him (8).

[These questions, and the answers to them, may afford a small specimen of the idle subjects upon which the talents of the schoolmen were employed. Many other instances might be produced, which are still more ridiculous. The ingenuity of men was exercised in a way that was totally disgraceful to the human understanding.] K.

[G] Bale confounds our Arnulph with Arnoul Bishop of Lisieux, Arnoul Abbot of Bonneval, and Arnulphus the Presbyter.] That author tells us, that Arnulphus went to Rome, where, inveighing strongly against the vices of the Bishops, particularly their lewdness, grandeur, and worldly-mindedness, he fell a sacrifice to the rage and resentment of the Roman Clergy, who caused him to be privately assassinated. Quod cum fecisset tandem Romæ, Christianæ religionis propugnator egregius, in ejus necem Scribarum & Pharisæorum Clerus conspirabat. Prælatorum enim vitia insectabatur acerbe: in eorum impudicitias atque libidines perfortiter invehebat: histrionicas illorum pompas arguebat, & in corradendis divitiis immoderata improbabat studia. Illorum igitur insidiis tandem atrociter mactabatur (9). But this is confounding him with Arnulphus the Presbyter, who, as Platina tells us, was destroyed by the treachery of the Roman Clergy, in the time of Pope Honorius II., for remonstrating with great severity against the corruptions of the Court of Rome. Nor could this possibly be true of our Arnulph, in the time of that Pope: for this Bishop of Rochester died before Honorius II. was raised to the Pontificate. As to the works ascribed by Bale to Arnulphus, such as De Operibus sex dierum, &c. they were written either by Arnoul Bishop of Lisieux, or by Arnoul Abbot of Bonneval. B.

ARNWAY (John) was descended of a very good family in the county of Salop, from which he inherited a considerable estate (a). He was born in 1601, educated in Grammatical learning in his own country, and in 1618 became a Commoner of St. Edmund's Hall, in Oxford, where he remained till he had taken his degrees in Arts, and had also received Holy Orders (b). He then went down again into Shropshire, where, in process of time, he obtained the Rectories of Hodnet and Ightfield, which he enjoyed to the breaking out of the civil war (c). He was a man of much learning learning and very extenſive charity, ſo that though his income was very conſiderable, yet he laid up very little. It was his cuſtom to clothe annually twelve poor people according to their ſtation, and every Sunday he entertained as many at his table, not only plentifully, but with intimacy and reſpect (d). His loyalty to his Prince being as warm as his charity towards his neighbours, he raiſed and clothed eight troopers for his ſervice, and beſides, preached warmly againſt rebellion (e). The Parliament having a garriſon in the town of Wem, a detachment was ſent from thence to plunder him, which they did moſt ſucceſsfully, leaving him nothing; and beſides, terrifying him with the cruelleſt inſults (f). In 1640 he repaired to Oxford, to ſerve the King in perſon, having no longer any eſtate to ſerve him with. There he was created Doctor in Divinity, and had alſo the Archdeaconry of Coventry given him, on the promotion of Dr. Brownrig to the Biſhopric of Exeter (g). His former misfortunes did not hinder Dr. Arnway from being as active afterwards in the King's ſervice, which ſubjected him to a new train of misfortunes, his eſtate being ſequeſtered, and himſelf impriſoned (h). At length, after the King's murder, he obtained his liberty, and like many other loyaliſts, was compelled by the laws then in being to quit his native country, and retire to Holland. There he continued ſome time at the Hague, where, in 1650, he publiſhed two little pieces (i). The firſt entitled, The Tablet: or, the Moderation of Charles I., the Martyr. In which he endeavours to wipe off all the aſperſions that were thrown on that Prince's memory by Milton and his aſſociates. The ſecond is called An Alarm to the Subjects of England, in which he certainly did his utmoſt to picture the oppreſſions of the new government in the ſtrongeſt colours; and in this work he tells us ſome very remarkable things of himſelf [A]. His ſupplies from England failing, and his hopes in that country being alſo fruſtrated, he was compelled to accept an offer that was made him of going to Virginia, where, oppreſſed with grief and cares, he yielded to fate, in 1653, leaving behind him the character of a pious, upright, and truly conſtant man (k).

But notwithſtanding this they are grown exceedingly ſcarce, and therefore I think it neceſſary to tranſcribe ſuch paſſages as relate to his own affairs. In his preface to the reader, before his Alarm to the Subjects of England, he ſays, 'He quitted a large 'fortune, of which he did not repent in his extreameſt 'penury, to ſerve that good Prince King Charles I. ARTHINGTON (HENRY), a gentleman of a good family in Yorkſhire who, towards the latter end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, engaged in ſome ſeditious practices againſt the Government (a). He was a man of moderate ſenſe and learning, zealouſly addicted to the Geneva diſcipline, and was engaged for ſeveral years, in diſtributing books in defence of a farther Reformation, and containing ſevere reflections on the Lords of the Privy Council, the Judges, and other Magiſtrates. In the proſecution of his deſigns, he became acquainted with Mr. Edmund Coppinger, a younger brother of a good family, and ſworn ſervant to Queen Elizabeth, who was as far gone as himſelf in fanatical opinions, and who was continually repreſenting to him the neceſſity of a thorough reformation in Church and State (b). This acquaintance of theirs laſted ſeveral years, till by frequent converſations, hearing warm ſermons, and praying together, they had greatly heated their imaginations, in conſequence of which, they began to believe themſelves very extraordinary perſons. About the latter end of the year 1590, Coppinger informed Mr. Arthington, and Mr. Lancaſter, a School-maſter, that he had a deſire to marry a certain widow, intreating them to faſt and pray with him to obtain ſucceſs in this deſign; which they did. A little after Coppinger came to them again, and told them, that God had ſhewed him a ſecret myſtery, and that he knew a way to bring the Queen to repentance, and to cauſe all her Counſellors and Nobles to do the like immediately, otherwiſe he ſhould prove them traitors that refuſed. Mr. Arthington diſliked this diſcourſe, told him the thing was impoſſible, for that all motions of the heart depended on God alone. This, however, did not cure him, for in January 1590-91, he came again to Mr. Lancaſter's houſe in Shoe-Lane, where Mr. Arthington lodged, and there diſcourſed of his extraordinary calling, and of the means of trying whether ſuch calls came from God or not. Arthington and Lancaſter told him that they were but ordinary men, men, no fit counſellors for him on ſuch occaſion, and therefore deſired he would apply himſelf to ſome godly miniſters, and not trouble them with his ſecrets. But by degrees, Arthington was brought to have a better opinion of theſe manifeſtations, by means of a letter he received from one Mr. Penry, a Non-conformiſt miniſter, who was afterwards executed (c). He was at that time in Scotland, where ſeditious books were privately printed, and ſent thence to be diſtributed in England, and in an epiſtle to Arthington, his correſpondent, he ſignified that reformation muſt ſhortly be introduced in England. Arthington taking Penry for a Prophet, believed this, and perceiving Coppinger's pretended revelation tended the ſame way, he ſuffered him to talk more freely of his calling, but declined being informed of the particular means which were to be uſed, for bringing this great deſign about. Some time in Eaſter Term 1591, Coppinger became acquainted with Hacket, and ſoon after introduced Arthington alſo to his acquaintance. They dined together at one Lawſon's houſe near Paul's Gate, where Arthington was well pleaſed with the converſation: however he went down again into Yorkſhire, and did not return to London till the beginning of Trinity term (d). Then Coppinger came to him to his lodgings, and magnified Hacket as the holieſt man that had ever lived except Chriſt; which Arthington heard with diſlike. At laſt, however, he was prevailed on to viſit him, and to hear his long prayers, which appeared to him ſo divine, ſweet, and heavenly, that he was thereby drawn to have great admiration for him, as he expreſſed himſelf. But that which ſtruck him moſt, was Hacket's beſeeching God to confound him, if he did not ſeek his honour and glory, in all things he did; and he ſeeing that notwithſtanding this Hacket remained ſound and well, concluded he muſt be a moſt holy man. Coppinger farther informed Mr. Arthington, that Hacket was grievouſly tormented by ſorcerers and devils, inſomuch that he endured as cruel tortures as if he were in Hell, which being alſo affirmed by Hacket with prodigious oaths, Arthington at laſt believed. He alſo caught, by infection, his maſter's method of curſing and making horrid imprecations againſt himſelf, believing that he felt within him motions of the ſpirit, which he conceived were to be implicitly obeyed, on pain of damnation (e). In conſequence of theſe notions, he wrote a letter to the Queen, wherein he accuſed a great Counſellor of treaſon, offering to prove him a traitor in her preſence, by a new ſort of trial, as appears by part of his own letter cited in the note [A]. He was now in a manner wholly at Hacket's devotion, who wrought upon his mind very cunningly, and drew him from one thing to another, without his knowing on what grounds he acted, or what his real intention was. On Sunday the eleventh of July 1591, Arthington made a long prayer in the preſence of Hacket, wherein he beſought God to preſerve the Queen: upon this Hacket turned away his face, and did not look upon him again, until he prayed for other things. After prayers were over, Hacket caſt his arms about Arthington, told him that he loved the Queen, as well as he, or Coppinger, deſiring him not to be offended at his behaviour, which he ſaid God had commanded. Coppinger alſo told him, that the Queen might be prayed for, but not as a Sovereign, for that ſhe was not to reign but this man Hacket, and yet ſhe ſhould live better than ever ſhe did, though governed by another (f). On Thurſday the fourteenth, Arthington penned his prophecy of judgments againſt England, the matter of which the reader will meet with in the notes [B]. Coppinger alſo drew up a life of Hacket, which Arthington wrote over again fair, ſitting up for that purpoſe all

[A] Cited in the note.] Theſe new prophets, by virtue of that extraordinary power which they fancied to be committed to themſelves, deprived all ſuch of her Majeſty's Counſellors as were diſagreeable to them, that is to ſay, deprived them in the opinion of their hair-brained diſciples, calling them thenceforward, the Late Lord Chancellor, the Late Lord Treaſurer. This laſt was the famous William Lord Burleigh, particularly hated by theſe Enthuſiaſts, and, indeed, by all the enemies of Queen Elizabeth. It was of this great Counſellor that Arthington complained to her by a letter, in which he charged him to be the moſt dangerous enemy that was diſcovered ſince her Highneſs's reign, adding, If your Majeſty cannot judge him to be ſo bad as I report him, yet give me leave in your ſacred preſence to fight the combat of prayer with him, wherein, if it pleaſe him, I will firſt begin to pray againſt myſelf, that if be be not as deeply guilty as I have charged him, then that God's vengeance may preſently conſume me both ſoul and body into Hell for ever, which if it come to paſs, the victory ſhall be his, and he return an innocent: But if he ſee me leap up for joy, as one that hath diſcovered him to be a traitor, then if he dare fall down in like ſort, and make the ſame prayer, That the like vengeance may fall upon himſelf, if he be deeply guilty as I have charged him, and if God's vengeance fall not upon him before he depart out of her preſence, let me be hanged, drawn, and quartered, for labouring to impeach a Counſellor's credit; but if he dare not thus enter the liſts with me before her Majeſty, let him be holden guilty (1).

[B] The reader will meet with in the notes.] We have one extract of this prophecy drawn by order of the Privy Council, which contains all the matter of it, and only wants ſome of the blaſphemous expreſſions. It is entitled, A PROPHECY of JUDGMENTS againſt England. In this prophecy he firſt ſetteth down the third commandment, inferring what plagues ſhall light on himſelf if he offend therein. Then cometh he to his nine ſeveral aſſertions, adding to every one of them, The Lord to confound him, viz. That if he think not himſelf to be the vileſt ſinful wretch living: If he take not himſelf to be the moſt ignorant in God's Book, of any man that hath profeſſed the goſpel ſo long: If he acknowledges not himſelf moſt unfit, and unworthy of all men to ſerve the Lord Jeſus: If, nevertheleſs, he be not extraordinarily called to do the meſſage of God more faithfully than any preacher in England hath hitherto done: If the ſcripture do not juſtify extraordinary callings before the end of the world: If he know not two perſons within the city of London, that have greater extraordinary callings than himſelf, viz. Edmund Coppinger, and William Hacket: If the former be not a prophet raiſed up of the Lord, to bring a meſſage of great mercy to the land, if all the people truly repent of their ſins: If the latter be not the holieſt man, and of the greateſt all night, and annexed to it his prophecy. The ſame day they penned a joint letter to Mr. Thomas Lancaſter, a ſchool maſter [C], ſigned by Coppinger as the Meſſenger of Peace, and by Arthington as the Prophet of God's Judgments, though it ſeems Arthington did not well know, why he ſtiled himſelf ſo. For on Friday the fifteenth of July, Coppinger having ſent for Arthington out of his bed, declared to him, that he had had a revelation, which aſſured him that he was Prophet of Mercy, and Arthington Prophet of Judgment; that Hacket was King of Europe, and that they were to go before him, and ſeparate the ſheep from the goats. Arthington the more readily credited this, becauſe he found a mighty burning in himſelf, which he interpreted a commencement of the angelic nature (g). Their firſt exploit was to go together to the houſe of a gentleman in the city, between ſix and ſeven in the morning, to appoint eſt power, to bring fearful judgments upon the whole earth that ever was born, Chriſt Jeſus excepted: If the ſaid Hacket (as the meſſenger of God's vengeance, where mercy is refuſed) do not bring ſuch plagues upon this realm of England, the like whereof was never ſeen: In theſe, and in every of theſe ſeveral caſes he prayeth, The Lord to confound him.

Whereupon he inferreth, that having thus denounced ſo many fearful woes againſt his own ſoul, as would ſink it into the bottomleſs pit of Hell, if he were guilty in any one of them; then thereupon, with chearfulneſs, he cometh to declare his meſſage to England, accuſing it to be the moſt rebellious, though it have been moſt bleſſed, of all nations. Then he affirmeth the city of London, and the courts of juſtice at Weſtminſter, and the counterfeit worſhip of God with croſs and ſurplice, to be worſe than Sodom and Gomorrah, or the purple Whore of Rome, or elſe deſireth to be confounded. Nay, he preferreth Rome before London; becauſe at Rome they ſin only of ignorance. Of her Majeſty he ſaith, ſhe is at leaſt guilty of the common ſins, but moſt abuſed (of any Prince that ever was) by thoſe whom ſhe hath moſt advanced.

(2) Theſe Initials ſignify, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor (Hatton), and the Lord Treaſurer (Cecil).

Then he ſpeaks to three great Counſellors (2) C. C. T. daring them to proteſt for their innocencies againſt themſelves, as deeply as he hath done, and then, if they be not ſwallowed up quick, he is contented to be hanged up in chains at Paul's Croſs. Then he threateneth them, that they three ſhall be otherwiſe detected e'er long, and all thoſe that are then partakers, when her Majeſty ſhall reign and live to ſee better days, if God give her true repentance. Then, he ſaith, he will leave all other of the clergy (as ſufficiently detected already) ſave ſuch as pretend to ſeek reformation, (who he ſaith) are as guilty (in two points) as any of the other. The firſt point, for not crying out continually againſt Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Deans, Archdeacons, and others, as wicked uſurpers in the houſe of God. The ſecond, for not crying out againſt the magiſtrates of this land, becauſe they keep out the Elderſhip out of the Church, and maintain in their room officers and offices of Antichriſt: Hereupon gathering thus: How can God ſpare this land any longer, wherein both the magiſtrates and meſſengers of God have dealt ſo unfaithfully in the Lord's ſervice? Adding, That the fearful judgments of God ſhall be ſure to fall on the reprobate: being already prepared and put into the hands of the mighty meſſenger of God, William Hackett, to be poured out upon this great city of London, and upon all places where repentance followeth not this publication. Then he goeth about to prove all ſuch preachers to be idolaters, or conſenting to idolatry, which practiſe or conſent, and ſuffer others to uſe ſurplice and croſs, becauſe (he ſaith) they are marks of Antichriſt, preferring herein the Papiſts afore them, as ſinning herein only through ignorance, ſeeking alſo to aggravate their faults in this behalf, for that they are all hypocritical idolaters, in that (nevertheleſs) they profeſs reformation: Whereunto he addeth (he ſaith) a ſecret: That this their halting and hypocriſy hath ſo hardened God's heart againſt their requeſts, for bringing in the diſcipline, that for this unfaithful and unſingle walking in their function, he hath hitherto denied it. Neither ſhall any of them, or all of them together, have that honour given, to bring in reformation: For (ſaith he) I tell you truly, The Almighty God hath put his cup of vengeance into his truſty and faithful ſervant's hand, William Hackett, to pour it down ſhortly, upon every wilful and obſtinate ſinner that doth not repent upon the notice hereof, or elſe the Lord confound me. Laſtly, he giveth charge to have this propheſy, together with the incredible (but moſt certain) hiſtory of the holieſt ſervant of God, William Hackett, that ever hath been, is, or ſhall be born (Chriſt Jeſus only excepted), with all ſpeed poſſible, printed and publiſhed together, as in ſubſtance true (ſaith he), or elſe the Lord confound me: This wiſe prophecy is thus ſubſcribed: By your moſt unworthy ſervant, but yet a faithful prophet of the Almighty Jeſus, or elſe his wrath confound me. Henrie Arthington (3).

(3) Conſpiracy for pretended Diſcipline, p. 39 —41.

[C] Mr. Thomas Lancaſter, Schoolmaſter.] This whole affair relating to Hackett, Coppinger, and Arthington, hath made ſo much noiſe abroad as well as at home, and is ſo imperfectly treated by moſt of the authors who have touched upon it, for want of ſeeing the original and authentic account publiſhed by Queen Elizabeth's order, that it is become neceſſary to preſerve with all imaginable care the original papers, which manifeſt the real ſpirit and true deſign of theſe impoſtors. For this cauſe we give our readers this Letter to Mr. Lancaſter, as the fulleſt teſtimony of the characters of theſe new prophets.

If this letter be not indited by the Holy Ghost, who hath appeared (in a far greater meaſure) to ſinful wretches, in the end of the world, even to us, whoſe names are here underwritten, and to a third perſon, in calling above all callings whatſoever (the Lord Jeſus excepted), The Lord confound us two with vengeance from Heaven, and carry us (with all violence) into the bottomleſs pit.

If we have not taken the name of God in vain, it ſtandeth you upon, to read this letter with fear and trembling, with joy and gladneſs; with fear, that the Lord ſhall wooe you to do him ſervice; with joy, that he offereth you honour if you accept it. We two are meſſengers from Heaven, who have a good captain to guide us; who have received immediate callings from God, to call the whole world to repentance, and amendment of life: Otherwiſe, they are to fear, that Chriſt Jeſus his ſecond coming in glory, will be to them as a thief in the night. If I Edmund Coppinger do not preſer you before any one man in the land whatſoever, for your wiſe, holy, loving, and righteous courſe, both in the general calling of a Chriſtian, and in your particular calling, The Lord confound me body and ſoul. The reaſon why I chuſe you firſt, is, becauſe in your houſe, in your preſence, and under God (partly by your means), I had my firſt extraordinary calling, though thereof (as of all other things) the whole honour and glory be the Lord's. And of the ſame mind is my brother Arthington. In token of our extraordinary love to you, we deal as we neither have, or will do with any other; for we command in the name of the Lord, all creatures upon the earth, and they muſt obey. But with you we will diſpenſe thus far, that it ſhall be your choice to come and take a new calling (for a time, wherein we would uſe you) or refuſe it. So wiſhing to commend us and yourſelf to God, before you anſwer us, which we expect in word and not in writing, &c.

The Meſſenger of Mercy to the world if they accept me.

Edm. Coppinger.

I avouch whatſoever my brother hath written to be moſt true; and further I proteſt, That you are a more holy man than any preacher in London, or throughout the whole land, or elſe the Lord confound me. If it pleaſe you to come and ſee me joyful, you may hope this is true.

The Prophet of Judgment to the whole World, where mercy is rejected.

him chief Governor under her Majeſty; but he would have nothing to do with them, nor would he ſuffer them to pray. Then they went to Wood-ſtreet Compter to Mr. Wigginton, a Miniſter, with whom they had a long conference: then they left him and went to Hacket's chamber, at the houſe of one Walker, at Broken Wharf. By this time it was eight o'clock: however Hacket was a-bed, which did not hinder Coppinger from kneeling down at the bed's feet, and making a long prayer. Arthington joined with them; Hacket came twice out of his bed in his ſhirt, and prayed likewiſe, which done, he went to bed again. Coppinger began to pray again, but Arthington interrupted him, and commanded him to ariſe and anoint the King with the Holy-Ghoſt. Coppinger preſently roſe, kiſſed the boards thrice where Hacket's feet had ſtood, and then reverently approaching him in bed, was going to lay his hand upon him, but Hacket ſaid, You ſhall not need to anoint me, for I have been already anointed in Heaven by the Holy Ghoſt. Then they both demanded what his pleaſure was to have done, upon which he ſaid, Go your way and tell them in the city, that CHRIST JESUS is come with his fan in his hand to judge the earth, and if any man aſk you where he is, tell him he lies at Walker's houſe, by Broken Wharf; and if they will not believe it, let them come and kill me if they can, for as truly as CHRIST JESUS is in Heaven, ſo truly is he come to judge the world (h). Coppinger upon this ran down ſtairs, and made proclamation before Arthington could get to him, afterwards they went together towards Cheapſide, by Watling-ſtreet, and the Old Change, crying out, Chriſt is come, &c. To this Arthington added, Repent England, repent; thretatening alſo ſtrange judgments againſt the city of London [D]. When they came near the croſs, which then ſtood in Cheapſide, the crowd was ſo great they could not move along; ſo they got up into an empty cart, wherein they declared out of a paper the office and calling of Hacket, how he repreſented Chriſt by taking a part of his glorified body, by his principal ſpirit, and by the office of ſevering the good from the bad, with his fan in his hand, and of eſtabliſhing the Goſpel in Europe; that they were two Prophets, one of Mercy, the other of Judgments, called to aſſiſt him in this great work, wiſhing confuſion and damnation to themſelves, if all they ſpake was not true. Much more to this purpoſe they ſaid, and, at the ſame time, ſpake with great heat and violence againſt two Lords of the Queen's Council, doing all they could to inflame the people, and raiſe a rebellion. This was between ten and eleven in the morning, and they hoped before noon to have gone through the whole city; but the great crowd in the ſtreets rendered it impoſſible. A gentleman who had ſome acquaintance with Coppinger, made him get out of the cart, and go into the Mermaid Tavern, in Cheapſide, into which Arthington followed him. Then they went by back lanes to Coppinger's lodging, Arthington proclaiming as he went along, Repent England, &c. They found the doors ſhut againſt them, whereupon Arthington went to Hacket's lodgings. He was abroad when Arthington came, but ſoon after returned, and as ſoon as Arthington ſaw him, he ſaid, there cometh the king of the whole earth, for which Hacket reproved him, telling him he was too outrageous. A paper was taken out of Arthington's ſleeve, which he ſaid he was glad of, for it was an epiſtle to the Queen, which ſhe would not receive, and therefore ſhe was no longer Queen, but deprived of her dignity. About one o'clock they were apprehended and conducted to the Lord Mayor's, where ſeveral Privy Counſellors were met, to whom Arthington refuſed to ſhew the leaſt reſpect, but when Hacket came into the room, he fell down on the ground, and grovelled at his feet. He was ſo far from perceiving his error, or believing that he was deceived, that he continued to aſſert the truth of Hacket's miſſion, and of the revelations made to Coppinger and himſelf. He was alſo thoroughly perſuaded Hacket would ſhortly be releaſed, and that he and his fellow-prophet ſhould go abroad with him, in order to take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms, and to perform their offices. As often as any of his friends conferred with him, and ſought to ſhew him the folly of his diſcourſe, he would anſwer with a ſmile, You think that we have incurred the danger of the laws herein, and that we therefore ſhall be put to death, but as ſure as God is in Heaven, the ſword ſhall not come near to hurt us, neither ſhall any man be able to touch the leaſt hair of our heads (i). He did not recede in the leaſt from theſe ſtrange notions, even after he had heard that Hacket was tried and condemned; but in the afternoon of Wedneſday the twenty-eighth of July, when he was aſſured that Hacket was actually hanged, drawn, and quartered, he preſently diſcerned his own deluſion and great danger. Upon this he wrote in the moſt humble manner to the Chancellor, and to the Treaſurer, beſeeching them to pardon the injuries he had done them; and afterwards he wrote to the body of the Council, giving the beſt account he was able of the whole buſineſs, [D] Threatening alſo ſtrange judgments againſt the city of London.] This judgment againſt London Arthington ſaid, he gathered out of Hacket's hiſtory, and it was to happen thus. Men were to be ſeized with a ſudden, furious, and bloody rage, and ſhould there kill and butcher one another like ſwine all the day long, and that none ſhould have either reaſon or compaſſion enough to interpoſe and ſtop ſo horrid a maſſacre. It is to be obſerved, that Arthington's inſpirations were no more than repetitions of what he had heard Hacket ſay, and that he ſtiled himſelf a prophet in conſequence of his publiſhing his maſter's revelations (5).

beſeeching them to intercede with her Majeſty for him, that he might not be proceeded againſt as his companions had been. As for Coppinger, he, a little after he was apprehended, ran abſolutely diſtracted, and never recovered his ſenſes, but obſtinately refuſing all nouriſhment, died of hunger the day after Hacket was executed. It was thought proper to detain Arthington ſome time in Wood-ſtreet Compter, in order to diſcover whether his repentance was ſincere, as alſo whether there was no danger of his relapſing into his enthuſiaſtic fit. But he remaining perfectly ſober and ſenſible, the Queen was pleaſed to extend her mercy towards him, by granting him a pardon (k). He publiſhed a retractation under his hand, and, as an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorian (l) informs us, had the good luck to recover his reputation ſo far, as to be thought an honeſt and ſincere, though a warm and weak man. What afterwards became of him, or when or where he died does no where appear. The conduct of theſe Enthuſiaſts, did not only kindle a great flame at that time, but hath left ſuch heat in the embers of their conſpiracy, as at this day is ſcarcely extinguiſhed. The writers againſt the Diſſenters never fail mentioning Hacket's inſurrection, as a charge upon them; and the Apologiſts for the Puritans as conſtantly treat this as a groſs calumny invented at firſt to countenance a moſt violent perſecution, which was ſet on foot againſt them, and ever ſince kept up to hinder the abating of that prejudice, which hath been ſo carefully infuſed into the vulgar, againſt their principles and practices. This is a very dark and perplexed affair, there being what may well enough be ſtyled evidence on both ſides. We pretend not therefore to decide upon this point; but to render this account of Hacket's conſpiracy as complete as we could, have added ſome particulars relating to this diſpute in the notes [E], on which the reader may perhaps paſs judgment; or if he thinks farther information neceſſary, will find it ſufficiently indicated where that may be met with. C.

[E] Some particulars relating to this diſpute in the notes.] Dr. William Nichols charges the Puritans roundly with abetting this deſign. Some of the Puritans of theſe times, ſays he, were ſo mad as to attempt a rebellion for the ſake of the diſcipline, and by the ſolicitation of ſome enthuſiaſtical men, Hacket, Coppinger, and Arthington, proceeded to ſtir up the people to take arms againſt the Queen on that behalf (6). Mr. Peirce, who anſwered the Doctor's book, denieth this charge, and cites Fuller, the Church Hiſtorian, as an irrefragable witneſs in favour of the Puritans (7). That author ſays, This buſineſs of Hacket happened unſeaſonably for that party: true it is, they as cordially deteſted his blaſphemy as any. And ſuch as loved Hacket, the Nonconformiſt, abhorred Hacket the Heretic, after he had mounted to ſo high a pitch of impiety. Mr. Neale, in his late hiſtory of the Puritans, complains loudly of the injuſtice done them, in repreſenting them as having any thing to do with theſe enthuſiaſts (8). The Rt. Rev. Author who has anſwered his book, endeavours however to pin down the charge on Cartwright and Udall, two of the moſt famous Nonconformiſt miniſters in thoſe times (9). But none of theſe writers ſeem to have conſidered the only authentic account of this whole affair, the title of which runs thus, Conſpiracy for pretended Reformation, viz. Preſbyterian Diſcipline. A treatiſe diſcovering the late deſignments and courſes held for advancing thereof, by William Hacket, Yeoman; Edmund Coppinger, and Henry Arthington, Gent. out of others depoſitions, and their own letters, writings, and confeſſions upon examination: Together with ſome part of the life and conditions, and the two inditements, arraignment, and execution of the ſaid Hacket: Alſo an anſwer to the calumniations of ſuch as affirm they were madmen; and a reſemblance of this action unto the like which happened heretofore in Germany, ultimo Septembris, 1591. This was written by Dr. (afterwards Archbiſhop) Bancroft, by direction of the Council, and was publiſhed by authority. The very title ſhews that his intention was, to repreſent this conſpiracy as if it had been concerted for the eſtabliſhing Puritaniſm. In the courſe of his account he ſhews, that Arthington had a correſpondence with Mr. Penrie a zealous miniſter, who was not long after executed, and that Hacket was in partnerſhip with one Wigginton, a miniſter, as a maltſter. There are likewiſe in the ſame piece ſeveral letters to Puritan miniſters, and a long examination of Wigginton's, wherein he acknowledges his being privy to Hacket's pretences both to prophecy and to power. This ſhews what the notions of men at the helm were, concerning this extraordinary tranſaction, in which, if the Puritans had no concern, they were without all doubt very grievouſly injured, ſince in this account of the matter, publiſhed by the Queen's authority, they are inſinuated to be the exciters and promoters of this diſturbance.

[Fanaticiſm was ſcarcely ever carried to a greater height than in the caſes of Arthington, Coppinger, and Hacket; and their conduct may ſerve to ſhew the dangerous abſurdities into which the human mind may be led, when all reaſon is thrown away in religion, and every caprice of a heated imagination is treated as the ſuggeſtion of the divine ſpirit. Theſe men went ſo far, that they cannot well be cleared of abſolute lunacy. Nothing elſe ſeems capable of accounting for the wildneſs of their actions. To charge their behaviour upon the Puritans in general, is flagrantly unjuſt: nor will ſuch a charge be now believed by any perſon of a judicious and liberal underſtanding. Little regard ought to be paid to what is ſaid in the heat of party, or to the inſinuations of a court publication, intended to anſwer ſome private purpoſes of Government. Were we to admit, in their full extent, the truth of the facts mentioned in the note [E], the evidence would ſtill be totally inſufficient againſt the Puritans as a body of men. It would only apply to the two miniſters ſpoken of; and even with regard to them, though it might ſhew their enthuſiaſm and their folly, it would not prove their acquaintance with Arthington's, Coppinger's, and Hacket's conſpiracy. 'It is the error of zealots,' ſays a valuable correſpondent, to whom we are much indebted, 'to impute the opinions of 'even a ſingle man to all his fraternity. In this 'obſervation I make no difference as to ſects. The 'error is general; being founded in human nature. 'Nothing ought in truth to be attributed to any 'ſociety, which has not been declared to be the opi'nion of that ſociety by ſome public act; or at leaſt 'by the public and avowed declarations of the prin'cipal leaders of that ſociety; and which has not 'been as openly contradicted by others who have 'heard of ſuch declarations. In this view of the caſe, 'the Puritans were innocent: for the opinions and 'aſſertions of Penrie and Wigginton could not imply 'the conſent and approbation of the Puritans in Eng'land.' If we look narrowly into the hiſtory of the times we are ſpeaking of, it will be found, that the intolerant ſpirit of thoſe times created much of the confuſions and dangers to which they were ſubject. The minds of men, when heated by perſecution, are apt to hurry them into extravagant actions. Were ſects let alone, in every caſe in which the peace of the community is not actually violated by them, they would become ſufficiently innocent; and their enthuſiaſm would either gradually ſubſide, or, if it continued, would ſpend itſelf in exertions that could be of no prejudice to the ſtate.] K.

ARTHUR (King of the Britons) of whom, though the common opinion be, that nothing with certainty can be affirmed [A], from his birth to his death, yet is it but juſt, that what is related of him ſhould be told, as alſo, what is ſaid for and againſt it. Here, therefore, we ſhall report, chiefly from Geoffrey of Monmouth, the common ſtory of Arthur and his exploits, and in the notes, we ſhall ſhew what is ſupported, what refuted, by more credible hiſtorians [B]. As to his birth, he is ſaid to have been the ſon of Uther Pendragon, King of the Britons, by Igerna, the wife of Gorlois, Duke

[A] Nothing with certainty can be affirmed.] After allowing that nothing can be more dubious than the hiſtory of Arthur is generally eſteemed, ſome readers may think his life might as well be omitted. Now as the ſame objection may be made to ſeveral other articles taken from our ancient hiſtory; it will be proper to return an anſwer once for all. In the firſt place then, one can ſee no reaſon, why we ſhould be at ſo much pains, to read and to underſtand the fabulous hiſtory of other nations, and yet abſolutely reject our own. What pains have the learned taken with the fables both of Greeks and Latins; and with what ſolemnity of late years, eſpecially, have we ſeen the Oriental romances, which in their kind exceed all others, commented upon, and thereby rendered uſeful to the judicious reader. By what figure in rhetoric ſhall we diſtinguiſh between the wiſdom ſhewn in theſe labours, and the folly of dwelling on the leſs credible hiſtory of this iſland? If under the former there may remain truths of great importance, why may not ſomething of the ſame kind be buried under the latter? But farther ſtill, what if the underſtanding of theſe fables contributes not a little to the underſtanding true hiſtory? For how fabulous ſoever a ſtory may be, yet if once it gain credit, and paſs in the opinion of men for undoubted truth, its circumſtances will in time become ſo intermixed, even with the moſt authentic relations, that without a thorough underſtanding the one, there will be no ſuch thing as coming at the true ſenſe of the other. On this account therefore the reading of fabulous hiſtory is neceſſary to avoid the believing fables; ſince if we ſhould once grow ſo nice, as to think it not worth our while to peruſe any thing branded with the name of fiction, it might become the means of our receiving, under the name of true hiſtory, the meaneſt and moſt abſurd fictions for want of knowing their origin. Add to all this, that as in the caſe of all extremes, ſo here, exceſſive incredulity becomes credulity itſelf. For, if from an apprehenſion of being thought leſs critical in taſte than others, we ſhould reject the authority of all authors whoſe credit hath been queſtioned, or reſolve to give up all facts with reſpect to which there have been any doubts, we evidently embrace the error we endeavour to ſhun, and, by affecting criticiſm, loſe all the advantages deducible from that kind of knowledge. Let us, therefore, be content, eſpecially in ſuch a work as this, to hear whatever our forefathers thought worth the leaving; to examine fairly both ſides of the queſtion, and then decide freely as the weight of evidence inclines us. It is, indeed, one great uſe of a dictionary like this, that it aſſembles in little room a multitude of paſſages relating to the ſame matter, and yet lying ſcattered in a variety of authors, whereby the reader in a few minutes becomes poſſeſſed of that knowledge, which coſt the author much pains and time to acquire.

[B] What ſupported, what refuted, by credible hiſtorians.] The hiſtory of Arthur in the text, is taken avowedly from Geoffrey of Monmouth, who, in his Britiſh hiſtory, treats copiouſly of the actions of this Prince. As to the credit of this author, which hath ſuffered violent attacks, we ſhall here conſider it ſo far only as it relates to the hiſtory of one King; though, at the ſame time, it muſt be acknowledged that this very hiſtory drew the moſt ſevere cenſures upon our author; who, as his antagoniſt tells us, was on this very account named Jeffery Ap Arthur; becauſe taking the fables of the ancient Britons concerning King Arthur out of the old romances, increaſing them with his own additions, and giving them the varniſh of the Latin tongue, he clothed them with the honourable name of Hiſtory (1). A harſh judgment this, which however many ages after was ſupported by Polydore Vergil (2), and ſince his time by Mr. Milton (3), and many others (4), who have carried it ſo far, as to doubt very much whether there really ever was ſuch a perſon as Arthur or not. We will ſtate briefly ſome of the principal arguments urged by them, and then we will ſhew what has been ſaid in anſwer. I. If, ſay they, there had been ſuch a King as Arthur, a Prince ſo warlike and ſo great a conqueror, how can we ſuppoſe that Gildas and Bede ſhould take no notice of him, when they expreſsly name Ambroſius and other Britiſh Kings, whoſe actions it is confeſſed were inconſiderable in reſpect of thoſe reported of Arthur. II. The hiſtory of Arthur is no way reconcileable to the authentic hiſtories of thoſe times. For whereas it is aſſerted therein, that the dominion of Arthur extended not only over all this iſland, but over a great part of the Continent, it is manifeſt from theſe, that ſeveral Saxon kingdoms were actually ſet up in England (5), ſo that the ſmalleſt part of this ſtory cannot be true. III. The great deeds of Arthur, as related by his hiſtorian, are incompatible with the hiſtories of foreign nations; and ſince thoſe hiſtories are undoubtedly authentic, it follows that this is fabulous. IV. The inconſiſtency of this ſtory with others, is not greater than its inconſiſtency with itſelf. For whereas Geoffrey of Monmouth makes Arthur ſo great a conqueror, yet Karadoc, whom Geoffrey owns to be a good writer (6), ſays expreſsly, that Melvas, who was Prince of that country now called Somerſetſhire, kept his Queen from him a whole year in the town of Glaſton, and was at laſt prevailed upon to reſtore her by the intreaty of Gildas, when Arthur had tried his power in vain (7). V. It is alledged that the whole of this tale reſts on the authority of Geoffrey of Monmouth, who, in compariſon of the times of which he writes, is a modern, and flouriſhed about the year 1150. From him all later writers have copied; and therefore nothing taken from them can ſtrengthen his authority. On the other ſide it is urged, that the omitting the name of Arthur in Gildas's letter (8), is ſo far from being any proof of his non-exiſtence, that it is really a circumſtance very favourable to his character. For Gildas writing only of the cauſes why the Britons were delivered up to be ſlaughtered by their enemies the Saxons, characterizes only the bad Princes living at the time he wrote, which appears to have been a little after Arthur's death. The very firſt Prince whom he upbraids for his tyranny, is Conſtantine the ſucceſſor of Arthur; and one of the facts for which he upbraids him, is for the murder of two young Princes of the royal family: theſe Princes Geoffrey of Monmouth tells us, were the ſons of Modred, the nephew of Arthur; and he relates their murder in the ſame manner as it is related by Gildas (9). But if there is no mention of Arthur in this author, he is however named by Nennius (10) a moſt ancient writer (11); ſo that this objection falls to the ground. It is alſo alledged, that though foreign hiſtorians do not ſpeak of Arthur in the ſtile of Geoffrey of Monmouth, that is, as a mighty conqueror; yet nothing can be clearer than that they acknowledge there was ſuch a Prince, and that he did alſo perform great things. Buchanan is very ſevere in his cenſure of Geoffrey; but the hiſtory himſelf gives us of Arthur, is ſuch a one as does him very great honour. Let us hear one ſentence only of it. 'To ſpeak briefly of his famous 'actions, ſays Buchanan, this is manifeſt, that he 'wholly ſubdued the forces of the Saxons, and re'ſtored peace to Britain; afterwards going over to 'Brittany in France, he entruſted the kingdom to 'Modred, his nephew; but as to his exploits in 'Gaul, we have no certainty of them.' A little after he gives us his character. 'This, ſays he, is 'certain, Arthur was a great man and very valiant, 'one who expreſſed his ſincere love to his country 'in freeing it from bondage, reforming corruptions 'in religion, and reſtoring the true worſhip of God '(12).'

Duke of Cornwall. This lady is held to have been in her time the greateſt beauty in Britain; and we are told, that Uther Pendragon enjoyed her by the help of Merlin's ſkill in magic, who gave this amorous Prince the form of Gorlois, ſo that Igerna taking him for her huſband, received him readily to her bed, and had by him Arthur (a). But though he was begotten in adultery, he was born in wedlock: for ſoon after this tranſaction, Uther Pendragon killed Gorlois, and married his widow Igerna, who was brought to bed of Arthur in 501 (b). This ſtory is in itſelf very incredible, but if we admit the commentary of Buchanan, it becomes as clear, and as intelligible, as we could wiſh. He ſays, that the King lay with the Duke of Cornwall's wife in that Duke's life-time, and marrying her after his deceaſe, the ſtory of the magical interview was invented to reſtore the ſplendor of the lady's honour, and make way for the King's owning Arthur for his ſon (c). Uther Pendragon had alſo by the ſame lady a daughter called Anne, and dying in the year 516, Arthur aſcended the throne in his place, though he was then but fifteen, or, as Buchanan ſays, eighteen years old (d). At this time the Saxons committed horrid devaſtations in Britain, under the command of Colgrin their Duke; wherefore Dubricius, Archbiſhop of Caerleon, ſolemnly crowned Arthur, at the requeſt of the Nobles and the people, who immediately prepared to take the field againſt the Saxons. His generoſity, perſonal bravery, and great zeal for the glory of the Britons, procured him quickly a competent army, with which he routed Colgrin and all his forces, conſiſting of Saxons, Scots, and Picts, on the banks of the river Duglas, but not without very conſiderable loſs on his own ſide (e). Upon this, Colgrin retired with the remains of his army into York, where Arthur beſieged him, and while he lay before the place, Cador Duke of Cornwall defeated Baldulph the brother of Colgrin, who with ſix thouſand men came to his relief. The King however could not take York; for Cheldric, or Cerdic, King of the Saxons, landing in Albania, i. e. Scotland, with a prodigious number of men, from on board a fleet of ſix hundred ſail, marched towards the Britons; upon which, by the advice of his council, Arthur raiſed the ſiege of York, and marched to London. On his arrival in that city, he called a general aſſembly, wherein the ſtate of affairs having been thoroughly debated, it was agreed to ſend Ambaſſadors to Hoel King of Armorica, i. e. Britanny, who was Arthur's ſiſter's ſon, to intreat his aſſiſtance; which being accordingly done, Hoel himſelf embarked with fifteen thouſand men, and landing at Southampton, then called the Port of Hamo, quickly found his uncle, who received him with all the affection and reſpect imaginable (f). Immediately after this junction, Arthur and his kinſman marched

'(12).' Add to this, that in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh there is a very high hill, the top of which is ſtyled Arthur's ſeat, from a tradition that Arthur ſurveyed the country from hence (13). The tradition of a people in favour of themſelves is a ſlight proof, but a tradition to their own diſhonour, cannot well be accounted for, if it be not founded in truth. As to the Saxon kingdoms founded in or before his time, Arthur might ſuppoſe himſelf ſupreme Lord of the iſland from their ſubmiſſion. In after-times Alfred and Ethelſtan were held Monarchs of England, though the Danes had erected ſeveral principalities here, which is a parallel caſe. As to the foreign conqueſts of Arthur, no body contends for them: they are fictitious circumſtances added to his hiſtory, but ſurely they cannot take away what was real. The ſuppoſed inconſiſtency between the account given alſo by Geoffrey of Monmouth, and that written by Karadoc, his contemporary, may prove, that there is ſome diverſity in the records relating to the actions of this Prince; but then certainly it proves that ſuch a Prince there was. For though one, or both of theſe authors ſhould be miſtaken, it cannot from thence be inferred that the hiſtory of Arthur is a fable: the utmoſt that can be deduced is, that ſome of the circumſtances of his ſtory are doubtful, which may be affirmed of the Princes of the laſt age. The reſting of this ſtory on the authority of Geoffrey of Monmouth, is a point by no means to be admitted; Nennius, who flouriſhed many ages before him, had recorded ſeveral particulars relating to Arthur (14). Henry of Huntington touches the principal points in his hiſtory (15); William of Malmeſbury alſo, in his introduction to his hiſtory, had given a conciſe account of his reign (16); and as we ſhall ſee in the ſubſequent note ſet down in another work, ſome particulars relating to Arthur, which Geoffrey of Monmouth never knew, and this from unqueſtionable authority. King Edward I, in a letter written to Pope Boniface VIII. aſſerts poſitively, that Arthur, King of the Britons, a moſt renowned Prince, ſubdued Scotland when in rebellion againſt him, and almoſt deſtroyed the whole nation. He ſays farther, that the King of Scots attended King Arthur at the city of Legions, did homage for his kingdom, and carried King Arthur's ſword before him (17). Leland alledges, that Caire Arture in Wales, is a plain proof there was ſuch a perſon, as alſo Arthur's gate in Montgomery (18). After all, Geoffrey of Monmouth is not the author of his book, but the tranſlator only. Though ſome have affected to doubt whether there really was any ſuch book written in the Britiſh tongue, yet in a manuſcript hiſtory of Britiſh affairs, written a hundred years ago by Mr. John Lewis, it is expreſsly ſaid by the author, that he had the very original of the Britiſh hiſtory, written in the Britiſh tongue; as he concludes from this circumſtance; that in his manuſcript, Geoffrey's preface was wanting, and the preface to his book was the ſecond chapter in Geoffrey's tranſlation, being the deſcription of Britain (19). Beſides, Giraldus Cambrenſis puts it out of diſpute, that Geoffrey was under no neceſſity of forging. For he tells us expreſsly, that even in his time the Welſh bards, and ſongſters, could recite from their ancient and authentic books, the genealogy of their Princes, which they puſhed not only as high as Arthur, but to Ænæas (20). On the whole, if the hiſtory given us by Geoffrey contains many things which are not ſtrictly true; he ought not to be reproached for them, becauſe he pretends to no greater authority than he really had, viz. that of the old Britiſh book; which, whether its contents were true or falſe, he was certainly commendable for publiſhing; and as to the fictions contained in it, they are not at all more glaring than thoſe in other hiſtories of the ſame ſtanding; and therefore, though they ought to have no credit themſelves, yet they cannot impeach the credit of the true hiſtory mixed with them. To conclude, if Camden doubts the credit of Geoffrey of Monmouth; he in other places ſupports the hiſtory of Arthur (21). If Milton doubts whether there ever was ſuch a Prince; Leland the great antiquary hath written a treatiſe expreſsly in ſupport of his hiſtory; and the great Primate Uſher (22) thought the objections brought againſt the ſtory of his actions, but of very little weight.

to oblige the Saxons to raiſe the ſiege of Kaerlind coit, now called Lincoln. The Saxons, upon their approach, inſtantly roſe from before the place, that with the greater conveniency they might fight the Britons. The battle was bloody and obſtinate; but at laſt the Saxons were overthrown with the loſs of ſix thouſand men, part killed, and part drowned in the rivers. The remains of the army retired to the woods of Caledon, which moſt probably are Celidon woods in Lincolnſhire, where they made a brave ſtand; but being ſurrounded by the Britons, were at laſt obliged to ſurrender upon articles, viz. That they ſhould leave behind them all their booty, retire peaceably to their ſhips, and tranſport themſelves back again into Germany (g). For the performance of theſe articles they gave hoſtages, and were then ſuffered to retire in order to embark quietly. But in their voyage repenting of what they had done, they landed at Totneſs, burnt all the country as far as the Severn ſea, ſlaughtered the peaſants, ruined the villages, and at length laid ſiege to the city of Badon, i. e. Bath in Somerſetſhire. When this news was brought to King Arthur, who was on the point of marching againſt the Scots and Picts, he inſtantly ordered the Saxon hoſtages to be put to death, and then marched to the relief of the beſieged city. When he drew near it, himſelf firſt made a ſpeech to the army, and then the Archbiſhop Dubricius harangued them likewiſe, and gave them his bleſſing. On the day of battle, Arthur put on an excellent coat of mail, a golden helmet, with the figure of a dragon upon the top thereof: acroſs his ſhoulder hung his ſhield, called Pridwen or Prywen, wherein was pictured the Virgin Mary, bearing the child Jeſus in her arms: he had likewiſe by his ſide his ſword called Calliburn (b), and in his right-hand he bore his lance Rou. Thus equipped he attacked the Saxons, who were drawn up in the form of a wedge. The battle laſted from morning till evening, when the Saxons withdrew to the top of a high hill, and there encamped. The next day Arthur attacked them again; but they made a gallant defence, till the greateſt part of the day was worn out, which ſo enraged Arthur, that he threw himſelf among the foremoſt ranks, and with great hazard of his perſon, performed there incredible feats of valour, for he ſlew with his own hand four hundred and ſeventy men. The Britons, encouraged by the example of their Prince, forced the Saxon camp on all hands, and put many thouſands of them to the ſword (i), amongſt whom fell Colgrin and Baldulph. But as for Cedric he carried off the remains of his army, and endeavoured to recover his ſhips. After the important victory at Badon, Arthur received advice, that the Scots and Picts had beſieged the city of Aclud, which is thought to be Dunbritton in Scotland, where he left his nephew Hoel ſick, at the time he marched back againſt the Saxons. To his aſſiſtance, therefore, the generous Britiſh Prince marched with all the alacrity imaginable, leaving Cador Duke of Cornwall, to purſue the Saxons. On his approach, the Scots and Picts not only raiſed the ſiege, but fled precipitately to Lough Lomond, where they endeavoured to fortify themſelves in the iſlands; but Arthur having quickly equipped a fleet, obliged them to ſurrender, and out of his great clemency pardoned them (k). In the mean time, Cador Duke of Cornwall, taking a circuit round the Saxons, and thereby giving them time to collect themſelves into a body, and to refreſh after their fatigues, ſuddenly ſeized and carried away their ſhips, and then marched in queſt of them, who, perceiving their deſperate condition, retired into the iſle of Thanet, where Cador blocked them up with their own ſhips, and after killing their commander Cedric in fight, forced them to ſurrender upon articles, and to give hoſtages once more for their departing out of the kingdom (l). This done, Cador rejoined the King, who kept his Chriſtmas at York, where he deſtroyed the temples of the Pagans, reſtored the Chriſtian churches, and appointed Pyramus, his Chaplain, Archbiſhop of this See (m). He alſo promoted Auguſel to the ſovereignty over the Scots (n), rewarded other perſons of diſtinction, and took himſelf to wife Guanhumara, a lady deſcended from the Romans, of exquiſite beauty, bred up in the family of Cador Duke of Cornwall (o). The next ſummer he fitted out a fleet, and therewith invaded Ireland, of which Guillamurius was the chief King, who, to oppoſe him, drew together a numerous army, which Arthur defeated, and made him priſoner: upon this all the petty Princes in the iſland ſubmitted. Then he ſailed to Iceland, which he likewiſe ſubdued, and received the ſubmiſſions of Doldavius King of Gothland, and Gunfaſius King of the Orkneys, whom the very terror of his arms had reduced to obedience (p). After this he returned into Britain, and governed here twelve years in peace, with ſuch magnificence and ſplendor, that all Europe was amazed at it, and the greateſt potentates ſtood in fear of him. At length, Sichelin King of the Norwegians dying, and leaving his kingdom to Lot, Arthur's brother-in-law, the people of Norway, notwithſtanding, ſet up Riculf. On this pretence, therefore, Arthur invaded that kingdom, defeated the Norwegians, killed Riculf, conquered Norway and Dacia, that is, Denmark, and having given the whole to Lot, proceeded with his victorious army to invade Gaul, then a province, as our hiſtorian tells us, of the Roman empire. The greateſt part of the country he quickly ſubdued, blocked up the Roman Governor in Paris, and reduced him to ſuch ſtreights there, that he was on the very point of ſtarving. In this diſtreſs he challenged Arthur to a ſingle combat, which he was too gallant a man to refuſe; whereupon a bloody duel enſued, in which at firſt Arthur had the worſt, but at length he conquered and killed Flollo, upon which Paris ſurrendered. He ſpent however nine years in conquering the reſt of France, after which he returned to that city, and kept a royal court, beſtowing Neuſtria, afterwards called Normandy, upon his butler, Bedver, and the reſt of the provinces upon his domeſtics (q). Upon the approach of the feaſt of Pentecoſt, Arthur determined to call a great aſſembly of the moſt noble of his ſubjects, which he appointed to be held at Caerleon in Montgomeryſhire; becauſe, ſtanding on the river Uſk, near the Severn ſea, it was both pleaſant and commodious, for the coming and going of thoſe who were invited. Accordingly there aſſembled Auguſel, King of Scotland, the King of North-Wales, the King of South-Wales, Cador, now called King of Cornwall, the Archbiſhops of London, York, and Caerleon, with a multitude of Britiſh Princes; there came likewiſe Guillamurius King of Ireland, Malvaſius King of Iceland, Doldavius King of Gothland, Gunfaſius King of the Orkneys, Lot King of Norway, Aſchillius King of the Dacians, &c. At this time he was ſolemnly crowned, the Kings of Scotland, Cornwall, North and South-Wales, carrying four golden ſwords before him (r). Not long after this, the Romans demanded tribute, which Arthur, by the advice of his council, not only refuſed, but reſolved to make war upon them. A mighty army he gathered, and marched to Southampton where he embarked, leaving the government of Britain to his nephew Modred, the ſon of Lot, by his ſiſter Anne, before mentioned. But while he was a coaſting about the iſland, he had news brought him, that a Spaniſh giant had forcibly taken away Helena, the daughter of his nephew Hoel, Duke of Britanny, whom he had carried to mount St. Michael in Cornwall [C]. Thither the King purſuing him, ſlew him in ſingle combat (s), after which he proceeded in the war he had firſt deſigned, and having therein triumphed over all the forces of the Roman empire, and ſlain with his own hand Lucius Tiberius, their General, as he was paſſing the Alps in order to go to Rome, he received advice, that Modred his nephew had revolted, and had married Guanhumara his Queen (t). This, ſays our hiſtorian, obliged him to deſiſt from his enterprize againſt Leo, King of the Romans: wherefore, ſending Hoel King of Britanny with a great army to ſecure the peace of Gaul, he, with the reſt of his forces, ſailed for Britain. Modred, knowing the badneſs of his cauſe, endeavoured to fortify himſelf by many and great alliances. With this view he once more called in the Saxons, and alſo invited, by promiſing great ſums of money, the Scots, Picts, and Iriſh, to fight under his banner. At length, having aſſembled eighty thouſand men, he led them down into Kent, to oppoſe his uncle, who he knew intended to land there. He could not however prevent Arthur's coming on ſhore; but he preſently engaged him, and after a bloody battle, in which many of the King's friends fell, was defeated and forced to fly to Wincheſter. As for the Queen, ſhe retired to the city of Caerleon, and there became a Nun (u). King Arthur purſued his nephew to Wincheſter, and there a ſecond time engaged him, beat him, and forced him to fly towards Cornwall. There, on the banks of the river Camel, Modred made a ſtand again with ſixty thouſand men, with whom Arthur fought a third battle, wherein, after thouſands had been ſlain, and amongſt them, many of the moſt honourable perſons on both ſides, at length, Modred himſelf was killed, and his army totally routed. In this engagement, however, our hero Arthur received ſeveral wounds, which forced him to retire into the iſland of Avalon, where, feeling himſelf extremely weak, he reſigned the crown to Conſtantine, the ſon of Cador Duke of Cornwall, and a few days after died, A. D. 542 (w). It is neceſſary to add a little ſober truth to this romantic ſtory, and therefore let us conclude this article with obſerving, that Henry II., who was the firſt of the Plantagenet line, being, in the laſt year of his reign, at Pembroke, and hearing there a Welſh bard ſinging to his harp, the ſtory of our Arthur, concluding with an account of his death and burial, in the church-yard of Glaſtenbury, between two pyramids [D]; the King inſtantly gave orders that the matter ſhould be enquired into, and the body dug up. This was done as the King directed,

[C] Mount St. Michael in Cornwall.] William of Malmeſbury, in his Antiquities of Glaſtenbury, gives us a very circumſtantial account of King Arthur's carrying one Ider, a Prince of the blood royal, to try his valour at a certain mount, called Brentenol, where he behaved very gallantly; but falling, through wearineſs, at length into a ſwoon, Arthur left him there for dead, which proved the cauſe of his really breathing his laſt in that place through want of help; to expiate which involuntary offence, Arthur gave to the monaſtery of Glaſtenbury, lands ſufficient for the maintenance of twenty-four Monks to pray for the ſoul of Ider; and alſo beſtowed on them gold and ſilver veſſels, and other eccleſiaſtical ornaments (23). The ſame author, in his catalogue of gifts made to the monaſtery, hath theſe words. 'Imprimis Rex Arthurus 'tempore Britonum dedit Brentemaris, Poweldon, 'cum multis aliis terris in confinio ſitis, pro ani-'ma Ider, ut ſupra tactum eſt, quas terras per 'Anglos, tunc Paganos, ſupervenientes ablatas; ite-'rum poſt eorum converſionem ad fidem reſtitue-'runt cum pluribus aliis; i. e. In the firſt place, 'King Arthur, in the time of the Britons, gave Brentemar, Poweldon, with many other lands in the 'neighbourhood, for the ſoul of Ider, as is before men-'tioned, which lands on the coming of the Engliſh, then 'Pagans, were taken away; and after their coming to 'the knowledge of the faith reſtored, with many others '(24).' It is to be obſerved, that this fact does not reſt at all on the credit of Geoffrey of Monmouth, or of his original author, but was taken from the records of the Abbey of Glaſtenbury.

[D] Between two pyramids.] As to the diſcovery of King Arthur's body, we have not only the teſtimony of Giraldus Cambrenſis, who was an eye-witneſs of it (25), but we have alſo a very long account in Bromton's Chronicle, who takes occaſion from thence to ſpeak of various circumſtances relating to the hiſtory of King Arthur, from other authorities than that of Geoffrey of Monmouth. For inſtance, he tells us, that in certain Chronicles it was noted, that Arthur having again and again vanquiſhed Cerdic the Saxon, and finding that he ſtill brought new armies into the field, being quite tired out, he granted him Hampſhire and Somerſetſhire, where he eſtabliſhed the kingdom of the Weſt Saxons.

directed, and at the depth of ſeven feet, was found a vaſt ſtone, whereon was faſtened a leaden croſs, with this inſcription on the inſide: Hic Jacet Sepultus Inclytus Rex Arturius in Inſula Avalonia; i. e. Here lieth the famous King Arthur, buried in the Iſle of Avalon. Digging ſtill lower, they found the King's body in the trunk of a tree, his beautiful Queen

Saxons. He ſays likewiſe, that in the Engliſh Chronicles, it was recorded, that when Modred rebelled againſt his uncle, he purchaſed the aſſiſtance of Cerdic by a new grant, and as it ſhould ſeem, by releaſing him from all homage. For thereupon Cerdic was crowned after the cuſtom of the Pagans at Wincheſter, and Modred at London. This writer reduces the victories gained by Arthur over the Saxons to nine, whereas all other authors reckoned them twelve: he fixes, however, the laſt of them at Lanſdown. He alſo fixes the year in which King Arthur's body was found to the 13th of the reign of Henry II., and to the year of our Lord 1180 (26). He differs in this from another very authentic account of this fact, not in any circumſtance, but in the date, which in the Annals of Margan is 1191. Therein it is ſaid, that digging under the two pyramids to bury a Monk, there was firſt found the body of a woman, after that the body of a man, and a great way below both the ſtone and croſs, bearing the inſcription mentioned in the text, under which lay the body of King Arthur. The firſt is ſuppoſed to be the body of his Queen, and the ſecond that of his nephew Modred (27). Not to tire the reader, let us ſhut up this matter with one obſervation more; which is, that in the larger Hiſtory of Wincheſter, we are told, that Arthur yielded, in the ſecond year of his reign, to Cerdic the Saxon, Hampſhire, Surrey, Wiltſhire and Somerſetſhire, to which Modred when he rebelled, added Dorſetſhire, Devonſhire, and part of Cornwall. The author of this hiſtory, is ſo far from tranſcribing Geoffrey of Monmouth, that he inveighs bitterly againſt his work, and therefore muſt have taken theſe paſſages from what he thought better authority (28).

[The following obſervations, on what is alledged, in the note [B], from Buchanan, and King Edward the firſt's letter, have been tranſmitted to us, by a learned correſpondent, to whom we have already ſeveral times been obliged. 'Buchanan was altogether ignorant of Britiſh Antiquity. His aſſerting, or denying Arthur to have exiſted can have no effect in the preſent controverſy. Arthur Seat, is ſaid to be derived, or rather corrupted from A'rd Seir, "a place or field of arrows, where people ſhot at a mark." And this not improperly, for among theſe cliffs is a little plain where the wind can ſcarcely reach, now called the Hunters Bog. See Gordon's Itinerarium Boreale. I think I have heard Preſident Forbes ſay, that he was puzzled as to the etymology of Arthur's Seat.——— King Edward ſaid what he thought moſt conducive to his own cauſe; though, indeed, the conqueſts of a Britiſh King could give little authority to the claim of a Saxon or Norman King, after the interval of many hundred years.'

As to the queſtion concerning the credit which is due to Geoffrey of Monmouth's hiſtory, it is not our intention to enter minutely into it, at leaſt in this place. Nevertheleſs, we cannot avoid obſerving, that Mr. Thompſon's vindication of that hiſtory, in his long preface to his tranſlation of it, hath afforded us, upon the whole, very little ſatisfaction. Biſhop Tanner doth not ſeem to have been much pleaſed with this preface, as he gives it the appellation of ſatis longa (29). In a letter of Biſhop Lloyd's, lately publiſhed, concerning Geoffrey of Monmouth's hiſtory, he treats Geoffrey with great contempt, and ſays, that 'the few truths he lighted upon, and prickt in here and there among his fictions, are ſo crudely delivered, and ſo confounded with his miſtakes, that it had been almoſt as good that they had been quite loſt, as that they had been no otherwiſe preſerved (30).' But however fabulous the work may be, it ſeems to be certain that it was not wholly, or principally, the invention of Geoffrey. 'About the year 1100,' ſays Mr. Warton, 'Gualter, Archdeacon of Oxford, a learned man, and a diligent collector of hiſtories, travelling through France, procured in Armorica an ancient Chronicle, written in the Britiſh or Armorica language, entitled BRUTY BRENHINED, OR THE HISTORY OF THE KINGS OF BRITAIN. This book he brought into England, and communicated it to Geoffrey of Monmouth, a Welch Benedictine Monk, an elegant writer of Latin, and admirably ſkilled in the Britiſh tongue. Geoffrey, at the requeſt and recommendation of Gualter, the Archdeacon, tranſlated this Britiſh Chronicle into Latin; executing the tranſlation with a tolerable degree of purity, and great fidelity, yet not without ſome interpolations.—Geoffrey confeſſes, that he took ſome part of his account of King Arthur's atchievements from the mouth of his friend Gualter, the Archdeacon; who probably related to the Tranſlator ſome of the traditions on this ſubject, which he had heard in Armorica, or which at that time might have been popular in Wales.—He alſo owns, that Merlin's Prophecies were not in the Armorican original.—The ſpeeches and letters were forged by Geoffrey; and in the Deſcription of Battles, our Tranſlator has not ſcrupled frequent variations and additions (31).' Mr. Warton has added ſome curious remarks, concerning Geoffrey's original, and his tranſlation, communicated by Mr. Morris of Penbryn, an ingenious Antiquarian in Britiſh Literature. This Gentleman has in his poſſeſſion a very ancient manuſcript of the original, and has been many years preparing materials for giving an accurate and faithful tranſlation of it into Engliſh (32).

There is no late Writer who hath entered ſo fully into the hiſtory and exploits of Arthur as Mr. Whitaker, from whom we ſhall tranſcribe what he hath ſaid in vindication of the exiſtence and the real tranſactions of that celebrated hero: 'The hiſtory of the famous Arthur has raiſed up two parties in the republic of letters, and engaged them in an attack upon its credit and a vindication of its authenticity. And theſe, like other factions in other republics, in their mutual zeal for the truth, have overleaped all the limits of moderation and propriety. By one ſet of hiſtorians, the whole account of Arthur, loaded as it is with falſehoods, and pregnant with abſurdities, is actually admitted as genuine. And by another, even thoſe parts of it, which exhibit the faireſt features of truth, and are marked with the ſtrongeſt ſignatures of authenticity, are abſolutely rejected as ſpurious. The hero is exalted into the little arbiter of the fates of Europe by the one. And even his exiſtence is denied as a fiction by the other. A long and continued oppoſition of ſentiment, in two contending parties, almoſt always reduces the judgment of both under the tyranny of the paſſions.

'Many of the actions, which are attributed to Arthur by the Welch chronicles of Britain, are as abſurd in themſelves, as they are ſpurious in their authority. Written, as thoſe narratives were, many centuries after the facts, and being merely the authentic accounts of Arthur, embelliſhed with the fictions, and diſtorted by the perverſions of folly; they are inconſiſtent equally with the ſtate of the times, and the hiſtory of the continent and the iſland. And the ignorance of the forgers, and the credulity of their abettors, can be equalled only by the injudiciouſneſs and incredulity of the opponents to both. If ſome accounts of Arthur and Cunobeline in theſe hiſtories be certainly ſpurious, others are as certainly genuine. And the relations of Suetonius, Dio, and Nennius, are not to be rejected, becauſe of the falſehoods which impoſture has engrafted upon them, and abſurdity admitted with them.

'The exiſtence of Arthur is evinced by that of the fables, which have at once annihilated his actions, and his name with the miſ-judging critic. And the reaſoner's own arguments actually turn againſt himſelf, and demonſtrate the point which they were intended to diſprove. The annals of Wales have long laboured in Arthur's commendation. The Highlanders have long had a poetical hiſtory of his exploits in their own language. The whole iſland is in traditionary poſſeſſion of his character. And ſix or ſeven hundred places within it are ſtill diſtinguiſhed by his name.

Queen lying by him, with long flowing hair, in colour bright as gold, which however ſunk into duſt when touched. The King's bones were very large ſized, and in his ſkull there were ten wounds or more, all cicatrized, except that of which he died. This diſcovery was made in the year 1189, as Giraldus Cambrenſis tells us, who ſaw theſe bones

'The genuine actions of the Chief are mentioned 'by his own hiſtorians, with a modeſty and conciſe-'neſs that is no bad argument of the truth, and 'with a particularity of time and place that is a good 'evidence of the facts. They are noticed by men, 'whom the death of the hero had exempted from all 'temptation to flattery. They are recited by per-'ſons, whom a proximity to the times had precluded 'from all poſſibility of miſtake. And they are atteſt-'ed by the beſt hiſtorical authority, writers who lived 'cotemporary with him, authors who converſed with 'his warriors, and hiſtorians that wrote within a few 'years after him. He is ſpoken of as the ho-'nourable father of the Britiſh heroes by the aged 'Llomarch, a writer actually cotemporary with him, 'and ſome time reſident at his court. One of his 'greater actions is incidentally recorded by Talieſ-'ſin, an hiſtorical bard living under Maelgwn 'Gwined, who was a ſovereign among the Britons 'in the days of Arthur, Gildas, and Llomarch. 'Another of his conſiderable exploits is caſually in-'timated by Myrdhin Wylht or Merlinus Caledo-'nius, who complains of the ſevere treatment which 'he himſelf received from Rydderch Hael, a king 'cotemporary with Urien Reged, and engaged with 'him in a war againſt the Saxons on the death of Ida 'in 560. And all his actions are particularly recited 'by Nennius.

'The Hiſtoria Britonum of this laſt author con-'ſiſts at preſent of two parts, the original accounts 'and the additional notices. And theſe are plainly 'diſtinguiſhed in ſome places by the groſs contra-'dictions in the chronology. Thus in chapter the 'firſt we have the date of the work ſettled at the 'year 800, and in preface the firſt at 858. And 'the Picts are ſaid in the ſecond chapter to have 'formerly inhabited Britain, priùs habitabant, and 'in the fifth to poſſeſs a third part of it even to that 'period, tenent uſque nunc. But the original date 'of the work may be eaſily aſcertained, and the ori-'ginal parts of it readily diſtinguiſhed, in general. 'And the concluſion of the hiſtory demonſtrates it to 'have been compoſed betwixt 547 and 560. The 'original detail of tranſactions is terminated in the 'ſixty-fourth chapter, and at the ſettlement of Ida 'on the throne of Bernicia in 547. And the further 'ſucceſſes of Ida and his conqueſt of Deira before '560, in the ſixty-fifth and the firſt appendix, are 'expreſsly declared to be added by an enlarger of 'the hiſtory. And ſince all the facts, that are men-'tioned in Nennius antecedent to this epocha, ought 'generally to be conſidered as the original incidents 'of the work, thoſe parts of it which continue the 'regular chain of tranſactions, and relate to the 'greater events of the national annals, ſhould be 'particularly admitted as genuine. Such is the ac-'count of Arthur's military actions. It is all con-'ſiſtent with the real date of the work. It is a 'neceſſary link in the chain of related events. And 'it is a ſeries of incidents the moſt important in all 'the national hiſtory.

'Among this aſſemblage of authors, almoſt all the 'writers in the age of Arthur whoſe works have 'deſcended to us, and all unqueſtionable witneſſes 'of his fame; the ſilence of Gildas concerning him 'has been frequently alledged. But the argument 'is of no avail. If this was of moment againſt the 'actions of Arthur, the ſilence of Nennius would be 'of equal againſt thoſe of Ambroſius. And, if Gil-'das's omiſſion was of any authority againſt that 'hero, it ſhould certainly be of equal, and even of 'greater, againſt Vortimer. Gildas does not merely 'paſs over the actions of the latter, but abſolutely 'precludes them by his manner. And all the ex-'ploits of Vortimer are virtually denied by Gildas, 'while the greateſt of Arthur's is actually mentioned 'by him; mentioned without an author by Gildas 'and expreſsly aſcribed to Arthur by Talieſſin. But 'the mere ſilence of an hiſtorian is a weak argument 'in itſelf. The omiſſion made by one writer, amid 'a variety of equal and atteſting hiſtorians, is 'the moſt frivolous of all reaſons. And the ſilence 'of Gildas concerning a train of military exploits, 'when they are noticed by others fully equal to him 'in authenticity, and when he expreſsly profeſſes 'non tam fortiſſimorum militum enunciare pericula 'quàm deſidioſorum, not to tell the deeds of the 'hero, but expoſe the conduct of the ſcoundrel, is 'not even the ſemblage of an argument at all.

'Arthur was the Arth-uir, great man, or ſovereign 'of the Proper Silures, and therefore denominated 'King of Gwent, the Venta Silurum of the Ro-'mans, and the Britiſh metropolis of the nation. 'So the Kings of the Creones and the Iriſh, as I 'have already ſhewn, were denominated from the 'places of their reſidence and the capitals of their 'dominions, Sovereigns of Selma and Monarchs of 'Temora. And thoſe of North and South Wales, 'during the tenth century, were denominated the 'Brenin of Aberffraw and the Arglwydd of Dinevor. 'At the requiſition of the Pendragon, Arthur had 'brought up his complement of troops to the ſouthern 'army, and been trained to war under the auſpices 'of Ambroſius. His valour diſtinguiſhed him a-'mong the aſſembled monarchs in the ſervice. And 'his conduct pointed him out to their diſcerning 'commander. Ambroſius pitied the diſtreſſes of the 'northern Britons, and was alarmed at the progreſs 'of the Saxons among them. He relieved the one, 'and ſtopt the other, effectually. He ſent Arthur 'into the North. And this officer he honourably 'ſingled out from the reſt, for the arduous and im-'portant province of rallying the routed, teaching 'the runaways to encounter their conquerors, and 'leading the beaten troops to victory and glory.

'The Saxon conqueſts in the North appear to have 'been principally obtained by the weight of num-'bers. The Angles poured ſo continually into the 'provinces, that they left their own country entirely 'deſtitute of people for ages; and ſome parts of it 'were actually diſpoſſeſſed of their inhabitants, even 'in the days of Hengiſt and before 488. And the 'ſubſequent hiſtory of their many defeats ſhews their 'numbers to have been extremely great. For the 'fortune of the Saxons was now reverſed. They 'encountered a new general and additional forces. 'They were repeatedly beaten. And all the country 'was recovered.

'The victories of Arthur over the Saxons are thus 'recorded by Nennius. The firſt battle was fought 'at the mouth of the river, which is denominated 'Glem. The ſecond, third, fourth, and fifth were 'upon another river, that is called Duglas, and lies 'in the region Linuis. The ſixth was on a ſtream, 'which bears the appellation of Baſſas. The ſeventh 'was in the wood of Celidon, that is, in Cat Coit 'Celidon. The eighth was at Caſtle Gunnion. 'And the ninth was at the city of the Legion. The 'tenth was on the bank of the river Ribroit, the 'eleventh at the hill Agned Cathregonion, and the 'twelfth at Mount Badon.

'Theſe twelve battles of Arthur are deſcribed to 'us in the ſame manner as Vortimer's three. Only 'the general facts are mentioned, and only the 'common names of places are recited, in both. 'And from the whole air and aſpect of the hiſtory, 'the remarkable conciſeneſs with which the notices 'are given, and the great eaſe with which the places 'are pointed out, the detail appears to have been 'drawn up at the diſtance only of a few years from 'the tranſactions, and when theſe little references 'were ſufficiently underſtood (33).'

Mr. Whitaker proceeds to aſcertain the ſcenes of Arthur's battles; after which he gives a relation of them, with a ſurprizing particularity. A ſevere critic might be apt to ſay, that it requires all our faith in the author's judgment, as well as in his ingenuity and learning, not to ſuſpect, that he ſometimes allows too much ſcope to fancy and conjecture. However, the whole of what he hath advanced is ſingularly curious, and deſerves peculiar attention and conſideration. And no one can help admiring the penetration with which he hath formed ſuch a regular detail of facts, from the combined aid of hiſtory, romance, and tradition (34). According to Mr. Whitaker Arthur's principal exploits were a-

bones, and examined the whole matter carefully (z). There was also a table containing this story, set up in the monastery of Glastenbury, and the leaden cross with the inscription remained there till the dissolution of the monastery, where it was seen by the great antiquary, Leland (y), but what is become of it since, does not appear. gainst the northern Saxons, whilst he was only Prince of the Silures, and Ambrosius was the Dictator, or Pendragon, of the Britons. 'In a series probably 'of five campaigns, and in a succession certainly of 'eleven victories, this great commander had re-'pelled the Saxons from the north of Flavia, dis-'lodged them from all Maxima, and dispossessed 'them of all Valentia. And these were successes so 'unchequered with misfortunes, so great in them-'selves, and so beneficial to the Public, that the 'name of Arthur claims the first rank in the list 'of military, and the better one of patriot, 'heroes (35).' The twelfth battle of Arthur was fought in the south of England, after he was elected to the Pendragonship, against Cerdic the Saxon. 'This, says Mr. Whitaker, was a most extraordinary 'victory, and compleats the circle of Arthur's mili-'tary glories (36).' In the author's account of this Prince's conduct in peace, he asserts, that Arthur saw that an appointment was wanted, which should at once be a more regular and more honourable signature of merit; by the certainty of the honour and the greatness of the dignity, call out all the worth of all the worthy in the nation; and collect it round the throne of the Pendragon. Accordingly, he established a military order. It was the first that had ever been instituted in the island; and it has since been imitated by all the nations on the Continent. 'By means of this association, Arthur raised 'among the provincials a general glow of ingenuous 'heroism, the first spirit of chivalry that ever ap-'peared in Europe; that manly and honourable 'gallantry of soul, which has made him and his 'Worthies the subject of romantic histories over all 'the west of it. By this, and this alone, could he 'have been what history represents him, the Reve-'rend Father of the British Heroes in general, even 'to the conclusion of the sixth century, and nearly 'the middle of the seventh. The order naturally 'survived its founder. And the members of it were 'denominated the warriors of Arthur, though the 'persons were born half a century after his death.' Mr. Whitaker goes on to inform us, that, under the prudent management of Arthur for twenty years together, a fair prospect dawned upon the Britons, and long scenes of future glories opened to their imaginations. 'But the gay vision was destroyed at 'once, by the commencement of a civil war. Many 'towns still remained in ruins, the memorial of the 'former wars, and the disgrace of the present. The 'diffused spirit of chivalry was turned upon the na-'tion, and heroism became the tool of dissension. 'And the dreadful combination of civil evils was 'begun and consummated, at once, by the death 'of the renowned Arthur in battle. Thus died the 'incomparable hero in 542 (37).'] K.

ARTHUR, (Duke of Britany) was the son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, fourth son of Henry II., King of England, and of Constantia sole daughter and heiress of Conan Duke of Britany, and Earl of Richmond. This Arthur was a posthumous son, his father being unfortunately slain, while his mother was with child of him, whom she brought into the world on Easter-day, which fell on the thirty-first of March, Anno Dom. 1187 (a). In right of his mother he was heir-apparent to the dukedom of Britany, and to many lordships; and on this account he was left under the care of his mother, notwithstanding the relation he had to the royal family of England [A]. The Lady Constantia did not long remain a widow, but took for her second husband the Earl of Chester (b), however she had still the care of her son, and in all probability was well treated, and her son for some years beloved, and caressed by her brother-in-law King Richard, who had so great a respect to the right of succession, and such an affection for his young nephew, that in the year 1190, in a letter directed to the Pope, and dated from Messina in Sicily, on the eleventh of November (c), he declares his dearest nephew Arthur his heir, in case he died without issue by his Queen; and also by an article in his treaty with Tancred King of Sicily, he stipulated that this nephew, Arthur, when he grew up, should take to wife the daughter of the King of Sicily. The next year after he provided, by a treaty with the King of France, that the dukedom of Britany should be for ever held of the Duke of Normandy, and that the Duke of Normandy should answer to the King of France for both dukedoms (d). Yet in the year 1199, when this Prince was so unfortunate as to receive a mortal wound before the castle of Chalus, he devised to his brother John the kingdom of England, and all his other dominions, caused such as were present to swear fealty to him, directing also that his castles should be immediately put into his hands, with three-fourths of his treasures (e). In all probability, it was the Queen-mother Eleanor who persuaded King Richard to take this step in disinheriting his nephew Arthur, who was then but twelve years old; neither are our ancient historians silent, as to the motives which induced the old Queen to act in this manner. She was, as all writers agree, a proud, ambitious woman, and the Lady Constantia, Dutchess of Britany, having also a very high spirit, the Queen foresaw that in case her son ascended the throne, she should thenceforward have little or no credit, which made her, to the utmost of her power, promote her son John's claim,

[A] Royal Family of England.] His father Geoffrey fourth son to Henry II. King of England, was born on the 23d of September 1158 (1), and his father, King Henry, while he was yet a child, declared he should marry Constantia heiress of Britany, who was also a child, and under colour of this marriage reduced the whole Dutchy under his obedience (2). In the year 1186, he had the misfortune to fall off his horse at a tournament in Paris, and being trampled under feet, was so terribly bruised that he died, leaving by his wife, Constantia, an only daughter Eleanor, to whom Philip King of France claimed to be guardian, which was disputed by King Henry of England, and in the interim Constantia was delivered of Arthur (3). That on the demise of Richard I. Arthur should claim his succession in England and in France, appears highly reasonable from this account of his birth. On the other hand, he had some other pretensions at least to friends and favourers, derived to him from his mother; for her mother was Margaret, sister to William King of Scotland, and niece to Edgar Atheling, right heir to the Crown of England of the Saxon line (4).

againſt that of her grandſon Arthur's. Several of the Norman, and moſt of the Engliſh lords, ſtuck to the firſt mentioned Prince, who, very ſhortly after, cauſed himſelf to be inveſted Duke of Normandy, and declared King of England. The inequality indeed was great between the competitors, for King John was in the prime of life, being in his thirty-third year, whereas Arthur was not much above twelve (f). Yet there wanted not ſome perſons of diſtinction, who, out of pure reſpect to juſtice, eſpouſed his quarrel. Thomas Defurnes, governor of the city of Angiers, rendered it with the caſtle to Duke Arthur, and the Barons and great men of Anjou, Tourain, and Main, having met together, recognized the young Prince for their Lord, whom his mother brought to the city of Tours, and there delivered him to Philip King of France, who ſolemnly received him, and all his dominions, under his protection (g). This ſo provoked his competitor John, that he immediately attacked the city of Main, and having reduced it, treated the inhabitants with great ſeverity, for the affection they had ſhewn to Duke Arthur. After this exploit, John went over into England to be crowned, while Arthur remained in the court of King Philip, who gave him ſtrong aſſurances of his favour and aſſiſtance (h). In purſuance of theſe promiſes, King Philip committed many hoſtilities in the countries belonging to King John, and having raiſed a conſiderable army in the ſummer, he, in the beginning of the month of Auguſt, knighted his pupil Arthur, and received his homage for Anjou, Poictou, Tourain, Main, Britany, and Normandy, ſo that he ſeemed now abſolutely engaged in the cauſe of the young Prince. King John returning into Normandy, firſt ſought to have entered into a treaty with King Philip, and being diſappointed therein, prepared the beſt he could to reſiſt his enemies. In the beginning of the month of October, the King of France took the caſtle of Balun, and put a garriſon into it. This highly offended William de Roche, whom the Latin writers call de Rupibus, who commanded the forces of Duke Arthur; inſomuch that after having expoſtulated, to no purpoſe, with King Philip, he reconciled the young Prince to his uncle, to whom he delivered the city of Mans, of which he was governor, and put Duke Arthur and his mother Conſtance into the King's hands. Things did not long continue in this condition; for the Lady Conſtantia, and thoſe about her, ſuſpecting King John intended to impriſon her ſon, made haſte away with him to the city of Angiers, where, by virtue of a diſpenſation from the Pope, Lady Conſtantia quitted her ſecond huſband the Earl of Cheſter, and married Guy de Tours (i). In the beginning of the next year, there were ſome negotiations between the Kings of France and England, which at length ended in a peace, wherein Duke Arthur was included, and the two Kings having an interview, near the city of Vernon, Arthur, by conſent of the French King, did homage to his uncle for the dukedom of Britany, and this ceremony over returned with King Philip to Paris, as having no great confidence in King John (k). In the year 1201, that King returned into Normandy, and, on an invitation from King Philip, went to Paris, where he was kindly received, though, after his return into Normandy, ſome diſputes grew between them. In 1202, the Kings had another interview, at which Philip haughtily required King John, to yield to his nephew all that he poſſeſſed in France without exception, and this extraordinary demand occaſioned a war. In the courſe of theſe diſputes Duke Arthur, with a conſiderable army, entered Poictou, and having ſubdued it, with the countries of Tourain and Anjou, he ſuddenly came with his forces before the caſtle of Mirabeau, where Queen Eleanor, his grandmother, at this time had her reſidence. The ſucceſs of this young Prince had drawn numbers into his ſervice, ſo that he attacked the place with a great army, and made himſelf maſter of all but the middle tower where the Queen was: in this diſtreſs ſhe wrote to her ſon John, earneſtly beſeeching him to come to her aſſiſtance. The King, extremely alarmed at his mother's danger, marched night and day to afford her relief; inſomuch that he appeared before Mirabeau at a time when he was not expected, and taking advantage of the enemy's confuſion, he attacked, and entirely defeated them. This was on the firſt of Auguſt 1202, as appears by King John's letter to the Barons of England, wherein he gives them a full account of this victory, and of his taking his nephew Arthur, and many other noble priſoners. This blow was fatal to our young Prince, and to his family. He had been a little before contracted to the King of France's youngeſt daughter; but now all hopes of his conſummating that marriage were loſt. His only ſiſter, Eleanor, named, by the common people, the Damſel of Britain, fell likewiſe into the hands of King John, who ſent her over into England, where ſhe remained a priſoner many years in the caſtle of Briſtol (l). As for Duke Arthur, the King ſent him to the caſtle of Falais, under the cuſtody of his Chamberlain Hubert, and not long after the King went thither himſelf. There, it is ſaid, he treated his nephew very gently, intreated him to lay aſide all thoughts of adhering, as hitherto he had done, to the French King, exhorting him rather to depend, as he ought, on him his uncle and Sovereign. To theſe ſpeeches the young Prince ſomewhat unadviſedly anſwered, that he was the lawful heir, not only of his uncle Richard's French dominions, but of the crown of England alſo, which if he did not yield to him, he ſhould not long wear in peace. This anſwer was certainly bold enough; but as it came from a boy ſcarcely turned of fifteen years of age, it ought not to have provoked the King ſo much as it ſeems it did; who thereupon cauſed him to be removed to the caſtle of Rouen, where, under the cuſtody of Robert de Vypont, he was much more cloſely confined than before (m). After this King John returned into England, where he continued not long before he entertained ſtrange thoughts with reſpect to his unhappy nephew. He was it ſeems ſo apprehenſive of the claim that he, and his deſcendants, might have to the dominions of King Richard, that he reſolved to have Arthur's eyes put out, and to have him farther deprived of the power of begetting children. From this barbarous project however he was diſſuaded, either by his Chamberlain Hubert, or by his mother Queen Eleanor, who began now (when it was too late) to expreſs a great tenderneſs for her unhappy grandſon, for whoſe misfortunes it is ſaid ſhe not long after broke her heart (n). But though the King was diverted from one cruel deſign, it hath been always ſtrongly ſuſpected that he put another in practice, ſince, in the ſpring of the next year, Duke Arthur diſappeared, and was never more ſeen (o). The French authors in general, and not a few Engliſh writers, charge King John expreſsly either with committing, or commanding the murder; and though ſome very learned men have taken no ſmall pains to free that Prince's memory from ſo foul a ſtain, yet ſo weak are their arguments, that, to any impartial reader, they muſt rather prejudice than promote the opinion they maintain [B]. Our excellent Shakeſpeare, in his life and death of King John, has given us an admirable picture of this tranſaction, wherein (ſo far as we can gather from hiſtory) he preſents to the eyes of his audience the true characters of thoſe

[B] The opinion they maintain.] The honour of King John in this particular, is beſt ſupported in that chronicle which paſſes under the name of Speed, but is in truth the work of ſeveral hands, this reign particularly being written by the learned Dr. Barkham (5). 'As the tongues of paraſites, ſays he, are 'no true ſcales to weigh the worth and virtues of 'great men; ſo neither ought we to judge of their '(or any man's) blemiſhes, by the deforming pencils 'of envy or rancour; with one of which, no emi-'nency, either of place or virtue, was ever unattend-'ed. And that this bloody aſperſion on the King, 'came from no other fountain but malignity; ſuch 'as then lived, and might therefore beſt know the 'truth, and were alſo (as Monks generally were) his 'moſt bitter taxers, and therefore far from ſalving his 'infamy with partial falſhood, can but witneſs. It 'was (ſaith one) (6) by certain perſons avowed, that 'Arthur attempting to eſcape ſecretly out of hold, 'was by caſualty drowned in the river Seyne (on 'which the caſtle of Roan is ſeated); and yet the 'Frenchmen, the King's mortal enemies (and there-'fore plenary credit not to be given them), give 'it out that he was murdered by the King's com-'mand, yea and by his own hands; thus by the 'malice of ſlanderers, England's King became not a 'little defamed, with whom other the approvedſt 'authors accord (though differing in the manner 'of his death), that this imputation ſprang only from 'the French emulation, as ſince it hath been kept 'on foot, only by French and Italianate ſpirits, one 'of which hath not bluſhed to charge King John 'with murdering of his own brother King Richard '(7), and another with killing Arthur's ſiſter, who 'yet outlived him twenty-four years (8); ſo ſhame-'leſsly will the pen blur the truth of actions, where it 'is once dipped in gall againſt the perſon.' Stripped of the Doctor's affectedly fine language, there is not either argument or authority in any thing he ſays. Paraſites ſeldom ſpeak evil of princes, and as to the only author he cites in King John's favour, I mean Matthew Paris, he ſays in his larger hiſtory (9), which is alſo moſt authentic, what does not make for the Doctor's purpoſe at all. 'Sed non multo poſt, 'idem Arthurus ſubito evanuit, modo fere omnibus 'ignorato, utinam non ut fama refert invida; i. e. Not 'long after this, Arthur ſuddenly vaniſhed in a man-'ner few are acquainted with, not I hope as ſpite-'ful report ſpeaks!' Trivet, whom he likewiſe cites, ſays only that King John was ſcandalized about his death (10), which is no proof that he did not kill him. Then as to charging King John with the murder of Duke Arthur's ſiſter, he is not quite ſo clear of it as might be wiſhed. She was his lawful Sovereign after the death of her brother, and yet he kept her a cloſe priſoner ſo long as he lived, and left her in that priſon where ſhe died (11). If only French writers reported that he murdered his nephew, we might be inclined to ſuſpect their authority, but it is in truth affirmed by all ſorts of writers foreign and domeſtic. It is aſſerted in the old Chronicles of Normandy, that the King cauſed him to be drowned (12), and from thence I ſuppoſe the French writers borrowed it, as we ſhall hear more at large hereafter. Thomas Sprott, who wrote in the reign of Henry III. ſon to King John, tells us roundly, 'Iſte interfecit Arturum Nepotem 'ſuum; i. e. This man murdered his nephew Arthur '(13).' In thoſe days very probably it was not ſafe to ſay more. However, an author whoſe works are ſtill preſerved in the library of Trinity College in Cambridge, tells the tale out. 'Dum adhuc eſſet in 'Aquitanum comprehenſum puerum (ſcilicet Arthu-'rum Nepotem ſuum), dolo tenuit & occidit per ma-'num Armigeri ſui Petri de Malo Lacu, cui poſtea 'heredem Baroniæ de Mulgreffe dedit in uxorem (14); 'i. e. While he was in Aquitain, he ſeized the young Man, '(Arthur his nephew) kept him baſely, and cauſed 'him to be ſlain by the hand of his Eſquire, Peter 'de Malo Lacu, to whom afterwards he gave the 'heireſs of the Barony of Mulgreffe to wife.' This ſeems to be the truth, and therefore I publiſh it. The Chronicle of Godſtow Abbey places the fact in a worſe light, for he tells us, that on the day of April 1203, King John, having taken his nephew in battle, directed ſome of his knights to go and murder him in priſon; but they refuſing, himſelf entered the place where Arthur was, and drawing his ſword, thruſt the lad through as he was upon his knees (15). This murder is reported after another manner by Rapin (16). There want not, ſays he, ſome hiſtorians who write that John cauſed him to be put into a boat in a very dark night, at the foot of the Tower where he had been kept priſoner, where he ſtabbed him with his own hands, and then ordered the body to be carried ſome leagues below Rouen, and there thrown into the Sein. Theſe diſcordant accounts of the murder are very far from deſtroying the credit of each other, becauſe ſuch murders as this was, muſt be ſecret in their nature, and conſequently, though the fact were ever ſo certain, there would be various reports about it. The thing, however, was ſo flagrant, that King John, as Duke of Normandy, was charged with it before his Peers at Paris; and, on his non-appearance, condemned to loſe all the lands he held in France. Camden tells us (17), that he offered to appear if he might have had a ſafe conduct, which however was refuſed him, on account perhaps of the nature of the crime with which he was charged. Dr. Barkham, in his before-mentioned hiſtory, is pleaſed to ſay, that the King might have juſtified his putting his nephew to death, whom he took in open arms fighting againſt him his Sovereign (18). This, however, is odd doctrine, conſidering who Arthur was, and how indiſputable his title to thoſe lands for which he fought. On the whole therefore, how much partiality ſoever there may be in the Monkiſh writers againſt King John in other reſpects, in this they ſeem to have done him no great wrong; and if he was innocent, he ſhewed little care to do himſelf right; otherwiſe he might certainly have given a clearer account of this affair, or at leaſt he might have told where his nephew was buried.

illuſtrious perſons he introduces, inſomuch that whoever reads this play, after conſulting our beſt hiſtorians, will read it with double pleaſure, as perceiving thence, after how exquiſite a manner this great genius hath united truth and poetry (p) [C]. Some authors inform us, that Conſtantia, Dutcheſs of Britany, and mother of Arthur, appealed King John before Philip, and the Peers of France, for the murder of her ſon Arthur (q). Yet this admits of ſome doubt; ſince Roger Hoveden, who lived in thoſe times, and who concludes his hiſtory the year before the battle of Mirabell, mentions the death of Conſtantia (r), and there are other authors who agree in the ſame date. But that ſuch a ſuit was commenced againſt King John, and judgment given thereupon, is certain (s); as alſo that the famous John de Courcy, Earl of Ulſter in Ireland, openly called him traitor, murderer, and refuſed to pay him any obedience on account of this murder (t), which, as Matthew Paris tells us, it was commonly reported the King committed with his own hand (u). [C] This great genius hath united truth and poetry.] The whole Tragedy of the Life and Death of King John, is truly beautiful. In this note, however, I ſhall meddle with nothing, but what relates to the ſtory of Arthur. In the firſt place, I muſt remark the wiſdom, as well as juſtice of the poet, in making John thought by every body, nay even by himſelf, an intruder, and no lawful poſſeſſor either of the Crown of England, or of the Dutchy of Normandy. In this he kept cloſe to hiſtory; for in reality he was never owned for ſuch, but by thoſe who found it their intereſt. Hubert, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, as appears by his oration (19), which is ſtill extant, would have made him an elective King. If ſo, this would ſerve his purpoſe only in England: in France the title of Duke Arthur was clear: he claimed the French dominions as heir to his Uncle Richard, and the great lords in thoſe countries, who were the beſt judges of the rule of deſcent, acknowledged his title. On this ground, Conſtance, throughout the Play, refuſes all kind of treaty with King John, which is conſiſtent with her character, though not exactly agreeable to hiſtory. The quarrels between her and Queen Eleanor, are founded on the teſtimony of credible authors, and, as far as we can judge at this diſtance of time, the poet makes her ſay nothing, but what we may well ſuppoſe ſhe might have ſaid. The reproaches thrown on Philip King of France, for owning and diſowning the cauſe of Arthur, juſt as his intereſt led him, are juſt and grounded in reaſon. The character of Arthur, was entirely in his own hands: he was at liberty to give that young Prince what manners he pleaſed, provided only he gave him ſpirit, of which our hiſtories aſſure us he had a large ſhare. The ſcenes between the Prince and Hubert are ſtrong and lively, agreeing perfectly well with the account given us by Coggeſhal. It may not be amiſs, to note here, that this Hubert, Chamberlain to King John, is the famous Hubert de Burgh, of whom the reader may ſee more in another place. As to the manner of Arthur's death, Shakeſpeare might take what tale he had liked beſt; and accordingly, he has taken that which leaſt injured the memory of King John, whom he treats as a lawful Prince in the latter part of the Play. On the whole therefore, as the force of his genius ſtrikes us at firſt ſight, ſo a reverence for his deep judgment and great knowledge in Engliſh hiſtory, muſt neceſſarily ariſe from an attentive conſideration of this, and indeed of all his performances of this kind.

(19) Matth. Paris, Hiſt. Angl. p. 197.

[It is evident, from Rymer's Fœdera, that Conſtantia died before her ſon; for we find in that work a patent of King John to the Barons of Britany, De Teſtamento Conſtantiæ quondam Comitiſſæ Britanniæ obſervando, which is dated on the 30th of January, 1202 (20). —— Though Arthur had an undoubted right to the Crown of England and the Dutchy of Normandy, according to the rules of ſucceſſion and repreſentation which have long been eſtabliſhed, it ought to be remembered, that theſe rules were by no means clearly underſtood, or ſtrictly attended to, during a conſiderable part of the feudal ages. We meet with many inſtances, in the hiſtory of Europe, in which a younger ſon or brother, as nearer in deſcent, was preferred to the grandſon or nephew by an elder ſon or brother; and it was very gradually that mankind in general arrived to thoſe rational and juſt ſentiments upon the ſubject which now obtain. The ideas of men upon this head were, indeed, much improved in the time of King John, though perhaps the improvement was greater in France than in England. But in no country were the laws of ſucceſſion and repreſentation ſo compleatly received and ſettled, as to make his uſurpation appear in that flagrant and unjuſtifiable light in which it would at preſent univerſally be regarded.] K.

ARVIRAGUS, an antient Britiſh King, flouriſhed in the time of the Emperor Domitian [A], when Salluſtius Lucullus was Lieutenant for the Romans in Britain (a). The Britiſh hiſtorians, eſpecially Geoffrey of Monmouth, place him in the reign

(a) Camden's Britannia, publiſhed by Biſhop Gibſon, folio, Vol. i. col. 77.

[A] Arviragus —— flouriſhed in the time of the Emperor Domitian.] This appears from the following paſſage of Juvenal, which is a compliment to that Emperor:

Non cedit Vejento; ſed ut fanaticus œſtro
Percuſſus, Bellona, tuo, divinat, &, ingens
Omen habes, inquit, magni clarique triumphi.
Regem aliquem capies, aut de temone Britanno Excidet Arviragus (1).

(1) Juvenal. Sat. iv. ver. 123.

Nor came Veiento ſhort, but as inſpired
By thee, Bellona, by thy fury fired,
Turns prophet: See, the mighty omen, ſee,
He cries, of ſome illuſtrious victory!
Some captive King thee his new Lord ſhall own;
Or, from his Britiſh chariot headlong thrown,
The proud Arviragus come tumbling down.
Rev. Mr. Richard Duke.

The author of the Chronicle of Dover (2) underſtands this paſſage as addreſſed to Nero; I ſuppoſe, becauſe the poet introduces the ſtory, of which they are a part, with theſe lines:

(2) Chron. Dover. apud Leland, Collectan. Vol. ii. p. 50.

Cum jam ſemianimum laceraret Flavius orbem
Ultimus, & calvo ſerviret Roma Neroni (3).

(3) Juv. ib. ver. 37.

When he, with whom the Flavian race decay'd,
The groaning world with iron ſcepter ſway'd,
When a bald Nero reign'd, and ſervile Rome
obey'd. Ibid.

But this is a plain deſcription of the Emperor Domitian, who was the laſt and worſt of the Flavian family, and is here called calvus Nero (a bald Nero) both on account of his cruelty, in which he reſembled that Emperor, and his baldneſs, by which he was diſtinguiſhed from him. Let us add, that the above-mentioned compliment would have been a very inſipid piece of flattery to Domitian, unleſs Arviragus were a conſiderable Prince then living, and an enemy to the Romans. And therefore there is no ground for the opinion of Alford (4), who contends, that Arviragus is the ſame as Caractacus, who was conquered by Claudius, and that Juvenal uſes the name by a poetical licence, though he lived long before. The probability of the caſe ſeems to be, that, in Domitian's time, after the recalling Agricola, and taking away the life of Salluſtius Lucullus his ſucceſſor, the Britons took up arms under Arviragus. And the learned Primate of Armagh (5) mentions an old Britiſh coin in Sir R. Cotton's Collections, with theſe letters on it, reign of the Emperor Claudius, whoſe enterprize againſt Britain he is ſaid to have oppoſed. The account we have of Arviragus in that author is generally eſteemed to be fabulous: however, the ſubſtance of it is as follows: Kymbelinus, when he had governed Britain ten years, begat two ſons, the elder named Guiderius, and the younger Arviragus. Kymbelinus being dead, Guiderius, who ſucceeded him, reſolved to ſhake off the Roman yoke, and began with refuſing to pay the uſual tribute: whereupon the Emperor Claudius undertook an expedition into Britain (b) [B]. In a battle which enſued between the Romans and the Britons, Guiderius was treacherouſly killed by Leuis Hamo, a Roman [C]: upon which Arviragus, putting on his brother's habiliments, and heading the Britons, gained a victory over Claudius (c) [D]. But being ſoon after beſieged by that Prince in the city of Wincheſter, he made his ſubmiſſion to the Romans, and, in conſequence of the treaty, married the Emperor's daughter Genuiſſa (d) [E]. Matters being thus accommodated, Claudius returned to Rome, and left to Arviragus the government of the Britiſh iſlands (e). After the departure of the Romans, Arviragus became a very powerful Prince; and this ſo elevated him with pride, that he diſdained any longer ſubjection to the Romans, and aſſumed to himſelf an independent authority. Whereupon Veſpaſian was ſent againſt him into Britain [F]; and, upon the arrival of this General, a great battle was fought, in which neither ſide got the victory: but, the morning after the fight, by the mediation of Queen Genuiſſa, the two leaders were reconciled; Veſpaſian returned to Rome, and Arviragus remained in Britain. This monarch lived to a good old age, governing his kingdom in peace, from whence he thinks his true name was Arivogus, which the Romans changed to Arviragus. The Britons being now up in arms, as far as we can learn, were not repreſſed till the Emperor Adrian came over in perſon, and built the firſt wall, to keep them out of the Roman Province. For, before this time, Spartian (6) tells us, the Britons could not be kept in ſubjection to the Roman power. So that here was a fit ſeaſon, in Domitian's time (Agricola being recalled in the beginning of that Emperor's reign) for ſuch a King as Arviragus to appear at the head of the Britons, and it was then a ſuitable compliment to Domitian to wiſh him a triumph over Arviragus.

(6) In Hadriano.

[B] The Emperor Claudius undertook an expedition into Britain.] He was attended in this expedition (ſays the Monmouth hiſtorian) by the commander of his army, who was called in the Britiſh tongue Leuis Hamo; by whoſe advice the ſucceeding war was to be carried on. This man therefore, arriving at the city of Portceſtre, began to block up the gates with a wall, and denied the citizens all liberty of paſſing out. For his deſign was, either to reduce them under ſubjection by famine, or to kill them without mercy (7). Guiderius, upon the news of Claudius's coming, aſſembled all the ſoldiery of the kingdom, and marched to meet the Roman army, which he attacked with great eagerneſs, doing more execution with his own ſword, than the greater part of his ſoldiers (8).

(7) Galfrid. Monumeth. Hiſt. Brit. lib. iv. c. 12.

(8) Ibid. c. 13.

[C] Guiderius was treacherouſly killed by Leuis Hamo.] Claudius was now juſt upon retreating to his ſhips, and the Romans very near routed, when the crafty Hamo, throwing aſide his own armour, put on that of the Britons, and as a Briton fought againſt his own men. Then he exhorted the Britons to a vigorous aſſault, promiſing them a ſpeedy victory. For he had learned their language and manners, as having been educated among the Britiſh hoſtages at Rome. By this means he approached by little and little to the King; and ſeeing his opportunity of acceſs, he ſtabbed him while under no apprehenſion of danger, and then eſcaped through the enemies ranks, to return to his men with the news of this deteſtable exploit (9).

(9) Ibid.

[D] Arviragus —— gained a victory over Claudius.] The Britons, knowing nothing of Guiderius's death, fought courageouſly, under the conduct of Arviragus, and killed no ſmall number of the enemy. At laſt the Romans gave ground, and dividing themſelves into two bodies baſely quitted the field. Claudius, with one part, to ſecure himſelf, retired to his ſhips; but Hamo to the woods, becauſe he had not time to get to the ſhips. Arviragus, thinking that Claudius fled along with Hamo, purſued him with ſpeed, nor left off haraſſing them from place to place, till he overtook them upon a part of the ſea-coaſt, which from the name of Hamo is now called Southampton. There was at the ſame place a convenient haven for ſhips, and ſome merchant-ſhips at anchor. And juſt as Hamo was attempting to get on board them, Arviragus came upon him unawares, and forthwith killed him. And ever ſince that time the haven has been called Hamo's port (10).

[E] He made his ſubmiſſion to the Romans, and married the Emperor's daughter Genuiſſa.] Claudius having employed variety of engines againſt the city, Arviragus aſſembled his troops, and opened the gates, to march out and give him battle. But juſt as he was ready to begin the attack, Claudius, who feared the boldneſs of the King, and the bravery of the Britons, ſent a meſſage to him with offers of peace; as chuſing to reduce the Britons by wiſdom and policy, rather than hazard a battle. To this purpoſe he offered a reconciliation with him, and promiſed to give him his daughter, if he would acknowledge the kingdom of Britain to be ſubject to the Roman State. The nobility hereupon perſuaded Arviragus to lay aſide thoughts of war, and be contented with Claudius's promiſe; repreſenting to him, that it was no diſgrace to be ſubject to the Romans, who enjoyed the empire of the whole world. By theſe and many other arguments he was prevailed upon to hearken to their advice, and ſo made his ſubmiſſion to Cæſar. Which done, Claudius ſent to Rome for his daughter, and then, with the aſſiſtance of Arviragus, reduced the Orkney and the Provincial Iſlands under his power (11). As ſoon as the winter was over, thoſe who were ſent for Claudius's daughter, returned with her, and preſented her to her father. The damſel's name was Genuiſſa, and ſo great was her beauty, that it raiſed the admiration of all who ſaw her. After her marriage to the King, ſhe gained ſuch an aſcendant over his affections, that he in a manner valued nothing but her alone: inſomuch that he was deſirous to have the place honoured where the nuptials were ſolemnized, and moved Claudius to build a city in memory of ſo great and happy a marriage. Claudius conſented thereto, and commanded a city to be built, which after his name was called Kaerglou, that is, Glouceſter, being ſituated on the confines of Demetia and Loegria, upon the banks of the Severn. But ſome ſay, it derived its name from Gloius, who was born to Claudius there, and to whom, after the death of Arviragus, fell the Dukedom of Demetia (12). This ſtory of Arviragus's marriage muſt be a mere fiction, if Claudius had no daughter named Genuiſſa. But the Roman Hiſtorians, who ſhould beſt know, mention only three daughters of that Emperor, named Claudia, Antonia, and Octavia.

[F] Veſpaſian was ſent againſt Arviragus into Britain.] As Veſpaſian was juſt arrived at the haven of Rutupi, Arviragus met him, and hindered him from entering the port. For he had brought ſo great an army along with him, as was a terror to the Romans, who for fear of his falling upon them durſt not come aſhore. Upon this Veſpaſian withdrew from that port, and ſhifting his ſails arrived at the ſhore of Totneſs. As ſoon as he was landed, he marched directly to beſiege Kaerpenhuelgoit, now Exeter; and after lying before the town ſeven days, he was overtaken by Arviragus and his army, who gave him battle (13).

confirming the old laws of his anceſtors, enacting new ones, and liberally rewarding perſons of merit: ſo that his fame ſpread all over Europe; and he was both loved and feared by the Romans, and became the ſubject of their diſcourſe more than any King of his time. After his death, he was buried at Glouceſter, in a certain temple, which he had built and dedicated to the honour of the Emperor Claudius (f). This is the ſubſtance of Geoffrey of Monmouth's narrative. There is an old tradition, that, in the time of this Britiſh King, Joſeph of Arimathea came over into Britain, and planted the Goſpel here [G].

(f) Ibid. c. 16.

[G] An antient tradition, that, in the time of Arviragus, Joſeph of Arimathea came over into Britain, and planted the Goſpel here.] Though it will appear preſently that this tradition has really nothing to do with King Arviragus, yet ſince the pretended coming of Joſeph of Arimathea into Britain has been aſcribed to the times of that Prince, and Arviragus is ſuppoſed to have been a benefactor to that Miſſionary and his companions, I think proper to take notice here of ſo remarkable a piece of eccleſiaſtical antiquity. The tradition in queſtion is to be found in William of Malmſbury's Book Of the Antiquity of the Church of Glaſſenbury. That writer, after ſome prefatory diſcourſe to Henry of Blois, nephew to King Henry I. and at that time Biſhop of Wincheſter and Abbot of Glaſſenbury, proceeds in his narrative of the antiquities of that church in the manner following. 'After 'the glorious Reſurrection and triumphant Aſcenſion 'of our bleſſed Saviour, and the Deſcent of the 'Holy Ghoſt, the ſucceſs of the Goſpel began to 'ſpread, the number of believers increaſed daily, 'and all of them maintained ſuch a friendly and 'charitable correſpondence, that they ſeemed to have 'but one heart and one ſoul. The Jewiſh Prieſts, 'with the Scribes and Phariſees, growing envious at 'the progreſs of Chriſtianity, ſtirred up a perſecution 'againſt the Church, murdered the Protomartyr St. 'Stephen, and made the country too troubleſome for 'the reſt. Thus the ſtorm blowing hard in Jewry, 'the diſciples diſperſing went off into ſeveral coun-'tries, according to their reſpective commiſſions, and, 'as they travelled along, preached the Goſpel to the 'Gentiles. Among theſe holy men, St. Philip (as 'Freculphus relates, lib. ii. cap. 4.) arriving in the 'territories of the Franks, converted a great number 'of them: and being deſirous to enlarge his maſter's 'kingdom, he picked out twelve of his diſciples, and 'diſpatched them to preach the Goſpel in Britain; 'Joſeph of Arimathea, as it is ſaid, being one of the 'number, and conſtituted a ſuperior to the reſt. 'Theſe holy Miſſionaries coming into Britain, in the 'year of our Lord 63, and in the 15th of the bleſſed 'Virgin's Aſſumption, publiſhed the doctrine of 'Chriſt with great induſtry and courage. But the 'barbarous King and his ſubjects being ſomewhat 'alarmed at ſo unuſual an undertaking, and not 'reliſhing a perſuaſion ſo different from his own, 'refuſed to become a proſelyte; but in conſideration 'of the length of their journey, and being ſome-'what charmed with their unexceptionable behaviour, 'gave them a little ſpot of ground, ſurrounded with 'fens and buſhes, to dwell in. This place was called 'Ynſwitrin by the natives, and ſituated upon the 'confines of his dominions. Afterwards two other 'Pagan Kings, being affected with their remarkable 'ſanctity, gave each of them a certain proportion of 'ground, and, at their requeſt, ſettled twelve Hides 'of land on them, by inſtruments in writing, ac-'cording to the cuſtom of the country: from 'whence it is ſuppoſed the twelve Hides, now part 'of the Abbey's eſtate, had their denomination (14).' Malmſbury proceeds to relate the occaſion and manner of theſe Miſſionaries building a church, which, he ſays, was the firſt in the iſland. The place where it was built was afterwards called Glaſtonia or Glaſſenbury; and the King, who was thus kind to Joſeph of Arimathea and his companions, is ſaid to be Arviragus:

Glaſtoniæ bis ſex Hidas dedit Arviragus Rex (15).

(15) Ex Appendice Chronici Glaſtonienſis MS. in Biblioth. Cotton.

I ſhall not enter upon the queſtion concerning the authenticneſs of this tradition, any farther than to ſhew, that, at the time of Joſeph's ſuppoſed arrival, there could be no ſuch Britiſh King as Arviragus is ſaid to have been. For, according to the tradition, Joſeph of Arimathea came into Britain in the year of our Lord 63. Now the more ſouthern parts of the iſland, where Glaſſenbury ſtands, were ſeized by the Romans, and formed into a province, before that time. For, as Tacitus reports (16), the hithermoſt part of Britain was gained and planted by Aulus Plautius and Oſtorius Scapula, and ſeveral colonies of the veteran troops were fixed there. Now between theſe two governors, and Suetonius Paulinus, were Didius Gallus and Veranius; and probably the Belgæ were ſubdued by Veſpaſian, who commanded under Plautius, of whom Suetonius relates (17), that he conquered here two powerful nations, above twenty towns, and the Iſle of Wight. By which we may conclude his expeditions lay weſtward. Now the Belgæ and Danmonii were the two powerful nations that way; and in all the progreſs of the war againſt the Britons afterwards, we find no care taken by the Roman Generals to ſecure themſelves againſt the Belgæ, as they did againſt the Brigantes and Silures, among whom Caractacus commanded: ſo that there could be no ſuch Britiſh King at that time among the Belgæ, as Arviragus is ſuppoſed to have been. For had there been ſuch a Prince among that people, we cannot ſuppoſe that, when Oſtorius marched northward againſt the Cangi or Cheſhire-men (18), he would have fixed his garriſons on the Severn and the Avon, to ſecure the province. For, had there been ſuch a Britiſh King as Arviragus among the Belgæ, what would the fortifying the Severn have ſignified, when the enemies to the Romans lived on the Roman ſide? B.

ARUNDEL (Thomas), Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the reigns of Richard II., Henry IV. and Henry V., was the ſecond ſon of Robert Fitz-Alan, Earl of Arundel and Warren, and brother of Richard Earl of Arundel, who was afterwards beheaded. He was but twenty-two years of age when, from being Archdeacon of Taunton, he was promoted to the Biſhopric of Ely [A], by the Pope's proviſion [B], and conſecrated at Otteford, April 6, 1375, in the fiftieth year of King Edward III. He was a conſiderable benefactor

[A] At twenty-two years of age —— he was promoted to the Biſhopric of Ely.] This is, I believe, the only inſtance of ſo young a prelate in all the Engliſh hiſtory. The King, it ſeems, had deſigned another perſon for that See, but could not carry his point. For, hearing of the death of Dr. John Barnet Biſhop of Ely, he wrote a very preſſing letter to the Chapter, deſiring them to elect his Confeſſor, John Woodroof. But the Monks, diſregarding the King's recommendation, met together, and unanimouſly choſe one Henry Wakefield. The Pope thought fit to ſet aſide this election, and, by virtue of his apoſtolical authority, declared Thomas Arundel, Archdeacon of Taunton, Biſhop of Ely. Biſhop Godwin mentions this new prelate's age with an ironical ſneer. 'Pontifex (ſays he) ex plenitudine po-'teſtatis Epiſcopum Elienſem declaravit, annoſum 'quendam, quemque virum facile credas graviſſimum, 'Thomam Arundellum, Roberti Comitis Arundellæ 'et Warrenæ filium, Tauntonenſem archidiaconum, 'cum jam (ô capularem ſenem) ætatis annum exple-'viſſet fere viceſimum ſecundum, et ſubdiaconus nu-'per factus eſſet (1). —— The Pope, by his own 'authority, advanced to the See of Ely a perſon of great age benefactor to the church and palace of that See; and, among other donations, he preſented them with a very curious table of maſſy gold, enriched with precious ſtones; which had been given to Prince Edward by the King of Spain, and ſold by the latter to Biſhop Arundel for three hundred marks. In the year 1386, the tenth of Richard II., this Prelate was made Lord High Chancellor of England (a); but reſigned that poſt upon his advancement afterwards to the See of Canterbury (b). After he had ſat a little more than fourteen years in the See of Ely, he was tranſlated to the Archbiſhopric of York, by virtue of the Pope's Bull, dated April 3, 1388 (c), and received the Pall the fourteenth of September following. He expended a very large ſum of money in building a palace for the Archbiſhops of that See; and, beſides other rich ornaments, he gave to that church ſeveral pieces of ſilver-gilt plate. In 1393, being then Chancellor, he removed the courts of juſtice from London to York [C]; and, as a precedent for ſo doing, he alledged the example of Archbiſhop Corbridge, who had taken the ſame ſtep eighty years before (d). The See of Canterbury being vacant by the death of Dr. William Courtney, Archbiſhop Arundel was tranſlated thither by a papal proviſion. The Bull of tranſlation was publiſhed at Canterbury the eleventh of January 1396. The Croſier was delivered into his hands by Henry Chellenden, Prior of Canterbury, in the preſence of the King, and a great number of the nobility. On the tenth of February following, he received the Pall, and on the nineteenth was enthroned with great pomp at Canterbury (e). It is obſervable, that this was the firſt inſtance of the tranſlation of an Archbiſhop of York to the See of Canterbury (f). He was ſcarcely fixed in that See, when he had a conteſt with the Univerſity of Oxford about the right of viſitation [D]; which was determined by King Richard, to whom the deciſion was referred, in favour of the Archbiſhop (g). At his Viſitation in London, he revived an old conſtitution, firſt ſet on foot by Simon Niger, Biſhop of London; by which the inhabitants of the reſpective pariſhes were obliged to pay to their Rector one halfpenny in the pound out of the rent of their houſes (h). In the ſecond year of his tranſlation, a Parliament was held at London; in which the Commons, with the King's leave, impeached the Archbiſhop, together with his brother the Earl of Arundel, and the Duke of Glouceſter, of

[B] — By the Pope's proviſion.] The reality of this papal proviſion, in favour of Arundel, is diſputed. For Godwin tells us (2), ſome writers are of opinion, he was canonically elected, becauſe at that time the papal proviſions were prohibited in England by authority of Parliament. It is true, the Statute of Proviſors, whereby the Pope's authority in filling up the vacant biſhoprics was taken away, is by the ſtatute-books aſſigned to the year 1350 (3), twenty-five years earlier than the time in queſtion. But it is certain the Pope ſtill continued to exerciſe that power, ſince it was found neceſſary to confirm that Act with new penalties, in the year 1390 (4). To which may be added, that though the State was willing to get rid of this encroachment of the See of Rome, the clergy were not ſo ready to part with it: for when the Statute abovementioned was confirmed, the Archbiſhops and Biſhops made a ſolemn proteſtation in open Parliament, that they would not aſſent to any law, which ſhould reſtrain the Pope's authority (5). But if there could be any doubt in this matter, the preſent article affords us two other unqueſtionable inſtances of the exerciſe of this power in the tranſlations of Arundel to the Sees of York and Canterbury.

[C] He removed the Courts of Juſtice from London to York.] This he did, in order, as he ſaid, to mortify the inſolence and pride of the Londoners, with whom the king was at that time highly diſpleaſed. But whatever he might pretend, the Londoners affirmed, he did it only to gratify and enrich the inhabitants of York. Our author adds, that this deſign did not take place long: for after one or two Terms, the Courts returned to their old place. *Summa Angliæ Tribunalia Londino Eboracum traduxit, eo pacto optime dicens caſtigari Londinenſium proterviam atque ſuperbiam, quibus rex ea tempeſtate fuit admodum infenſus. —— Quicquid vero ille obtenderet, Eboracenſes ſuos juvandi et locupletandi gratia hæc ipſum molitum Londinenſes affirmabant. [D] He had a conteſt with the Univerſity of Oxford about the right of viſitation.] The Canoniſts and Civilians of Oxford, being uneaſy at ſome ſtatutes made to the diſadvantage of their profeſſion, preferred a complaint againſt the Univerſity to the Convocation then ſitting at London. Their Delegate for this buſineſs was Michael Sergeaux Doctor of Laws, who ſet forth, that the Univerſity of Oxford had procured a Bull to exempt themſelves from the juriſdiction both of their Dioceſan and Metropolitan: that this Bull was rather a diſſervice than an advantage to that learned body, as it deprived the members of a remedy, in caſe of any injuſtice done to them by the Chancellor. This faculty therefore intreated the Archbiſhop, ſince he had an undiſputable right to viſit their Univerſity, that he would exert his authority, and revoke the Chancellor's pretended exemption. It was called a pretended Exemption, becauſe, as Sergeaux alledged, the Bull had neither the Pope's ſeal, nor the ſubſcription of any public Notary, to prove it authentic. Notwithſtanding this objection, Dr. Hyndman, the Chancellor, who was preſent in the Convocation, inſiſted upon the inſtrument, and entered a proteſt againſt any farther proceedings. After the breaking up of the Convocation, the Archbiſhop, deſigning to viſit the univerſity, was informed, that the Chancellor and Proctors were reſolved to inſiſt upon the Pope's Bull, and oppoſe the viſitation. Whereupon a writ was iſſued out by the King's order, directed to the Chancellor and Students, requiring them not to oppoſe the juriſdiction of their Ordinary and Metropolitan, to renounce the Bull in form, and to ſend their act of renunciation to the King. It does not appear, that this writ was obeyed, or the Bull given up. However, that ſome kind of ſubmiſſion was made, is very probable, ſince the Archbiſhop went to Oxford the May following, with a deſign to viſit. It is true, he was oppoſed in the exerciſe of this juriſdiction; but it was upon a new plea: for now the Univerſity, waving their former privilege, pretended they were viſitable by the Crown only, and not by the Archbiſhop. This created a new diſpute; which being at laſt referred to the King, his Highneſs gave the cauſe againſt himſelf, and decided in favour of the Archbiſhop. But, notwithſtanding this ſentence, the viſitation did not go on at that time (7).

high-treaſon [E], for compelling the King, in the tenth year of his reign, to grant them a commiſſion to govern the kingdom (i). The Archbiſhop was ſentenced to be baniſhed, and had forty days allowed him to prepare for his exile; within which time he was to depart the kingdom on pain of death (k). Being thus driven from his country and his See, he retired firſt into France, and then to the Court of Rome, where Pope Boniface IX. gave him a very friendly reception, and wrote a letter to King Richard, deſiring him to paſs by the offence, and receive the Archbiſhop again into favour. But not meeting with ſucceſs, his Holineſs reſolved to interpoſe his authority in favour of Arundel. Accordingly he nominated him to the Archbiſhopric of St. Andrews, and (which was a more diſobliging ſtroke) declared his intention of giving him ſeveral other preferments in England, by way of proviſion (l). The King, being informed of the Pope's deſign, wrote an expoſtulatory letter to him [F]; which had ſo good an effect upon his Holineſs, that he not only withheld the intended favours from Arundel, but likewiſe, at the King's requeſt, promoted Roger Walden (m), Dean of York, and Lord Treaſurer of England, to the See of Canterbury. That Prelate was inſtalled the twenty-fifth of March 1398 (n); but was ſoon obliged to quit his new dignity: for, the next year, Archbiſhop Arundel returned into England with the Duke of Lancaſter [G], after-

[E] The Commons — impeached the Archbiſhop — of high-treaſon.] The chief article of the charge was, that being Biſhop of Ely and Lord Chancellor, he was traiterouſly aiding, procuring, and adviſing, in making a commiſſion directed to Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, Richard Earl of Arundel, and others, and procured himſelf, as one of the chief Miniſters of State, to be put into the ſaid commiſſion; which commiſſion was apparently prejudicial to the King's prerogative and dignity; and that the ſaid Thomas put the ſaid commiſſion in execution (8). The King, to whom the Commons applied for leave to carry on the proſecution againſt the Archbiſhop, told them, that, in regard the impeachment concerned ſo great a perſon and a peer of the realm, he would be farther adviſed. But the Commons reſolving not to give over, and preſſing the King farther, his Highneſs replied, that the Archbiſhop had confeſſed to him before ſeveral Lords, that he had been guilty of imprudence in executing that commiſſion, and threw himſelf upon the King's mercy. However, this not ſatisfying the Commons, the King conſented to the impeachment; and the Archbiſhop was adjudged a traitor, by the Lords temporal, and Sir Thomas Piercy Proctor for the Biſhops and Clergy (9). It will not be improper to obſerve, that Archbiſhop Arundel, though in the Parliament-houſe at his firſt impeachment, yet was abſent the next day when ſentence was pronounced againſt him. It ſeems, the King had commanded him not to come into the houſe, having firſt made him a promiſe of his friendſhip, and given him his oath that the Lords ſhould do nothing to his prejudice (10). I ſhall ſubjoin Mr. Collier's remarks upon this impeachment. 'This caſe affords 'another precedent of a Biſhop's being tried by 'his Peers, it being plain by the record, that judg-'ment was given by the Houſe of Lords; and that 'the Lords proceeded not in a legiſlative, but in a 'judicial way, is evident by the Commons being 'only proſecutors in the caſe; whereas, had the 'Archbiſhop been found guilty by a bill of attain-'der, the votes of the Commons would have been 'neceſſary. And whereas none of the Commons are 'concerned as judges in this trial, excepting Sir 'Thomas Piercy, who repreſented the Biſhops and 'Clergy; we may obſerve from hence, in the ſe-'cond place, that the Biſhops withdrawing from the 'Houſe of Lords in cauſes of blood was only a vo-'luntary abſence, occaſioned by the reſtraint of the 'Canons. Their retiring, I ſay, was a compliance 'with the diſcipline of the Church, and not any 'neceſſity forced upon them by the civil conſtitu-'tion. For now we ſee, ſince they had appointed 'a Lay-Proxy, their right of judging in criminal 'matters is not queſtioned. For the record informs 'us, that Sir Thomas Piercy, Proxy for the Prelates, 'gave judgment with the Temporal Lords againſt 'the Archbiſhop. Now this gentleman was no more 'than a Commoner, and acted only upon the ſtrength 'of his repreſentation. If therefore the Biſhops had 'been barred by the conſtitution from being judges 'in capital cauſes, Sir Thomas Piercy's powers 'would have been conteſted, neither would he have 'been allowed an equal ſhare with the Temporal 'Peers in pronouncing this ſentence: for a delegation 'cannot reach beyond the right of the principal, nor 'can any Proxy have more authority than the perſon 'he repreſents (11).' It may be neceſſary, for the better underſtanding this laſt remark, to obſerve, that Sir Thomas Piercy, as Proctor for the Clergy, not only concurred in giving judgment againſt the Archbiſhop, but likewiſe in paſſing ſentence on the Earl of Arundel, who was beheaded.

[F] The King — wrote an expoſtulatory letter to the Pope.] It was couched in the following terms: 'Thomas, for his treaſonable conſpiracy againſt our 'crown and royal dignity, has been ſentenced only to 'perpetual baniſhment; whereas, had he been dealt 'with anſwerably to his demerits, he ought to have 'ſuffered the puniſhment of high-treaſon: but in 'conſideration of his character, and out of regard to 'religion, we have thought fit to grant him his life, 'and abated of the rigour of the law. But, ſince his 'going beyond ſea, both ourſelf and our ſubjects are 'much ſurprized at the turn of his fortune: for we are 'informed, he has been invited to your Holineſs's 'court, countenanced in his miſbehaviour, taken into 'your protection, and put in hopes of recovering 'his See, or at leaſt of being promoted in our 'kingdom to benefices of greater value than thoſe 'he enjoyed before. How deſtructive ſuch unac-'countable favours as theſe muſt be to our dignity 'and government, and to what apparent danger it 'may expoſe us, is eaſy to imagine. For which rea-'ſon, we are reſolved not to bear with ſuch treatment, 'though the whole world were of a different opinion. 'For we are thoroughly acquainted with this man: 'We know him to be of a turbulent, ſeditious tem-'per; who, if he were permitted to live in our do-'minions, would return to his old practices, poiſon 'our ſubjects with miſreporting the adminiſtration, 'and endeavour to undermine our government. For 'it is probable, he would uſe ſufficient precaution not 'to fall under the laſh of the law. We deſire there-'fore, that your Holineſs would prevent theſe oppor-'tunities of miſchief, and not ſhock our intereſt and 'inclinations by ſuch favours. For ſhould ſuch mea-'ſures be put in execution, it is poſſible they might 'create ſuch miſunderſtandings between the Crown 'and the Mitre, as it might prove difficult to remove. 'For, to ſpeak plainly, we cannot take that perſon 'for our friend, who careſſes our enemies, and takes 'them by the hand in ſo loving a manner. However, 'if you have a mind to provide for him otherwiſe, 'we have nothing to object; only we cannot allow 'him to dip in our diſh. We heartily deſire you 'would take this matter into ſerious conſideration, as 'you tender our royal regards, and expect a compli-'ance with any future requeſt your Holineſs may 'make to us (12).'

[G] He returned into England with the Duke of Lancaſter.] The Nobility, Gentry, and Commons of England, having been for ſeveral years intolerably oppreſſed and ſlighted by King Richard and his favourites, contrived to ſettle the Crown on another head, which might govern them with greater prudence and lenity.

The

afterwards King Henry IV.; upon whoſe acceſſion to the throne, the Pope revoked the Bull granted to Walden, and reſtored Arundel to his See (o). Among the articles of miſgovernment brought againſt King Richard, one was his uſage and baniſhment of this Prelate [H]. The throne being vacant by Richard's reſignation, and the Duke of Lancaſter's title being allowed in Parliament, Archbiſhop Arundel took that Prince by the hand, and led him to the throne; where when he was ſeated, the Archbiſhop made a kind of ſermon or oration to the aſſembly [I]. He had the honour to crown the new King,

The perſon, whom they pitched upon as fitteſt to ſway the ſcepter, was Henry of Bolingbroke, Duke of Lancaſter and Hereford; who, being the ſon of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, fourth ſon of Edward III., was nearly allied to the Crown. I ſhall not enter into the particulars of this conſpiracy againſt King Richard, which ended in placing the Duke of Lancaſter on the throne; but ſhall confine myſelf to that part of it, in which Archbiſhop Arundel was concerned. The Duke of Lancaſter, it is well known, had been baniſhed by King Richard, and was in France when he was ſolicited by the nobility and others to take the crown. This their requeſt they drew up in a letter, and ſent it over by faithful meſſengers to Archbiſhop Arundel, who was then in Britany, deſiring him to be their advocate upon this occaſion with the Duke. The Archbiſhop, being a fellow-ſufferer, gladly accepted the office, and went with the meſſengers to the Duke at Paris; where they delivered the letters from the Nobles and Commons of England, and the Archbiſhop ſeconded them with the beſt arguments reaſon could invent, or rhetoric urge. He repreſented to the Duke the preſent miſerable ſtate of the Engliſh nation: 'That it was utterly ruined 'by the miſmanagement of public affairs; in which 'though the King himſelf were not actually con'cerned, yet, ſo long as he employed and ſupported 'unfit miniſters, he could not be thought fit to go'vern: that it was far more intolerable to be ſlaves 'to ignoble perſons, than to the King; and there'fore, ſo long as the King continued to maintain the 'pride and tyranny of ſuch perſons over his ſubjects, 'it could be no crime to depoſe him: that the pre'ſent ſtate of the nation was ſo diſordered, that no'thing but immediate help could ſave it from entire 'deſtruction; for the ancient courage of the Engliſh 'was ſunk into effeminacy, the men of bravery and 'conduct either put to death or baniſhed, the nobility 'contemned and ſlighted, the gentry abuſed, and the 'Commons oppreſſed with heavy taxes, not to ſup'port the government, but the pride and avarice of 'their fellow-ſubjects.' The Archbiſhop added, 'That 'the nation placed all their hopes in him (the Duke) 'and expected the redreſs of their grievances only at 'his hands, both on account of his perſonal courage 'and atchievements, and the near relation he ſtood 'in to the Crown; and therefore he was bound in ho'nour and duty to anſwer the reaſonable expectations 'of his countrymen, eſpecially as they had reſolved 'to ſtand by him in the attempt; which could hardly 'prove unſucceſsful, where ſo much affection, power, 'and intereſt were united.' The Duke of Lancaſter did not immediately cloſe with this inviting offer, but objected to the Archbiſhop the unlawfulneſs of the deſign; to which Arundel thus replied: Examples of caſting a King out of his ſtate are not rare (as you affirm) nor long ſince put in practice, nor far hence to be fetched. The Kings of Denmark and Sweden are oftentimes baniſhed by their ſubjects, oftentimes impriſoned and put to their fine. The Princes of Germany, about an hundred years paſt, depoſed Adolphus the Emperor, and are now in hand to depoſe their Emperor Wenceſlaus. The Earl of Flanders was a while ſince driven out of his dominions by his own people, for uſurping greater power than appertained to his eſtate. The ancient Britons chaſed away their King Caractacus, for the lewdneſs of his life, and cruelty of his rule. In the time of the Saxon Heptarchy, Bernredus King of Mercia, for his pride and ſtoutneſs towards his people, was by them depoſed. Likewiſe Alcredus and Ethelbertus, Kings of Northumberland, were for their diſorders expelled by their ſubjects. Since the conqueſt of the Normans, the Lords endeavoured to expel King Henry III., but they were not able; yet were they able to depoſe King Edward II., and to conſtitute his young ſon Edward King in his ſtead. Theſe are not all, and yet enough to clear this action of rareneſs in other countries, and novelty in ours (13). The event of this negotiation is too well known, to need mentioning in this place.

(13) Life and Reign of Richard II. in the Complete Hiſt. of England, Vol. i. p 282.

[H] One of the articles —— againſt King Richard was, his baniſhment of Arundel.] To give a better colour to their proceedings, the Lords drew up a charge of male-adminiſtration, digeſted into thirty-three articles. Theſe articles were publickly read in the Parliament-houſe, and alledged as a ſufficient ground for depoſing King Richard. What relates to his treatment of our Archbiſhop is contained in the thirtieth and thirty-third articles. The 30th article complains, 'That the ſaid King having perſuaded 'Thomas Arundel Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his 'ſpiritual father, to abſent himſelf from the Parlia'ment-houſe, dealt inſincerely with the ſaid Arch'biſhop, took advantage of his abſence, and, with'out any legal proceſs of law, adjudged him to per'petual baniſhment.' The 33d article reports this grievance more at large, and ſets forth, 'That, after 'one of the knights for the county had wrongfully 'impeached the Archbiſhop of Canterbury of high'treaſon, the ſaid Archbiſhop immediately ſtood up, 'and offered to anſwer to the charge in Parliament, 'and deſired the King would permit him the liberty 'to make his defence: that the King, out of a deſign 'to ruin the Archbiſhop, adviſed him to wave his de'fence, to reſerve himſelf for a better opportunity, 'and forbear coming to the houſe five or ſix days; 'promiſing him withal, that he ſhould receive no 'prejudice by his abſence; and yet the ſaid King, in 'the Parliament above mentioned, procured a ſen'tence of baniſhment againſt the ſaid Archbiſhop, 'without calling him to his anſwer, or allowing him 'the benefit of the law.' The ſame article charges the King with farther inſtances of inſincerity; viz. 'That he promiſed him, that, upon his going down 'to Southampton in order to quit the kingdom, the 'Queen ſhould intercede for the reverſing the ſen'tence; and in caſe the ſaid Archbiſhop ſhould be 'forced to depart the kingdom, the King engaged to 'recall him before the Eaſter following; notwith'ſtanding which promiſe, ſolemnly ſworn upon the 'croſs of St. Thomas of Canterbury, the King forced 'the Archbiſhop to quit the kingdom, and abſolutely 'deprived him of his See (14).'

[I] He made a kind of ſermon or oration in the Parliament-houſe.] His text was: And when Samuel ſaw Saul, the Lord ſaid unto him, behold the Man, whom I ſpake to thee of; this ſame ſhall reign over my people, 1 Sam. ix. 17. 'In theſe words (ſays the 'Archbiſhop) God Almighty deſcribes the qualifica'tions of a governor: and ſince they may be truly 'applied to our preſent Prince, they afford us a very 'comfortable proſpect. For now we have no reaſon 'to fear that threatning denounced againſt the Jews 'by the prophet Iſaiah; I will give children to be 'their princes, chap. iii. 4. For God has been pleaſed 'in his wrath to remember mercy, to viſit his people, 'and not, as formerly, to ſuffer babes to rule over us. 'To thoſe Princes who have lately governed us, 'thoſe words of St. Paul may be applied without 'ſtraining the compariſon, When I was a child, I 'ſpake as a child, I underſtood as a child, I thought as 'a child, 1 Cor. xiii. 11. Firſt, as to ſpeech, 'tis 'certain a child is very inſignificant and variable: 'truth and falſehood are almoſt indifferent to him; 'he is forward to promiſe, but quickly forgets the 'performance. Theſe qualities are very unfortunate 'in a Prince, neither is it poſſible for a kingdom to be 'happy, where the crown is no better furniſhed. But, 'cum vir dominatur populo, when the people have a 'man to reign over them, there will be none of theſe 'defects in the adminiſtration. For it is the property 'of a man to govern his tongue and guard his lan'guage. This is our caſe; we have now a man to 'reign over us, of whom I hope that ſaying of the King; and, at the Coronation-dinner, ſat at his right hand; the Archbiſhop of York being placed at his left (p). In the firſt year of King Henry's reign, this Archbiſhop ſummoned a Synod [K], which ſat at St. Paul's (q). Harpsfield, and the Councils from him, have miſtaken this Synod for one held during the vacancy of the See [L]. This Prelate, by his courage and reſolution, preſerved ſeveral of the Biſhops, who were in King Henry's army, from being plundered of their equipages and money [M]. The next year, the Commons having moved, that the revenues of the Church might be applied to the ſervice of the Public, Archbiſhop Arundel oppoſed the motion ſo vigorouſly [N], that the King and Lords promiſed him, the Church ſhould never be rifled in their time (r). ' ſon of Sirach may be verified; Happy is the man that ' hath not ſlipt with his tongue.' The Archbiſhop proceeds to comment on the above-mentioned text of St. Paul, and upon theſe words, I underſtood as a child, he obſerves, that a child reliſhes nothing but what pleaſes his humour, and flatters his weakneſs: as for remonſtrance and plain-dealing, ſuch freedoms are always unacceptable. Then he goes on: ' But ſuch has ' formerly been the misfortune of this kingdom; for ' truth was in a manner clapt under hatches, and no ' man had the courage to deliver his thoughts. From ' whence it is plain, the ſcepter was in a child's hand: ' for a man carries his thoughts farther, and has a ' more abſolute command over his paſſions. And to ' come to the advantage of our preſent circumſtances, ' now, by God's aſſiſtance, that of the ſon of Sirach, ' Bleſſed is the man, who is ſtayed upon wiſdom, may ' juſtly be affirmed of his royal perſon. For as a ' child is fond of trifles and flattery, ſo a man loves ' truth and prudent advice. In the laſt place, the ' Apoſtle tells us, I thought as a child. And what are ' the thoughts of a child? A child follows only the ' ſolicitations of appetite. Thus, when a child go- ' verns, reaſon is diſcarded, humour is abſolute, and ' will carries all before it. But, where caprice reigns, ' and reaſon is forced to retire, the adminiſtration ' muſt needs be unſteady and ill directed. But now, ' having a man at the helm, we are reſcued from the ' danger of ſo unhappy a conduct. The Prince, ' who now rules over us, being a man both in age ' and underſtanding, will readily acknowledge the ' proper buſineſs of his ſtation, and make no ſcruple ' to ſay, I come not to do my own will, but the will of ' him that ſent me, that is, God's will. And there- ' fore we may promiſe ourſelves, that he will be ſtayed ' upon wiſdom: that he will ſeriouſly conſider the pro- ' vidence of God, and govern his practice by the rules ' of religion; in ſhort, that he will conduct the ad- ' miniſtration in ſuch a manner, that the promiſe in ' Holy Scripture may not be unapplicable to his go- ' vernment, A King ſhall reign in righteouſneſs, and ' do judgment and juſtice in the earth (15).'

[K] He ſummoned a Synod,] King Henry ſent the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmorland to this Synod, not to preſs any ſubſidy, but only to deſire the prayers of the clergy for the proſperity of the King and nation. Reſtitutionis ejus anno primo Synodum indixit, quo acceſſerunt Northumbriæ & Weſtmorlandiæ Comites, dicentes, à rege quidem miſſos ſeſe, ſed nuntium ſolitum haudquaquam apportare; ſiquidem ideo ſe venire, non ut pecunias flagitent, ſed orationes eorum, pro ipſo, regnique incolumitate fundendas (16). But this diſintereſted Prince, who ſeemed at this time to deſpiſe money, was ſo changed before two years were ended, that he refuſed a voluntary offer made him by the clergy of a tenth of their revenues, and demanded a larger ſum. Hic tantus pecuniarum contemptor, ante elapſum biennium ita mutatus eſt, ut annui cenſus ſimplicem decimam in proxima Synodo oblatam ultro, aſpernaretur, multo majora poſtulans (17).

[L] Harpsfield —— miſtook this Synod for one held during the vacancy of the See.] That author tells us (18), that, during the exile of Arundel, a Synod was held at Canterbury; that it was ſummoned by the Prior and Chapter of Chriſt's-church; and that the King ſent the Earls of Weſtmorland and Northumberland to this convocation, with the meſſage above-mentioned (19). But Harpsfield is undoubtedly miſtaken: for, firſt, Walden being Archbiſhop of Canterbury that year, the Prior and Chapter could have no pretence to ſummon a convocation. In the next place, the circumſtance of King Henry's ſending the Earls of Weſtmorland and Northumberland is a proof that Arundel was reſtored; ſince that Prelate came over with the Duke of Lancaſter, and crowned him upon his ſeizing the government.

[M] He prevented ſeveral of the Biſhops —— from being plundered of their equipages and money.] Walſingham (20) informs us, that the King having marched his army into Yorkſhire, and ſettled the northern parts, projected an expedition againſt the Welſh, who had lately made depredations upon the Engliſh; but, his exchequer being low, he wanted money to ſubſiſt and pay his troops. That the deſign might not be dropt upon this account, ſome of the officers ſuggeſted an expedient to the King. They told him, there were ſeveral Biſhops in the army in a condition to ſupply his Highneſs: that theſe Prelates ought to be ſent home on foot, and their equipages and money taken from them for the public ſervice. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury being preſent when the motion was made, replied, That if any of the ſoldiers offered to plunder his retinue, they might expect to be well drubbed for their pains. This reſolution of the Archbiſhop checked the intended outrage, and made the officers deſiſt. This is Walſingham's account of the matter. The author of the Life and reign of Henry IV. (21) relates the ſame ſtory with this difference, that the King was adviſed to ſeize the lands and treaſures of the Biſhops, not their equipages; for he ſays nothing of their being in the King's army. That writer adds, that ' though the King was not for- ' ward to meddle with the church-men, yet this ad- ' vice put him in mind of the riches and plenty of ' the clergy; which being beſtowed on perſons, whoſe ' beſt character it is to be deſpiſers of the world, ' might beſt be ſpared at this juncture; and there- ' upon, though he would uſe no force, yet he dealt ' with the Archbiſhop to procure him a ſupply in this ' exigency, and ſo prevailed with him, that, calling ' a Synod of the clergy, he obtained a tenth of them ' for him; and the King ſent the Prince, with his ' army, into Wales.'

[N] Arundel vigorouſly oppoſed the motion for applying the revenues of the Church to the ſervice of the public.] On the 6th of October, 1404, the King held a Parliament at Coventry. It was called Parliamentum Indoctum, or the Lack-learning Parliament, becauſe it was compoſed of none but illiterate perſons, all others, eſpecially Serjeants and Barriſters at Law, being, by the King's expreſs direction, excluded (22). M. Rapin thinks, there is room to doubt whether theſe orders were ſo poſitive as is affirmed. However he is of opinion, the court took care, upon this occaſion, that ſuch perſons chiefly ſhould be elected, as were leaſt likely to be prejudiced in favour of the clergy; and that for reaſons, which will preſently appear (23). When the Parliament met, the Lord Chancellor laid before them the neceſſities of the Public; that the Scots and Welſh, the French and Flemings, were ready to invade the kingdom; that the Exchequer was greatly exhauſted, and the King's revenues unable to furniſh the neceſſary defence. The Commons hereupon remonſtrated, that the clergy had engroſſed a great part of the wealth of the kingdom; that they lived in idleneſs, and contributed very little to the public advantage: whereas the laity hazarded both their perſons and fortunes in the ſervice of their country. They therefore were of opinion the King ſhould ſeize the revenues of the Church, and apply them to the public ſervice of the nation. Archbiſhop Arundel, who was preſent at the motion, roſe from his ſeat, and repreſented, ' That the Clergy had ' always contributed more to the public ſervice than ' the Laity, and had more frequently granted the ' Crown a tenth, than the others had done a fifteenth; ' and though they did not ſerve the King in perſon ' in his wars, yet they ſent their tenants to aſſiſt him, ' and

After this, he viſited the Univerſity of Cambridge; where he made ſeveral ſtatutes, ſuppreſſed ſeveral ill cuſtoms, and puniſhed the ſtudents for their miſbehaviour. And, when the viſitation was ended, at the requeſt of the Univerſity, he reſerved all thoſe matters and cauſes, which had been laid before him, to his own cognizance and juriſdiction (s). In the year 1408, Arundel began to exert himſelf with vigour againſt the Lollards or Wickliffites (t). To this end, he ſummoned the Biſhops and Clergy at Oxford, to check the progreſs of this new ſect, and prevent that Univerſity's being farther tinctured with their opinions (u). But the doctrines of Wickliff ſtill gaining ground in that ſeat of learning, the Archbiſhop reſolved to viſit the Univerſity, and apply ſome farther remedy. Accordingly he went down, attended by the Earl of Arundel, his nephew, and a ſplendid retinue. When he came near the town, he was met by the principal members of the Univerſity, who told him, that, if he came only to ſee the town, he was very welcome; but if he came in the character of a Viſitor, they refuſed to acknowledge his juriſdiction. The Archbiſhop, reſenting this treatment, left Oxford in a day or two, and wrote to the King on account of his diſappointment. After a warm conteſt between the Univerſity and the Archbiſhop, both parties agreed to refer the diſpute to the King's deciſion; who, governing himſelf by the example of his predeceſſors (w), gave ſentence in favour of the Archbiſhop [O]. Soon after this controverſy was ended, a Convocation being held at St. Paul's in London, the Biſhops and Clergy complained of the growth of Wicklevitiſm at Oxford [P], and preſſed the Archbiſhop to viſit that Univerſity. Hereupon Arundel wrote to the Chancellor and others, giving them notice, that he intended to hold a Viſitation in St. Mary's Church. His delegates for this purpoſe were ſent down ſoon after, and admitted by the Univerſity; who, to make ſome ſatisfaction for their backwardneſs in cenſuring Wickliff's opinions, wrote to the Archbiſhop, and aſked his pardon (x): after which they appointed a Committee of twelve perſons, to examine heretical books, particularly thoſe of Wickliff. Theſe Inquiſitors into heretical pravity, having cenſured ſome concluſions extracted out of Wickliff's books, ſent an account of their proceedings to the Archbiſhop, who confirmed their cenſures, and ſent an authority in writing to ſome eminent members of the Univerſity, empowering them to inquire into perſons ſuſpected of heterodoxy, and oblige them to declare their opinions. Theſe rigorous proceedings made Arundel extremely hated by the Wickliffites, who would ſometimes compliment him with a curſing letter. However he went on with the proſecution, and not only ſolicited the Pope to condemn the abovementioned concluſions, but deſired likewiſe a Bull for the digging up Wickliff's bones. The Pope granted the firſt of theſe requeſts, but refuſed the other, not thinking it any uſeful part of diſcipline to diſturb the aſhes of the dead (y). Arundel's warm zeal for ſuppreſſing the

'and were at leaſt as ſerviceable to him by their in-'ceſſant prayers for his ſucceſs, as the Laity were by 'their arms.' The Speaker of the Houſe, Sir John Cheney, took up the Archbiſhop, and publickly declared, he thought the prayers of the Church a very ſlender ſupply, and that their lands would do the Church and nation more good. This anſwer fired the Archbiſhop, who, getting up, declared with warmth, 'That the King and kingdom could not expect to 'thrive, ſo long as the Prayers of the Clergy were 'deſpiſed.' And as for you, Sir, continued he, turning to the Speaker, who take the liberty to rally the functions of the Clergy, I believe you will find it no eaſy undertaking to invade the rights and poſſeſſions of the Church. Then, perceiving the King, who was preſent at the conteſt, inclining to favour the deſign of the Commons, he went up to him, and, on his knees, beſought him to conſider the oath he had taken at his coronation, to maintain the rights of the Church, and afford the Clergy his favour and protection. Whether the King was really affected with the Archbiſhop's diſcourſe, or began to ſee the difficulty of the enterprize, he bad him riſe and go to his place, aſſuring him, he was fully reſolved not to hearken to theſe new meaſures, but to leave the Church rather in a better condition than he found it. Arundel, encouraged by this promiſe, turned to the Commons, and let them know, he ſaw through the whole deſign, telling them, 'That their wicked advice was intend-'ed more for their own, than the King's advantage.' You, Gentlemen, ſays he, and others governed by the ſame views, have perſuaded the King and his predeceſſors to ſeize the revenues of the Friars alien, on pretence of augmenting the royal revenues, but in reality to get them into your own hands: for you have defeated the Crown of thoſe eſtates, and begged them for yourſelves. And the ſame would be the caſe, ſhould the King comply with this execrable project: he would not be a farthing the richer in a year's time. This courage in the Archbiſhop, and the King's declaration, ſilenced the Commons, and put a ſtop to the deſign for the preſent. However, Arundel thought it beſt to ſecure a party in the Houſe of Lords againſt the intended bill, in caſe the project ſhould be revived. At laſt the Commons themſelves aſked the Archbiſhop's pardon, admired his reſolution, and confeſſed the injuſtice of their expedient (24).

[O] ——— After a warm controverſy between the Univerſity and the Archbiſhop, &c.] The heads of the univerſity were ſent for up to court, and the Chancellor and Proctors turned out of their office. The ſtudents were ſo far diſconcerted by theſe rigours, that they diſcontinued the public lectures, and were even upon the point of breaking up, and diſſolving their body. The King being informed of what paſſed, ſent them a reprimanding letter at firſt, but afterwards was pleaſed to treat them more gently. His Highneſs's award in favour of the Archbiſhop was confirmed by act of Parliament (25). And to fortify himſelf ſtill farther, Arundel procured a Bull from the Pope, to revoke the exemption granted to the univerſity by Boniface. But this Bull of revocation was afterwards voided by Sixtus IV. who, as much as in him lay, reſtored the Univerſity to their former immunities (26). As to the King's deciſion, in caſe the Univerſity did not abide by it, but diſturbed the Archbiſhop or his ſucceſſors in their viſitation, they were to forfeit a thouſand pounds, and their franchiſes to be ſeized, and remain in the King's hands, till they ſubmitted to the award (27).

Lollards,

Lollards, or Wickliffites, carried him to ſeveral unjuſtifiable ſeverities [Q] againſt the heads of that ſect, particularly againſt Sir John Oldcaſtle, Lord Cobham (z); and induced him to procure a Synodical Conſtitution, which forbad the tranſlation of the Scriptures into the vulgar tongue [R]. This Prelate died at Canterbury, after having ſat ſeventeen years, the twentieth of February 1413. The Lollards of thoſe times pretended to diſcover the immediate hand of Heaven in the manner of his death [S]. He was buried in the cathedral church of Canterbury, near the weſt end, under a monument erected [Q] He was carried to ſeveral unjuſtifiable ſeverities againſt the Lollards.] It cannot be denied, that the Lollards had given the Archbiſhop great provocation (if any could be great enough) for perſecution. They attacked him in the authority of his character, and ſtruck directly at the rights and poſſeſſions of the Church. It is true, they had began a reformation in religion, but maintained withal ſeveral groſs and capital errors (29). But on the other ſide, the perſecuting theſe people to the ſtake, was carrying the rigour of diſcipline too far; and acting in a manner not ſuitable to Chriſtian Charity, and the tenderneſs of the Epiſcopal character.

(29) See the article WICKLIFF.

[R] He procured a ſynodical conſtitution, which forbad the tranſlation of the Scriptures into the vulgar tongue.] Let us hear what Biſhop Godwin ſays of this matter. 'Cumque nihilo ſecius iſtorum homi-'num creſcere indies numerum conſpiceret; ut caligi-'nem offunderet oculis eorum, ne illos defigere poſ-'ſent amplius in pravis illis ſuperſtitionibus quæ in 'eccleſiam jam olim paulatim irrepſerant; Scripturas 'ſacras in vernaculam Anglicanam converti, vel con-'verſas legi vetuit in Synodo; cum non ita pridem 'in funere Annæ Reginæ concionatus, haud alio no-'mine eam magis laudaverit, quam quod Evange-'lia in Anglicanum idioma converſa aſſidue lecti-'taret (30). —— And obſerving that the number of 'theſe Sectariſts daily increaſed, that he might in ſome 'meaſure put a ſtop to thoſe erroneous opinions and 'practices, which had by degrees crept into the Church, 'he forbad, by a ſynodical decree, the tranſlating the 'Scriptures into the vulgar tongue, or the reading them 'when tranſlated: Arundel, I ſay, did this; who not 'long before, in a ſermon preached at the funeral of 'Queen Anne, commended her for nothing more than 'her daily reading the Scriptures tranſlated into Eng-'liſh.' Let us ſee how Mr. Collier endeavours to vindicate the Archbiſhop from this charge of inconſiſtency. 'To this it may be anſwered, that the 'Archbiſhop's conſtitution declares only againſt a 'tranſlation made by a private hand; and that no 'verſion of the Holy Scriptures ſhould be uſed till it 'was allowed by a provincial Synod, or at leaſt by 'the Biſhop of the dioceſe (31). Now without doubt 'the Archbiſhop was ſo far in the right, as not to 'allow every private perſon the liberty of tranſlating 'the Scriptures. To have done otherwiſe might have 'been a dangerous permiſſion. It might have opened 'a paſſage to hereſy and error, put it in the power 'of ignorant and deſigning men to corrupt the holy 'text, and poiſon the fountain of life (32).' With ſubmiſſion to this ingenious author, this does not amount to a juſtification of Arundel. For what difference is there between obliging the people to receive ſuch a tranſlation or interpretation of the Scriptures as the Church ſhall think fit, and withholding the uſe of it entirely from them; ſince in both caſes the people muſt pin their faith upon the Church's ſleeve?

[S] The Lollards pretended to diſcover the immediate hand of Heaven in the manner of his death.] He died of an inflammation in his throat. It is pretended, he was ſtruck with this diſeaſe, as he was pronouncing ſentence of excommunication and condemnation on the Lord Cobham; and from that time, notwithſtanding all the aſſiſtance of medicines, he could ſwallow neither meat nor drink, and ſo was ſtarved to death. The Lollards imputed this lamentable end to the juſt judgment of God upon him, both for his ſeverity towards that ſect, and forbidding the Scriptures to be tranſlated into Engliſh (33). Biſhop Godwin tells us the ſame. Juſto Dei judicio factum ferunt, ut is qui verbum Dei, animæ pabulum, ſubtraxerat popularibus; clauſis per anginam aut morbum aliquem conſimilem faucibus, aliquanto ante mortem tempore, nec verbulum potuerit fari, nec cibi vel minimum deglutire, adeoque mutus fameque tandem enectus inedia interierit (34). [We ſhall ſelect, from the Parliamentary Hiſtory, and Mr. Bentham's Antiquities of the Church of Ely, ſome circumſtances relative to Archbiſhop Arundel, which are either differently ſtated or not mentioned in the preceding article. The writer of it, following Godwin de Præſulibus Angliæ, hath ſaid that Thomas Arundel was conſecrated Biſhop of Ely, April 6, 1375: but we learn from Mr. Bentham, that he was conſecrated on the 9th of April, 1374; and that, on the 20th of April 1376, he was enthroned at Ely, with the uſual ſolemnities. Whilſt he held this See, he almoſt rebuilt the epiſcopal palace in Holborn (35). In 1386, according to Knyghton, Biſhop Arundel, by common conſent of the whole Parliament, was deputed, together with the Lord Thomas of Woodſtock, Duke of Glouceſter, to preſent a ſevere remonſtrance to King Richard the Second, upon his mal-adminiſtration, and abſenting himſelf from his Parliament. The remonſtrance is very remarkable, and contains ſeveral bold ſentiments in favour of the rights of the people; but the authenticity of it hath been diſputed. When, a few days after, Arundel was appointed Lord High-Chancellor of England, it was at the particular inſtance of Parliament, and not with the good-will of the King; who was obliged, with great reluctance, to remove from the Chancellorſhip his favourite, Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk. The Earl of Suffolk was immediately impeached by the Commons, in full Parliament, of high crimes and miſdemeanors. Arundel did not continue in the poſt of Chancellor, without interruption, till he was advanced to the See of Canterbury. In 1389 he reſigned that office, and was again appointed to it in 1391 (36). In 1390, Arundel, being then Archbiſhop of York, united with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (William Courtney) in making a proteſtation, in open Parliament, for themſelves and the whole Clergy of their provinces, 'That they neither intended or would aſſent to any 'ſtatute or law to be made againſt the Pope's autho-'rity;' which proteſtation, at their requeſt, was entered upon the roll (37). Two ſpeeches of Arundel, upon the occaſion of Henry the Fourth's acceſſion to the crown, are given in the Parliamentary Hiſtory; the laſt of which is the ſame with that in the note [I]; but with a conſiderable difference in the language of the different tranſlations (38). Our predeceſſor has followed Mr. Daniel in making the parliamentum indoctum to be held on the 6th of October 1404; but, according to the Parliamentary Hiſtory, it did not meet till 1405 (39). In 1406, when the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons preſented ſome excellent regulations for the right government of the nation, to be ſworn to by the King's Council, Archbiſhop Arundel, for himſelf, and others, refuſed to take the oath; but offered to do what they could towards the obſervance of the articles. However, upon the King's charging them, on their allegiance, to comply with the requiſition, they thought proper to ſubmit (40). In the Parliament which met in 1407, the Archbiſhop, who ſeems to have been then a third time Lord Chancellor, opened the ſeſſion and the cauſe of the meeting with a ſpeech; and the text which he took for his ſubject was, Regem honorificate (41). —— Some particulars concerning Arundel's tranſactions with the univerſity of Cambridge, whilſt he was Biſhop of Ely, though not of a very intereſting nature, are related by Mr. Bentham (42). ——The Archbiſhop's treatment of the Lollards is much too tenderly ſpoken of in the note [Q]. How far theſe people maintained ſeveral groſs and capital errors, will properly be conſidered in another place. We are clearly of opinion, that Arundel's perſecution of the followers of Wickliff, was erected by himself in his life-time. He was a considerable benefactor to that church: for he built the Lanthorn Tower, and great part of the Nave; and gave a ring of five bells, called from him Arundel's Ring, and distinguished by the names of Trinity, Mary, Gabriel, Blasius, and John (aa). He gave likewise to that church several rich vestments, a mitre enchased with jewels, a silver gilt crosier, a golden chalice for the high altar, and another to be used only on St. Thomas Becket's day. He gave also the church of Godmersham; out of the income of which, he ordered six shillings and eight pence to be given annually to every Monk of the convent, on the aforesaid festival. Lastly, he gave several valuable books, particularly two Missals, and a collection in one volume of St. Gregory's works, with Anathema to any person, who should remove it out of the church (bb). Archbishop Arundel seems to have been a person of great natural capacity, well improved by study and experience; but is deservedly censured for the great share he had in dethroning King Richard, and his cruelty towards those whom he esteemed heretics. ASAPH (St.) gave his name to the Episcopal See of St. Asaph in Wales (a). He was descended of a good family in North-Wales, and became a Monk in the convent of Llan-Elvy, over which Kentigern the Scotch Bishop of that place presided [A]. That Prelate, being recalled to his own country, resigned both his convent and cathedral to Asaph, who demeaned himself with such sanctity, that after his death Llan-Elvy lost its name, and took that of the saint. He was a diligent preacher, and had frequently this saying in his mouth; They who withstand the preaching of God's word, envy man's salvation. St. Asaph flourished about the year 590, under Carentius King of the Britons. He wrote the Ordinances of his Church, the Life of his Master Kentigern, and some other pieces. The time of his death is not certainly known (b). Bale tells us, he was the first who received unction from the Pope [B]. After his death, the See of St. Asaph continued vacant above five hundred years, till Geoffrey of Monmouth was placed therein [C].

ASCHAM (Roger) was born at Kirby-Wiske, near North-Allerton, in Yorkshire, about the year 515 (a). His father's name was John Ascham, a man of a moderate fortune, but of a very extraordinary character, both for his understanding, and probity, and steward to the noble family of Scroop; his mother's name was Margaret, descended of a genteel family, and allied to several persons of great distinction. Besides this Roger, these good people had two other sons, Thomas, and Anthony, and several daughters. As they lived in great credit in their country, so their conduct was very exemplary; the education of their children their principal concern, and their behaviour towards their neighbours equally honest and courteous; by which means they were universally beloved, and many honourable persons interested themselves in providing for their children. One thing is so remarkable of them, that it ought not to pass unmentioned: after living together forty-seven years in the greatest harmony, and with the most cordial affection, the good old people died the same day, and almost in the same hour (b). As for him of whom we are speaking (their third son Roger), some time before his father's death, he was taken into the family of the Wingfields, and at the expence of the then Sir Anthony Wingfield, studied with his two sons under the care of Mr Bond. The brightness of his genius, and his great affection for learning, very early discovered themselves, by his eager reading all the English books which came to his hands. This propensity for study was encouraged by his generous benefactor, who, when he had attained the elements of the learned languages, sent him, about the year 1530, to St. John's College in Cambridge (c). It was extremely happy for Mr. Ascham, that, at this time, St. John's College was one of the most flourishing in the university. Its master, Nicholas Medcalf, was a great encourager of learning, and a most generous patron to such as addicted themselves thereto; and his tutor, Mr. Hugh Fitzherbert, had not only much knowledge, but also a most graceful and insinuating method of transfusing it into his pupils, amongſt whom were very many, who, in proceſs of time, became the greateſt and the brighteſt men of the age (d). No wonder then, that to a genius naturally prone to learning, Mr. Aſcham added a ſpirit of emulation, which, together, induced him to ſtudy ſo hard, that, while a perfect boy, he made a prodigious progreſs in polite learning, and became exceedingly diſtinguiſhed, even amongſt thoſe who were the moſt eminent wits in the univerſity [A]. He took his firſt degree of Bachelor of Arts on the twenty-eighth of February, 1534, when he was but eighteen years of age; and on the twenty-third of March following, was elected fellow of his college by the intereſt of the maſter (e), though Mr. Aſcham's propenſity to the Reformed Religion had induced him to ſpeak a little indiſcreetly, and thereby put Dr. Medcalf to no ſmall trouble, in carrying his good intention into act, as our author himſelf tells us. Theſe honours ſerved only to excite him to ſtill greater vigilance in his ſtudies, particularly in that of the Greek tongue, wherein he attained an excellency peculiar to himſelf, and read therein, both publickly for the univerſity, and privately in his college, with univerſal applauſe. At the commencement held after the feaſt of St. Peter and St. Paul, in 1536, he was inaugurated Maſter of Arts, being then twenty-one years old (f). By this time many of his pupils came to be taken notice of for their extraordinary proficiency, inſomuch that William Grindal, who was one of them, at the recommendation of Mr. Aſcham, was made choice of by Sir John Cheke, to be tutor to the lady Elizabeth. One may juſtly wonder, that he did not accept at this time of ſo great an honour himſelf: but it ſeems he was ſo delighted with an academical life, that he was not very deſirous of changing it for one at court (g). His affection for his friends, though it filled him with a deep concern for their intereſts, and a tender regard for their perſons, yet could not induce him to give up his underſtanding, eſpecially in points of learning. For this reaſon he did not go immediately into the new pronunciation of the Greek, which his intimate friend, Sir John Cheke, laboured, by his authority, to introduce throughout the univerſity (h); yet when he had thoroughly examined, he came over to his opinion, and defended the new pronunciation with that zeal and vivacity which gave a peculiar livelineſs to all his writings. In July 1542, he ſupplicated the univerſity of Oxford, to be incorporated Maſter of Arts, but whether he was or was not incorporated, does not appear by the regiſter (i). To divert him after the fatigue of ſeverer ſtudies, he addicted himſelf to archery, which innocent amuſement drew upon him the cenſure of ſome envious perſons. Whereupon he ſet himſelf to ſhew the expediency of ſuch ſort of divertiſements in general, and the innocency and uſefulneſs of ſhooting with the long-bow in particular, in a ſmall treatiſe, intitled, Toxophilus; which book he publiſhed in 1544, and dedicated it to King Henry VIII., then about to undertake his expedition againſt Boulogne. This work was very kindly received [B]; and the King, at the recommendation of Sir

[A] The moſt eminent wits in the univerſity.] At firſt Mr. Aſcham applied himſelf to teaching Greek for the ſake of learning it thoroughly himſelf; to which courſe he was adviſed by his great friend Mr. Robert Pember, who told him, that he would acquire more knowledge by reading to a boy a ſingle fable out of Æſop, than by hearing others read Latin lectures on the whole Iliad (1). The ſame gentleman directed him in his choice of Latin authors. By degrees, he became himſelf ſo perfect a judge both of ſentiment and ſtile, that he loſt no time in the peruſal of mean or unprofitable books. Cicero and Cæſar he ſtudied, eſpecially, for the ſake of their language; and whoſoever conſiders his letters attentively, will find that he rarely makes uſe either of words or of phraſes, but what are to be found in them. Among the philoſophers, he read chiefly Plato and Ariſtotle. Thucydides and Herodotus were his favourite hiſtorians; Demoſthenes and Iſocrates, the orators he ſtudied moſt (2). On theſe two laſt-mentioned authors, he read privately to his pupils, as he did likewiſe on the beſt and moſt famous of the Greek poets. By this means, he came to excel in Philology, of which there cannot be a ſtronger teſtimony, than his excellent letter to Hubert Languet, in defence of the new pronunciation of the Greek tongue (3), of which it is hard to ſay, whether the critical knowledge contained therein, or the elegance of the ſtile in which it is written, ought moſt to commend it. There is extant in the Oxford edition of his letters, Languet's anſwer (4), which is alſo well worth reading, by ſuch as are deſirous of underſtanding thoroughly that controverſy, and the reaſons which induced Sir John Cheke, and Sir Thomas Smith, to ſupport that which is now ſtiled the Engliſh pronunciation of the Greek.

[B] This work was very kindly received.] The title of the book mentioned in the text, as it ſtands in the copy I have before me is this, Toxophilus. The Schole or Partitions of ſhooting contayned in two Bookes, written by Roger Aſcham, 1544. And now newlye peruſed. Pleaſaunt for all gentlemen and Yomen of England, for theyr Paſtime to reade, and profitable for their Uſe to followe both in Warre and Peace, Anno 1571. Imprinted at London in Flete-ſtreat, near to Saint Dunſtone's Churche, by Thomas Marſhe. Before it ſtands a copy of Latin verſes by Dr. Walter Haddon. This ſecond edition hath a dedication prefixed to it, addreſſed to all the gentlemen and yeomen of England; though, as is obſerved in the text, the firſt edition is dedicated to King Henry. There is among our author's letters, one addreſſed to his patron Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter, wherein he ſpeaks out plainly, what his deſign was in writing that book, and what he aimed at by writing it. As to the firſt, he acknowledges his intention was to introduce an eaſy and natural ſtile, in the writing of Engliſh proſe, inſtead of that forced and frothy language, which was the foible of moſt writers of his time. With reſpect to the ſecond, he owns that he had at that time a deſire of travelling into Italy, and was in hopes of obtaining, by the dedication of his book to the King, a penſion, which might enable him to fulfil his deſire (5). Without all doubt, this little treatiſe may ſtill be ſtiled a maſter-piece in its kind, whether we conſider the manner in which he handles his ſubject, or the matter which his book contains (6). His words are always ſuited to the nature of his diſcourſe, never riſing above, never ſinking beneath it, but ſo naturally expreſſive of their author's ſentiments, that the reader is never at a loſs, as he never can be diſpleaſed with their meaning. Much learning he does indeed ſhew, where one would little expect it; but this he does ſo modeſtly, with ſuch a graceful propriety, and ſo much to the peruſer's advantage, that it is impoſſible to miſtake that for pedantry, which is the pure effect of ſuperior knowledge. So perſpicuous, ſo natural is his

Sir William Paget, was pleaſed to ſettle a ſmall penſion upon him, which, after that Prince's death, was for ſome time diſcontinued, but at length reſtored to him, during pleaſure, by Edward VI., and confirmed by Queen Mary, with an addition of ten pounds per annum (k). Among other accompliſhments, he was remarkable for writing a very fine hand, for which reaſon he was made uſe of to teach that art to Prince Edward, the Lady Elizabeth, the two brothers Henry and Charles, Dukes of Suffolk, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, and for many years wrote all the letters of the univerſity to the King, and to the great men at Court (l). The ſame year that he publiſhed his book he was choſen univerſity orator, in the room of Mr. John Cheke, an office which ſuited him extremely well, as gratifying his ſtrong paſſion for an academical life, and affording him frequent opportunities of diſplaying his ſuperior eloquence in the Latin and Greek tongues (m). In 1548, on the death of his pupil, Mr. Grindal, he was ſent for to Court, in order to inſtruct the Lady Elizabeth in the knowledge of the learned languages, which duty he diſcharged for two years, with great reputation to himſelf, and with much ſatisfaction to that illuſtrious perſon (n). For ſome time he enjoyed as great comfort and content at Court as he had done at College: but at length, on account of ſome ill-judged and ill-founded whiſpers, Mr. Aſcham took ſuch a diſtaſte at ſome in the Lady Elizabeth's family, that he left her a little abruptly, which he afterwards heartily repented, and took great and not unſucceſsful pains, to get himſelf reſtored to her good graces (o). On his returning to the univerſity, he reſumed his ſtudies, and the diſcharge of his office of public orator, his circumſtances being at this time pretty eaſy [C], by reaſon his method, that if for no other reaſon yet for this, I ſhould be glad to ſee it taken out of its black letter'd garb, and put into the hands of young gentlemen at the univerſity. But there is another reaſon which renders this ſtill more deſirable. It abounds with fragments of Engliſh hiſtory, curious in themſelves, and ſo loſt in the ocean of our hiſtories, that ſhould they be at any time revived, they would certainly have all the charms of novelty. It would be unjuſt to conclude this note without remarking, That as this treatiſe gave the firſt riſe to our author's fortunes, ſo it was the review of it by Biſhop Gardiner, which reſtored them when the author thought them ſhipwrecked by the death of King Edward; for in his letter to the Biſhop of Wincheſter, he takes notice of its being peruſed and approved by the lords of the council, and being the means of introducing its author into their favour (7).

(7) Aſcham. Epiſt. l. ii. ep. 25.

[C] His circumſtances being pretty eaſy.] Among our author's firſt patrons, are to be reckoned the following illuſtrious perſons, viz. Edward Lee, Archbiſhop of York, a Prelate diſtinguiſhed no leſs by his extraordinary learning, untainted integrity, and extenſive beneficence, than by his exalted ſtation. He took our author early under his care, and beſides many other ſervices, which, in reſpect to his merit he rendered him, was pleaſed to allow him an annual penſion out of his pocket. Among our author's letters, there are extant ſeveral to this Archbiſhop full of profound acknowledgments, and of panegyricks in the ſtrongeſt and ſweeteſt ſtrain (8). This prelate died in 1544, when Mr. Aſcham was in the thirtieth year of his age (9). He was alſo much careſſed by the Ducheſs of Suffolk, and had in ſome meaſure her ſons, Henry and Charles, entruſted to his care (10). Anne, Counteſs of Pembroke, and ſiſter to the Marquis of Northampton, was another auſpicious patroneſs and his pupil in the Latin tongue, as appears by two letters ſtill extant in that language to that noble lady (11). To theſe we may add the Chancellor Wriotheſley, Sir John Cheke, and many others (12). To all of whom, Mr. Aſcham was peculiarly grateful: for a due ſenſe of obligation was in him a predominant virtue, and no doubt, this thankfulneſs in his temper was no inconſiderable help to his promotion. All the ſtations of life he occupied, were diſcharged with decency and honour; but he ſeems to have ſhone moſt in his poſt of public orator at the univerſity, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf with a zeal equally laudable and happy: for as a certain humorous writer expreſſes himſelf, he did good ſervice in the hindering thoſe ſacrilegious perſons who had dined upon the Church from ſupping on the Univerſities (13). This ought to be remembered to his everlaſting honour, for many reaſons, but for this eſpecially, that it may provoke others to a like diligence, and a like reſpect for thoſe luminaries of ſcience which once eclipſed, we ſhould ſoon fall into more than Egyptian darkneſs.

[The character which Dr. C. has given of Archbiſhop Lee, in the above note, ſeems to require ſome conſiderable abatement. This prelate was a great enemy to Eraſmus; and Dr. Jortin, in his life of that great man, repreſents Lee in a very unfavourable light. 'Edward Lee,' ſays he, 'began about this 'time (1517) to attack Eraſmus, and to ſtir up the 'divines againſt him; in which attempt the Domi'nicans were no leſs buſy. He not only treated 'Eraſmus as one of little erudition and no judg'ment, but as an heretic and an enemy to the 'church; and did all that lay in his power to run 'him down and ruin him. Eraſmus in return hath 'often ſaid of him, that the earth never produced 'an animal more vain, more arrogant, more ſcur'rilous, more ignorant, more fooliſh, and more 'malicious, than he. Yet this man advanced him'ſelf at court, and became an Archbiſhop. He muſt 'have had ſome dexterity, ſays Le Clerc, unleſs his 'elevation was owing to the caprice of the King, or 'of Dame Fortune, who loves to divert herſelf, and 'play her gambols (if we may ſpeak in a Pagan 'ſtyle) at the expence of poor mortals.

'Lee was of a reputable family, was educated at 'Oxford and Cambridge, afterwards chaplain and 'almoner to Henry VIII. then employed by the 'king on ſeveral embaſſies, then made Archbiſhop of 'York, A. D. 1531, and died 1544.

'He was, as Antony Wood and ſome others have 'ſaid, not only profoundly learned, and an incom'parable divine, but a pious Chriſtian, an able and 'aſſiduous preacher, extremely charitable to the 'poor, and univerſally lamented, when he departed 'this life. It is very well: but whence came our 'Antiquaries to know all this? Why, even from his 'Epitaph. As if ſtones could not exaggerate! Thus 'much is certain, that he was always an enemy to 'the reformation.

'Sir Thomas More was a conſtant friend to Lee, 'and yet much diſpleaſed at his quarrelling with 'Eraſmus. He wrote three letters to Lee on that 'occaſion; which inform us, that he would have 'diſſuaded Lee from printing his cenſures upon 'Eraſmus; that he was very ſorry, when they were 'publiſhed; that he thought Lee to be no match 'for Eraſmus, but far inferior to him both in know'ledge and abilities, and in credit and intereſt with 'the learned world; and judged that this exploit 'would draw infamy and contempt upon the writer, 'and even an odium upon the nation.

'Thus our Lee, who, if he had kept the fool with'in doors, might have paſſed off for a tolerable di'vine, choſe rather to purchaſe renown, ſuch as it 'was, by heading the clamorous, unlearned, or 'half-learned cenſurers of Eraſmus, and of all refor'mation. Amongſt theſe indeed he might hope to 'make a figure, though not amongſt more eminent 'perſons; and it is no wonder, that an ambitious 'man ſhould chuſe rather to be the leader of a paltry 'ſect, than loſt amongſt ſcholars of the ſecond or reaſon of conſiderable aſſiſtances from lovers of learning, and a ſmall penſion allowed him by King Edward (p). In the ſummer of 1550, he went into Yorkſhire to viſit his family and relations, from whence he was recalled to Court, in order to attend Sir Richard Moryſine, who was then going Ambaſſador to the Emperor Charles V. In his journey to London, he went to viſit the Lady Jane Gray, at her father's houſe at Broadgate in Leiceſterſhire, with whom he had been well acquainted at Court, and for whom he had already a very high eſteem. At this viſit it was, that he ſurpriſed her reading Plato's Phædo in Greek, in the abſence of her tutor Mr. Aylmer, in the article of whoſe life, a full account is given of their converſation and its effects (q). In September following, he embarked with the before-mentioned Ambaſſador for Germany, where he remained three years, and during that ſpace, left nothing omitted which might ſerve to perfect his knowledge of men as well as books (r). As he travelled with an Ambaſſador he thought it became him to make Politics ſome part of his ſtudy, and in this he ſucceeded perfectly well, as appears from a ſhort but very curious tract [D] which he wrote, concerning Germany, and of the affairs of Charles V. He was alſo of great uſe to the Ambaſſador, as well in the management of his public concerns, as in being the companion of his private ſtudies (s), which were for the moſt part in the Greek language, wherein he read Herodotus, Sophocles, Euripides, and Demoſthenes, three days in a week: the other three he copied the letters which the Ambaſſador ſent to England (t). While he was thus employed, his friends in England procured for him the poſt of Latin Secretary to King Edward, for which he was in a particular manner obliged to the kind interceſſion of Sir William Cecil, Secretary of State (u). But whatever ſatisfaction reſulted to him from hence, he did not enjoy it long, being recalled on account of the King's death, whereby, for the preſent, he loſt all his places, together with his penſion, and, which was worſe, all expectation of obtaining any farther favours at Court. In this ſad ſituation he was at firſt in a manner hopeleſs, and therefore retired to the univerſity, merely to indulge his melancholy (w). But the proſpect quickly became more promiſing. His friend the Lord Paget mentioned him to Stephen Gardiner Biſhop of Wincheſter, Lord High Chancellor, who very frankly received him into his favour, notwithſtanding Mr. Aſcham remained firm to his religion, which was ſo far from being a ſecret to the Biſhop, that he had many malicious informations given him on that head, which however he treated with contempt, and abated nothing in his friendſhip to our author on that account [E]. He in the firſt place procured him the re-eſtabliſhment of his penſion, which

* Life of Eraſmus, vol. i. p. 98, 99, 100.

[D] A ſhort and very curious tract.] The title of this treatiſe runs thus: A Report and Diſcourſe, written by Roger Aſcham, of the Affairs and State of Germany, and the Emperor Charles his Court, duryng certain Yeares, while the ſaid Roger was there. At London, Printed by John Daye, dwelling over Alderſgate. Cum Gratia & Privilegio Regiæ Majeſtatis per Decennium. My copy is without a date, nor does Anthony Wood mention when it was printed, though he mentions the book. This treatiſe is written in the form of a letter, addreſſed to John Aſtley, in anſwer to one of his which is prefixed: he was a domeſtic of the lady Elizabeth, and his letter bears date the 19th of October 1552. The anſwer muſt have been written the ſame year, ſince there is no mention therein of King Edward's death, which happened the next. It is without compliment to Mr. Aſcham, one of the moſt delicate pieces of Hiſtory that ever was penned in our language, and ſhews its author to have been a man as capable of ſhining in the cabinet as in the cloſet. He firſt tells his friend, that the Emperor Charles V. was in peace with all the world in the year 1550, and yet at the time he was writing, which as we have ſhewn, was in the latter end of 1552, found himſelf ſo preſſed by open, and ſo embarraſſed by ſecret enemies, that after flying out of Germany, he was now in a manner at his wits end, and knew not what to do. The plan therefore that he propoſes to himſelf, is to enter into and to explain the cauſes of theſe diſorders, the conſequences of them, and the characters of thoſe from whom they chiefly proceeded. Previous to this, he makes ſome obſervations on the various methods of writing hiſtory, and the ſeveral kinds thereof. In the courſe of it he renders unknown things clear, by comparing them with ſuch as are perfectly known, and throughout the whole, writes nothing which he knew not to be true of his own experience, or from the authority of ſuch as either, in reſpect to their offices, or characters, were not above all ſuſpicion. On the whole, this ſhort piece gives the cleareſt and moſt diſtinct account of the motives which led to one of the greateſt events in that age, viz. the Emperor's reſignation, and contains ſuch a number of curious facts, with ſuch natural and pertinent reaſonings upon them, as can ſcarcely be found within the ſame compaſs in our own, or perhaps in any other modern language. This is by much the ſcarceſt and the leaſt known of all our author's writings, and even among the copies that are now and then to be met with, there is hardly one perfect.

[E] Abated nothing in his friendſhip to our author on that account.] One cannot help being aſtoniſhed at Mr. Aſcham's good fortune under the reign of Queen Mary, conſidering that he never made any ſecret, not only of his being a Proteſtant, but of his being zealouſly ſo, while in the mean time, his friend and patron, Sir John Cheke, was in the Tower for his religion, and converted by this ſole argument, Chuſe whether you will ſign yourſelf a recantation, or have a warrant ſigned for your execution (14). The former of which he choſe; and there is amongſt Mr. Aſcham's letters, that very one which was written by or for Sir John Cheke, upon this occaſion (15). This was owing in all probability to two cauſes, the innocency of his life, and the uſefulneſs of his pen. The former made it unreaſonable to proceed harſhly againſt him, and the latter conſidering that Queen Mary's miniſtry were moſt of them men of great parts and learning, made his ſervice appear more neceſſary than it would have done at another time. How well he anſwered their expectations, may be gathered from the many letters of his which are extant, and how aſſiduous he was in the diſcharge of his duty, may be underſtood from this inſtance; that in the beginning of the reign of Philip and Mary, he wrote in three days ſeven and forty letters to perſons of ſuch high rank, that the loweſt in dignity was a Cardinal (16). His duty and diligence anſwering ſo fully the character which Lord Paget had given him, and his other patrons, Pole and Gardiner, being the Queen's chief miniſters ſo long as ſhe lived, we may thence gather, that a which consisted of but ten pounds a year, with the addition of ten pounds a year more: he fixed him in the post of Latin Secretary to the King and Queen, and by her Majesty's interest and his own, kept him in the fellowship of St. John's, and in his place of orator to the university, to Midsummer 1554 (x). He was likewise well known to, and in great credit with, Cardinal Pole, who though he wrote elegantly in the Latin tongue, yet he would sometimes make use of Mr. Ascham's pen, and particularly in translating his speech to the Parliament, which he made as the Pope's Legate, and of which translation he sent a copy to the Pope (y). On the first of June 1554, he married Mrs. Margaret Howe, a lady of a good family, and with whom he had a very considerable fortune, of whom he himself gives an excellent character, in one of his letters to his friend Sturmius (z). His favour with Queen Mary's ministers lasted as long as they were in power, and he was even so happy as to enjoy the countenance of the Queen herself, who conversed with him often, and was much pleased with his company (a). On her death, however, he was so far from losing any of his preferments, that, on the contrary having been previously reconciled to the Lady Elizabeth, he was immediately distinguished by her, on her accession to the throne. Thenceforward to the day of his death he was always constant at Court, very fully employed in the discharge of his two great offices, the one of Secretary for the Latin tongue, and the other of Tutor to her Majesty in the learned languages, wherein he read some hours with her every day. This interest of his at Court, would have procured a man of a more active temper many considerable advantages: but such was either Mr. Ascham's indolence, or disinterestedness, that he never asked her Majesty any thing, either for himself or his family, though he received several considerable benefactions without asking, particularly the Prebend of Westwang in the church of York, in 1559, which he held to his death (b). Yet how cold soever he was in regard to his own affairs, he was very far from being negligent in those of his friends; for whom he was ready to do any good office in his power, and in nothing readier than in parting with his money, though he never had much to spare. He was always in company with the greatest men of the Court; and having once in conversation heard the best method of educating youth debated with some heat, he from thence took occasion, at the request of Sir Richard Sackville, to write his Schoolmaster, which he lived to finish*, but not to publish [F]. His application to study rendered him infirm throughout his whole life, and at last he grew so weak, that he was unable to read in the evenings or at night; to make amends for which he rose very early in the morning. The year before his death he was seized with a hectic, which brought him very low; and then, contrary to his former custom, relapsing into night-studies, in order to compleat a Latin poem with which he designed to present the Queen on the new year, he, on the twenty-third of man of Ascham's prudence, was pretty safe even in those troublesome times. Yet neither his complaisance, nor the care he had of his own safety, could divorce him from his Protestant friends: he took care to maintain his interest with the lady Elizabeth, when it was dangerous to seek such an interest, and he lived in such strict friendship with Sir William Cecil, as contributed not a little to his prosperity in the succeeding reign.

[F] He lived to finish but not to publish.] This work of his, which is that whereby he is chiefly known to posterity, bears in its original edition this title. The Schole-master. Or a plain and perfite Way of teaching Children, to understand, write, and speake the Latin Tonge, but especially purposed for the private bringing up of youth in Jentlemen and Noblemens Houses, and commodious also for all such as have forgot the Latin Tonge, and would by themselves, without a Scholemaster, in short Tyme, and with small paines, recover a sufficient Habilitie to understand, write, and speake Latin, by Roger Ascham, Ann. 1571. At London, Printed by John Daye, dwelling over Aldersgate. Cum Gratia & Privilegio Regiæ Majestati, per Decennium. Notwithstanding this date in the title-page, the colophon tells us, it was printed in 1573. This work is now well known to the world by Mr. Upton's edition, illustrated with notes (17). The occasion of the author's composing this book, is briefly touched in the text; but it may not be amiss to insist a little more particularly upon it here. When the great Plague was at London, in 1563, Queen Elizabeth lay at her castle of Windsor, where it so fell out, that on the 10th of December there dined in Sir William Cecil's lodgings, Sir William Petre, Sir J. Mason, Dr. Wotton, Sir Richard Sackville, Treasurer of the Exchequer; Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Mr. Haddon, Mr. Astley, Master of the Jewel-house; Mr. Hampton, Mr. Nicasius, and our author. At dinner Secretary Cecil happened to say that he had heard strange news that morning, viz. That several scholars at Eaton, had run away on account of their master's severity, which he condemned as a very great fault in such as had the education of youth. Sir William Petre maintained the contrary, and being a severe man in his temper, pleaded warmly in defence of the rod. Dr. Wotton, in a soft voice and with smooth words, supported what the secretary had said; Sir John Mason merrily bantered both sides, without adhering to either. Mr. Haddon seconded Sir William Petre, and, in defence of what he advanced, observed, that the best school-master then in England, was the greatest beater. This provoked our author to speak; who said, that if it was so, it was owing to the boy's parts, and not to their master's beating, which he was sure did often harm, and seldom, if ever, good. Sir William Cecil being mightily pleased with what Mr. Ascham said, engaged into discourse more largely upon the subject; to which also Sir Walter Mildmay, Mr. Astley, and the rest, spoke a little, only Sir Richard Sackville said not a word. After dinner Mr. Ascham went to the Queen, with whom he read one of the orations of Demosthenes. Sir Richard Sackville coming up, and finding him in the Queen's privy-chamber, as soon as company came in, took him aside to a window: there he told him, that though he spoke nothing, he would not have been from that dinner for a great deal of money; that he knew to his cost, the truth of what Mr. Secretary Cecil had said, since the beating of such a schoolmaster at fourteen, had given him an aversion to learning, which he said should make him the more careful of his grandson Robert Sackville. On this account he proposed to Mr. Ascham, that he should fix upon a good schoolmaster, and send his own son Giles, to be bred up together with his grandson under his care, by those rules, which, as Sir Richard said, he thought our author could draw up the best of any man (18). This is the accident which gave birth to Ascham's School-master, a book that will be always useful, and everlastingly esteemed on account of the good sense, judicious observations, excellent characters of antient authors, and many pleasant and profitable passages of English history, which are plentifully sprinkled therein.

December 1568, was attacked by an aguiſh diſtemper, which threatened him with immediate death. He was viſited in his laſt ſickneſs by Dr. Alexander Nowell, Dean of St. Paul's, who found him perfectly calm and chearful, in which diſpoſition he continued to the thirtieth of the ſame month, when he expired (c). On the fourth of January following, he was interred according to his own directions, in the moſt private manner, in St. Sepulchre's church, his funeral ſermon being preached by the before-mentioned Dr. Nowell. He was univerſally lamented, and even the Queen herſelf not only ſhewed great concern, but was alſo pleaſed to ſay, that ſhe had rather have loſt ten thouſand pounds than her tutor Aſcham. His character is very well drawn by Buchanan in the following ſhort epigram, which he conſecrated to the memory of his friend:

With thine, the Greek and Latin Muſes join,
O Britain! to lament at Aſcham's ſhrine.
To Princes dear, delightful to his friends,
He liv'd on little, yet to mighty ends.

His only failing was too great a propenſity to dice and cock-fighting, which the learned Biſhop Nicolſon would perſuade us to be an ill-grounded calumny (e); but as it is mentioned by Camden (f), as well as ſome other contemporary writers (g), we dare not omit it. Certain it is, that he died in very indifferent circumſtances, as may appear from theſe two inſtances. Firſt, the addreſs of his widow to Sir William Cecil, in her dedication of his Schoolmaſter, wherein ſhe ſays expreſsly, that Mr. Aſcham left her a poor widow with many orphans, and this only to comfort them, that, as his relations, they would be under the protection of that honourable perſon to whom ſhe addreſſes herſelf. Secondly, it appears from Dr. Grant's dedication of Aſcham's letters to Queen Elizabeth; wherein he moſt pathetically recommends to her his pupil, Giles Aſcham, the ſon of our author, telling her, that he had loſt his father who ſhould have taken care of his education, and that he was left poor and without friends, having indeed a mother who had the will, but not the means of affording him ſuch breeding, as the ſon of ſuch a father deſerved. Beſides this ſon he had two others, Dudley and Sturmur, of whom we know little. But as for Giles Aſcham, Lord Burleigh took him under his protection, by whoſe intereſt he was commended to a ſcholarſhip of St. John's, and afterwards by the Queen's mandate, to a fellowſhip of Trinity-college in Cambridge, and was celebrated, as well as his father, for his admirable Latin ſtile in epiſtolary writings (h) [G].

[Since the above article was written, a new edition has been publiſhed, in 1761, in one volume, 4to, of the Engliſh works of our very learned author, by Mr. James Bennett, to which a life of him is prefixed, written by Dr. Samuel Johnſon (i). From this life of Aſcham we ſhall ſelect a few remarks, and alſo make one or two other additional obſervations relative to him and his works. He entered the univerſity about the time of the reſurrection of letters [H]; and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, as hath been already obſerved, when he was only eighteen years of age; " a time of life," ſays Dr. Johnſon, " at which it is more common now to enter the univerſities than to take degrees, " but which, according to the modes of education then in uſe, had nothing of remark- " able prematurity (k)." His deſign in publiſhing his Toxophilus [I], was to vindicate himſelf from the imputation of ſpending too much time in archery, and alſo, as the learned writer juſt mentioned obſerves, " to give an example of diction more natural, " and more truly Engliſh, than was uſed by the common writers of that age, whom he " cenſures for mingling exotic terms with their native language, and of whom he com- " plains, that they were made authors not by ſkill or education, but by arrogance and " temerity.——He has not failed in either of his purpoſes. He has ſufficiently vindicated " archery as an innocent, ſalutary, uſeful, and liberal diverſion [K]; and if his precepts " are of no great uſe, he has only ſhewn by one example among many, how little the " hand can derive from the mind, how little intelligence can contribute to dexterity. In " every art practice is much; in arts manual practice is almoſt the whole. Precept can " at moſt but warn againſt error, it can never beſtow excellence (l)."

(i) That this life was written by Dr. Johnſon is manifeſt from the ſtyle, which cannot eaſily be miſtaken by thoſe who are acquainted with his writings, and it has alſo been publiſhed as his in the Fugitive Pieces printed for T. Davies, vol. i. p. 235. —253.

[G] Admirable Latin ſtile in epiſtolary writings.] As to the Epiſtles of our author, which were alſo a poſthumous work, collected however very ſoon after his death by Mr. Grant, maſter of Weſtminſter ſchool, in order to recommend his ſon, as we have in the text noted, to Queen Elizabeth's favour, let their character be firſt ſeen by Biſhop Nicolſon's account of them, and of their author, and then we will ſpeak of their ſeveral editions. 'Theſe letters, 'ſays that learned Prelate, have, chiefly on account 'of their elegancy, had ſeveral editions. The au-'thor was ſome time an inſtructor in the Latin 'tongue, and afterwards Latin ſecretary to King Ed-'ward VI. Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth; and 'in this latter ſtation, was frequently employed to 'tranſlate ſeveral letters of the then Engliſh mi-'niſters of ſtate, to foreign Princes, Ambaſſadors, 'and other great men. In theſe we have all the 'fine variety of language that is proper, either for 'rendering a petition or complaint the moſt agree-'able, and withal a very great choice of hiſtorical 'matter that is hardly preſerved any where elſe. 'Together with the author's own letters, we have 'a good many that are directed to him, both from 'the moſt eminent foreigners of his time, ſuch as 'Sturmius, Sleidan, &c. and the beſt ſcholars, as 'well as the wiſeſt ſtateſmen of his own country. 'And the publiſher of theſe aſſures us, that he had 'the peruſal of a vaſt number of others in the 'Engliſh tongue, which were highly valuable. His 'attendance on Sir Richard Morriſon, in his Ger-'man embaſſy, gave him an intimate acquaintance 'with the affairs of that country, and the extraor-'dinary freedom and familiarity, with which the 'two Siſter Queens treated him here at home, af-'forded him a perfect knowledge of the moſt ſe-'cret myſteries of ſtate in this kingdom; ſo that 'were the reſt of his papers retrieved, we could not 'perhaps have a more pleaſing view of the main 'Arcana of thoſe reigns, than his writings would 'give us (19).' Mr. Grant's firſt edition came out in 1576; there was another in 1577; a third in 1578; a fourth in 1590, all at London, in 8vo. There were two editions at Hanau, one in 1602, the other in 1610; alſo one at Nurembergh in 1611. The laſt and beſt edition is that of Oxford in 1703, publiſhed by the celebrated Mr. Elſtob, who has added from MSS. many letters, which were not in the former editions; but hath omitted Mr. Aſcham's Poems, which are to be met with in the reſt. Mr. Wood mentions another work of our author's, intitled, Apologia contra Miſſam, &c. i. e. An Apology againſt the Maſs, &c. ſaid to be printed in 1577, in 8vo (20). Some writers mention a treatiſe de Imitatione, but that is included in the laſt edition of his Letters (21). C.

Dr Johnſon remarks, that Aſcham " appears to have been not much qualified for the " improvement of his fortune. His diſpoſition was kind and ſocial; he delighted in the " pleaſures of converſation, and was probably not much inclined to buſineſs. This " may be ſuſpected from the paucity of his writings. He has left little behind him, and " of that little nothing was publiſhed by himſelf but the Toxophilus, and the account of " Germany. The Shoolmaſter was printed by his widow, and the epiſtles were collected " by Grant, who dedicated them to Queen Elizabeth, that he might have an oppor- " tunity of recommending his ſon Giles Aſcham to her patronage."——" Whether he " was poor by his own fault, or the fault of others [L], cannot now be decided; but " it

[H] He entered the univerſity, &c.] ' Aſcham ' entered Cambridge,' ſays Dr. Johnſon, ' at a time ' when the laſt great revolution of the intellectual ' world was filling every academical mind with ar- ' dour or anxiety. The deſtruction of the Conſtan- ' tinopolitan empire had driven the Greeks with their ' language into the interior parts of Europe, the art ' of printing had made the books eaſily attainable, ' and Greek now began to be taught in England. ' The doctrines of Luther had already filled all the ' nations of the Romiſh communion with controverſy ' and diſſenſion. New ſtudies of literature, and new ' tenets of religion, found employment for all who ' were deſirous of truth, or ambitious of fame. ' Learning was at that time proſecuted with that ' eagerneſs and perſeverance, which in this age of ' indifference and diſſipation it is not eaſy to con- ' ceive. To teach or to learn was at once the buſi- ' neſs and the pleaſure of the academical life; and ' an emulation of ſtudy was raiſed by Cheke and ' Smith, to which even the preſent age perhaps owes ' many advantages, without remembering or know- ' ing its benefactors.— Aſcham ſoon reſolved to unite ' himſelf to thoſe who were enlarging the bounds of ' knowledge, and immediately upon his admiſſion ' into the college, applied himſelf to the ſtudy of ' Greek. Thoſe who were zealous for the new ' learning, were often no great friends to the old ' religion; and Aſcham as he became a Grecian, ' became a Proteſtant. The reformation was not ' yet begun, diſaffection to Popery was conſidered as ' a crime juſtly puniſhed by excluſion from favour ' and preferment, and was not yet openly profeſſed, ' though ſuperſtition was gradually loſing its hold ' upon the public. The ſtudy of Greek was reputa- ' ble enough, and Aſcham purſued it with diligence ' and ſucceſs equally conſpicuous (22).'

[I] His deſign in publiſhing his Toxophilus.] This work is written in ſo agreeable a manner, that it may be read with great pleaſure even by thoſe who have little taſte for diverſions of this kind. It abounds with erudition, and with ingenious obſervations on life and manners.

It has been queſtioned whether Aſcham was really addicted to Cock-fighting: but the following paſſage, in his Schoolmaſter, ſeems to be a ſufficient evidence of his attachment to that diverſion. ' Of all kinds ' of paſtimes, fit for a gentleman, I will, God will- ' ing, in fitter place more at large declare fully, in ' my Book of the Cockpit, which I do write to ſatisfy ' ſome, I truſt with ſome reaſon, that be more cu- ' rious in marking other men's doings, than careful ' in mending their own faults*.' It cannot reaſon- ably be ſuppoſed, that Aſcham would have thought of writing on this ſubject, if he had not been ad- dicted to cock-fighting; and it is, perhaps, a cir- cumſtance favourable to his memory, that he did not execute his intended work.

* Bennet's edition of Aſcham's Eng. Works, p. 239.

[K] He has ſufficiently vindicated archery, &c.] Dr. Johnſon obſerves, in the life of Aſcham above referred to, that ' the bow has been ſo long diſuſed, that ' moſt Engliſh readers have forgotten its importance, ' though it was the weapon by which we gained the ' battle of Agincourt, a weapon which when handled ' by Engliſh yeomen, no foreign troops were able ' to reſiſt. We were not only abler of body than ' the French, and therefore ſuperior in the uſe of ' arms, which are forcible only in proportion to the ' ſtrength with which they are handled, but the na- ' tional practice of ſhooting for pleaſure or for prizes, ' by which every man was inured to archery from his ' infancy, gave us inſuperable advantage, the bow ' requiring more practice to ſkilful uſe, than any ' other inſtrument of offence.'

[L] Whether he was poor by his own fault, or the fault of others.] This learned writer in another place intimates, that Queen Elizabeth might be leſs libe- ral to Aſcham, on account of her knowledge of his imprudencies, and that this may be conſidered as an apology for her conduct in this reſpect. But there is the leſs reaſon for admitting this juſtification of Elizabeth, becauſe ſhe is well known to have behav- ed in a manner ſhamefully penurious to ſome of the moſt meritorious of her ſervants. Her conduct to Aſcham may ſo naturally be accounted for by that exceſſive parſimony to which ſhe was addicted, that there can be no neceſſity for ſuppoſing that it aroſe from her knowledge of his want of oeconomy, or from any motive of that kind.

Another obſervation of Dr. Johnſon ſeems to be better founded. He objects to what has been inti- mated by Dr. Campbell, in note [E] of the preced- ing article, that Aſcham owed his ſafety from perſe- cution in the reign of Queen Mary to his innocence and uſefulneſs, that it would have been unpopular to attack a man ſo little liable to cenſure, and that the loſs of his pen could not have been eaſily ſupplied. ' But the truth is,' ſays Dr. J. ' that morality was ' never ſuffered in the days of perſecution to protect ' hereſy; nor are we ſure that Aſcham was more ' clear from common failings than thoſe who ſuffered ' more; and whatever might be his abilities, they ' were not ſo neceſſary but Gardiner could have ' eaſily filled his place with another ſecretary. No- ' thing is more vain than at a diſtant time to examine ' the motives of diſcrimination and partiality; for ' the inquirer having conſidered intereſt and policy, ' is obliged at laſt to omit more frequent and more ' active

" it is certain, that many have been rich with leſs merit. His philological learning " would have gained him honour in any country, and among us it may juſtly call for that " reverence which all nations owe to thoſe who firſt rouſe them from ignorance, and " kindle among them the light of literature. Of his manners nothing can be ſaid but " from his own teſtimony and that of his contemporaries. Thoſe who mention him " allow him many virtues. His courteſy, benevolence, and liberality, are celebrated; " and of his piety we have not only the teſtimony of his friends but the evidence of his " writings (m)."

(m) Ibid. p. 15, 16.

In Mr. Bennet's edition of our author's Engliſh works, are ſome of his letters which were never before printed, from which we ſhall ſelect a few extracts, which will be found in the note [M]. If literary performances were always ſought after in proportion to their merit, there can be no doubt but the works of Aſcham would have paſſed through more editions than they have done. They have, however, been deſervedly held in great eſtimation by the truly learned; and an Upton and a Johnſon have been laudably employed in doing juſtice to his memory, and extending his reputation.

It has been obſerved of Aſcham, that " he loſt no time in the peruſal of mean, or un- " profitable books." This is a remark that deſerves to be attended to; and the conduct of Aſcham, in this reſpect, is worthy of imitation by every ſtudent. Much time may be ſpent in reading to little purpoſe, if men peruſe the authors that may fall into their hands indiſcriminately, without any regular views, and without making any juſt diſtinction between truly valuable authors, and thoſe of inferior merit, or perhaps of no merit at all. More real and uſeful knowledge may be derived from an accurate acquaintance

' active motives of human conduct; caprice, accident, ' and private affections. At that time, if ſome were ' puniſhed, many were forborne; and of many why ' ſhould not Aſcham happen to be one? He ſeems ' to have been calm and prudent, and content with ' that peace which he was ſuffered to enjoy; a mode ' of behaviour that ſeldom fails to produce ſecurity ' (23).'

(23) Life, ubi ſupra, p. 12.

[M] Some letters which were never before printed, &c.] In one of theſe letters, addreſſed to Mr. Raven, fellow of St. John's college in Cambridge, are the following paſſages: ' As I wrote in my laſt letter, ' 3d Oct. we came to Mechlin. I told you at large ' both of the abbey with 1600 nuns, and alſo the ' landgrave (of Heſſe), whom we ſaw priſoner. He ' is luſty, well favoured, ſomething like Mr. Hebil- ' throut in the face; haſty, inconſtant; and to get ' himſelf out of priſon, would fight, if the emperor ' would bid him, with Turk, French, England, ' God, and the Devil. The Emperor perceiving ' his buſy head without conſtancy, handles him ' thereafter: his own Germano, as it is ſaid, being ' well content that he is forthcoming.

' John Frederick is clear contrary, noble, courageous, conſtant, one in all fortunes, deſired of his ' friends, reverenced of his foes, favoured of his ' emperor, loved of all. He hath been proffered of ' late, it is ſaid, by the emperor, that if he will ' ſubſcribe to his proceedings, to go at large, to ' have all his dignities and honour again, and more ' too. His anſwer was from the firſt one, and is ſtill, ' that he will take the emperor for his gracious ſo- ' vereign lord: but to forſake God and his doctrine, ' he will never do, let the emperor do with his body ' what he will.

' At Mechlin we ſaw a ſtrange bird. The emperor ' doth allow it 8d. a day. It is milk-white, greater ' than a ſwan, with a bill ſomewhat like a ſhovel, ' and having a throat well able to ſwallow, without ' grief or touch of creſt, a white penny loaf of Eng- ' land, except your bread be bigger than your bread- ' maſter of St. John's is wont willingly to make it. ' The eyes are as red as fire, and, as they ſay, an ' hundred years old. It was wont in Maximilian's ' days to fly with him whitherſoever he went.

' 4th Octob. we went to Bruſſels, twelve miles. ' In the mid-way is a town called Vilfort, with a ' notable ſtrong hold of the emperor's in it. Trai- ' tors and condemned perſons lie there. At the ' town's end is a notable ſtrong place of execution, ' where worthy Will. Tyndall was unworthily put to ' death. Ye cannot match Bruſſels in England, but ' with London.

' At afternoon, I went about the town. I came ' to the friar Carmelites houſe, where Edward Bil- ' lick was warden; not preſent there, but being ' then at Colen, in another houſe of his, I heard ' their even-ſong: after I deſired to ſee the library. ' A friar was ſent to me, and led me into it. There ' was not one good book but Lyra. The friar was ' learned, ſpoke Latin readily, entered into Greek, ' having a very good wit, and a greater deſire to ' learning. He was gentle, and honeſt; and being a ' Papiſt, and knowing me to be a Proteſtant, yet ' ſhewed me all gentleneſs, and would needs give me ' a new book in verſe, titled De Ruſticitate Morum.

' I have ſeen the emperor twice, firſt ſick in his ' privy-chamber, at our firſt coming. He looked ' ſomewhat like the parſon of Epurſtone. He had a ' gown on of black taffety, and a furred night-cap on ' his head, Dutch-like, having a ſeam over the ' crown.——I ſaw him alſo on St. Andrew's day, ' ſitting at dinner at the feaſt of Golden Fleece; he ' and Ferdinando both under one cloth of eſtate; ' then the prince of Spain; all of one ſide, as the ' knights of the garter do in England; after orderly, ' Mr. Buſſie, maſter of the horſe, Duke d'Alva, a ' Spaniard, Dux Bavariæ, the prince of Piedmont, ' the count of Hardenburgh.

' I ſtood hard by the emperor's table. He had ' four courſes: he had ſod beef very good, roaſt mut- ' ton, baked hare: theſe be no ſervice in England. ' The emperor hath a good face, a conſtant look: he ' fed well of a capon. I have had a better from mine ' hoſteſs Barnes many times in my chamber. He and ' Ferdinando eat together very handſomely, carving ' themſelves where they liſt, without any curioſity. ' The emperor drank the beſt that ever I ſaw; he ' had his head in the glaſs five times as long as any of ' us, and never drank leſs than a good quart at once of ' Rheniſh wine. His chapel ſung wonderful cun- ' ningly all the dinner-while.

In another letter to the ſame gentleman, he ſays, ' England need fear no outward enemies. The luſty ' lads verily be in England. I have ſeen on a ſunday ' more likely men walking in St. Paul's church than ' I ever yet ſaw in Auguſta, where lieth an emperor ' with a garriſon, three kings, a queen, three princes, ' a number of dukes, &c.——I ſtudy Greek apace, ' but no other tongue; for I cannot. I truſt to ſee ' England ſhortly, God willing. I am ſorry that I ' hear no word from Ireland. Commendations to ' you all, becauſe I would leave out none; to Dr. ' Haddon, father Bucer, John Scarlett, mine hoſteſs ' Barnes.'

In another letter he ſays, ' If ye will know how I ' do, I think I ſhall forget all tongues but the Greek ' afore I come home. I have read to my lord ſince I ' came to Auguſta, whole Herodotus, five tragedies, ' three orations of Iſocrates, ſeventeen orations of ' Demoſthenes. For underſtanding of the Italian, I ' am meet well; but ſurely I drink Dutch better than ' I ſpeak Dutch. Tell Mr. D. Maden, I will drink ' with him now a carouſe of wine; and would to God ' he had a veſſel of Rheniſh wine, on condition that ' I paid 40s. for it: and perchance, when I come ' to Cambridge, I will ſo provide here, that every ' year I will have a little piece of Rheniſh wine ' (24).']

ASCOUGH (a) (William), Doctor of Laws, and Biſhop of Saliſbury, in the reign of King Henry VI., was deſcended from a very ancient family, ſeated at Kelſey in Lincolnſhire (b) [A]. He was conſecrated to the aforementioned See in the chapel of Windſor, July 20, 1438: ſoon after which he was appointed the King's Confeſſor, this being the firſt inſtance of a Biſhop's diſcharging that office. The moſt remarkable particular concerning this Prelate was the tragical manner of his death. For after he had ſat near twelve years, the famous rebel Jack Cade and his followers, coming to Edington in Lincolnſhire, where the Biſhop then was, and being joined by ſeveral of that Prelate's own tenants, fell upon his carriages and plundered them, taking away no leſs than ten thouſand merks in money. The next day they aſſaulted the Biſhop himſelf, whilſt he was officiating at the altar, and dragged him away to a neighbouring hill, where they barbarouſly murdered him [B], by daſhing out his brains: then tearing his bloody ſhirt in pieces, to be preſerved in memory of the action, they left his body naked on the place. This maſſacre happened the 29th of June 1450 (c).

[A] He was deſcended from a very ancient family, ſeated at Kelſey in Lincolnſhire.] Dr. Fuller (1) collects this chiefly from Biſhop Aſcough's arms, which, he ſays, he ſaw at Saliſbury, 'With alluſion to the arms 'of that houſe, and ſome epiſcopal addition.' This likeneſs, the Doctor tells us, 'Is with him a better 'evidence, than a ſameneſs of arms would have been, 'knowing (as he expreſſes it) that the Clergy in that 'age delighted to diſguiſe their coats from their pater- 'nal bearing.'

(1) Worthies of England, Lincolnſhire, p. 156.

[B] They barbarouſly murdered him.] Upon the mention of this tragedy, Dr. Fuller (2) gives us the following diſtich:

Sic concuſſa cadit populari Mitra tumultu, Protegat optamus nunc Diadema Deus.

By people's fury Mitre thus caſt down,
We pray henceforward God preſerve the Crown.

(2) Ubi ſupra, p. 157.

Biſhop Godwin is at a loſs for the reaſon of this cruel treatment. Illi quam ob cauſam infenſi non habeo compertum (3). But Dr. Fuller conceives it was 'Be- 'cauſe he was learned, pious, and rich, three capital 'crimes in a clergyman (4)'. The laſt-mentioned circumſtance is ſufficient to account for this horrid tragedy: for it is more than probable they murdered the good Biſhop, the better to ſecure the riches they had robbed him of.

['The tearing the bloody ſhirt to pieces to be pre- 'ſerved in memory of the action,' doth not carry the appearance of its having proceeded from avarice in the murderers. The circumſtance of the Tenants of the Biſhop having joined in the attack, ſeems to point out that he was, though perhaps unjuſtly, held a haughty or cruel maſter.]

ASGILL (John), an ingenious and celebrated writer at the cloſe of the laſt, and the beginning of the preſent century, was deſcended of parents in a middle ſtate of life, who gave him a good education, and then ſent him to London, in order to acquire ſome knowledge of the Laws, whereby he might gain his living. The natural quickneſs of his genius, joined to the good fortune he had of rendering himſelf agreeable to the gentlemen of Lincoln's-Inn, proved the means of recommending him to Mr. Eyre, a very eminent Lawyer, and one of the Judges of the King's-Bench, in the reign of King William (a). Under ſo able a maſter, he quickly acquired a competent knowledge of the Laws, and was thereupon called to the bar, and was ſoon taken notice of, as a riſing man in his profeſſion (b). His talent for politics, and a very uncommon vein of wit and humour, which was diſcovered in two pamphlets he publiſhed in the year 1698, drew the eyes of the world ſtill more upon him, and acquired him the univerſal character of a perſon of extraordinary, though ſingular genius [A]. Dr. Barebone, the famous projector, who built the

[A] Perſon of extraordinary, though ſingular genius.] Of this he afforded the world ſufficient evidence, in the two pamphlets mentioned in the text. The firſt was entitled, Several Aſſertions proved, in order to create another Species of Money than Gold and Silver; the ſecond, An Eſſay on a Regiſtry for Titles of Lands, London, 1698, 12*mo*. This, though written in a humorous ſtile, muſt be allowed to be as ſenſible a piece as was perhaps ever written on that important ſubject, and is become extremely ſcarce. It may not therefore be amiſs to give the reader a ſpecimen, as well of this piece, as of our author's method of handling grave ſubjects in a merry way. His fourth aſſertion runs in theſe words, That all objections made againſt ſuch regiſtry, on account of reducing the practice of the Law, are one good reaſon for it, which he thus proves: 'The practice of the 'Law in civil cauſes is divided into three ſorts; firſt, 'the transferring of titles, which is called Convey- 'ancing. Secondly, the ſhewing forth and defending 'theſe titles in forms of Law, and this is called Plead- 'ing. Thirdly, the arguing upon theſe conveyances 'and pleadings (when they come in conteſt) before 'the Judges, and this is called, Practice at the bar. 'So that the practice of the two latter doth ariſe 'from the errors or incertainties of the former. Were 'the titles of lands, once made certain (which they 'may be by a regiſtry, and no otherwiſe), I know what 'I think of the future gains of the Law: the profit of 'the Law ariſes from the incertainty of property, and 'therefore as property is more reduced to a certainty, 'the profit of the Law muſt be reduced with it, the 'fall of one muſt be the riſing of the other. Actions 'of ſlander and battery, and cauſes on the crown ſide, 'would ſcarce find ſome of the circuiteers periwigs, 'and yet (if we obſerve evidence) they ſtand obliged 'to diſputes in titles for many of theſe. Thief and 'whore, kick and cuff, are very often the effect of 'forcible entries, treſpaſſes, and ſerving of proceſs, in 'which the title comes frequently in queſtion. But 'the reducing this part of the practice of the Law, are 'things not ſeen as yet. The proximus ardet will fall 'upon the conveyancers, and that not by altering the 'forms of legal conveyances, or taking them out of 'their hands, or putting any ſtop to the dealing in 'lands (for that will be increaſed), but by expoſing 'their manner of practice in this conveyancing part of 'the Law. For as it was numbered among the ſins 'of one of the Kings of Iſrael, that he made prieſts of 'the meaneſt of the people; ſo it is the misfortune of 'the people of England, that conveyancers are fre- 'quently made out of old attornies, or noblemens 'leaſe-makers, fumpt up in bar gowns. Two quali- 'fications are neceſſary to a compleat conveyancer. 'Firſt, that he be incapable of diſpatching buſineſs ſo 'faſt as he ſhould; ſecondly, that he doth not diſpatch 'it ſo faſt as he can. Not to ſpeak of bantering their 'clients with their ſeeming care and caution in delay- 'ing their buſineſs, ſhewing great trunks of old writ-

the new ſquare in Lincoln's-Inn, and who, by a multitude of ſchemes, had brought his affairs into a very perplexed ſituation, made choice of Mr. Aſgill, firſt for his friend and counſel, and afterwards for his executor, for a very odd reaſon (c), of which the reader may be informed in the note [B]. His own affairs were a good deal embarraſſed before he took upon him this truſt, which ſerved to increaſe his difficulties not a little; ſo that upon the act for reſuming forfeited eſtates in Ireland, paſſing in the year 1699, and appointing Commiſſioners to hear and determine claims, he reſolved to go over into that iſland (d). Before his departure he publiſhed that ſtrange treatiſe on The Poſſibility of avoiding Death, which made him ſo well known to the world, and which will hinder his being ever forgotten. A treatiſe ſo amazing as to its matter, and dreſſed out in ſuch an unuſual manner, that in all probability it will be ever read, though never believed (e) [C]. On his arrival in Ireland, the favour of the Commiſſioners, and Mr. Aſgill's own merit, got ings in their chamber, calling to their clerks (before them) for one Lord's ſettlement, and another Lady's jointure, to tell what great clients they have: and when they come to be paid, they reckon their fees by longitude and latitude. I have ſeen an original mortgage of one ſkin bred up by a ſcrivener (in ſix years) to one-and-twenty, by aſſigning it every year, and adding one ſkin to every aſſignment, by recitals and covenants. As cows after three years old have one wrinkle added to each horn for every year after, which ſhews their age; and I am informed, that one deed of ſixty ſkins, was heaved out of a conveyancer's office the other day. At this rate, in a little time, the clients muſt drive their deeds out of their lawyers chambers in wheel-barrows. Theſe aſſignments, and re-aſſignments of ſecurities, have been a pretty ſort of perquiſites, eſpecially if they have but an old judgment or ſtatute kept on foot, theſe are certain annual incomes. I knew two Serjeants at Law (uſurers) made it their common practice every long vacation, to ſwop ſecurities with one another, to make their mortgagees pay for the aſſignments; and (doing this without advice of counſel) they once merged an old term, and thereby ſpoiled their title to ſecure their fees; which (as to them) anſwers the character given of theſe graduates by a foreign hiſtorian, Eſt in Regno Angliæ Genus Hominum doctorum indoctiſſimum communiter vocat, The learned Serjeants at Law: Now I cannot think but theſe conveyancers and aſſigners would be aſhamed to produce ſuch things to a regiſtry; and that therefore they muſt either abbreviate their conveyances, or loſe their practice. But whether this regiſtry will make theſe reductions: 1. Of the length of conveyances. 2. The incertainties of titles: and, 3. By conſequence, the other practice in the Law, I cannot tell: however, I hope it, and believe ſome of them fear it. But if the cries of Monks and Friars had been regarded, we had never heard of the diſſolution of monaſteries; and if the clamours of Maſters of Requeſt, Clerks, and Eſcheators, had prevailed, the Court of Wards and Liveries had been ſtanding to this day; and yet, perhaps, moſt of theſe had either purchaſed their places, or were bred up to that part of the Law only (1).' This excellent pamphlet is, amongſt many other curious pieces, preſerved in the large collection of State Tracts in the reign of King William III. (2), where we alſo find another treatiſe in anſwer to ſome objections made to ſuch regiſtry, which by the ſtile ſhould ſeem to be Mr. Aſgill's alſo, only his name is not prefixed, as his manner was to every thing he publiſhed (3).

[B] Of which the reader may be informed in the note.] Dr. Barebone was not only a ſchemiſt, but a humouriſt, which the following ſtory will illuſtrate. He had drawn a gentleman in the city into a building project there, by which he loſt a conſiderable ſum of money. To make him amends, he engaged him in another ſcheme of building in the fields, where he buried the remainder of his fortune. Whether the gentleman had really any foul play, or whether his misfortunes rendered him ſuſpicious, ſo it was, that meeting Barebone in Leiceſter-Fields, he clapt his hand upon his ſword, and bid him draw, Draw, ſaid the Doctor calmly, why, where would you have me draw you, I have already drawn you from one end of the town to the other (4). Such was the man who fixed upon Mr. Aſgill for his executor, and the ſole cauſe he aſſigned for it was, That he ſhould never pay his debts. As ſoon therefore as the teſtator was dead, Mr. Aſgill ſummoned his creditors to Lincoln's-Inn Hall, where he produced the Will, and to avoid drawing things into length, or feeding them with falſe expectations, he made them a very laconick ſpeech. You have heard, gentlemen, the Doctor's teſtament, and I will religiouſly fulfil the will of the dead. The gentleman who furniſhed theſe memoirs rightly obſerves, that the Doctor and the Counſellor reſembled each other ſtrongly, and that there was not, perhaps, ſuch another pair in the three kingdoms. It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that his being Dr. Barebone's executor, gave him an intereſt in the borough of Bramber, for which he ſate as Burgeſs in ſeveral Parliaments (5).

[C] It will be ever read, though never believed.] The title of this treatiſe was, An Argument, proving, That according to the Covenant of eternal Life revealed in the Scriptures, Man may be tranſlated from hence into that eternal Life, without paſſing through Death, although the Human Nature of Chriſt himſelf, could not be thus tranſlated till he had paſſed through Death. It was printed originally in the year 1700, and has been privately reprinted ſeveral years ſince. To give the reader any notion of this piece, in any other than its author's words is impoſſible. Thus then he ſpeaks of it himſelf: 'To them that knew not the reaſon, it looked like a whim, for the man in the Goſpel to walk about the ſtreets with his bed upon his back on the Sabbath-day, while the reſt of the people were at their devotion, and perhaps it may ſeem more odd in me, to bolt out an argument in Divinity (as a bone of contention) into the world, at a time when the reſt of mankind are ſo deeply engaged in ſecular affairs. But he that regardeth the wind will never ſow; and he that waiteth for times and ſeaſons will never do buſineſs. And as that ſeeming whimſical man ſaid to them that reproved him, He that made me whole, the ſame ſaid unto me, take up thy bed and walk: ſo ſay I to them that affront me, He that revealed this unto me, the ſame bad me tell it abroad, as a watch-word to be given out from one to another (every man to his fellow) as faſt as he receives it: Let him that heareth, ſay, come! And having thus delivered my part of the meſſage, I look upon myſelf to have no more to do with it afterwards than you have. But hereby I ſhall know, whether this doctrine be mine or no. If it be mine, it will ſink and fall and die, but if it be his, that I think it is, it will kindle itſelf like a firebrand from one to another, till it hath ſet the world in arms againſt death. And having thus left the deciſion of the truth of it to the ſucceſs, I begin to feel myſelf more eaſy under it. And as the four leprous men ſaid to one another in the gate of Samaria; if we ſit here we are ſure to die with famine, and if we go into the camp of the Syrians, we can but die by the ſword: ſo I have ſaid to myſelf, if I ſubmit to death, I am ſure to die, and if I oppoſe it, I can but be killed and die. And ſhould I be baffled in this eſſay, I can loſe nothing by it, but that little credit with the world which I value not, in compariſon of this attempt. And as thoſe four deſperate men venturing themſelves upon this reſolution, did thereupon find, that they had been before more afraid than hurt; ſo in making this ſally againſt death, methinks I have diſcovered it to be rather a bugbear than an enemy. And therefore as they having filled themſelves with plunder, thought it their duty to go, and tell the news to them that were ready to periſh: So I cannot ſatisfy myſelf to eat my morſel alone, without communicating to them, who I know with myſelf muſt, by reaſon of death, be all their life-time ſubject to bondage. And as their glad tidings of plenty was nevertheleſs welcome to the King and people of Iſrael, for being brought to them by men poor and miſerable;

got him into excellent practice. The whole nation almoſt was then engaged in law-ſuits, and among theſe, there were few conſiderable ones in which Mr. Aſgill was not retained on one ſide or other; ſo that in a very ſhort ſpace of time, he became maſter of a conſiderable fortune, which, however, inſtead of making him happy, became his ruin. He purchaſed a large eſtate for the life of Nicholas Brown, Eſq; commonly called Lord Viſcount Kenmare (f), having been ſo created by King James II. This eſtate, which was worth about three thouſand five hundred pounds a year, he bought for a very ſmall conſideration, in truſt, as it was ſuggeſted, for the family of that unfortunate Lord. The intereſt this eſtate gave him, occaſioned Mr. Aſgill's being elected a member of the Houſe of Commons in Ireland, an honour which he did not long enjoy. He was in Munſter when the ſeſſions began, and before he could get to Dublin, he was informed, that, upon a complaint, the Houſe had voted his book to be a blaſphemous libel, and had ordered it to be burnt: however, he ventured to take his ſeat in the Houſe, where he ſat juſt four days, when he was expelled for his performance (g). We have an account of this matter given by himſelf, which is a very fair one, and will certainly divert the reader [D]. His affairs made him very uneaſy in Ireland, where he involved himſelf in various ſuits, with the unfortunate Lord Kenmare's family, notwithſtanding he married his daughter, a lady of diſtinguiſhed beauty and merit, and for whom Mr. Aſgill had a moſt tender affection (h). In order to deliver himſelf from theſe troubles, he diſpoſed of part of his intereſt, which created freſh diſputes, and a new train of law-ſuits. His expulſion ſeems to have been in the year 1703, and in 1705 he returned into England, where he was choſen a member for the borough of Bramber in the county of Suſſex, and ſat without diſpute or interruption for ſeveral years (i). But in an interval of privilege in 1707, being taken in execution at the ſuit of Mr. Holland, he was committed to the Fleet. The Houſes meeting in November, Mr. Aſgill applied, and on the ſixteenth of December he was demanded out of cuſtody by a Serjeant at Arms with the mace, and the next day took his ſeat in the Houſe. Between his application and his diſcharge, complaint was made to the Houſe, of the Treatiſe ſo often mentioned, and a Committee was appointed to

'miſerable; ſo if my news be true in itſelf, why 'ſhould it fare the worſe for being told by the greateſt 'of ſinners? And perhaps this qualifies me to be the 'meſſenger, leſt one more holy ſhould ſeem to be ho'noured with it for his own perſonal ſanctity. I re'member a ſudden retort once given me by a Lady '(to whom I excuſed this my emulation by the exam'ple of Enoch), but you are not ſo good as he was; 'for Enoch walked with God. And this might have 'puzzled me, had not Paul (in his liſt of worthies) 'counted upon the tranſlation of Enoch, as done by 'faith: By faith Enoch was tranſlated, that he ſhould 'not ſee death. Why then, if I have as good a faith 'for this purpoſe as he had, I am in this point (quoad 'hoc) as good a man as he was, though I fall ſhort of 'him, in all his other qualities. Nor is it to be ex'pected, that any aſſembly of divines ſhould be em'ployed in ſuch a buſineſs as this. They incloſe them'ſelves within the pale of their own Church, and who'ever breaks through that fence, is proſecuted as a 'treſpaſſer upon their juriſdiction. And thus the Jew'iſh prieſts excommunicated a layman for teaching 'them religion, Thou waſt altogether born in ſin, and 'doſt thou teach us? and they caſt him out. But he 'that had opened his eyes took him in. And ſuch an 'exchange I ſhould reckon no great misfortune. But 'is it not a ſhame, that this Enoch in the beginning 'of time, ſo long before the receipt of the promiſe, 'ſhould attain to that faith in Chriſt, which we, that 'have ſeen him crucified before our eyes, think a ſin 'to offer at? But having been tempted to commit this 'ſin (like a true mother child of my grand parent 'Eve), I would tempt my friends to do ſo too. 'And all I aſk of them is this; having abſtracted the 'ſtudy of ſeven years recluſe into leſs than two hours 'reading, I only deſire the peruſal of it at a time of 'leiſure, when men and women deſign to be ſerious, 'and think moſt for themſelves. And then I flatter 'myſelf, that they will find it not the moſt unpleaſant 'hour that ever they ſpent in their life. For this I 'know, that nothing is more pleaſant to us than 'news; and what I have ſaid, was never ſaid by 'man before. And this I know, that (notwith'ſtanding the defection of our natures) nothing is 'more pleaſant to man than truth. And what I 'have ſaid is true. And a truth that all the gain'ſayers ſhall not be able to reſiſt, though it be in 'contradiction to the moſt received truth in the world, 'That all men muſt die (6).' It is ſcarcely to be conceived how great a noiſe this ſmall tract raiſed, and how general an outcry was made againſt its author. The Rev. Dr. Sacheverell mentioned it among other blaſphemous writings, which induced him to think the Church in danger (7). The poets too were very hard upon Mr. Aſgill; and what is not a little ſtrange, almoſt all the world concluded that Mr. Aſgill muſt be an Atheiſt, becauſe he had taken ſo much pains about religion. The truth ſeems to be, that he was a violent Enthuſiaſt, and having ſtudied the Scriptures in his mother tongue, and without conſulting any commentators, in conſequence of which he frequently miſtook their meaning; this led him to believe ſo much, that thoſe who believed leſs, in order to vindicate themſelves, would needs have it, that he did not believe at all. To ſupport what has been ſaid, as well as to gratify the curioſity of the reader, it will be neceſſary to add, in other notes, a ſpecimen or two of that wit, which Mr. Aſgill's book occaſioned.

[D] Will certainly divert the reader.] This we find in a tract of the author's, publiſhed in the year 1712. 'Having,' ſays he, 'condemned and executed 'the book without hearing me, there was nothing 'left between that, and my expulſion, but to prove 'me the author; which no one can think I intend'ed to diſown, when I had publiſhed it with my 'name to it. Yet, as it happened, I had then an 'opportunity to put them upon the proof of it. 'The Printer having ſold off his firſt edition, broke 'the preſs. And the demands for more putting him 'upon a ſecond, he committed in that, above thirty 'errata's from the firſt. And my accuſer in Ireland, '(who, I hear, is ſince promoted to be Secretary to the 'French prophets) having one of this ſecond edition 'in his hand, demanded of me a categorical anſwer, 'whether I was the author? To which I replied, that 'I was author of a treatiſe written upon that argu'ment; but that if I muſt be categorical, what he 'then ſhewed me, was not a print from my copy. 'And therefore, ſince he had accuſed me of (a crime 'higher than high-treaſon) blaſphemy; I did demand 'it, as the juſtice of the houſe, that they would not 'admit any leſs evidence to convict me of this crime, 'than if I ſtood indicted of high-treaſon. Upon this, 'up ſtood two volunteer evidence. The firſt a gentle'man of the Law, who at my coming to Ireland '(about three years before) had invited me to dine 'with him at his own houſe (where I never was either 'before or after). And his evidence was, That 'there was then ſome jocular diſcourſe about a book. 'The other was a member (with whom I had a ſuit of 'law) and his evidence was, That I had turned about 'upon my heel, and ſaid I had wrote a book, and did 'not care who knew it. And upon this evidence, I 'was expelled that houſe for blaſphemy (8).'

examine it. Of this Committee, Edward Harley, Eſq; was Chairman, who made a report, That the book contained ſeveral blaſphemous expreſſions, and ſeemed to be intended to expoſe the Scriptures. Thurſday the eighteenth of September, 1707, was appointed for him to make his defence, which he did with infinite wit and ſpirit; but inaſmuch as he ſtill continued to maintain the aſſertions he had laid down in that Treatiſe, he was expelled (k) [E]. Many have ſurmiſed, and indeed Mr. Aſgill himſelf was of opinion, that though his book was made the handle, yet his circumſtances were the true cauſe of his being thus ſeverely treated. It was indeed the firſt ſeſſion of the firſt Parliament of Great Britain, and the memoirs I have ſuggeſt, that ſeveral of the North Britiſh members were ſcandalized at a perſon's ſitting in the Houſe, and diſpoſing of other folk's property, who, by his lying in priſon, had viſibly no property of his own (l). Thenceforward Mr. Aſgill's affairs grew worſe and worſe. He retired firſt to the Mint, and then became a priſoner in the King's-Bench, removed himſelf thence to the Fleet, and in the rules of one or other of theſe priſons continued thirty years, during which time he publiſhed a multitude of ſmall political pamphlets, which were moſt of them well received [F]. He alſo drew bills and anſwers, and did other buſineſs in his profeſſion with great dexterity. He had ſomething extremely ſingular in his perſon, his air, his dreſs, and his manner of ſpeaking. His converſation was inexpreſſibly lively and entertaining, and his vivacity continued, in ſpite of old age and infirmities, to the laſt. He had a very unaccountable contempt for money, parting with it very readily on all occaſions, though he acquired it hardly. The death of his wife affected him more than all the reſt of his misfortunes (m) [G]. But even the ſenſe of this he wore off by degrees, and continued a boon

[E] He was expelled.] Out of the long defence of Mr. Aſgill, wherein he accounts for this notion coming into his head, his writing a treatiſe to ſupport it, and his publiſhing that treatiſe when it was written, it will be neceſſary to ſelect only one paſſage, becauſe therein we have his anſwer to the charge brought againſt him, and the moſt material evidence to juſtify that character which we have given of him. 'I find,' ſays he, 'the report of the Committee is not levelled at 'the argument itſelf which I have advanced; nor yet 'againſt the treatiſe I have publiſhed to prove it: But 'againſt ſome expreſſions I have uſed in that proof, 'and which I intend to give particular anſwers to. 'But there is ſomething elſe laid to my charge (as my 'deſign in publiſhing that argument) of higher con'cern to me, than any expreſſions in the treatiſe, or 'any cenſure that can fall on me for it. As if I had 'wrote it with a malicious intention to expoſe the 'Scriptures as falſe, becauſe they ſeemed to contain 'what I have aſſerted. And that therefore, if that aſ'ſertion did not hold true, the Scripture muſt be falſe. 'Now, whether this was my intention or no, there is 'but one witneſs in heaven or earth can prove, and 'that is he that made me, and in whoſe preſence I 'now ſtand; and who is able to ſtrike me dead in 'my place. And to him I now appeal, for the 'truth of what I proteſt againſt: That I never did 'write or publiſh that Argument or Treatiſe upon it, 'with any intention to expoſe the Scriptures. But, 'on the contrary (though I was aware that I might 'be liable to that cenſure, and which I knew not 'how to avoid), I did both write and publiſh it, 'under a firm belief of the truth of the Scriptures: 'And with a belief (under that), that what I have 'aſſerted in that Argument is within that truth. 'And if it be not, then I am miſtaken in my Ar'gument, and the Scripture remains true: Let God 'be true, and every man a liar. And having made 'this proteſtation, I am not much concerned, whe'ther I am believed in it or no. I had rather tell 'a truth, than be believed in a lie at any time. 'But having made this proteſt againſt an accuſation, 'greater than the charge in the report, it is time 'for me to come to the report itſelf. But by what 'I apprehend from the nature of the exceptions 'thereby taken, I may firſt offer one general anſwer 'to moſt, if not all, of them, before I deſcend to 'particulars. I do own, that, in that Treatiſe (the 'ſubject whereof relates to eternal ſalvation), I have 'uſed ſome familiar expreſſions of common things, 'which I did with intent to be ſooner read, and 'more readily underſtood: All men in the world 'being (in this thing) like children, moſt affected 'with what is ſpoken in their own dialect. From 'whence any one of our Saviour's ſhort parables, 'in comparing the kingdom of God to ſmall and 'trivial things, hath proved more inſtructive in re'ligion and morality, than all the works and ora'tions of the learned philoſophers (9).' To this let us add, an account of his expulſion from an impartial writer. There was, ſays he, one Mr. John Aſgill, a Member of the Houſe of Commons, who, at the opening of this ſeſſion of Parliament, was unhappily laid under execution in the Fleet priſon; and his adverſary Mr. Holland, a Staffordſhire gentleman, being apprehenſive leſt he might plead his privilege, he petitioned the Houſe, that he might not be allowed it, till he had made juſt ſatisfaction for the debt he owed him. Now the Houſe having appointed a Committee to examine this affair, and Mr. Aſgill having ſome years before publiſhed a pamphlet, entitled, An Argument, &c. this, inſtead of the matter of privilege, was wiſely made a handle to expel him the Houſe; which, when Mr. Aſgill, who was then in the Houſe, ſaw would unavoidably befal him, he went out, and by a ſtratagem made his eſcape from thoſe that lay in wait for him at the door (10).

[F] Which were moſt of them well received.] It would be a very difficult thing, to attempt making an exact catalogue of Mr. Aſgill's writings, ſince there were few public diſputes after his expulſion, in which he did not take a ſhare. The moſt conſiderable of his works, however, which have not been already taken notice of, are theſe, De Jure Divino, or, an Aſſertion, That the Title of the Houſe of Hanover to the Succeſſion of the Britiſh Monarchy (on failure of Iſſue of her preſent Majeſty) is a Title hereditary and of divine Inſtitution, 1710, 8vo. Mr. Aſgill's Defence on his Expulſion, to which are added an Introduction and Poſtſcript, 1712, 8vo. Of the firſt pamphlet there were ſeveral editions: however, not long after it was publiſhed, he ſent abroad another treatiſe, under the title of, Mr. Aſgill's Apology for an Omiſſion in his late Publication, in which are contained Summaries of all the Acts made for ſtrengthening the Proteſtant Succeſſion, for which Mr. Aſgill was a ſtrenuous advocate. Another pamphlet of his was, The Pretender's Declaration abſtracted from Two anonymous Pamphlets: The one entitled, Jus Sacrum; the other, Memoirs of the Chevalier de St. George, with Memoirs of Two other Chevaliers in the Reign of Henry VII., 1713, 8vo. The Succeſſion of the Houſe of Hanover vindicated, againſt the Pretender's ſecond Declaration in folio, entitled, The Hereditary Right of the Crown of England aſſerted, &c. 1714, 8vo. This was in anſwer to Mr. Bedford's famous book, and indeed the beſt anſwer it ever had; for Mr. Aſgill was a good lawyer, and knew better what he was about than that Rev. Divine, or any of his aſſiſtants. The Pretender's Declaration from Plombiers, 1714, engliſhed, with a Poſtſcript before it, in relation to Dr. Leſley's Letter ſent after it, 1715, 8vo. Beſides theſe he wrote An Eſſay for the Preſs. The Metamorphoſes of Man. Aſgill againſt Wolſton, and many other things.

if we will take his own word for it. In the poſtſcript to his defence he writes thus: 'Under this confinement God hath been alſo pleaſed to take away the deſire of mine eyes with a ſtroke, which hath (however) drowned all my other troubles at once (for the leſs are merged in the greater). Qui venit hic fluctus, fluctus ſupereminet omnes. And ſince I have mentioned her, I'll relate this of her. She having been educated a Proteſtant of the Church of England, by a Lady her grandmother (her immediate parents, and other relations being Roman Catholics), an honeſt gentleman of that perſuaſion, who knew her family, preſented her (while ſhe was my fellow-priſoner) with a large folio volume (being the Hiſtory of the Saints canonized in that Church), for her reading; with intention (as I found) to incline her that way. With which (delighting in reading) ſhe entertained herſelf till ſhe had gone through it. And ſome time after that ſhe told me, that ſhe had before ſome thoughts towards that religion; but that the reading that hiſtory had confirmed her againſt it. And in truth, were I to preſcribe an antidote againſt Popery, I can't think of a better, than to have that legend reprinted, and read in Proteſtant churches. And yet ſhe would never read the book I was expelled for, till after my laſt expulſion. But then reading it through, told me ſhe was reconciled to the reaſons of it, though ſhe could not ſay ſhe believed it. However, ſhe ſaid ſomething of her own thoughts with it, that hath given me the ſatisfaction that ſhe is dead in Chriſt, and thereby ſure of her part in the firſt reſurrection: The dead in Chriſt ſhall ariſe firſt. And this Pars deceſſa mei leaving me half dead (while ſhe remains in the grave) hath ſince drawn me (in diving after her) into a nearer view, and more familiar (though more unuſual) thoughts of that firſt reſurrection, than ever I had before (13)' This Lady, for whom Mr. Aſgill expreſſes ſo much tenderneſs and reſpect, is ſaid to have broke her heart on account of the misfortunes of her family, which were chiefly owing to her huſband's management.

(13) Defence on his expulſion, p. 60.

[Though Mr. Aſgill was an ingenious man, the character given of him, in the preceding article, is carried too high. It is by no means true, that his Treatiſe on the Poſſibility of avoiding Death will, in all probability, be for ever read; for it ſeems, at preſent, to be almoſt ſunk into oblivion: and I know, from experience, that the peruſal of this abſurd and fantaſtical performance (the novelty of its doctrine being now over), is tedious and diſagreeable. It is no otherwiſe deſerving of notice, than as it ſhews to what lengths a perſon may be led by enthuſiaſm. That Mr. Aſgill was an Enthuſiaſt, and not an unbeliever, is evident from his ſolemn declarations, inſerted in the note [E]. The buſtle that was made about his writings, and the perſecutions raiſed againſt him, are much to the diſhonour of the times in which he lived. If his deſign was unfavourable to Revelation, he was capable of being eaſily confuted. As a ſincere Enthuſiaſt, he ought only to have excited contempt or pity. It was, therefore, ridiculous to ſee the Houſes of Commons, in Ireland and England, employed on ſo inſignificant an object. It is happy that the good ſenſe of the preſent age thinks the publications, whether of Infidels or Enthuſiaſts, worthy of no other regard than what may be paid to them by individuals, with a view of refuting them.] K.

ASHLEY (ROBERT), a Wiltſhire gentleman (a), deſcended from the family of that name reſiding at Naſhhill in that county, was admitted a gentleman-commoner of Hart-Hall in Oxford, in the year 1580, being then fifteen years of age. From the univerſity he removed to the Middle-Temple, where he was called to the dignity of Barriſter at Law. After ſome time, he travelled into Holland, France, &c. [A], converſing with the learned, and frequenting the public libraries. Being returned into England, he lived many years in the Middle-Temple, and honoured the commonwealth of learning with ſeveral of his lucubrations. He died in a good old age, the beginning of October, 1641, and was buried in the Temple-Church, the fourth day of the ſame month. He gave ſeveral books to that Society. We ſhall mention ſome of his works in the remark [B]. B.

The ſame author tells us, Mr. Aſhley returned from his travels, a very knowing and complete gentleman (2).

ASHMOLE (ELIAS), an eminent Philoſopher, Chemiſt, and Antiquary, of the laſt century, and founder of the noble Muſæum at Oxford, which ſtill bears his name (a). He was the only ſon of Mr. Simon Aſhmole, of the city of Litchfield, in Staffordſhire, Sadler, by Anne, the daughter of Mr. Anthony Boyer, of Coventry, in Warwickſhire, Woollen-Draper (b). He was born May 23, 1617, a little after three in the morning, as himſelf informs us, with other particulars relating to his tender years, which for their ſingularity he thought worth remembering (c) [A]. It happened that his mother's ſiſter was married

[A] Which for their ſingularity he thought worth remembering.] As this gentleman had a very ſtrong turn to Aſtrology, he was ſingularly nice in his dates, and I am apt to think, the minuteneſs of ſuch remarks in many old diaries is owing to the ſame cauſe. The following circumſtances from our author's diary, are ſuch as married to James Paget, Esq; Puisne Baron of the Exchequer, and his second son Thomas being extremely fond of his cousin Ashmole, proved the cause of his future preferment, which our author gratefully recorded both in his memory and diary (d). On this gentleman's motion he was taught Music as well as Grammar, and having a genius thereto, succeeded so well, as to become a Chorister in the cathedral at Litchfield. When he had attained the age of sixteen, young Mr. Ashmole was sent for up to London, and taken into Baron Paget's family (e). In the month of June, 1634, he lost his father, of whom he has left us a very modest and candid character [B]. He continued for some years after in his dependance on the Paget family, during which time he made a considerable progress in the Law, and spent his leisure hours in perfecting himself in Music and other genteel accomplishments (f). In the year 1638, he settled himself in the world, and on the twenty-seventh of March, married Eleanor, daughter of Mr. Peter Manwaring, of Smallwood, in the county Palatine of Chester, and in Michaelmas term the same year, became a Solicitor in Chancery (g). On the eleventh of February, 1641, he was sworn an Attorney of the Court of Common Pleas (h), and on the fifth of December, in the same year, he lost his wife, who died suddenly, and of whom he has left us a very natural and affectionate memorial [C]. The troubles coming on, he retired from London, agreeable to his principles, being always a zealous and steady Loyalist, and on the ninth of May, 1645, he became one of the gentlemen of the ordnance in the garrison at Oxford (i), from whence he removed to Worcester, where he was Commissioner, Receiver, and Register of the Excise, became soon after Captain in the Lord Ashley's regiment, and Comptroller of the ordnance (k). In the midst of all this business he was far from neglecting his studies. On the contrary, having entered himself of Brazen-Nose-college, in Oxford, he applied himself vigorously to the sciences, but more particularly to Natural Philosophy, Mathematics, and Astronomy; and his intimate acquaintance with Mr., afterwards Sir George Wharton, gave him a turn to Astrology, which was in those days in greater credit than now (l). In the month of July, 1646, he lost his mother, who had always been a very kind parent to him, and for whom he had a very pious regard, as appears by the fair account he has given of her in his diary [D]. On the sixteenth of October the same year, he was elected a brother of the ancient and honourable society of Free and Accepted Masons (m), which he looked upon as were collected for rectifying the scheme of his nativity when he first studied that art; and I am inclined to believe, that he then began to keep so exact an account of his actions. 'I was born the 23d of May, '1617 (and as my dear and good mother hath often 'told me), near half an hour after three o'clock in the 'morning. When I rectified my nativity, An. 1647, I 'found it to be eight hours and 25 minutes, 49 seconds, 'A. M. the quarter 38 of ♊ ascending. But upon 'Mr. Lilly's rectification thereof, Anno 1667, he 'makes the quarter 36 ascending. I was baptised the '2d of June following, at St. Mary's church in Litch-'field; my Godfathers were Mr. Christopher Baxter, 'one of the Proctors of the Bishop's Court, and Mr. 'Thomas Offey, Sacrist of the cathedral church. Be-'fore I was carried to church, it was agreed my name 'should be Thomas (as was my grandfather). But 'when the minister had name the child, my godfather 'Offey answered Elias, at which his partners wonder-'ed, and being (at their return home) asked why he so 'called me, he could render no account, but that it 'came suddenly into his mind by a more than ordi-'nary impulse of spirit. My godmother's name was 'Mrs. Bridges. When I was about a year old, and sat 'by the fire, I fell into it, and burned the right side of 'my forehead; it resting upon the iron bar of the 'grate (of which a scar always remained), but my 'good mother being near, presently took me up and 'applied something for the cure. I had the small-pox '(yet but few), as also the swine-pox and measles, 'when I was young, but know not the certain time of 'either. Being about eight or ten years old (but the 'year I cannot remember), my mother and I were in-'vited to my cousin Blackburn's in Longparish: at 'that time they were building a barn, and I getting 'up by ladders, to the top thereof, fell down; in 'which fall the inside of my right knee struck against 'the edge of a great beam, which thereby received a 'great triangular gash, of which I lay a long time 'before I was cured (1).'

(1) Ashmole's Diary, p. 2, 3.

[B] A very modest and candid character.] It is generally allowed our author penned his diary for private use, and never intended it for public inspection. But why so? Did he set down his father and mother's names for fear he should forget them? Or is it not more probable, that he committed these particulars to writing, that they might be preserved and read? I therefore commend him for speaking so of his father, as to render his best qualities conspicuous, at the same time he throws a decent veil of obscurity over the rest: '1634 my father died about eleven o'clock before 'noon: Mr. Simon Martin's letter, who gave me 'notice of his death, bears date the 22d of June. 'My father was born upon a Whitsunday in the morn-'ing, he was bred up by his father to his trade. Yet 'when he came to man's estate, followed it but little. 'He more affected war than his profession, and spent 'many of his years abroad, which drew on him a 'course of expences and ill husbandry. His first voy-'age was into Ireland with Robert Earl of Essex, anno '1599.—Two other voyages he afterwards made with 'his son Robert Earl of Essex, into the Palatinate, 'from whom he received good respect. He was an 'honest fair conditioned man, and kind to others; 'yet through ill husbandry became a great enemy to 'himself and poor family (2).'

(2) Ibid. p. 4, 5.

[C] A very natural and affectionate memorial.] It appears by the diary, that in the summer of 1641, Mr. Ashmole and his wife were in the country together, and that he came up to London without her, because she was with child. A maid of his died the same year of the plague; but whether his wife died of the same distemper is uncertain. His entry concerning her death runs thus: 'December 5, My dear wife fell suddenly 'sick about evening and died (to my own grief and 'the grief of all her friends), she was buried the next 'night about 9 o'clock in Atburry church in Cheshire, 'near the entrance of the south isle of that church, 'viz. the west end of that isle. December 14, I went 'from London towards Cheshire, 16th arriving at 'Litchfield, I first heard of my wife's death: she was a 'virtuous, modest, careful, and loving wife, her affec-'tion was exceeding great towards me, as was mine to 'her, which caused us to live so happy together. Nor 'was I less beloved and esteemed both by her father 'and mother, insomuch as at her funeral her mother 'sitting near the corps, with tears professed to the Ba-'ron of Kinderton's Lady (who after told it to me), 'and others present, that she knew not whether she 'loved me or her only son better (3).'

(3) Ibid. p. 9.

[D] The fair account he has given of her in his diary.] At the time of her demise, he was besieged in Worcester. His entry on hearing the news of her death, runs in the following terms, 'July 31, 1646, 'Mr.

upon as a very diſtinguiſhing character, and has therefore given us a very particular account of the lodge eſtabliſhed at Warrington in Lancaſhire; and in ſome of his manuſcripts, there are very valuable collections relating to the hiſtory of the Free Maſons [E]. The King's affairs being now grown deſperate, Mr. Aſhmole withdrew himſelf, after the ſurrender of the garriſon of Worceſter, into Cheſhire, where he continued till the end of October, and then came up to London, where he became acquainted with Mr., afterwards Sir Jonas Moore, Mr. William Lilly, and Mr. John Booker, eſteemed the greateſt Aſtrologers in the world, by whom he was careſſed, inſtructed, and received into their fraternity, which then made a very conſiderable figure, as appeared by the great reſort of perſons of diſtinction to their annual feaſt, of which Mr. Aſhmole was afterwards elected Steward (n). In 1647 he went down into Berkſhire, where he made choice of the pleaſant village of Englefield, for the place of his retirement. There he purſued his ſtudies very cloſely, and having ſo fair an opportunity, and the advantage of ſome very able maſters, he often went a Simpling, and very ſoon became an eminent Botaniſt; for it was the peculiar felicity of this man's genius, that he ſpeedily attained whatever he attempted (o). Here, as appears from his own remarks, he enjoyed in privacy the ſweeteſt moments of his life, the ſenſation of which perhaps was quickened, by his juſt idea of the badneſs of the times (p). It was in this retreat that he became

' Mr. Richard Harriſon miniſter of Tettnal formerly, ' and afterwards of Litchfield, told me of my mother's ' death, and that ſhe died about the 8th or 9th of July ' of the Plague, not long before, that city being vi- ' ſited this ſummer. She was a diſcreet, ſober, provi- ' dent woman, and with great patience endured many ' afflictions. Her parents had given her exceeding good ' breeding, and ſhe was excellent at her needle, which ' (my father being improvident) ſtood her in great ' ſtead. She was competently read in Divinity, Hiſto- ' ry, and Poetry, and was continually inſtilling into my ' ears, ſuch religious and moral precepts as my younger ' years were capable of; nor did ſhe ever fail to cor- ' rect my faults, always adding ſharp reproofs and ' good lectures to boot: ſhe was much eſteemed by ' perſons of note with whom ſhe was acquainted, ſhe ' lived in much friendſhip among her neighbours, and ' left a good name behind her; in fine, ſhe was truly ' religious and virtuous (4).'

(4) Ibid. p. 15.

[E] Collections relating to the hiſtory of Free-Maſons.] He made very large collections on almoſt all points relating to Engliſh hiſtory, of which ſome large volumes are remaining at Oxford, but much more was conſumed in the fire at the Temple (5), which will be hereafter mentioned. What is hinted above, is taken from a book of letters, communicated to the author of this life, by Dr. Knipe, of Chriſt-church, in one of which is the following paſſage relating to this ſubject. ' As to the ancient ſociety of Free-Ma- ' ſons, concerning whom you are deſirous of know- ' ing what may be known with certainty, I ſhall ' only tell you, that if our worthy brother, E. Aſh- ' mole, Eſq; had executed his intended deſign, our ' fraternity had been as much obliged to him as ' the brethren of the moſt noble Order of the Garter. ' I would not have you ſurpriſed at this expreſſion, or ' think it at all too aſſuming. The Sovereigns of ' that order have not diſdained our fellowſhip, and ' there have been times when Emperors were alſo ' Free-Maſons. What from Mr. E. Aſhmole's collec- ' tion I could gather, was, that the report of our ' Society's taking riſe from a Bull granted by the Pope, ' in the reign of Henry III., to ſome Italian Ar- ' chitects, to travel over all Europe, to erect chapels, ' was ill-founded (6). Such a Bull there was, and thoſe ' Architects were Maſons; but this Bull, in the opi- ' nion of the learned Mr. Aſhmole, was confirmative ' only, and did not by any means create our frater- ' nity, or even eſtabliſh them in this kingdom. But ' as to the time and manner of that eſtabliſhment, ' ſomething I ſhall relate from the ſame collections. ' St. Alban, the Proto-Martyr of England, eſtabliſhed ' Maſonry here, and from his time it flouriſhed more ' or leſs, according as the world went, down to the ' days of King Athelſtane, who, for the ſake of his ' brother Edwin, granted the Maſons a charter; ' though, afterwards growing jealous of his brother, ' it is ſaid, he cauſed him together with his Page, to ' be put into a boat and committed to the ſea, where ' they periſhed (7). It is likely that Maſons were ' affected by his fall, and ſuffered for ſome time; ' but afterwards their credit revived, and we find ' under our Norman Princes, that they frequently re- ' ceived extraordinary marks of royal favour. There ' is no doubt to be made, that the ſkill of Maſons, ' which was always tranſcendent, even in the moſt ' barbarous times, their wonderful kindneſs and at- ' tachment to each other, how different ſoever in ' condition, and their inviolable fidelity in keeping ' religiouſly their ſecret, muſt expoſe them in igno- ' rant, troubleſome, and ſuſpicious times, to a vaſt ' variety of adventures, according to the different ' fate of parties, and other alterations in government. ' By the way, I ſhall note, that the Maſons were al- ' ways loyal, which expoſed them to great ſeverities ' when power wore the trappings of juſtice, and ' thoſe who committed treaſon, puniſhed true men ' as traitors. Thus in the third year of the reign ' of Henry VI., an Act of Parliament paſſed to aboliſh ' the Society of Maſons (8), and to hinder, under ' grievous penalties, the holding chapters, lodges, or ' other regular aſſemblies. Yet this Act was after- ' wards repealed, and even before that King Henry ' VI., and ſeveral of the principal Lords of his ' court became fellows of the Craft (9). Under the ' ſucceeding troubleſome times, the Free-Maſons ' through this kingdom became generally Yorkiſts, ' which as it procured them eminent favour from Ed- ' ward IV., ſo the wiſe Henry VII., thought it bet- ' ter by ſhewing himſelf a great lover of Maſons to ' obtrude numbers of his friends on that worthy ' fraternity, ſo as never to want ſpies enough in ' their lodges, than to create himſelf enemies, as ſome ' of his predeceſſors had done by an ill-timed per- ' ſecution (10). As this Society has been ſo very ' ancient, as to riſe almoſt beyond the reach of re- ' cords, there is no wonder that a mixture of fable ' is found in its hiſtory; and methinks it had been ' better, if a late inſidious writer had ſpent his ' time in clearing up the ſtory of St. Alban, or the ' death of Prince Edwin, either of which would ' have found him ſufficient employment, than as he ' has done in degrading a Society with whoſe foun- ' dation and tranſactions he is viſibly ſo very lit- ' tle acquainted (11), and with whoſe hiſtory and con- ' duct Mr. Aſhmole, who underſtood them ſo much ' better, was perfectly ſatisfied, &c. (12).' I ſhall add to this letter, as a proof, of its author's being exactly right as to Mr. Aſhmole, a ſmall note from his diary, which ſhews his attention to this Society, long after his admiſſion, when he had time to weigh, examine, and know the value of the Maſons ſecret (13).

acquainted with a fair Lady, whom he afterwards married, though the proſpect of that marriage had very near coſt him his life. This Lady's name was Mary, ſole daughter of Sir William Forſter, of Aldermarſton, in the county of Berks, Bart. who was firſt married to Sir Edward Stafford, after his deceaſe to one Mr. Hamlyn, and laſtly to Sir Thomas Mainwaring, Knt. Recorder of Reading, and one of the Maſters in Chancery. Mr. Humphrey Stafford, her ſecond ſon, had ſuch a diſlike to this match, that when Mr. Aſhmole was very ill, he broke into his chamber, and if he had not been prevented, would have murdered him (q). In the latter end of 1648, Lady Mainwaring conveyed to him her eſtate at Bradfield, which was ſoon after ſequeſtered on account of Mr. Aſhmole's loyalty; but the intereſt he had with William Lilly, and ſome others of that party, enabled him to get that ſequeſtration taken off (r). On the ſixteenth of November, 1649, he married Lady Mainwaring, upon which he ſettled in London, and his houſe became the receptacle of the moſt learned and ingenious perſons that flouriſhed at that time (s). It was by their converſation, that Mr. Aſhmole, who had been more fortunate in worldly affairs than moſt ſcholars are, and who had been always a curious collector of manuſcripts, was drawn to think of publiſhing a treatiſe written by Dr. Arthur Dee, relating to the Philoſopher's ſtone, together with another tract on the ſame ſubject, by an unknown author, which pieces actually came abroad in the year following; but Mr. Aſhmole was ſo cautious, or rather modeſt, as to publiſh them by a fictitious name (t) [F]. He at the ſame time addreſſed himſelf to a work of greater conſequence, which was the preparing for the preſs, [F] To publiſh them by a fictitious name.] The firſt ſtep into the world in print, is, for a modeſt man, always a little hard, let his abilities be what they will. But beſides the uſual inconveniences, Mr. Aſhmole laboured under many, from the ſubject he had choſen to cultivate; and very probably this it was that induced him to break the ice, by publiſhing other mens works, and to appear as an editor and tranſlator, before he took upon him the character of an author. The title of this piece was, I. FASCICULUS CHEMICUS: or Chymical Collections expreſſing the Ingreſs, Progreſs, and Egreſs, of the ſecret Hermetick Science, out of the choiceſt and moſt famous Authors. Whereunto is added, the Arcanum, or Grand Secret of Hermetick Philoſophy. Both made Engliſh by James Haſolle, Eſq; Qui eſt Mercuphilus Anglicus, London, 1650, 12*mo*. In his Prolegomena to the ingeniouſly elaborate Students of Hermetick Learning he ſpeaks thus: 'I here preſent you with 'a ſummary collection of the choiceſt flowers growing in the Hermetick gardens, ſorted and bound 'up in one compleat and lovely poſy, a way whereby 'painful inquiſitors avoid the uſual diſcouragements 'met with in a tedious wandering through each long 'walk, or winding maze; which are the ordinary and 'guileful circumſtances, wherewith envious Philoſophers have enlarged their labours, purpoſely to puzzle 'or weary the moſt reſolved undertakings. 'Tis true, 'the manner of delivery uſed by the ancients upon 'this ſubject, is very far removed from the common 'path of diſcourſe; yet I believe they were conſtrained (for the weight and majeſty of the ſecret) 'to invent thoſe occult kind of expreſſions in Ænigmas, Metaphors, Parabols, and Figures.

'Now amongſt the catalogue of authors that have 'treated of this ſacred learning, I have chiefly obſerved four ſorts.

'The firſt, are ſuch whoſe well-mindedneſs and 'honeſty have cauſed them to lay down the whole 'myſtery, faithfully and plainly, giving you a clew, 'as well as ſhewing you a labyrinth; and they only 'are to be ſtudied.

'The ſecond, are thoſe whoſe magiſterial handling 'a part, or branch thereof, did it rather to diſcover 'themſelves maſters, than with intent to inſtruct 'others: Theſe may be read, but they are too ſublime for thoſe who ſtand in need of any introduction.

'Others there are, who, out of ignorance or miſtake, have delivered blind and unbottomed fictions, 'which have too much deluded and abuſed the credulous world; ſo that of this ſort, I may ſay (not 'blemiſhing the honour, which ſome of them have 'juſtly acquired in other parts of learning), their 'works are like Pygmalion's image (full of exquiſite 'proportion, feature, delicacy, and beauty, but not 'animated with the life and ſoul of truth), and 'whilſt a man conſults with ſuch, he ſhall always 'doubt, whether what he reads be to the matter or 'not; however, the judicious may ſmell their levity 'by the rankneſs of their impertinencies.

'But the laſt and worſt ſort of all, are thoſe who, 'through envy, have ſcattered abroad their unfaithful recipes and falſe gloſſes (taking for preſident 'the devil, that can ſow tares and transform himſelf into an angel of light), with intent to choak and 'obfuſcate the more evident light of the plain-dealing 'Philoſophers; and to diſcern theſe impoſtures, requires a judgment able to divide a hair.

'From this variety of writers it is, that many, 'otherwiſe ſteady minds, are toſſed up and down, 'as from racket to racket, being forced to change 'their thoughts as often as they change their authors; and conceiving they have ſettled right upon 'a point (juſt like tickliſh weather-cocks), are neceſſitated to ſhift with the next puff (although 'but of an empty windy conceit). New diſcoveries 'begetting new opinions, which raiſe more untoward 'and turbulent doubts, than their greateſt ſtrength 'of judgment can conjure down. Thus (unhappy 'men) thinking themſelves ready to anchor, a croſs 'guſt blows them off the ſhore, perhaps into a rougher 'ſea of debate and perplexity than before, and with 'greater hazard and danger of ſplitting.

'I know that the truth of the proper argent, its 'preparation, and the fire (the three moſt important 'ſteps to this bleſſed work) with the whole proceſs is 'by ſome philoſophers ſo ſincerely laid down and 'unfolded, that, to a knowing artiſt, it is a cauſe 'of much wonder, why he that reads (though but 'ſmatteringly acquainted with nature), ſhould not 'meet with clear ſatisfaction: But here is the reaſon, 'many are called but few are choſen. 'Tis a haven 'towards which many ſkilful pilots have bent their 'courſe, yet few have reached it. For as amongſt 'the people of the Jews, there was but one that 'might enter into the Holy of Holies (and that but 'once a year), ſo there is ſeldom more in a nation 'whom God lets into this ſanctum ſanctorum of 'Philoſophy; yet ſome there are. But though the 'number of theſe Elect are not many, and generally the fathom of moſt mens fancies, that attempt 'the ſearch of this vaſt and ſubtle myſtery, too narrow 'to comprehend it, and their ſtrongeſt reaſon too weak 'to pierce the depth it lies obſcured in; being indeed ſo unſearchable and ambiguous, it rather exacts the ſacred and courteous illuminations of a 'Cherub, than the weak aſſiſtance of a pen to reveal it. Yet let no man deſpair; For ſurely there 'is a ſpirit in man, and the inſpiration of the Almighty giveth underſtanding. And though all things 'before us ſeem huddled up in a deformed chaos, 'yet can he place them in comelineſs and order. For 'many Philoſophers cloſely ſhut up, or concealed 'divers things, which they left the ingenious inquirer to ſift into, or find out, preſuming to whom 'God intended the diſcovery of the wonder, he 'would afford eyes that ſhould pierce through the 'midſt of words, and give them a ray of light, 'which ſhould lead them through this darkneſs. To 'find out that path which no fowl knoweth, and 'which the vulture's eye hath not ſeen. He was brought to have this affection for Chemiſtry, by his intimate acquaintance with Mr. William Backhouſe, of Swallowfield in the county of Berks, who was reputed an adept, and whom, from his free communication of chemical ſecrets, Mr. Aſhmole was wont to call Father, agreeably to the cuſtom which had long prevailed among the lovers of that art (w) [G]. ' rioufly peruſed, you will find their books are much ' like drawers, that lead to ſome choice and ſecret ' box in a cabinet, (one opening the way to the ' reſt) which if heedfully revolved, the ſatisfaction ' you miſs of in one author, you will meet with ' in another; and all perhaps may at length diſcover ' ſuch pregnant and ſublime ſecrets, as ſhall mani- ' feſt thee to be one of thoſe choſen veſſels ordain- ' ed to be informed of this knowledge, which ſome- ' times God hath hid from the wiſe and prudent, but ' revealed unto babes (14).' The bringing ſo much of this introductory diſcourſe into public view, may be of ſervice to the inquiſitive reader, as it ſhews him at once, what ſort of learning this was, and what kind of phraſeology was thought requiſite to recommend it. Mr. Aſhmole's Prolegomena alone contains thirty-one pages, excluſive of the poſtſcript, which accounts for the publication of the ſecond piece in the collection. The former of theſe prefaces is dated March 1, 1649-50; the ſecond, April 1, 1650. As for the original author of the Faſciculus, we ſhall have occaſion to mention him at large hereafter (15); but as for the author of the Arcanum, he was not known to Mr. Aſhmole, which is one good reaſon to ſuſpect he was not one of the Adepti, as will be ſhewn in its proper place. Before we quit this treatiſe it is requiſite to obſerve, that before it there is a kind of hieroglyphical frontiſpiece in ſeveral compartments. At the top there is the repreſentation of a King (Phœbus), ſitting on a lion, holding the reſemblance of the Sun in his hand at one end of the page, and oppoſite to him a lady (Diana) with the Moon in one hand and an arrow in the other, ſitting on a crab. Between them is the figure of Hermes, on a tripod, with the ſcheme of the heavens in one hand, and his caduceus in the other. Theſe are intended to expreſs the materials of the ſtone, and the proper ſeaſon for the proceſs. In the middle of the page is an altar, with the buſt of a man, to the middle of his neck, his head being covered by an aſtrological ſcheme, dropped by a hand from the clouds. In the middle of this ſcheme are theſe words, Aſtra regunt homines, i. e. The ſtars mankind command. On the altar are theſe words, Mercuriophilus Anglicus; i. e. The Engliſh lover of Hermetic philoſophy. On the right ſide of the frontiſpiece is the ſun, moon, and croſs, in conjunction, and from them hangs down a ſcrowl with theſe words, Quod eſt ſuperius, eſt ſicut inferius; i. e. What is above, is as what is beneath. Under this ſcrowl is a tree, and a creature gnawing the root. On one ſide is a pillar adorned with muſical inſtruments, rules, compaſſes, and mathematical ſchemes; on the other, a pillar of the like kind, with all ſorts of martial muſic, and inſtruments of war. At the bottom of the page, this tetraſtich ſtands by way of explication.

Anthony Wood (16), gives a large but incorrect account of this picture, in which we find aſſembled all the learned fooleries of that age, which becauſe untouched by Wood, I will endeavour to explain. The ſcrowl from above, and the mole at the foot of the aſh-tree, expreſs the author's name, which is alſo anagramized in James Haſole; i. e. Elias Aſhmole. The column on the right hand refers to his proficiency in muſic, and his being a Free-Maſon, as that on the left does to his military preferments; and thus with Dr. Wharton's leave, theſe Ænigmas, as he calls them, are revealed.

[G] Prevailed among the lovers of that art.] As to this gentleman's kindneſs to our author, he mentions it frequently in his Diary, and tells us expreſsly, that after revealing to him ſo many of his ſecrets, Mr. Backhouſe told him, he muſt needs be his ſon. Yet ſomewhat he long concealed, for we find this entry in Mr. Aſhmole's Diary after this (17). ' 1653, ' May 13, My father Backhouſe, lying ſick in Fleet- ' ſtreet, over-againſt St. Dunſtan's church, and not ' knowing whether he ſhould live or die, about ' eleven of the clock, told me in ſyllables, the true ' matter of the Philoſopher's ſtone, which he be- ' queathed to me as a legacy.' The nature of this kind of philoſophic adoption, is very copiouſly explained by our author himſelf, in his notes on Norton's Ordinal (18), and perhaps the paſſage may not be diſagreeable to the reader.

(17) Page 29.

' There has ever been a continued ſucceſſion of ' Philoſophers in all ages, although the heedleſs ' world hath ſeldom taken notice of them; for the ' ancients (uſually before they died) adopted one or ' other for their ſons, whom they knew well fitted ' with ſuch like qualities, as are ſet down in the letter ' that Norton's maſter wrote to him, when he ſent ' to make him his heir unto this ſcience, and other- ' wiſe than for pure virtue's ſake, let no man expect ' to attain it, or, as in the caſe of Tonſile,

' Now under what ties and engagements, this ' ſecret is uſually delivered (when beſtowed by word ' of mouth), may appear in the weighty obligations ' of that oath, which Charnock took before he ob- ' tained it: For thus ſpake his maſter to him (21),

' And this oath he charged him to keep faith- ' fully, and without violation, as he thought to be ' ſaved from the Pit of Hell.

' And if it ſo fell out, that they met not with ' any, whom they conceived in all reſpects worthy ' of their adoption (22) they then reſigned it into ' the hands of God, who beſt knew where to beſtow ' it. However, they ſeldom left the world, before ' they left ſome written legacy behind them, which ' (being the iſſue of their brain) ſtood in room and ' place of children, and becomes to us both parent ' and ſchoolmaſter, throughout which they were ſo ' univerſally kind, as to call all ſtudents by the dear ' and affectionate title of Sons (23), (Hermes, giving ' the firſt precedent) wiſhing all were ſuch, that take ' the true pains to tread their fathers ſteps, and in acquiring the art of engraving ſeals, caſting in ſand, and the myſtery of a working Goldſmith (x). But all this time, his great work of publiſhing the ancient Engliſh writers in Chemiſtry, went on; and finding that a competent knowledge of the Hebrew, was abſolutely neceſſary for underſtanding and explaining ſuch authors as had written on the Hermetic ſcience, he had recourſe to Rabbi Solomon Frank (y), by whom he was taught the rudiments of the ſacred tongue, which he found very uſeful to him in his ſtudies. At length, towards the cloſe of the year 1652, his Theatrum Chymicum Britannicum appeared, which gained him great reputation in the learned world, as it ſhewed him to be a man of a moſt ſtudious diſpoſition, indefatigable application, and of wonderful accuracy in his compoſitions; and as it was then very much admired, ſo it is ſtill highly eſteemed, by ſuch as are addicted to that kind of learning (z) [H]. (24) Norton's Ordinal, in his Introduction.

‘ In theſe legitimate children, they lived longer ‘ than in their adopted ſons; for though theſe cer- ‘ tainly periſhed in an age, yet their writings (as if ‘ when they died, their ſouls had been tranſmigrated ‘ into them) ſeemed as immortal, enough at leaſt to ‘ perpetuate their memories, 'till time ſhould be no ‘ more: And to be the father of ſuch ſons, is (in ‘ my opinion) a moſt noble happineſſe.’ Our author's Commentary making this point quite clear, there is no neceſſity of inſiſting farther upon it; only it may be proper to obſerve, that Mr. Aſhmole's father, Backhouſe, did not die till May 30, 1662, as appears by our author's Diary (25). He was eſteemed a very great Chemiſt, and admirably verſed in what was ſtyled the Roſicrucian learning, and he was ſo; but it appears plainly from Mr. Aſhmole's writings, that he underſtood his father Backhouſe, in too literal a ſenſe, and did not diſcover the confuſion occaſioned by applying a method of removing all the imperfections of metals to phyſic, and thereby miſleading people on that ſubject, by the promiſes of an univerſal medicine, true perhaps in the leſs obvious ſenſe, and falſe in the other, in which however it is generally taken. This I only hint, and that for a reaſon which will be more fully inſiſted on in the enſuing note.

[H] By ſuch as are addicted to that kind of learning.] There are very few books that have been printed in our language, which have made ſo much noiſe abroad, and yet are ſo little known at home, as this piece of our author's, which however brought him into eſteem and credit with all the Virtuoſi, who were living at the time of its publication. The title at large ran thus:

II. Theatrum Chemicum Britannicum, containing ſeveral poetical pieces of our famous Engliſh Philoſophers, who have written the Hermetique Myſteries, in their own ancient language. Faithfully collected into one Volume, with Annotations thereon, by Elias Aſhmole, Eſq; Qui eſt Mercuriophilus Anglicus. London 1652, 4*to.*

The authors publiſhed in this collection are, I. Thomas Norton's Ordinal of Alchemie. II. George Ripley's Compound of Alchemie. III. Pater Sapientiæ, i. e. the Father of Wiſdom, by an anonymous writer. IV. Hermes's Bird, written originally in Latin, by Raymund Lully, and done into Engliſh verſe by Abbot Cremer, of Weſtminſter. V. Sir Geoffrey Chaucer's Chanons Yeoman's Tale. VI. Daſtin's Dream, which ſeems to be a verſion of the Latin Poem of John Daſtin, entitled his Viſion. VII. Pearce, the Black Monk, on the Elixir. VIII. Richard Carpenter's work, which ſome think, and not without ſome colour of reaſon, ought rather to be aſcribed to John Carpenter, Biſhop of Worceſter, who was one of the beſt chemiſts of his time. IX. Hunting of the Green Lion, by Abraham Andrews; but there is alſo a ſpurious piece, with the ſame title. X. Breviary of Natural Philoſophy, by Thomas Charnock. XI. Ænigmas by the ſame perſon. XII. Bloomfield's Bloſſoms, which is likewiſe entitled the Camp of Philoſophy, by William Bloomfield. XIII. Sir Edward Kelle's Work. XIV. His Letter to G. S. Gent. It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that this gentleman's name, even by Mr. Aſhmole, is written Kelley, though Sir Edward himſelf, wrote it Kelle. XV. Dr. John Dee's Teſtament, which appears to be an Epiſtle to one John Gwin, written A. D. 1568, and a third letter, the two firſt being wanting. XVI. Thomas Robinſon, of the Philoſopher's Stone. XVII. Experience and Philoſophy, by an anonymous author. XVIII. The Magiſtery, by W. B. i. e. William Bloomfield. XIX. John Gower, on the Philoſopher's Stone. XX. George Ripley's Viſion. XXI. Fragments by various authors.

Our learned author, in his Prolegomena to this work, having firſt magnified the Science of Alchymy, as it is called, proceeds next to an hiſtorical account of Engliſh writers on that ſubject, which is extremely to our purpoſe, as containing many curious ſtrokes not to be found elſewhere. His words are theſe:

‘ Our Engliſh Philoſophers generally (like Prophets) ‘ have received little honour (unleſs what has been ‘ privately paid them) in their own country, nor have ‘ they done any mighty works amongſt us, except in ‘ covertly adminiſtring their medicine to a few ſick, ‘ and healing them (for greater experiments than ‘ what it performs in Phyſic, they never publickly ‘ made ſhew of). Thus did I. O. (one of the firſt ‘ four fellows of the Fratres R. C.) in curing the ‘ young Earl of Norfolk of the leproſy, and Dr. ‘ B. in carrying off the virulency of the ſmall-pox, ‘ twice from Queen Elizabeth; inſomuch that they ‘ never appeared: But in parts abroad, they have ‘ found more noble reception, and the world greedy ‘ of obtaining their works, nay, (rather than want ‘ the ſight thereof) contented to view them through ‘ a tranſlation, witneſs what Maierus, Hermannus, ‘ Combachius, Faber, and many others have done: ‘ the firſt of which came out of Germany, to live ‘ in England, purpoſely that he might ſo underſtand ‘ our Engliſh tongue, as to tranſlate Norton's Ordinal into Latin verſe, which moſt judiciouſly and ‘ learnedly he did; yet (to our ſhame be it ſpoken) ‘ his entertainment was too, too coarſe for ſo deſerving a ſcholar.

‘ How great a blemiſh is it then to us, that re- ‘ fuſe to read ſo famous authors in our natural lan- ‘ guage, whilſt ſtrangers are neceſſitated to read them ‘ in ours, to underſtand them in their own; yet ‘ think the ſubject much more deſerving than their ‘ pains. If this we do but ingenuouſly conſider, we ‘ ſhall judge it more of reaſon, that we look back ‘ upon, than neglect ſuch pieces of learning as are ‘ natives of our own country, and by this inquiſi- ‘ tion, find no nation has written more or better, ‘ although at preſent (as well through our own ſu- ‘ pineneſs, as the decrees of fate) few of their works ‘ can be found. John Leland took very much pains, ‘ even at the yielding up of the ghoſt of our Engliſh ‘ learning, to preſerve its lateſt (but weakeſt, cauſe ‘ almoſt ſpent) breath; and from him John Bale, ‘ with John Pitts (who indeed is but Bale's plagiary), ‘ hath left us a catalogue of the writers of this na- ‘ tion, and that's near all: Yet poſterity for this ‘ is deeply obliged. What puniſhment then did ‘ their peſtilent malice deſerve, who robbed us of ‘ their whole works?

work gave him, extended his acquaintance conſiderably; inſomuch, that the great Mr. Selden took notice of him in the year 1653, encouraged his ſtudies, and lived in great friendſhip with him to the day of his death (a). He was likewiſe very intimate with Mr. Oughtred, the famous Mathematician, and with Dr. Wharton, a Phyſician of great character and experience (b). His marriage with Lady Mainwaring involved him firſt in abundance of law-ſuits with other people, and at laſt produced a diſpute between themſelves, which came to a hearing on the eighth of October 1657, in the Court of Chancery, where Serjeant Maynard having obſerved, that in eight hundred ſheets of depoſitions taken on the part of the Lady, there was not ſo much as a bad word proved againſt Mr. Aſhmole, her bill was diſmiſſed, and ſhe delivered back to her huſband (c). He had now for ſome time addicted himſelf to the ſtudy of antiquity and records, for

'A judicious author, ſpeaking of the diſſolution 'of our monaſteries, ſaith thus; Many manuſcripts, 'guilty of no other ſuperſtition than the red letters 'in their front, were condemned to the fire, and here 'a principal key of antiquity was loſt to the great 'part of poſterity (ſuch was learning's misfortune at 'that great devaſtation of our Engliſh libraries that), 'where a red letter or a mathematical diagram ap-'peared, they were ſufficient to entitle the book to 'be Popiſh or Diabolical.'

Our author then ſtrikes out into the praiſes of the Druids among the Britons, the learned Philoſophers among the Saxons, and the politer writers amongſt the Normans. He next turns to the particular ſubject of Hermetic philoſophy, and though he intimates he never adventured to practiſe it, he ſeems confident, that he knows what he ſpeaks of thus:

'I muſt profeſs, I know enough to hold my tongue, 'but not enough to ſpeak; and the no leſs real than 'miraculous fruits I have found, in my diligent en-'quiry into theſe Arcana, lead me on to ſuch de-'grees of admiration; they command ſilence, and 'force me to loſe my tongue. Yet as one greatly 'affecting my native country, and the ſatisfaction 'of all ingenious artiſts, I have publiſhed (for their 'uſe) theſe enſuing collected Antiquities, and ſhall 'here ſay ſomething more than they ſpeak of.

'He who ſhall have the happineſs to meet with 'St. Dunſtan's work de Occulta Philoſophia (a book, 'which E. G. A. I. made much uſe of, and which 'ſhall chiefly back what here I am about to ſay), 'may therein read ſuch ſtories as will make him 'amazed, to think what ſtupendious and immenſe 'things, are to be performed by virtue of the Phi-'loſopher's mercury, of which a taſte only and no 'more.

'And firſt of the mineral ſtone, the which is wrought 'up to a degree only, that hath the power of tranſ-'muting any imperfect earthy matter into its utmoſt 'degree of perfection; that is, to convert the baſeſt 'metals into perfect gold and ſilver, ſlints into all 'manner of precious ſtones, (as rubies, ſaphirs, eme-'ralds, and diamonds, &c.) and many more experi-'ments of the like nature. But as this is but a part, 'ſo it is the leaſt ſhare of the bleſſing which may be 'acquired by the Philoſopher's materia, if the full 'virtue thereof were known. Gold, I confeſs, is a 'delicious object, a goodly light which we admire 'and gaze upon, ut pueri in Junonis avem, but as to 'make gold (ſaith an incomparable author) is the 'chiefeſt intent of the Alchymiſts, ſo was it ſcarce 'any intent of the ancient Philoſophers and the low-'eſt uſe the adepti made of this materia.

'For they being lovers of wiſdom more than world-'ly wealth, drove at higher and more excellent 'operations. And certainly he to whom the whole 'courſe of nature lies open, rejoiceth not that he can 'make gold and ſilver, or the Devils, to become 'ſubject unto him, as that he ſees the heavens open, 'the Angels of God aſcending and deſcending, and 'that his own name is fairly written in the book of life.

'Next to come to the vegetable, magical, and 'angelical ſtones, the which have in them no part of 'the mineral ſtone (quatenus ſtone fermented with 'metalline and earthly nature), for they are marvel-'louſly ſubtil, and each of them differing in opera-'tion and nature, becauſe fitted and fermented for 'ſeveral effects and purpoſes. Doubtleſs Adam, '(with the fathers before the flood and ſince) Abra-'ham, Moſes, and Solomon, wrought many won-'ders by them, yet the utmoſt of their virtues they 'never underſtood, nor indeed any but God the 'maker of all things in heaven and in earth, bleſſed for 'evermore.

'For by the vegetable may be perfectly known the 'nature of man, beaſts, fowls, fiſhes, together with 'all kind of trees, plants, flowers, &c. and how to 'produce and make them grow, flouriſh, and bear 'fruit. How to increaſe them in colour and ſmell, 'and when, and where we pleaſe, and all this not 'only at an inſtant, experimenti gratia, but daily, 'monthly, yearly, at any time, at any ſeaſon, yea, 'in the depth of winter; and therefore not unlike 'the walnut-tree which anciently grew in Glaſſen-'bury's church-yard, and never put forth leaves be-'fore St. Barnabies-day, yet then was fully loaded 'with them, as alſo the hawthorn there, ſo greatly 'famed for ſhooting out leaves and flowers at Chriſt-'mas; together with the oak in New Foreſt, that 'bore green leaves at the ſame ſeaſon, may be ſome 'experiments made of the vegetable ſtone.

'Beſides the maſculine part of it which is wrought 'up to a ſolar quality, and through its exceeding heat 'will burn up and deſtroy any creature, plant, &c. 'That which is lunar and feminine (if immediately 'applied) will mitigate it with its extreme cold, and 'in like manner the lunar quality benumbs and con-'geals any animal, &c. unleſs it be preſently helped 'and reſolved by that of the Sun. For though they 'both be made out of one natural ſubſtance, yet in 'working they have contrary qualities, nevertheleſs 'there is ſuch a natural aſſiſtance between them, that 'what the one cannot do, the other doth, can, and 'will perform. Nor are their inward virtues more 'than their outward beauties; for the ſolar part is of 'ſo reſplendent tranſparent luſtre, that the eye of 'man is ſcarce able to endure it. And if the lunar 'part be expoſed abroad in a dark night, birds will 'repair to (and circulate about) it as a fly round a 'candle, and ſubmit themſelves to the captivity of 'the hand. And this invites me to believe, that the 'ſtone which the ancient Hermit (being then 140 'years old) took out of the wall in his cell, and 'ſhewed Cornelius Gallus, An. 1602, was of the 'nature of this vegetable ſtone; for (upon opening 'the golden box wherein it was incloſed) it dilated 'its beams all over the room, and that with ſo great 'ſplendor, that it overcame the light that was kindled 'therein. Beſides, the Hermit refuſed to project it 'upon metal (as being unworthy of it) but made his 'experiment upon veronica and rue.'

It is very ſtrange, that a perſon of ſuch admirable natural parts, and of ſo much acquired learning, ſhould expreſs himſelf with ſo great vehemence, and venture his reputation ſo boldly in a matter of this nature, which he very well knew, laboured under ſo many ſuſpicions: but he was ſo led away by the exterior appearances, and relied ſo entirely on what the ſages he had read delivered, that he never once ſuſpected that this univerſal medicine acted only within its own kingdom, and that what he repreſents as the loweſt, was in truth its higheſt effect. But it may juſtly be alledged, in favour of Mr. Aſhmole, that he ſtudied the hiſtory of the ſcience, rather than the ſcience itſelf, and knew more of the Philoſopher's ſtone by reading than practice, which, however it might ſhew his own wiſdom, contributed very little to that of his reader. This preface is dated January 26, 1651-2; but the book itſelf did not appear till about that time twelve-month, and was then extremely well received by the Virtuoſi, who grew wonderful well pleaſed with our author, and offered him all manner of encouragement for the compleating his deſign, by publiſhing the proſe as well as poetic authors.

which he had a wonderful genius. This recommended him to the intimate acquaintance of Mr., afterwards Sir William Dugdale, whom about this time he attended in his ſurvey of the Fens, and was very uſeful to him in that excellent undertaking; the conſequence of which ſhortly appeared to the world, in the moſt valuable performance that ever fell from the pen of that great writer, and indefatigable Antiquary, whoſe writings do ſo much honour to his country (d). Mr. Aſhmole himſelf ſoon after took the pains to trace the Roman road, which in Antoninus's Itinerary is called Bennevanna, from Weeden to Litchfield, of which he gave Mr. Dugdale an account, in a letter addreſſed to him upon that ſubject (e). It is very probable, that after his ſtudies had thus taken a new turn, he loſt ſomewhat of his reliſh for Chemiſtry, ſince he diſcontinued the Theatrum Chemicum, which, according to his firſt project, was to have made ſeveral volumes: yet he ſtill retained, as moſt people do who dip into that kind of ſtudy, ſuch a remembrance of it, as induced him to part civilly with the ſons of art, which he did, by publiſhing a treatiſe in proſe on the Philoſopher's ſtone, to which he prefixed an admirable preface, wherein he ſeems to have apologized for taking leave of the ſubject, as he appears to have done by ſending abroad this treatiſe (f) [I]. In the ſpring of the year 1658, our author applied himſelf to the collecting materials for his hiſtory of the Order of the Garter, which he afterwards lived to finiſh, and thereby rendered both the order and himſelf immortal, the juſt reward of the prodigious pains he took in ſearching records in

[I] As he appears to have done by ſending abroad this treatiſe.] It was with a view to continue and complete his former deſign, that Mr. Aſhmole got this, and many other pieces of a like nature, into his cuſtody, from ſuch of the Literati as were his friends; as appears plainly, from the beginning of his preface to this very piece, the next book he publiſhed, which was, III. The Way to Bliſs, in three Books, made public by Elias Aſhmole, Eſq; Qui eſt Mercuriophilus Anglicus. London 1658, 4*to.* He opens himſelf thus to the world on that occaſion.

'It is now ſomewhat above ſix years, ſince I 'publiſhed the firſt part of my Theatrum Chemicum 'Britannicum, immediately after which, my ſtudies 'of that nature received moſt unfortunate interrup- 'tions from the commencement of ſeveral vexatious 'ſuits againſt me; but God, not only enabled me 'to endure thoſe impetuous, multiplied ſtorms, but 'ſome few months ſince, was pleaſed to ſweeten my 'long ſufferings with a fair and peaceful iſſue.'

How he came to alter his purpoſe of publiſhing ſeveral ſuch volumes, and to ſend this piece ſingly into the world, we are frankly told by him in theſe words.

'All this while, I hoped to meet with one or other, 'who (inclined to advance the honour of Hermes his 'family) would have taken the pains of adding a 'ſecond volume, to my ſaid Theatrum, in regard 'thoſe ſucceſſive troubles (hanging ſo long, and hea- 'vily upon me) had denied me the leiſure; nor were 'either my invitations to it wanting, or the free 'contributions of whatever I had ſo painfully col- 'lected unoffered, to the end (my deſign of letting 'the world ſee, what excellent men we had once 'of our nation, famous as well for that kind of 'philoſophy as any other learning, and maſters of 'ſo tranſcendent a ſecret) might have been further- 'ed. Notwithſtanding this, I hear of nothing (hi- 'therto) done, nothing endeavoured: But inſtead 'thereof, I lately met with a pretended copy of the 'following diſcourſe, ready fitted for the preſs, 'which (upon peruſal) I found mutilated with many 'imperfections, much injured by ſeveral incongruous 'additions, and they, confeſſed to be only made up 'of ſome ſcattered ſhreds and fragments, collected 'from the whole work, and beſides intended, that 'the world ſhould take it for the child of one Euge- 'nius Theodidactus, being (by re-baptization) called 'the Wiſe-Man's Crown, or Roſie-cruſian Phyſic, un- 'der which titles notice hath been given of its coming 'abroad, by other books ſince pupliſhed.

This perſon E. Theodidactus, was one John Heydon, a great pretender to Roſicruſian knowledge, who married the widow of Nicholas Culpepper, the famous quack, and publiſhed abundance of idle books, in ſome of which, he abuſed Mr. Aſhmole on this ſubject (26), though certainly there was no compariſon between the men, one being as deſpicable as the other was juſtly eſteemed. In the ſame preface, Mr. Aſhmole gives us the following ingenuous account of the original author of this treatiſe.

'As for our author, he was without doubt an 'Engliſhman, but has hitherto paſſed with us among 'the anonymi, and the book (his off-ſpring) ſhews 'itſelf ſufficiently legitimate, though the true father 'thereof be as yet unknown. I have heard ſome 'notable ſtories, and thoſe backed with perſuaſive 'circumſtances, to make an eaſy faith think the pro- 'vidence very obſervable, that not only furniſhed a 'laborious ſearcher into this myſterious learning with 'the original itſelf, but moſt fortunately directed 'him to three grains of the powder cloſed up be- 'tween two leaves thereof, with which he made 'projection; but I affect not to fly-blow the ears of 'my readers, only this I can modeſtly aver, that my 'copy was a tranſcript of that original.

'The work ſeems to be written about the begin- 'ning of the laſt (or end of the former) century, 'the main drift of the author being from weighty 'and ſerious arguments and examples, to prove the 'poſſibility of ſuch a thing as the Philoſopher's ſtone, 'whereby is largely manifeſted, that nature has ex- 'hibited greater wonders to the view of the world; 'and as great things have been (and conſequently 'may be) performed by other weaker and leſſer 'means, where a due, friendly, and philoſophical 'conjunction of art and nature is fully underſtood, 'and yet how be it (becauſe ſuch are familiar unto, 'and ordinary among us) we conſider them not; 'tis 'a diſcourſe fraught with variety of excellent rational 'matter, and fitted to the learned, as well as meaner 'capacities; nay, ſuch as I boldly perſuade myſelf, 'will fully ſatisfy both, beyond any thing yet extant 'of this nature. And I believe many captious argu- 'ments, heretofore uſed and urged againſt the truth 'of this ſo infallible a ſcience, will here meet with 'ſatisfactory ſolutions, and henceforth find no fur- 'ther place in any diſcourſe ſavouring but of ſo- 'briety.

'I muſt alſo acquaint the reader, that this piece 'was of ſo high a value with the induſtrious Doctor 'Everard, as it invited him to beſtow his pains in 'the marginal notes; wherein (like a ſkilful Philo- 'ſopher, whoſe firſt operation is to make hidden 'things manifeſt) he drew forth and diſcovered, that 'which our author's magiſterial pen thought fit to 'conceal, and having obtained thoſe notes (they 'being added to a tranſcript of this work, and both 'fairly written in the Doctor's hand) from a very 'intimate friend (one extraordinarily learned, and a 'great ornament of our nation) I was willing to 'make them public alſo (27).'

This addreſs to the reader, which is dated April 16, 1658, was a kind of farewel to Hermetic philoſophy from Mr. Aſhmole. For though he afterwards depoſited many valuable MSS. ralating to this ſcience in a public library for the benefit of poſterity, yet he wrote nothing more upon the ſubject. The book itſelf, deſerved the pains that both Dr. Everard and Mr. Aſhmole beſtowed about it; for beyond all doubt, in this genuine edition of our author, it is the beſt and moſt ſenſible book in our language, containing as much truth, and much more learning and reaſon, than the boaſted performances of Eugenius, or of Irenæus Philalethes.

the Tower, and elſewhere, comparing them with each other, and obtaining ſuch lights, as were requiſite to render ſo perplexed a ſubject clear, and to reduce all the circumſtances of ſuch a vaſt body of hiſtory into their proper order (g). In September following he made a journey to Oxford, where he was extremely well received, and where he undertook the making a full and diſtinct deſcription of the coins given to the public library by Archbiſhop Laud, which was of great uſe to him in the works which he afterwards compoſed (h). He had lodged and boarded ſometimes at a houſe in South Lambeth, kept by Mr. John Tredeſcant, whoſe father and himſelf had been phyſic-gardeners there for many years, and had collected a vaſt number of curioſities, which, after mature deliberation, Mr. Tredeſcant and his wife determined to beſtow on Mr. Aſhmole, and accordingly ſealed and delivered a deed of gift for that purpoſe, on the ſixteenth of December 1659 (i). Upon the happy reſtoration of King Charles II., Mr. Aſhmole was early introduced into the preſence and favour of his Majeſty, and on the 18th of June 1660, which was the ſecond time he had the honour of diſcourſing with the King, he graciouſly beſtowed upon him the place of Windſor Herald (k) A few days after, he was appointed by the King to make a deſcription of his medals, and had them delivered into his hands, and King Henry VIIIth's cloſet aſſigned for his uſe, being alſo allowed his diet at Court (l). On the twenty-firſt of Auguſt in the ſame year, he preſented the three books which he had publiſhed to his Majeſty, who, as he both loved and underſtood chemiſtry, received them very graciouſly (m). On the third of September he had a warrant ſigned for the office of Commiſſioner of the Exciſe, in conſequence of a letter written by his Majeſty's expreſs command, to the Earl of Southampton, then Lord High-Treaſurer, by Mr. Secretary Morris (n). About this time, a commiſſion was granted to him as incidental to the care of the King's medals, to examine the famous, or rather infamous, Hugh Peters, about the contents of the royal library which had fallen into his hands, and which was very carefully and punctually executed, but to very little effect (o) [K]. On the ſecond of November he was called to the bar in Middle-Temple hall (p). On the fifteenth of January 166⅟, he was admitted a Fellow of the Royal Society (q). On the 9th of February following, the King ſigned a warrant for conſtituting him Secretary of Surinam in the Weſt Indies (r). In the beginning of the year 1662, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners for recovering the King's goods (s), and about the ſame time he ſent a ſet of ſervices and anthems to the cathedral church of Litchfield, in memory of his having been once a Choriſter there, and he gave afterwards twenty pounds towards repairing the cathedral (t). On the twenty-ſeventh of June 1664, the White Office was opened, of which he was appointed a Commiſſioner (u). On the ſeventeenth of February 1665, Sir Edward Byſhe ſealed his deputation for viſiting Berkſhire, which viſitation he began on the eleventh of March following (w). On the ninth of June 1668, he was appointed by the Lords Commiſſioners of the Treaſury, Accomptant General, and Country Accomptant in the Exciſe (x). His ſecond wife, Lady Mainwaring, dying on the firſt of April in the ſame year, he ſoon after made his addreſſes to Mrs. Elizabeth Dugdale, daughter to his good friend Sir William Dugdale, Knt. Garter King at Arms, and to this lady, who was his third wife, he was married in Lincoln's-Inn chapel, on the third of November, by Dr. Lloyd, afterwards Biſhop of Worceſter (y). The Univerſity of Oxford, conſidering the many favours they had received from Mr. Aſhmole, on the nineteenth of July 1669, created him Doctor of Phyſic by diploma, which was preſented to him on the third of November following, by Dr. Yates, Principal of Brazen-Noſe College, in the name of the Univerſity (z). [K] Carefully and punctually executed, but to very little effect.] It was a thing notorious, that this enthuſiaſtical buffoon, Hugh Peters, had gotten poſſeſſion of the King's library and cloſet, in thoſe times of rebellion and confuſion, and it was no leſs notorious, that the moſt valuable curioſities in them were embezzled and diſſipated all over Europe, and therefore the Parliament ſhewed an early care in this reſpect (28); and the King alſo iſſued the following warrant, for obtaining the beſt account that could be had of his royal father's effects.

CHARLES REX.

To our truſty and well-beloved Sir John Robinſon, Knt. and Bart. Lieutenant of our Tower of London.

OUR will and pleaſure is, that you permit Thomas Roſs, and Elias Aſhmole, Eſquires; to ſpeak with and examine Hugh Peters, concerning our books and medals, that have been embezzled, and this to be performed in your preſence; for which this ſhall be your warrant. Given at our Court at Whitehall, the 10th day of September 1660, in the twelfth year of our reign.

By his Majeſty's command,
EDW. NICHOLAS.

Upon this Mr. Aſhmole, and Mr. Roſs, who was Tutor to the D. of Monmouth, did accordingly take ſome pains with Hugh Peters, on this head, but with how ſmall effect the following report ſhews.

An Account of what Mr. Hugh Peters gave upon his Examination before the Honourable Sir John Robinſon, Lieutenant of his Majeſty's Tower, taken by Mr. Roſs and Mr. Aſhmole, aſſigned thereunto 12 Sept. 1660.

The examinant ſaith, That about the year 1648, in Auguſt, he preſerved the library in Saint James's, againſt the violence and rapine of the ſoldiers, and the ſame continued three or four months under his cuſtody, and that he did not take there any thing, but left it unviolated as he found it. He doth confeſs that he ſaw divers medals of gold, ſilver, and braſs, and other pieces of antiquity, as iron rings, and the like, but that he took nothing thence, and then delivered up the key and cuſtody of them, to Major-General Ireton; and further he ſaith, that he never had or ſaw any thing belonging thereto.

Given upon oath before me John Robinſon, Lieutenant of the Tower (29).

was now courted and eſteemed by the greateſt people in the kingdom, both in point of title and merit, who frequently did him the honour to viſit him at his chambers in the Temple, and whenever he went his ſummer progreſs, he had the ſame reſpect paid him in the country, more eſpecially at his native town of Litchfield, to which when he came, he was ſplendidly entertained by the Corporation (a). On the eighth of May 1672, he preſented his laborious work on the moſt noble order of the Garter, to his moſt gracious maſter King Charles II., who not only received it with great civility and kindneſs, but ſoon after granted to our author, as a mark of his approbation of the work, and of his perſonal eſteem for him, a privy ſeal for 400 pounds out of the cuſtom of paper (b). This was his greateſt undertaking, and indeed if he had publiſhed nothing elſe, it ought to have preſerved his memory for ever, ſince it is in its kind one of the moſt valuable books in our language [L]. On the twenty-ninth of January 1675, he reſigned his office of Windſor Herald, which, by his procurement, was beſtowed on his brother Dugdale (c). It was with great reluctancy that the Earl Marſhal parted with him, and it was not long after, that he beſtowed on him the character of being the beſt officer in his office (d). On the twentieth of February 1677, Sir Edward Walker, Garter King at Arms, deceaſed, upon which a controverſy grew between the King and the Duke of Norfolk, as Earl Marſhal, about the right of diſpoſing of his place, on which Mr. Aſhmole was conſulted, who declared in favour of the King, but with ſo much prudence and diſcretion as not to give any umbrage to the Earl Marſhal (e). He afterwards refuſed this high office, which was conferred on his father in-law Sir William Dugdale,

[L] One of the moſt valuable books in our language.] The title of this excellent work at large runs thus. IV. The Inſtitution, Laws, and Ceremonies of the moſt noble Order of the Garter. Collected and digeſted into one body by Elias Aſhmole, of the Middle-Temple, Eſquire; Windeſore Herald at Arms. A work furniſhed with variety of matter relating to Honour and Nobleſſe. Lond. 1672, Folio. It is, beyond compariſon, the moſt finiſhed piece that ever fell from the hand of our author, and contains a vaſt treaſure of hiſtory and antiquities, which had they not been thus preſerved, had been unqueſtionably loſt to all poſterity. As to the deſign of the performance, the preface, which is very ſhort, and written in a much plainer and more correct ſtile, than any thing he had formerly penned in the ſame way, ſufficiently informs us, as well as the manner in which it is diſpoſed; and therefore we have tranſcribed two or three of the moſt remarkable and material paragraphs, in order to confirm theſe remarks to the reader.

'As I ever had a great veneration for the moſt 'noble order of the Garter, ſo muſt it needs be 'imagined, that I was accordingly much concerned 'in the late unhappy times, to ſee the honour of it 'trampled on, and itſelf ſunk into a very low eſteem 'among us. That reflection put me upon thoughts, 'not only of doing ſomething, that might inform the 'world of the nobleneſs of its inſtitution, and the 'glory which in proceſs of time it acquired, both 'at home and abroad, but alſo of drawing up, in 'the nature of a formulary, both the legal and cere-'monial part thereof, for the better conduct of ſuch 'as might be therein afterwards concerned, in caſe 'the eclipſe it then laboured under in our horizon, 'ſhould prove of ſo long continuance, as that many 'occurrences, worthy of knowledge, might come to 'be in a manner forgotten.

'Upon the firſt communication of my deſign, to 'the late Reverend Doctor Chriſtopher Wren, Re-'giſter of the ſaid order, it received not only his 'approbation, but alſo his ready aſſiſtance in the uſe 'of the annals thereof, then in his cuſtody. From 'theſe and other authentic manuſcripts and auto-'graphs, particularly relating to the order, and a 'painful and chargeable ſearch of our public records, 'I had collected the greateſt part of my materials 'before the happy reſtoration of his now Majeſty, 'the preſent Sovereign of this moſt noble order; who 'being afterwards acquainted with what I had done, 'was moſt graciouſly pleaſed to countenance it, and 'encourage me in the proſecution thereof.

'The work in general contains an hiſtorical ac-'count of the laws and ceremonies of the ſaid moſt 'noble order; but more particularly its inſtitution, 'the manner and order obſerved in elections, inveſti-'tures, and inſtallations of Knights, the holding of 'chapters, celebration of feſtivals, the formality of 'proceedings, the magnificence of embaſſies, ſent 'with the habit to ſtranger Kings and Princes, in ſum 'all other things relative to the order. In the 'illuſtration whereof, I have inſerted (where they 'properly occurred) the moſt eminent and conſider-'able caſes, which have required and received diſ-'cuſſion in chapters, the determination thereupon, 'becoming rules and laws; whence it may be ob-'ſerved, that the foundation and ſuperſtructures of 'the order were laid and raiſed upon the exacteſt 'rules of honour. And to ſupply the failure and de-'fects of the annals, I have been forced to make 'uſe of memorials and relations, yet ſuch as were 'taken notice of and committed to writing, either 'by ſome of the officers of the order, or thoſe of 'arms, during the times of their attendance on the 'ſervice of the order, and conſequently of ſufficient 'authority for me to rely on.

'To uſher in thoſe, I have given a proſpect of 'knighthood in general, of the ſeveral orders of 'knighthood, as alſo of the antiquity of the caſtle 'and college of Windſor, and cloſed all with the 'honours, martial employments, and famous actions, 'the matches, and iſſues of the founder, and firſt 'knights-companions; as alſo a perfect catalogue of 'their ſucceſſors to this very preſent. All which are 'adorned with variety of ſculptures, properly relating 'to the ſeveral parts of the work.'

He was not only ſo happy as to receive thoſe extraordinary marks of the Sovereign's favour, mentioned in the text, but was complimented in an obliging manner, by his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York; who, though then at ſea againſt the Dutch, ſent for his book by the Earl of Peterborough, and afterwards told our author he was extremely pleaſed with it (30). The reſt of the Knights-companions of the moſt noble order, received him and his book with much reſpect and civility, and yet the regard ſhewn to it, and to its author abroad, was much more ſingular (31). It was repoſited by the then Pope, in the library of the Vatican. King Chriſtiern of Denmark, ſent him, in 1674, by Thomas Henſhaw, Eſq; the King's Reſident at Copenhagen, a gold chain and medal, which, with the King's leave, on certain high feſtivals he wore. Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburgh, ſent him the like preſent, and ordered his book to be tranſlated into High-Dutch (32). He was afterwards viſited by the Elector Palatine's, the grand Duke of Tuſcany's, and other foreign Princes Miniſters, to return him thanks for this book, which he took care ſhould be preſented them, and thereby ſpread the fame of the Garter, the nation, and himſelf, all over Europe (33). Yet it does not appear, that this laborious and exquiſite performance advanced at all the deſign he had formed ſome years before, of getting himſelf appointed Hiſtoriographer to the order, to which propoſal ſome objections were made, and by our author fully anſwered (34), although we find no mention of this circumſtance in any memoirs of Mr. Aſhmole hitherto extant.

[M] For whom he employed his utmoſt intereſt.] This was one of the nobleſt and moſt generous actions of our author's life, and he has left a particular account of it under his own hand, which not being included in the Diary of his life, that has been printed, ſeems the rather to deſerve a place here (35). 'February 21, My Lord Biſhop of Saliſbury (Dr. Seth Ward) having been at my houſe in Sheere-Lane, (which then ſtood empty, having ſome time before retired into the country to dwell) and at my chamber in the Temple; but miſſing me at both places, heard at length I dwelt at South-Lambeth, whereupon the next day he ſent me an obliging letter (Feb. 22) to acquaint me, that as ſoon as he heard of Sir Edward Walker's death, he endeavoured to find me out, but being not able, he immediately ſpoke to the Duke of York, and ſome other Knights of the Garter, to move the King on my behalf to ſucceed him. But the Duke wiſhed him rather to move the matter to the King, becauſe he was pre-engaged, viz. to the Earl-Marſhal, and immediately gave him an opportunity to do it. The King gave him ſuch an anſwer, as cauſed him to believe and hope his inclinations were very good to me; but it appeared after, that the Earl-Marſhal had acquainted the King, with a claim himſelf had of the diſpoſing of that office, which induced his Majeſty to give the Biſhop no poſitive anſwer.

'The letter his Lordſhip ſent me by one of his gentlemen, who found me at home, under a fortnight's ill indiſpoſition, by whom I returned my moſt humble thanks, and informed him I had no inclination to accept of the place, and therefore deſired him to preſs it no farther, and that I would attend him as ſoon as I was able to ſtir out of doors, and then acquaint him with the reaſons of my refuſal.

'March 3d, I went to give my Lord Biſhop of Saliſbury, my perſonal thanks, for ſo real a kindneſs, and told him I was retired into the country, with reſolutions to take upon me no new employments, and had (to make my retirement more comfortable and eaſy) reſigned my Herald's place, and thrown off all other kinds of buſineſs (except the Comptrollerſhip of the Exciſe), and for that reaſon was not willing to enter again upon any other whatſoever; and that in caſe his Majeſty ſhould enquire of him, why he did not preſent his ſuit on my behalf, he ſhould be ready to anſwer, that my employment in the Exciſe took up my whole time, and I was doubtful, leaſt my attendance at White-Hall, the Heralds-Office, or elſewhere, upon matters relating to this office, might occaſion me to neglect that ſervice, which ſo nearly related to his Majeſty's profit and advantage.

'March 7th, This morning I went to wait upon my Lord Marſhal, who told me, he heard I uſed means to the King, to obtain Garter's place, but conceived it was his right, as Earl-Marſhal, to diſpoſe of it. I repeated him the reaſons I had before given his ſecretary, why I was of opinion it was the King's right, not his, and denied that I ſo much as looked after the place, and therefore acquainted him firſt with what the Biſhop of Saliſbury, out of kindneſs to me had done (though without my knowledge), next that I had entreated him to proceed no further, and laſtly gave his Lordſhip the ſame reaſons for declining the employment, which I had before given to the Biſhop. He thereupon deſired me to give him leave to tell the King ſo much, which I readily did. He then told me, he heard Sir William Howard made means to the King for it, and aſked my opinion whether he could be Garter, who was not of the Office of Arms. I anſwered, there had antiently been two perſons made Garter, who had not been officers of Arms; but I hoped the King would not ſo far diſcourage the preſent officers, as to chuſe a ſtranger in the place. Whereupon he aſked me leave to let the King know this was my ſenſe, which he did: then I acquainted him, that the King had commanded me to aſſiſt the Chancellor, in making out his right to the nomination of Garter, and though I refuſed the place, yet I durſt not deny him that ſervice: This he did not very well like, but I told him I knew not which way to avoid it.

(35) Aſhmole's Memoirs, p. 14—20.

'March 31, 1677. The next morning after the Earl-Marſhal's pretenſions to the right of nominating Garter, had been heard before the Committee appointed for that purpoſe, I had occaſion to attend my Lord Treaſurer Danby, about ſome buſineſs in the exciſe-office. Mr. Ch. Bertie, his ſecretary ſeeing me there, aſked me why I did not ſeek after the place? and intimated that my Lord Treaſurer thought me the fitteſt perſon for it; but I told him I had no ambition towards it, and feared that my attendance about this place, might occaſion ſome neglect in the exciſe-office; and though this excuſe ſtood me in ſome ſtead, and ſeemed conſiderable to others, to whom I had made uſe of it, yet he preſently replied, my Lord Treaſurer would give me leave to execute my Comptroller's place by deputy. To which I had nothing to reply, but that I had many other reaſons that induced me to wave the employment: upon this he told me, my Lord would ſpeak with me in the Park, where I attended till he came thither. When he came, he began to aſk me ſome few queſtions about the preparations he was to make againſt his Inſtallation, and who he ſhould ſend for to inform him therein. I anſwered it was the duty of Garter to inform him; and that this affair being debated the night before (where his Lordſhip was, and of the Committee), I preſumed would be known ere long what was then determined. He anſwered, the matter had that night before the Committee roſe, been determined on the King's ſide againſt my Lord Marſhal; upon which I told his Lordſhip, I preſumed within a few days, Garter would be nominated, and in regard it was above a fortnight to the day of his Inſtallation, it would be time enough to attend him, and make all things ready againſt that time. And here I preſume (by what I gathered from Mr. Bertie's preſſing me to make friends to obtain Garter's place) his Lordſhip expected I would have moved him to have ſpoke to the King for me, and pauſing a little while, aſked me, if I had any thing to ſay to him, I anſwered no, and ſo took my leave.

'In the afternoon Mr. Bertie meeting me again, aſked me what diſcourſe paſſed between his Lordſhip and me. I told him, who wondered I would not move him to ſpeak for me, and uſed many arguments to induce me yet to do it, and told me how unfit Mr. Lee (whom my Lord Marſhal intended for the place) was for it, nor was capable of it, not being a Gentleman of Blood; as he heard the conſtitution of the order required. I ſtill ſhewed my unwillingneſs and left him: notwithſtanding which, on Monday morning April the 1ſt, after he ſat more earneſtly again upon me, and told me he heard the place muſt ſpeedily be diſpoſed of, becauſe the day appointed for Inſtallation approached; and moſt earneſtly preſſed me to apply myſelf to the King to obtain it, but I told him, I was unfit for the place; at which he wondered I ſhould alledge that, when it appeared by my Book of the Garter, there was no Man fitter. I anſwered, my unfitneſs grew from deafneſs increaſing upon me, from decay of my eye-ſight, and greater decay in my memory, all which conſidered, did very much incapacitate me from that ſervice, to which he replied, he never knew any man diſcommend himſelf before, when ſo fair a way lay open for his preferment; I then gave him many hearty thanks for his kind inclinations to me, and ſo parted.

'April the 2d, The next morning my Lord Marſhal coming out of the Lords houſe, he told me, the King had pitched upon my father Dugdale to be Garter, and believed it would not diſpleaſe me. I anſwered, I was very glad of it, and I thought it was the beſt choice; but he being in Warwick-found the magiſtrates and ſome other leading perſons of the place, notwithſtanding both their obligations and their invitations, ſo far from being cordial, that he thought it prudent to draw off in time (g). On the twenty-ſixth of January, 1679, about ten in the morning, a fire began in the Middle Temple, in the next chambers to Mr. Aſhmole's, by which he loſt a library he had been collecting thirty-three years; but his MSS. eſcaped, by their being at his houſe in South Lambeth. He likewiſe loſt a collection of 9000 coins, ancient and modern; but his more valuable collection of gold medals were likewiſe preſerved by being at Lambeth; his vaſt repoſitory of ſeals, charters, and other antiquities and curioſities, periſhed alſo in the flames (b). In 1683, the univerſity of Oxford having finiſhed a noble repoſitory near the Theatre, Mr. Aſhmole ſent thither that great collection of rarities which he had received from the Tredeſcants beforementioned, together with ſuch additions as he had made to them, and to this great benefaction he afterwards added that of his MSS. and Library (i), which ſtill remain a monument of his generous love to learning in general, and to the univerſity of Oxford in particular [N]. In the beginning of the year 1685, he was invited by the magiſtrates, and by the Dean of Litchfield, to repreſent that corporation in Parliament; but upon King James's intimating to him by the Lord Dartmouth, that he would take it kindly if he would reſign his intereſt to Mr. Lewſon, he waited upon his Majeſty and told him, that he was all obedience (k). On the tenth of January, 1686, died his father-in-law, Sir William Dugdale, on which occaſion Mr. Aſhmole declined a ſecond time the office of Garter King at Arms, and did all that was in his power to recommend his brother Dugdale,

'ſhire, his Lordſhip added, he would ſend for him 'up by that night's poſt.

'I have been thus particular, becauſe after this 'time, ſome of the officers of Arms (Mr. Hold-'ford, &c.) aſſerted, my Lord Marſhal had ſaid, (and 'it was moſt certain) I ſought underhand to get Gar-'ter's place, though openly I ſeemed to decline it; 'which I could not but wonder at, becauſe I had 'been ſo clear with his Lordſhip, in averring the 'contrary; and alſo becauſe his Lordſhip had told 'my father, upon his coming to town, that I had 'carried myſelf very fairly in the managing the 'buſineſs againſt him. Though both honour and profit 'lay on this occaſion before me; yet God having 'taken from me both ambition and covetouſneſs, 'I ſet more value upon the retired life I was entered 'into, than all the advantage and honour I ſhould 'reap by that office.'

[N] To the univerſity of Oxford in particular.] The reaſon why our author had ſo warm an affection for Oxford, was plainly from his becoming a member thereof, in thoſe dreadful times of public confuſion, when all who were loyal reſorted to Oxford, and that moſt tender mother of arts, and nurſe of all virtues, opened her arms to embrace all who were loyal, let their circumſtances be what they would. This correſpondence begun in difficult, continued in diſmal times, begat on one ſide regard for ſo eminent a perſon, as appears by the notice taken of him among the writers of Brazen-noſe college (36), and on the other, the deepeſt reſpect for ſo venerable a body in a happier age, when peace, proſperity, and learning returned with the King. Theſe ſentiments diſcovered themſelves on both ſides, by a variety of public acts, which are mentioned in the text, and were cloſed by this. It was towards the latter end of October 1677, that he made an offer to the univerſity, of beſtowing on it all that valuable collection of the Tredeſcants, which was ſo well known to the learned world, and which had been exceedingly improved ſince it came into his poſſeſſion, together with all the coins, medals, and manuſcripts of his own collecting, provided they would erect a building fit to receive them; to which propoſition the univerſity willingly aſſented (37). Accordingly on Thurſday the 15th of May 1679, the firſt ſtone of that ſtately fabric, afterwards called Aſhmole's Muſæum, was laid on the weſt ſide of the theatre, and being finiſhed by the beginning of March, 1682, there were put therein on the 20th of the ſame month, about twelve cart-loads of rarities, ſent to Oxford by Mr. Aſhmole, which being fixed in their proper places, by Robert Plott, LL.D. who before had been intruſted with the cuſtody of the ſaid Muſæum, were firſt of all publicly viewed on the 21ſt of May following, by his Royal Highneſs James Duke of York, his royal Conſort Joſepha Maria, Princeſs Anne, and their attendants, and on the 24th of the ſame month, by the Doctors and Maſters of the univerſity. In a convocation held on the 4th of June following (1683) were letters openly read, whereby Mr. Aſhmole gave for ever to the univerſity of Oxford, all the ſaid rarities, notwithſtanding he had been courted by ſome to beſtow them elſewhere, and that others had offered great ſums for them. Whereupon a Latin letter of thanks, penned by him who was then deputy orator, being publicly read, was forthwith ſent to Mr. Aſhmole at South Lambeth (38). In July 1690, he viſited the univerſity with his wife, and was received with all imaginable honour, and entertained at a noble dinner in his Muſæum; upon which occaſion Mr. Edward Hannes, A. M. the Chemical Profeſſor, afterwards an eminent phyſician, made an elegant oration to him (39). His benefaction to the univerſity was very conſiderably enlarged at his death by the addition of his library, which conſiſted of one thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty-eight books, of which ſix hundred and twenty were manuſcripts, and of them three hundred and eleven folio's, relating chiefly to Engliſh Hiſtory, Heraldry, Aſtronomy, and Chemiſtry, with a great variety of pamphlets, part of which had been ſorted by himſelf, and the reſt are methodized ſince, and a double catalogue made, one claſſical, according to their various ſubjects, and another alphabetical (40). He bequeathed alſo to the ſame place, two gold chains and a medal, the one a philigreen chain of ninety links, weighing twenty-two ounces, with a medal of the Elector of Brandenburg, upon which is the effigies of that Elector, and on the reverſe, a view of Straelſund, ſtruck upon the ſurrender of that important city, a Collar of S.S. with a medal of the King of Denmark, and a gold medal of the Elector Palatine, and a George of the Duke of Norfolk, worn by his grandfather, when he was ambaſſador in Germany. All theſe he had received as acknowledgments of the honour which he had done the Garter, by his labours on that ſubject (41). Over the entrance to the Muſæum, fronting the ſtreet is the following inſcription in capital letters:

in which, though he did not fully ſucceed, yet he procured him the place of Norroy (l), and this was one of the laſt public acts of his life, the remainder of which was ſpent in an honourable retirement to the day of his demiſe, which happened on the eighteenth of May, 1692, in the ſeventy-ſixth year of his age (m). He was, beyond a queſtion, one of the greateſt men, and one of the greateſt patrons of learning in the laſt century. He was a great lover of Chemiſtry, and by his care and diligence, preſerved many valuable MSS. relating to that ſcience, beſides thoſe that he cauſed to be printed and publiſhed [O]. He had a great genius for hiſtory and antiquities, as ſufficiently appears by his learned and laborious works, both printed and manuſcripts [P]. He was likewiſe a generous encourager and protector of ſuch ingenious and learned men, as were leſs fortunate in the world than himſelf, as appears by his kindneſs to Sir George Wharton in the worſt of times (n), his reſpect to the memory of his friend Mr. John Booker (o), and the care he took in the education of the late eminent Dr. George Smalridge (p), as will be ſhewn in our article of him. His corpſe was interred in the church of Great Lambeth in Surrey, on the twenty-ſixth of May, 1692, and a black marble ſtone laid over his grave, with a Latin inſcription, in which, though there is much to his honour, there

[O] Beſides thoſe he cauſed to be printed and publiſhed.] After Mr. Aſhmole once addicted himſelf to the ſtudy of antiquities and records, he never deſerted it, or could be prevailed upon to reſume his deſign of ſending abroad the works of the other Engliſh Adepti, though he had made large collections towards it. I have a very good authority for what I ſay. Mr. William Cooper in his preface to one of Philalethes's pieces, which he publiſhed in 1678, ſpeaking of our author's Theatrum Chymicum Britannicum, ſays (39), I heartily wiſh that the learned Philoſophers of our age, could prevail with him to publiſh his ſecond volume of that collection, which he had almoſt finiſhed almoſt twenty years ſince (as I had it from his own mouth) and hath lain a-ſleep ever ſince, and likely ſo to lye; for to the perfecting thereof, he is now unwilling to be brought, unleſs ſome worthy friend of his can be wrought upon to prevail with him, before the ſleep of death ſeizes him, and leaves theſe rare pieces of antiquity to be inevitably loſt, to the prejudice of all philoſophers, and great diſhonour to the Engliſh nation. This very complaint, ſhews how well (even then) he ſtood with the Hermetic tribe, of whom this Mr. Cooper was the moſt zealous encourager, and yet no reaſon is aſſigned for his remiſſneſs, which ſuits ſo little with the character of the indefatigable Mr. Aſhmole, that I am convinced he was with-held by ſome more worthy motive. In ſhort, I am perſuaded ſome of the abler Alchemiſts ſhewed him his miſtakes, as to what he had already publiſhed, particularly as to the Arcanum beforementioned, which he calls the work of a concealed author, though in what ſeems to be the motto, viz. the words Penes nos unda Tagi, the very name of the author was expreſſed, viz. Jean Eſpagnet. He was Preſident of the Parliament of Bourdeaux, and is eſteemed the ableſt writer on this ſort of learning, whoſe works are extant. But this piece publiſhed by Mr. Aſhmole, was only the ſecond part of Eſpagnet's work, the firſt being publiſhed under this title, Enchiridion Phyſicæ reſtitutæ cum Arcano Philoſophiæ Hermeticæ. Pariſ. 1623, 8*vo. i. e.* The Enchiridion of revived Phyſick, with the ſecret of the Hermetic Philoſophy. In the title of this work, the author's name is concealed under another anagrammatical motto, viz. Spes mea in agno eſt. The ſecond part was entitled, Enchiridium Philoſophiæ Hermeticæ. Pariſ. 1628, 8*vo.* It was printed again in 1647, and a third time in 1650, and from this laſt edition our author tranſlated it. The truth is, and the Abbé Freſnoy has very juſtly obſerved it, our author was never an Adept, and began to write when he was but a diſciple (40). He grew afterwards more cautious, and though he never miſſed any opportunity of purchaſing chymical MSS., yet he was cured of the itch of publiſhing them, and held it ſufficient to depoſit them in the Bodleian library, for their greater ſecurity, and for the benefit of ſociety. As this has not been taken notice of at all by any of the writers of his life, I imagine, I may do ſome ſervice to the lovers of Chemiſtry, if I juſt mention a few of thoſe pieces, thus preſerved by the care of Mr. Aſhmole. 1. Geberi, ſuper Artem Alchymiæ, lib. vi. i. e. Geber's Art of Alchemy in ſix books, a quarto MS. on parchment. 2. Albohali; i. e. Avicennæ liber de rebus Alchymicis; e. Albohali; that is, Avicenna's Treatiſe on Chemical Matters. This piece is highly valuable and curious. 3. De diſtinctione Mercurii Aquarum, liber unus; i. e. Of the Diſtinction of the Mercury of Waters. This piece is aſcribed to Morienus, a Roman Hermit, who flouriſhed in the XIIth century. 4. Pupilla oculi; i. e. The Apple of the Eye; by Sir George Ripley. This was to have been included in the ſecond volume of his Theatrum, and this copy he had prepared for the preſs. 5. De Regimine Ignium Philoſophorum & quibuſdam Experimentis probatiſſimis; i. e. Of the management of the Philoſophers Fires, together with ſome approved Experiments. This treatiſe was written alſo by Sir George Ripley, and was to have made a part of the ſame collection. I might add to theſe, a noble copy of the Chemical works of Raymond Lully, in two folios, and many others; but theſe are more than ſufficient to ſhew the curious and intelligent reader, how induſtrious and careful, and, at the ſame time, how capable, and how accurate, a collector he was of treatiſes of this kind, having wonderfully improved himſelf in this knowledge, after he declined writing more upon it, or at leaſt the publiſhing of what he wrote. In foreign countries he was highly extolled for the pains he took in collecting, publiſhing, and explaining, the Engliſh authors on Hermetic Philoſophy, and when his work of the Garter made him ſtill more known to the Princes of Germany, he received their complements on his former performance (41). Neither has his reputation abroad been at all injured by time: for ſince the very learned Olaus Borrichius, Morhoff, Boerhaave, and other great men, have ſhewn the ignorance of ſuch as ran down Chemical writers without diſtinction, and have revived, very deſervedly, the reputation of ſome of theſe old authors; Mr. Aſhmole, who ſaved ſo many of the beſt of them from oblivion, has been juſtly mentioned, as a great preſerver, patron, and protector of learning, which indeed was a character he very juſtly merited, ſince no man ever ſhewed in this reſpect, either more zeal, diligence, or public ſpirit. If therefore we conſider him in this light, we muſt allow that he very worthily filled that poſt which he aſſigned himſelf, when declining the arduous labours which were neceſſary to the gaining his father Backhouſe's legacy, and becoming an Adept, he modeſtly and truly ſtiled himſelf Mercuriophilus Anglicus; a title ſo juſt, and ſo expreſſive of his real deſerts, that one would have thought he had exerted his ſkill as a Herald, in deviſing it, if we had not known that Chemiſtry was his firſt, and to his laſt continued his favourite ſtudy.

[P] Laborious works both printed and manuſcripts.] We have already given an exact account of all the works that were publiſhed by our author in his lifetime; it remains therefore, that we ſay ſomething of ſuch as were publiſhed after his deceaſe, and of thoſe that ſtill continue in MS. V. The Arms, Epitaphs, Feneſtral Inſcriptions, with the Draughts of the Tombs, &c. in all the Churches in Berkſhire. It was penned in 1666; and the original viſitation taken in the two preceding years, in virtue of his deputation from Sir Edward Byſhe, Clariencieux King at Arms, which makes another folio volume, ſtands next to this in Mr. Aſhmole's collection of MSS., but both have been publiſhed to the world within theſe few years, under another title than their author ever deſigned them. VI. Familiarum illuſtrium Imperatorumq; Romanorum there is nothing which exceeds the truth [Q]. It was the peculiar happineſs of Mr. Aſhmole, that, living and dead, a due reſpect was paid to his learning, virtue, and public ſpirit. His unſhaken loyalty to his Royal Maſter, in the worſt of times, recommended him to the worthieſt men in the kingdom, as his application to the Sciences then moſt in eſteem, gained the friendſhip of the powerful and conſiderable amongſt the other party, by which he ſecured peace, and the leiſure neceſſary to follow his private ſtudies, when it was no longer poſſible for him to ſerve the Public. But notwithſtanding he concealed, he never changed, or made a ſhew of changing his principles; ſo that on the Reſtoration of King Charles II., he ſtood ſo clear in his Majeſty's opinion, that, by his order, Mr. Secretary Nicholas acquainted the Lord High-Treaſurer, Southampton, that Mr. Aſhmole was a perſon that his Majeſty had a more than ordinary deſire to prefer, adding, on his own knowledge, that he was a very deſerving perſon, and a man of more than ordinary parts. The learned Dr. Plott thought our author an honour to the country in which he was born, and therefore places him amongſt the moſt eminent men it had

XIII. The Arms, Epitaphs, Inſcriptions, &c. in Cheſhire, Shropſhire, Derbyſhire, Nottinghamſhire, &c. taken at the ſame time. Biſhop Nicolſon, tells us ſomething of his intention to write the Hiſtory and Antiquities of his native Town of Litchfield, which it may be preſumed his Lordſhip took upon memory, ſince in the ſame paragraph, he calls Mr. Aſhmole, Garter King at Arms, which ſhews no great attention to what he was writing (43). XIV. Anſwers to the Objections urged againſt Mr. Aſhmole's being made Hiſtoriographer to the Order of the Garter, A. D. 1662. XV. A Tranſlation of John Francis Spina's Book of the Cataſtrophe of the world, to which was ſubjoined Ambroſe Merlin's Prophecy. Mr. Wood tells us, that he was not informed by Mr. Aſhmole's letter (44), when or where this tranſlation was publiſhed, and indeed I make ſome doubt, whether it was publiſhed at all. Father Niceron (45), in his ſhort account of the life of Aſhmole, which is entirely tranſcribed from Wood, mentions none but the books publiſhed in his lifetime, and is not very correct even as to theſe; but we have fully ſhewn that what he printed, was but a very ſmall part of what he wrote; and indeed there is ſcarcely any branch of our Engliſh hiſtory and antiquities, on which he has not left us ſomething valuable, of his own compoſing, in that vaſt repoſitory of papers, which make ſeveral folios, in his Collection of MSS., under the title of XVI. Collections, Remarks, Notes on Books, and MSS., which is a noble proof of his induſtry and application. To cloſe this account, and to give the reader ſome notion of a piece which we have ſo often cited, we ſhall laſtly mention, XVII. The Diary of his Life, written by himſelf, which was publiſhed at London 1717, in 12°. with the following title. Memoirs of the Life of that learned Antiquary, Elias Aſhmole, Eſquire, drawn up by himſelf by way of Diary, with an Appendix of Original Letters. Publiſhed by Charles Burman, Eſquire. The editor tells us in the preface. 'That the copy from 'whence theſe papers were publiſhed, was in the 'hand-writing of Dr. Robert Plott, chief keeper of the 'Aſhmolean Muſæum at Oxford, and Secretary of the 'Royal Society, and was tranſcribed by him for the 'uſe of a near relation of Mr. Aſhmole's, a private 'gentleman in Staffordſhire: That they had been 'collated a few years before, by David Perry, 'M. A. of Jeſus College, in Oxford, and chief keeper 'to the Muſæum, who corrected from the ori-'ginal manuſcripts (46) ſome few literal errors.' The editor concludes with obſerving, that he ſhall not deſcant upon the uſefulneſs of theſe kind of works, but only ſay thus much, That they let us into the ſecret hiſtory of affairs of their ſeveral times, diſcover the ſprings of motion, and diſplay many valuable, though minute circumſtances, overlooked, or unknown to our general hiſtorians; and, to conclude all, ſatiate our largeſt curioſity. The appendix contains a letter of thanks, dated January 26, 1666, from the corporation at Litchfield, upon the receipt of a ſilver bowl preſented to them by Mr. Aſhmole: A preface to the catalogue of Archbiſhop Laud's medals, drawn up by Mr. Aſhmole, and preſerved in the public library at Oxford: A letter from Dr. Thomas Barlow, afterwards Biſhop of Lincoln, to Mr. Aſhmole, dated December 28, 1668, on the preſent of his books, deſcribing Archbiſhop Laud's cabinet of medals: A letter from John Evelyn, Eſq; to recommend Dr. Plott to him for reader in Natural Philoſophy, and another from Mr. Joſhua Barnes, dated from Emanuel college, Cambridge, October 15, 1688, wherein he deſires Mr. Aſhmole's pardon, for having reflected upon his Order of the Garter, in his own hiſtory of King Edward III., with Mr. Aſhmole's anſwer to that letter, dated October 23, following. How dry and unentertaining ſoever the peruſal of ſuch a note-book may be in itſelf, yet, as a ſupport in regard to facts and authorities, it is certainly impoſſible to find one that deſerves greater credit.

produced, and to juſtify this, gives him the following character (q). ‘ The worſhipful ‘ Elias Aſhmole, Eſq; of Brazen-Noſe college, Oxon, was born at Litchfield in this ‘ county, who for his general ſkill in all the politer ſorts of learning, ſuch as Heraldry, ‘ Antiquities, Chemiſtry, Aſtrology, Natural Philoſophy, &c. was made firſt Windſor ‘ Herald, and had the ſuperviſing and ordering the King's cabinet of coins, and made ‘ catalogues of thoſe in the univerſity of Oxford, which univerſity, upon his extraordinary ‘ merit, ſent him a diploma, for his Doctor's degree in the faculty of Phyſic, ex mero ‘ motu, without his knowledge or ſeeking; he was alſo honoured in the Inns of Court, ‘ with the title and degree of Barriſter at Law. Laſtly, our late dread Sovereign, King ‘ Charles II., being conſcious of his great knowledge, induſtry, and fidelity, made him ‘ Comptroller of all the Exciſe in England and Wales; he hath obliged the learned ‘ world with many curious books, and lately the univerſity of Oxford, with the beſt ‘ Hiſtory of Nature, Arts, and Antiquities, to be ſeen any where in the world, ‘ not in print or ſculpture, but in a generous donation of the real things themſelves, where- ‘ with they have furniſhed the new Muſæum, lately there erected, and gratefully ſtiled it, ‘ (as a perpetual memorial of ſo noble a benefaction) the Muſæum Aſhmoleanum.’ It is true, Dr. Plott had great obligations to our author, and therefore it may be ſuſpected (eſpecially as Mr. Aſhmole was living at the time of his publiſhing that work) that his gratitude had a large ſhare in his eulogium; but nothing of this ſort can be objected to Anthony Wood, who wrote after Mr. Aſhmole's deceaſe, and ſeldom erred on the ſide of panegyric. He ſays, ſpeaking of our author, ‘ I muſt take leave to tell the reader, he was the greateſt Virtuoſo ‘ or Curioſo that ever was known or read of in England before his time. Uxor ſolis took ‘ up its habitation in his breaſt, and in his boſom the great God did abundantly ſtore up the ‘ treaſures of all ſorts of wiſdom and knowledge (r).’ This we muſt allow to be an extraordinary commendation from ſo ſplenetic a writer, who has not failed giving place to every thing he had heard, that might abate the reputation of this worthy perſon [R], as well as to theſe juſt praiſes, which envy herſelf could not refuſe him. But the univerſity of Oxford, more courteous than her Antiquary, expreſſes our author's merit in few words, in the diploma, by which, without his ſolicitation (or ſo much as his knowledge), ſhe created him Doctor in Phyſic; for there his profound learning, as well as his benevolence to that learned body, is ſaid to have rendered him moſt dear to the univerſity. Ob eruditionem recondita & benevolentia in academia propenſa nobis chariſſimus (s), are their words, and for the ſame cauſes ſhould his memory remain dear to lateſt poſterity; ſince to them have deſcended not only the teſtimonies he gave of his deep ſcience, but alſo thoſe mighty helps, which by his pains he procured, and by his bounty beſtowed, where they might beſt anſwer the ends of judicious enquirers through all ſucceeding ages.

[R] That might abate the reputation of this worthy perſon.] After mentioning the rarities, coins, medals, books, and manuſcripts, given by Mr. Aſhmole in his lifetime, and at his death, to the univerſity of Oxford, he very abruptly proceeds thus (48), ‘ But the beſt elixir that he enjoyed, which was the ‘ foundation of his riches, wherewith he purchaſed ‘ books, rarities, and other things, were the lands, ‘ and jointures, which he had with his ſecond wife, ‘ Mary, &c. widow of Sir Thomas Manwaring, ‘ of the Inner Temple, Knt. ſome time Steward of ‘ Reading: After whoſe death Mr. Aſhmole taking ‘ her to wife, Nov. 16, 1649, enjoyed her eſtate, ‘ though not her company, for altogether, to the ‘ day of her death, which happened April 1, 1668.’ In this jumbled and unconnected paragraph, there is a large proportion of malice, and a very ſmall mixture of truth, as the reader will eaſily diſcern from a ſhort examination. 1. There is a baſe innuendo, as if Mr. Aſhmole had ſtudied Chemiſtry to little purpoſe, ſince without his wife, he had miſſed of the elixir, whereas in fact, he was a lover of Chemiſtry, only never wrought with his hands, and conſequently never ſought the elixir, which indeed he never needed. 2. It is inſinuated, that from this marriage Mr. Aſhmole obtained all that he had, and that if he was a great benefactor to the univerſity of Oxford, it came all out of his lady's lands, and jointures: But is this true? A very large part of his collection was bequeathed to him by Mr. John Tredeſcant, and conſequently did not come by his wife. Beſides, a prodigious ſhare of what curioſities, &c. he might have purchaſed in that wife's time, were burned in the fire, which conſumed his chambers in the Temple, and ſo were loſt to him and the univerſity too. Laſtly, after this lady's deceaſe, Mr. Aſhmole remained Windſor Herald, Keeper of Rarities to the King, Commiſſioner for recovering King Charles the Firſt's goods, Secretary of Surinam, and Comptroller of the Exciſe, which places one would imagine, might furniſh occaſion and money too, for buying books and curioſities, as well as Lady Manwaring's jointure; ſo that, after all, there is as little of veracity, as of decency or gratitude, in theſe remarks of our Antiquary of Oxford. 3. But the ſevereſt ſtroke of all, is as to the ſeparation of him and his wife, which might induce an unwary reader, to believe Mr. Aſhmole uſed this lady very ill, who brought him all this money; whereas in fact ſhe uſed him ſo, or the Court of Chancery had never ſent her back to him again, after her complaint to that Court, as it has been before ſhewn was actually done.

(48) Ath. Oxon. Vol. ii. col. 891.

But what is ſtill more extraordinary in Mr. Wood's manner of penning this life, is his taking an opportunity at the cloſe of it, to ſhew his diſtaſte in very unmannerly terms, towards the widow of Mr. Aſhmole, of whom he gives us this account (49). ‘ Soon after ‘ Mr. Aſhmole's death, his widow, Elizabeth, who ‘ ſeemed to have had a great love and fondneſs for ‘ her huſband (which was ſometimes before company ‘ expreſſed) married a luſty man, called John Rey- ‘ nolds, a Stone-Cutter, but had no iſſue by him.’ Theſe are particulars, which no way deſerve the notice of poſterity, and are quite below the dignity of a Biographer, who ought to have no other view, than to ſerve the public, by recording what ſucceeding generations ought either to follow or to ſhun. [It is not much to the honour of Dr. Plott's judgment and taſte, that, when he was enumerating the politer parts of learning, he could think of nothing but Heraldry, Antiquities, Chemiſtry, Aſtrology, and Natural Philoſophy.——In Mr. Gough's anecdotes of Britiſh Topography, there is an account of the ſeveral works that have been publiſhed upon the order of the Garter; from which it appears that, though ſome of them have their diſtinct and ſeparate merit, none of them can be compared with Mr. Aſhmole's noble performance (50).] K.

ASHTON (THOMAS), a Clergyman in the time of the Uſurpation, was the ſon of Thomas Aſhton, and born at Teuerdley in Lancaſhire, in 1631 (a). At ſixteen years of age, he was admitted a Servitor of Brazen-noſe College in Oxford, and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, February 7, 1650 (b). He was choſen fellow of his college, and took holy orders. Mr. Wood tells us (c), he was a 'forward and conceited ſcholar,' and 'became a malapert preacher in and near Oxford.' Being appointed to preach at St. Mary's, on Tueſday (a lecture-day) July 25, 1654, he gave ſo great offence by his ſermon [A], that he was in a fair way of expulſion; but, by the interceſſion of friends, the matter was compromiſed: nevertheleſs he was obliged, about two years after, to quit his fellowſhip upon ſome quarrel which he had with Dr. Greenwood, Principal of his houſe. In 1656, he was intruſted with a commiſſion from the Protector to be chaplain to the Engliſh forces in the iſland of Jerſey; but was ſoon after diſplaced upon the arrival of a new Governor. After the King's Reſtoration, he was beneficed ſomewhere near Hertford in Hertfordſhire; where, Mr. Wood ſays, 'he ſoon after finiſhed his reſtleſs 'courſe.' He publiſhed two pieces [B], mentioned below.

ASHWELL (GEORGE), Rector of Hanwell, near Banbury in Oxfordſhire, was the ſon of Robert Aſhwell of Harrow on the Hill in Middleſex, and was born in the pariſh of St. Martin, near Ludgate, in London, November the 18th, 1612. He was admitted a ſcholar of Wadham-college in Oxford in 1627, took the degrees in arts, was elected Fellow, and became a celebrated Tutor in that houſe. In the time of the Grand Rebellion he continued in Oxford, and preached ſeveral times before the King, Court, and Parliament. A little before the ſurrender of the garriſon of Oxford, he had the degree of Bachelor in Divinity conferred on him (a). About the latter end of the year 1658, he was preſented to the living of Hanwell, vacant by the death of Doctor Robert Harris, having been before (as Mr. Wood thinks) Chaplain in the family of Sir Anthony Cope, Lord of the Manour of Hanwell (b). He had the character of a very peaceable and religious man, and was well verſed in Logic, the Schoolmen, and the Fathers. He wrote the following books. I. Fides Apoſtolica, or A Diſcourſe aſſerting the received Authors and Authority of the Apoſtles Creed. Oxon. 1653, 8vo. II. A Double Appendix, the firſt touching the Athanaſian, the ſecond touching the Nicene Creed, printed with the Fides Apoſtolica [A]. He publiſhed the Diſſertation as a ſpecimen of his performance, and to try what ſucceſs he might reaſonably expect from the publication of the whole (2).

[C] Philoſophus autodidactus, &c.] In this Epiſtle (Mr. Wood tells us) is demonſtrated by what ſteps and degrees human reaſon, improved by diligent obſervation and experience, may arrive to the knowledge of natural things, and from thence to the diſcovery of ſuper-naturals, more eſpecially of God, and the concerns of another life. ASSHETON (William), Doctor of Divinity, and Rector of Beckenham in Kent, was the ſon of the Reverend Mr. Aſheton, Rector of Middleton in Lancaſhire, of the ancient family of the Baronets of that name and place (a). He was born in the year 1641, had his education in a private country ſchool, and was from thence removed to Brazen-noſe College in Oxford, July 3, 1658 (b). Here he imbibed the ſtrongeſt principles of true religion and loyalty [A], and made ſo quick a progreſs in every branch of good literature, that he ſoon merited a fellowſhip, into which he was elected in 1663, being then Bachelor of Arts (c). After he had taken the degree of Maſter of Arts, he went into orders, and was a preacher for ſome time in the parts about Oxford (d). He was appointed Chaplain to James Duke of Ormond, Chancellor of that Univerſity, whom he ſerved in that capacity both in England and Ireland. He took the degree of Doctor in Divinity, in January 1673; and, the February following, he ſucceeded Doctor Benjamin Parry, in the Prebend of Knareſburgh, in the church of York (e). His attendance on his Patron brought him to London, where he obtained the living of St. Antholin (f); and in 1676, by the Duke's intereſt with the family of the St. Johns, he was preſented to the rectory of Beckenham in Kent. He was frequently and unanimouſly choſen Proctor for Rocheſter in Convocation [B]. This worthy Divine was the firſt projector of the ſcheme for providing a maintenance for clergymen's widows, and others, by a jointure payable out of the Mercers Company [C]. He wrote ſeveral pieces againſt the

[A] He imbibed, at Oxford, the ſtrongeſt principles of true religion and loyalty.] Mr. Wood pretends (1), that he was, at his firſt admiſſion in the college, put under a Preſbyterian tutor; by which means he was very early tinctured with the principles of that ſect; inſomuch, that (as our Antiquarian expreſſes it) he frequented, with Sam. Parker, the religious meetings in the houſe of Beſſe Hampton, an old decrepid laundreſs, living in Halywell in the north ſuburb of Oxford; but that he changed his principles after the Reſtoration of King Charles II. This is not eaſily reconciled with what the author of his Life tells us, that 'He was providentially 'bleſſed in ſome orthodox and loyal inſtructors, ſuch 'as ſecured him from the general contagion (2).' It is true, the ſame author confeſſes, 'He fell into 'ſome dangerous hands at ſchool and the univerſity, 'and lay under many temptations, where the lea-'vens of error and hypocriſy prevailed:' but, at the ſame time, he argues againſt the probability of his having ever fallen in with the Preſbyterian party. 'Beſides (ſays he), as it pleaſed God to endow him 'with a moſt towardly diſpoſition, a moſt compaſ-'ſionate good nature, a very ſtudious humble mind, 'and modeſt behaviour, as with all virtuous incli-'nations and ſpecial graces; ſo he could never be 'ſo much as tainted with ill notions of any kind, 'nor ever be drawn into the party of any furious 'zealots, libertines, &c. whom he wanted not ſpirit 'to oppoſe on all due occaſions, and in proper ſea-'ſons throughout his life (3).'

[B] He was frequently and unanimouſly choſen Proctor for Rocheſter in Convocation.] He was ſo often elected into this office, that at length he begged leave to decline the favour; as he found the diſtempers of his ſtudious ſedentary life, the gravel and ſtone, growing upon him, which diſabled him for attendance and fatigues. However, he was prevailed upon to continue in that function; his great abilities and integrity rendering him the fitteſt perſon to repreſent thoſe of his order (4).

(4) Id. ibid. p. 41.

[C] He projected the ſcheme for providing for Clergymen's widows, and others, by a jointure payable out of the Mercers Company.] Dr. Aſheton gave the public an account of this ſcheme, in a book, entitled, A full Account of the Riſe, Progreſs, and Advantages of Dr. Aſheton's Propoſal, &c. (5) In the Preface we are told, that 'As Dr. Aſheton did not 'project this propoſal for his own private advan-'tage, but doth ſincerely deſign a public good; in 'like manner, the worthy members of the Mercers 'Company have undertaken to manage this Propoſal, 'not from any proſpect of advantage to their own 'private perſons, but only out of a generous deſign 'to make the Company more capable to anſwer the 'end and reaſon of their charter; which is to eſta-'bliſh and manage public charities, and thereby to 'enlarge their capacity of doing good.' An Advertiſement, which follows the Preface, informs us, that 'This Propoſal being firſt projected for the be-'nefit of thoſe who have ſmall eſtates, the words 'poverty and poor do ſometimes occur in the ex-'plication of it; and therefore, that perſons of ho-'nour and quality may not be prejudiced againſt it, 'as if it nothing concerned them; they may pleaſe 'to be informed, that this Propoſal, as now model-'led and improved, may be ſerviceable to thoſe of 'quality and eſtate: 1. By enabling them to ſettle, 'or the Papiſts and Diſſenters, and ſome practical and devotional tracts [D]. A few years before his death, he was invited to accept of the Headſhip of his College, then vacant; which

' or enlarge jointures, without clogging their lands: ' 2. By encouraging them to demand larger portions than otherwiſe, without the help of this Propoſal, they could rationally expect.' The bringing this ſcheme to perfection, took up Dr. Aſsheton's thoughts many years. For though he was encouraged by many judicious perſons, in the proſecution of the deſign, yet where to fix it, or how to provide ſuch a fund as might ſecure the Subſcribers, was a matter of ſome difficulty. However, he reſolved to go on; and, if poſſible, to finiſh what he had ſo long projected. His firſt addreſs was to the Corporation of the Clergy, who declared, they were not in a capacity to accept the Propoſal. His next Application was to the Royal Bank of England, where he met with no better ſucceſs. Whereupon the Doctor applied himſelf to the Mercers Company; who, after full debates in their general Courts and Committees, agreed with him upon certain rules and orders; out of which I ſhall extract the following particulars: 1. 'That the Company will take in ' ſubſcriptions at any time, till the ſum of 100,000 l. ' be ſubſcribed, but will never exceed that ſum. ' 2. That all married men, at the age of thirty ' years or under, may ſubſcribe any ſum not exceeding 1000 l. That all married men, not exceeding the age of forty years, may ſubſcribe any ſum, not exceeding 500 l. And that all married men, not exceeding the age of ſixty years, may ſubſcribe any ſum, not exceeding 300 l. And that the widows of all perſons, ſubſcribing according to theſe limitations, ſhall receive the benefit of 30 per cent. per annum, according to the former Propoſal, free of all taxes and charges, at the two uſual Feaſts of the Annunciation of the Bleſſed Virgin Mary, and St. Michael the Archangel; and that the firſt of theſe payments ſhall be made at the firſt of the ſaid Feaſt days, which ſhall happen four months or more after the deceaſe of the perſon or perſons ſo ſubſcribing; excepting ſuch as ſhall voluntarily make away with themſelves, or by any act of theirs occaſion their own death; either by duelling or committing any crime, whereby they ſhall be ſentenced, and put to death by juſtice: in any, or either of theſe caſes, the widows to receive no annuity; but, upon delivering up the Company's bond, to have the ſubſcription money paid to them. 3. That no ſea-faring men may ſubſcribe, who follow it as their buſineſs or vocation; nor others, who go farther than Holland, Ireland, or the coaſts of England; and that any perſon may ſubſcribe for any others, whom he ſhall nominate in his laſt will, during the natural life of his wife, if ſhe ſurvive, and his intention be declared in his ſubſcription.' The Company had ſeveral meetings in Committees with the Doctor, about ſettling a ſufficient ſecurity; in which they ſatisfied him that their eſtates, being clear rents, amounted to 2888 l. 8 s. 10 d. beſides the payments of the benefactors, to be paid out of the ſame; which, by a moderate calculation, would yield, when the leaſes came out, above 13500 l. per annum. All things being agreed upon, the Deed of Settlement was executed by the Company and Truſtees, at a general Court of the ſaid Company, held on Wedneſday the 4th of October, 1699. This Deed is enrolled in the High Court of Chancery, and an authentic copy of it kept by the Company (6).

[E] An Extract of Dr. Aſsheton's Character from the Author of his Life (10).] 'He was very regular and aſſiduous in private Devotion, Meditation, and Reading. ——— Hiſtory and Philoſophy, he juſtly uſed as the proper handmaids to Divinity, which was his buſineſs and delight, his Study indeed. ——— He readily ſubſcribed to the publiſhing all critical, learned, and laborious works. ——— Thus he compleated one of the beſt Libraries any Clergyman can deſire, having the bleſſing of a ſufficient revenue, out of which he laid out at leaſt 10*l.* per annum, to improve and increaſe his firſt ſtock of books; whereof he ſent many duplicates, upon requeſt, for Wales, and the Highlands of Scotland. ——— Among all his books, thoſe of devotion were intermixed, or at hand, to begin and end with. ——— His zeal in and for the Church, was ever conſpicuous. ——— He preached twice every Sunday, to keep the people from ſtraggling, and engage them to frequent the church; otherwiſe he knew, and lamented, that we have but too much preaching in the nation. ——— At length he found his labour too great for him; which yet rather than leſſen (though in a ſmall pariſh), he was willing to keep an aſſiſtant before he died; to whom he committed the catechizing part in his declining age, allowing him 5*s.* per Sunday, over and above 30*l.* per annum, and the benefit of his table all Church-days, &c. with ſeveral gifts and advantages that made up the whole about 50*l.* per annum. ——— He watched diligently over his flock, and never neglected to pray for them, and bleſs them; neither would he ſuffer any to periſh for want of admonition or reproof; as well in the ſpirit of meekneſs, as with all authority; though he never ſued, cited, or proſecuted the moſt injurious and obſtinate offenders; yet he rebuked and avoided the unruly, and kept the impertinently cenſorious, and perverſe, at a due diſtance. ——— He knew, and did his own duty well; and would have all his people mind theirs, who were not to tell him what to preach, &c. however offended at his juſt reproofs and warnings; of which he had an inſtance in a wilful profaner, and abſenter from the Church ſometimes, and from the Lord's Table always; pretending that the Doctor had preached againſt him, and told him, he ſhould be damned, before all the congregation. ——— He ſo much the more deſerved of his pariſh, as he was more generous and charitable among them, than juſt to himſelf, in diſregarding often his ſmall tythes and perquiſites, taking quietly what ſome left him, and helping all; wherein, to make all juſt and eaſy too, he tried all poſſible fair ways without contention, by letting out the whole, and letting every man his part; and at laſt taking all in kind, when they would not come near the value. He perſiſted in taking his tenths many years, till his death, with all imaginable eaſe to his people, and too much loſs and expence to himſelf; who yet always obſerved and declared, that the worſt tythe was better than the beſt compoſition he could make; moſt country-men being too hard at bargains, and often ſo unreaſonable, as to ſtand in their own light, as they called it. ——— He kept a conſtant good table, and ſeemed glad of daily gueſts, excepting on Faſt-days, &c. otherwiſe the more frequent viſits were to him, the more welcome. ——— He kept up the true moderate Engliſh hoſpitality, genteelly managed by an excellent Virgin-ſiſter (who lived and died with him, while he continued ſingle), and ſome few years by a truly virtuous wife, though ſickly, for whom he ſet up his coach, being moſt tender of her, and ſorrowful at her death. ——— As he was a moſt affectionate, tender huſband, and brother; ſo he was a juſt indulgent maſter, and had generally careful and honeſt ſervants, whom he took pains to make religious, peaceable, and ſober. ——— He daily obſerved the good old religious way of Family-devotions, and Sunday-repetitions, &c. in the evening, for heavenly knowledge, grace, and protection hourly. ——— He ſometimes uſed extempore Sermons (having a body of Divinity in his head), until he was diſturbed, and put into a conſternation with his congregation, by a woman ſwooning away in the church, who was ſoon carried out, and the people became ſilent; yet he could not recover his ſubject, nor recollect any thing he had ſaid before; which obliged him to make an apology and come down. This he took as a warning, never to preſume upon the ſtrength of his parts or memory any more; neither would he ever after venture into any pulpit without notes. ——— He was eaſy of acceſs, moſt courteous and affable, meek as a lamb, harmleſs as a dove; but withal, wiſe to diſtinguiſh perſons, times, and places. His table-talk was both delightful and improving; he diverted ſad ſtories, and decried falſe ones; he would not willingly know a wicked perſon, or ſuffer a lier or tale-bearer in his ſight. He never looked ſo frowning, as when a certain gentleman was backbiting another, and telling them a ſcandalous ſtory; he ſtarted up, and with emotion aſked him, If he could face the abſent? which ſoon confounded the whiſperer.' In this extract the reader will perceive, that I have ſelected only thoſe particulars, which moſt ſtrongly mark Dr. Aſsheton's character; which I ſhall ſum up in the words of an ingenious writer, quoted by the author of his life (11). Though low of ſtature, and mean aſpect, yet truly reverend; his countenance was full of mildneſs and courteſy; his eyes more ſmiling than his mouth; his diſcourſe grave and ſober; words ſmooth and proper, diſtinctly diſtinctly uttered, with due reſpect to time, place, and perſon. His religion was legible in the innocency of his life, exactneſs of his morals, integrity and truth of his words, and the juſtice and honeſty of his converſation. He abſtained from offending, as if none ever pardoned; yet pardoned, as if he daily offended. His paſſions he made ſervants to his reaſon and religion; and if they rebelled, firſt concealed, and then ſuppreſſed their mutiny. He generally ſpake little; ſaw others tempers, without diſcovering his own; yet, when occaſion ſerved, ſhewed that his ſilence neither proceeded from affectation nor weakneſs: for by running back to ages paſt, and recovering events out of memory, and then preventing time in flying forward to future things, and comparing one with the other, he would give a verdict very near prophetical; yet was ſo free from vanity, he could bear interruption patiently. Such was his prudence, and ſo exact his judgment, as to diſcern between pride and greatneſs, religion and ſuperſtition, quickneſs and raſhneſs, government and tyranny, liberty and licentiouſneſs, ſubjection and ſervitude, frugality and covetouſneſs, &c. and to give to every cauſe its proper actions and effects. He drank wine, as ſick men take phyſic, merely for health: Reaſon was his rule, conſcience his counſellor; and his actions were ever contrary to thoſe he found fault with. Age rendered him neither moroſe nor imperious; his converſation was ſo affable, pleaſant, and inſtructive, that young and old both delighted and profited in his company. B.

[Though Dr. Aſsheton appears to have been a pious, worthy, and uſeful clergyman, it will be deemed, at preſent, of little advantage to his literary character, that his firſt writings were againſt Toleration. Neither do his opinions concerning Paſſive Obedience and Apparitions redound much to his honour. But theſe errors are, perhaps, rather to be imputed to the times than the man. His beſt works are thoſe which were written for the inſtruction and edification of his Pariſhioners, and to promote practical Religion. He was a zealous Divine, who, with a conſiderable degree of abilities and learning, was always ready to defend what were eſteemed the Orthodox Doctrines of the Church of England; and there is no doubt but that, in ſo doing, he was actuated by principles of integrity and piety. The grand undertaking of his life was his negociation with the Mercers Company, for the Benefit of the Widows of the Clergy. This was a very laudable deſign: but both the Doctor and the Company were miſtaken in their calculations; ſo that the payment of the annuities was ſtopped for a time, or, at leaſt, the allowance leſſened. Dr. Aſsheton's writings have, we believe, fallen pretty much into oblivion.] K.

[ASTELL (Mary), a Lady of conſiderable learning and ingenuity, was the daughter of a merchant at Newcaſtle upon Tyne, in the county of Northumberland, where ſhe was born about the year 1668. She was genteelly educated, and taught the accompliſhments generally thought proper for her ſex. She had an uncle, a Clergyman, who obſerving her excellent natural abilities, and ſtrong propenſity to learning, kindly undertook to be her preceptor; and, under his tuition, ſhe made a conſiderable progreſs in Philoſophy, Mathematics, and Logic. She had before been inſtructed in the French language, and afterwards acquired ſome knowledge of the Latin. At about twenty years of age ſhe left Newcaſtle, and went to London; where, and at Chelſea, ſhe ſpent the remainder of her life (a). Here ſhe proſecuted her ſtudies with great aſſiduity, and made conſiderable acquiſitions in different ſciences. And the progreſs which ſhe had herſelf made in learning, led her to reflect with much concern on the ignorance of the generality of her own ſex. She was deſirous of exciting in them a greater thirſt of knowledge, and with that view addreſſed to them a treatiſe, in two parts [A]. In 1696 was publiſhed in 8*vo*, an Eſſay in Defence of the Female Sex, which, Mr. Ballard ſays (b), was commonly aſcribed

(a) Ballard's Memoirs of Britiſh Ladies, edit. 8*vo*. 1775, p. 306, 307.

(b) Memoirs of Britiſh Ladies, p. 309.

[A] With that view addreſſed to them a treatiſe, &c.] It was entitled, A ſerious Propoſal to the Ladies, for the Advancement of their true and greateſt Intereſt, &c. And ſome time after was publiſhed a ſecond part, with this title: A ſerious Propoſal to the Ladies, Part the Second; wherein a Method is offered for the Improvement of their Minds. Both theſe pieces were printed together at London, in 12*mo*, in 1697.

Mrs. Aſtell, in this publication, gives it as her opinion, that 'ignorance is the cauſe of moſt feminine 'vices.'—'Whence is it,' ſays ſhe, 'but from ignorance, from a want of underſtanding to compare 'and judge of things, to chuſe a right end, to proportion the means to the end, and to rate every 'thing according to its proper value, that we quit 'the ſubſtance for the ſhadow, reality for appearance, and embrace thoſe very things, which, if we 'underſtood, we ſhould hate and fly, but now are 'reconciled to, merely becauſe they uſurp the name, 'though they have nothing of the nature of thoſe 'venerable objects we deſire and ſeek? Were it not 'for this deluſion, is it probable a Lady who paſſionately deſires to be admired, ſhould ever conſent 'to ſuch actions as render her baſe and contemptible? 'Would ſhe be ſo abſurd as to think either to get 'love, or to keep it by thoſe methods which occaſion 'loathing, and conſequently end in hatred? Would 'ſhe reckon it a piece of her grandeur, or hope to 'gain eſteem by ſuch exceſſes, as really leſſen her in 'the eyes of all conſiderate and judicious perſons? 'Would ſhe be ſo ſilly as to look big, and think 'herſelf the better perſon, becauſe ſhe has more 'money to beſtow profuſely, or the good-luck to 'have a more ingenious taylor or milliner than her 'neighbour?'—'Ignorance, and a narrow education, lay the foundation of vice, and imitation and 'cuſtom rear it up: cuſtom, that mercileſs torrent 'that carries all before it, and which indeed can be 'ſtemmed by none but ſuch as have a great deal of 'prudence, and a rooted virtue. For it is but decorous, that ſhe who is not capable of giving better rules, ſhould follow thoſe ſhe ſees before her, 'leſt ſhe only change the inſtance and retain the 'abſurdity. It would puzzle a conſiderate perſon to 'account for all that ſin and folly that is in the 'world (which certainly has nothing in itſelf to recommend it), did not cuſtom help to ſolve the difficulty. For virtue, without queſtion, has on all 'accounts the pre-eminence of vice: it is abundantly 'more pleaſant in the act, as well as more advantageous in the conſequences; as any one who will but 'rightly uſe her reaſon, in a ſerious reflection on 'herſelf, and the nature of things, may eaſily perceive. 'Tis cuſtom, therefore, that tyrant cuſtom, which is the grand motive to all thoſe irrational choices which we daily ſee made in the world, 'ſo very contrary to our preſent intereſt and pleaſure, 'as well as to our future. We think it an unpardonable miſtake not to do as our neighbours do, and 'part with our peace and pleaſure, as well as our innocence and virtue, merely in compliance with an 'unreaſonable faſhion. And having enured ourſelves to folly, we know not how to quit it: we go 'on in vice, not becauſe we find ſatisfaction in it, 'but becauſe we are unacquainted with the joys of 'virtue (1).'

Theſe ſentiments of our Fair Moraliſt led her to propoſe the eſtabliſhment of a ſeminary for female education; and Mr. Ballard informs us (2), 'that 'the ſcheme given in her propoſal, ſeemed ſo reaſonable, and wrought ſo far upon a certain great 'Lady, that ſhe had deſigned to give ten thouſand 'pounds towards erecting a ſort of college for the 'education and improvement of the female ſex; and 'as a retreat for thoſe ladies, who nauſeating the 'parade of the world, might here find a happy receſs 'from aſcribed to Mrs. Aſtell; but it may be queſtioned whether this was really her performance [B]. However this be, there is no doubt but that ſhe was the author of Reflections on Marriage, which were publiſhed in the year 1700. A ſecond edition of this piece was alſo publiſhed in 1705, in 8*vo*, to which was added a Preface, in anſwer to ſome objections that had been made againſt it. It is ſaid, that her diſappointment in a marriage-contract with an eminent Clergyman gave riſe to this performance (c).

(c) Ballard's Memoirs, p. 310.

About this time, ſhe is ſaid to have acquired a more intimate knowledge of ſome of the beſt writers of antiquity [C]. She alſo publiſhed ſeveral controverſial pieces [D], and ſome letters were printed which paſſed between her and Mr. John Norris, concerning the love of God [E]. She had ſome acquaintance with Biſhop Atterbury, who communicating to her one of his ſermons in manuſcript, at her requeſt: ſhe wrote a ſheet of remarks upon it: but they were drawn up in ſuch a manner, that his Lordſhip, in a private letter to Dr. Smalridge, complained of her want of politeneſs [F]. In 1705, ſhe publiſhed in 8*vo*. a treatiſe, intitled, The Chriſtian Religion, as profeſſed by a Daughter of the Church of England. In the courſe of this work ſhe has attacked both Locke and Tillotſon; but, as might be ſuppoſed, with little advantage to her reputation. This is her moſt elaborate performance [G]; and in the compoſition of it, ſhe ſays, "ſhe conſulted no Divine, nor "any other man; ſcarce any book, except the Bible, being willing to follow the thread "of her own thoughts (d)."

'from the noiſe and hurry of it. But this deſign 'coming to the ears of Biſhop Burnet, he immediately went to that lady, and ſo powerfully re'monſtrated againſt it; telling her it would look like 'preparing a way for Popiſh orders, that it would be 'reputed a Nunnery, &c. that he entirely fruſtrated 'that noble deſign.'

[B] It may be queſtioned whether this was really her performance.] It is not mentioned in the Advertiſement of her other pieces, which is added to her Treatiſe on the Chriſtian Religion; and there is an air of levity in it, which does not appear to be ſuitable to her character, nor agreeable to the general ſtrain of her writings. It may alſo be obſerved, that ſome ſentiments advanced in it ſeem not conſonant to thoſecontained in her other pieces.

[C] She acquired a more intimate knowledge of ſome of the beſt writers of antiquity.] Mr. Ballard ſays, 'The Heathen writers which ſhe eſteemed moſt, were 'Xenophon, Plato, Hierocles, Tully, Seneca, Epic'tetus, and M. Antoninus (3).'

[D] She alſo publiſhed ſeveral controverſial pieces,] Theſe were, Moderation truly ſtated: or, A Review of a late Pamphlet, intitled, Moderation a Virtue. With a prefatory Diſcourſe to Dr. D'Avenant, concerning his late Eſſays on Peace and War, 4to. 1704.—*A fair Way with the Diſſenters, and their Patrons. [E] Some letters were printed which paſſed between her and Mr. John Norris, &c.] When this Gentleman publiſhed his Practical Diſcourſes upon ſeveral divine Subjects, they were very carefully peruſed by Mrs. Aſtell, and occaſioned ſeveral doubts to ariſe in her mind concerning the love of God. She therefore addreſſed herſelf to Mr. Norris for the ſolution of theſe difficulties. This cauſed ſeveral letters to paſs between them upon the ſubject, which were afterwards publiſhed under the following title: *Letters concerning the Love of God, between the Author of the Propoſal to the Ladies, and Mr. John Norris: wherein his late Diſcourſe, ſhewing, that it ought to be entire and excluſive of all other Loves, is cleared and juſtified. [F] In a letter to Dr. Smalridge, complained of her want of politeneſs.] The following is the letter of Dr. Atterbury ſpoken of in the text, in which he expreſſes his ſentiments of Mrs. Aſtell:

'Dear George,

'I Happened about a fortnight ago to dine with 'Mrs. Aſtell. She ſpoke to me of my Sermon, 'and deſired me to print it: and after I had given 'the proper anſwer, hinted to me, that ſhe ſhould 'be glad of peruſing it. I complied with her requeſt, 'and ſent her the Sermon the next day. Yeſterday 'ſhe returned it with this ſheet of remarks, which I 'cannot forbear communicating to you, becauſe I 'take them to be of an extraordinary nature, conſidering they came from the pen of a woman. Indeed, one would not expect a woman had written 'them. There is not an expreſſion that carries the 'leaſt air of her ſex from the beginning to the end of 'it. She attacks me very home you ſee, and artfully enough, under a pretence of taking my part 'againſt other Divines, who are in Hoadly's meaſures. Had ſhe had as much good-breeding as 'good-ſenſe, ſhe would be perfect; but ſhe has not 'the moſt decent manner of inſinuating what ſhe 'means, but is now and then a little offenſive and 'ſhocking in her expreſſions; which I wonder at, 'becauſe a civil turn of words is what her ſex is always miſtreſs of. She, I think, is wanting in it. 'But her ſenſible and rational way of writing makes 'amends for that defect, if indeed any thing can 'make amends for it. I dread to engage her; ſo I 'only writ a general civil anſwer to her, and leave 'the reſt to an oral conference. Her way of ſolving 'the difficulty about ſwearing to the queen, is ſome'what ſingular (5).' It is ſuppoſed, that the Sermon referred to in this letter, is that which Atterbury preached, and afterwards printed, againſt Hoadly's Meaſures of Submiſſion.

(5) Ballard, p. 312.

[G] This is her moſt elaborate performance.] It is a large octavo volume, conſiſting of more than 400 pages, in which ſhe has given a copious account of her religious ſentiments. Dr. Waterland ſtiles it, 'a very good Book (6);' and Ballard ſays, 'I 'heartily wiſh this book was in every hand (eſpeci'ally the younger part of the world), being fully 'perſuaded, that it would have a conſiderable in'fluence over the generality of mankind, in check'ing and repreſſing the many reigning vices of this 'age, which are now ſo powerfully and fatally prevailing among us. The deformities of vice being 'here exhibited in ſuch a terrible form; and the 'charms of virtue repreſented in ſuch an amiable 'and captivating manner, as would implant in the 'mind ſuch pure ſeeds of religion and virtue, as 'could hardly ever be eradicated. Here the diligent 'and attentive reader may find all the duties of a 'Chriſtian painted in ſuch true and lively colours, 'as will at once both convince his reaſon, and forcibly gain his affections (7).'

As Mrs. Aſtell had very high notions of government, both in church and ſtate, ſhe has taken occaſion in this work to inculcate the doctrine of non-reſiſtance very ſtrongly. She ſays, it is unqueſtionably the doctrine of the Church of England, and 'as plainly delivered in ſcripture as Thou ſhalt not 'kill, thou ſhalt not ſteal (8).' It is, however, not quite clear, that ſhe would have carried this doctrine into domeſtic life, if ſhe had entered into the matrimonial ſtate: for ſhe ſeems to have taken no inconſiderable degree of offence at the tyranny of the men, and to have thought that a proper ſubject of oppoſition. In the treatiſe juſt referred to are the following paſſages: 'To what ſtudy ſhall we apply ourſelves? 'ſome men ſay, that Heraldry is a pretty ſtudy for a woman,

(8) Vide the Chriſtian Religion, as profeſſed by a Daughter of the Church of England, p. 177, 178.

She ſeems to have enjoyed an uninterrupted ſtate of health till a few years before her death, when being unhappily obliged to have one of her breaſts cut off, in conſequence of a cancer, her conſtitution became greatly impaired. But ſhe endured this calamity with much fortitude [H]; and afterwards prepared herſelf for her approaching diſſolution, with great piety and reſignation [I]. She died on the 11th day of May, 1731; and was buried at Chelſea on the 14th of the ſame month (e). In the conduct of her life ſhe appears to have been ſtrictly virtuous, and ſhe was abſtemious even to a degree of auſterity [K]. The ſeverity of her manners is ſaid, however, not to have been attended with ſourneſs or moroſeneſs of temper; her mind being generally calm and ſerene, and her converſation entertaining, and ſometimes facetious [L]. Mr. Ballard ſays, that 'for ſeveral years before her death, ſhe conſtantly walked from Chelſea to St. Martin's 'church every Sunday, never regarding the inclemency or unſeaſonableneſs of the wea-'ther, purely to hear a celebrated preacher, whom ſhe much admired for his excellent 'practical divinity (f).' She never affixed her name to any of her pieces, which is attributed to her modeſty. She certainly had conſiderable merit; but her talents as a writer have been much over-rated by Ballard, and others. She appears to have been much tinctured with bigotry; and to have been rather deficient in charity for thoſe whoſe religious ſentiments were different from her own. She was extremely frugal of her time, and very unwilling to be diſturbed at her ſtudies by trifling viſitors [M], from whom ſhe could derive no inſtruction, and who were incapable of rational converſation.]

'woman, for this reaſon, I ſuppoſe, that ſhe may 'know how to blazon her lord and maſter's great 'atchievements! They allow us poetry, plays, and 'romances, to divert us and themſelves; and when 'they would expreſs a particular eſteem for a wo-'man's ſenſe, they recommend hiſtory; though, with 'ſubmiſſion, hiſtory can only ſerve us for amuſe-'ment and a ſubject of diſcourſe. For though it 'may be of uſe to the men who govern affairs, to 'know how their forefathers acted, yet what is this 'to us, who have nothing to do with ſuch buſineſs? 'Some good examples indeed are to be found in 'hiſtory, though generally the bad are ten for one; 'but how will this help our conduct, or excite in us 'a generous emulation? Since the men being the 'hiſtorians, they ſeldom condeſcend to record the 'great and good actions of women; and when they 'take notice of them, 'tis with this wiſe remark, 'that ſuch women acted above their ſex. By which 'one might ſuppoſe they would have their readers 'underſtand, that they were not women who did 'thoſe great actions, but that they were men in 'petticoats!'——'Except in the duties of our 'Chriſtian calling, and the little œconomies of a 'houſe, women's lives are not active, conſequently 'they ought to be contemplative; for I hope our 'Chriſtian brethren are not of the Turks opinion, 'that women have no ſouls; I heartily wiſh, indeed, 'that we made more uſe of them. And ſince it is 'allowed on all hands, that the men's buſineſs is 'without doors, and that theirs is an active life; 'women who ought to be retired, are for this rea-'ſon deſigned by Providence for ſpeculation: Pro-'vidence, which allots every one an employment, 'and never intended that any one ſhould give them-'ſelves up to idleneſs and unprofitable amuſements. 'And I make no queſtion but great improvements 'might be made in the ſciences, were not women 'enviouſly excluded from this their proper buſineſs. 'Quickneſs and penetration our maſters vouchſafe to 'allow us, whilſt they deny us judgment, and I own 'it is too true, that too many of us have given 'them juſt reaſon, gratitude apart. For it is no great 'ſign of prudence to chuſe a ſervice when we are 'free (9).'

[H] She endured this calamity with much fortitude.] Ballard ſays, that ſhe concealed her having a cancer 'from the world in ſuch a manner, that 'even few of her moſt intimate acquaintance knew 'any thing at all of the matter. She dreſſed and 'managed it herſelf, till ſhe plainly perceived there 'was an abſolute neceſſity for its being cut off: and 'then, with the moſt intrepid reſolution and cou-'rage, ſhe went to the Reverend Mr. Johnſon, a 'gentleman very eminent for his ſkill in ſurgery '(with only one perſon to attend her), entreating 'him to take it off in the moſt private manner ima-'ginable; and would hardly allow him to have per-'ſons whom neceſſity required to be at the operation. 'She ſeemed ſo regardleſs of the ſufferings or pain 'ſhe was to undergo, that ſhe refuſed to have her 'hands held, and did not diſcover the leaſt timidity, 'or impatience, but went through the operation 'without the leaſt ſtruggling or reſiſtance; or even 'ſo much as giving a groan, or a ſigh: and ſhewed 'the like patience and reſignation throughout the 'whole cure, which that gentleman, to his laſting 'credit and honour, ſoon performed. Perhaps this 'might be the reaſon which induced her excellent 'friend, the Lady Elizabeth Haſtings, to make uſe 'of him upon the ſame ſad occaſion. This great 'lady's friendſhip to Mrs. Aſtell continued inviolable 'to the laſt date of her life: and well knowing that 'ſhe did not abound in riches, her generoſity to her 'was ſuch, that ſhe has given her fourſcore guineas 'at one time (10).'

(10) Memoirs, P. 316, 317.

[I] Prepared herſelf for her approaching diſſolution, with great piety and reſignation.] Ballard ſays, that 'by a gradual decay of nature, being confined to 'her bed, and finding the time of her diſſolution 'draw nigh, ſhe ordered her coffin and ſhrowd to be 'made, and brought to her bed-ſide; and there to 'remain in her view, as a conſtant memento to her 'of her approaching fate, and that her mind might 'not deviate or ſtray one moment from God, its 'moſt proper object. Her thoughts were now ſo 'entirely fixed upon God and Eternity, that for 'ſome days before her death, ſhe earneſtly deſired 'that no company might be permitted to come to 'her; refuſing at that time to ſee even her old 'and dear friend the Lady Catherine Jones, purely 'becauſe ſhe would not be diſturbed in the laſt 'moments of her divine contemplations (11).'

(11) Ibid. p. 317.

[K] She was abſtemious even to a degree of auſterity.] 'In abſtinence few or none ever ſurpaſſed 'her; for ſhe would live like a hermit, for a con-'ſiderable time together, upon a cruſt of bread and 'water, with a little ſmall beer. And at the time 'of her higheſt living (when ſhe was at home), ſhe 'very rarely eat any dinner till night; and then it 'was by the ſtricteſt rules of temperance. She would 'ſay, abſtinence was her beſt phyſic. And would fre-'quently obſerve, that thoſe who indulged themſelves 'in eating and drinking, could not be ſo well diſpoſed 'or prepared, either for ſtudy, or the regular and 'devout ſervice of their Creator (12).'

(12) Ibid. p. 316.

[M] Unwilling to be diſturbed at her ſtudies by trifling viſitors.] Mr. Ballard ſays, ſhe was ſo devoted to her ſtudies, that 'when ſhe has accidentally 'ſeen needleſs viſitors coming, whom ſhe knew to 'be incapable of diſcourſing upon any uſeful ſubject, 'but to come for the ſake of chat and tattle, ſhe 'would look out at the window, and jeſtingly tell 'them (as Cato did Nafica) Mrs. Aſtell is not at 'home; and in good earneſt keep them out, not 'ſuffering ſuch triflers to make inroads upon her 'more ſerious hours (14).'] T.

ASTLEY (John), ſecond ſon of Sir Thomas de Aſtley, Knt. by Elizabeth, daughter and heireſs of Richard Harcourt, Eſq; deſcended of the ancient and noble family of Aſtley, of Aſtley in Warwickſhire (a) [A]. He was born in the beginning of the XVth century, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by feats of arms, in the reign of our great Engliſh conqueror, King Henry V. It was in thoſe days cuſtomary, for perſons who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by military atchievements, to tilt publickly for the honour of their nation, or of their miſtreſſes. Thus in 1438, one Peter de Maſſe, a Frenchman, having challenged all comers in honour of a certain lady, it was accepted by our heroe, Aſtley, who, on the twenty-ninth of Auguſt that year, in the ſtreet of St. Antoine in Paris, engaged him on horſeback in the preſence of Charles VII., the French King, and having with his lance pierced the head and helmet of his opponent quite through, he preſented the latter to his lady, according to the conditions of combat (b). Being by this exploit become famous, on his return into England he was made choice of to fight Sir Philip Boyle, an Arragonian Knight, who, by the command of the King his maſter, had been in France, and had there challenged any perſon to fight with him on horſeback or on foot, and was now come into England for the ſame purpoſe. The combat was on the thirtieth of January 1442, being the twentieth of Henry VI. It was fought in Smithfield in the preſence of that king, and all his nobility (c). Our John Aſtley was then an Eſquire of the King's houſe, and was made choice of on this occaſion, to ſupport the honour of the nation. They fought on foot, both being completely armed, and firſt Aſtley threw his ſpear, which was avoided by Sir Philip Boyle, who put it by with his ſword. After this Aſtley took his battle ax, and went againſt the Knight ſuddenly, ſays my author, on whom he ſtruck many ſtrokes hard and ſore upon his baſnet, and on his hand, and made him loſe his battle-ax and let it fall to the ground, and burſt up his umber; i. e. the vizor of his helmet three times, and caught his dagger, and would have ſmitten him in the face to have ſlain him in the field, and then the King cried Hoo! and ſo they were parted and went to their tents (d). Immediately after, the King dubbed the ſaid John Aſtley a Knight, and granted him an annuity of one hundred merks per annum (e). As for Sir Philip Boyle, or, as Stowe calls him, Sir Philip de Beauſe, he went and offered his arms at Windſor (f) [B]. Sir John de Aſtley continuing in the exerciſe of arms, became in proceſs of time Knight of the Garter; and having paſſed through life with the greateſt honour, he at length deceaſed at Pateſhull in Staffordſhire, and lies buried there under a handſome monument (g) [C].

[A] Aſtley of Aſtley in Warwickſhire.] This ancient family is ſuppoſed, on account of the likeneſs of arms, the lands they held by military ſervice, and the employments they, from time to time, had under the Earls of Leiceſter, to have been a younger branch, deſcended from Simon de Montfort Earl of Leiceſter, great-grandchild to Almaric, baſe ſon to Robert King of France (1). This is the conjecture of Sir William Dugdale, and ſeems to have a great deal of probability. As to the name it is thus derived. In Domeſday book, this manor is called Eſtleja; i. e. Locus Orientalis, a place lying eaſt, and the firſt mention we have of the family of which we are ſpeaking, is in the twelfth of Henry II., when it appears, that Philip de Eſtleja, Eſtley, or Aſtley, held three Knights fees of William, Earl of Warwick, de veteri feoffamento, by which it is plain, that this eſtate was either in his father, or grandfather in the time of Henry I. (2), of which three Knights fees, Eſtley was part with Wedington, Hillmorton, Milverton, &c. by the ſervice of holding the Earl's ſtirrup when he either mounted or alighted (3). This is the ancient and chief family of Aſtley, from which the families ſeated at Hillmorton, and Wolvey in Warwickſhire, and at Pateſhull in Staffordſhire, draw their ſource (4). As to the eldeſt branch it failed in William de Aſtley, in the reign of Henry V., for he leaving an only daughter, Joan, ſhe married firſt Thomas Raleigh of Farnborough, in the county of Warwick, and afterwards Reginald, Lord Grey of Ruthin, in whoſe family the manor of Aſtley long continued (5).

[B] He went and offered his arms at Windſor.] As to theſe combats, and the laws relating to them, the reader may meet with large accounts of them, in the books cited in the margin (6); but, however, it may not be amiſs to ſay ſomething in few words of them here. In the firſt place, the King's leave was to be aſked in a ſolemn manner. When that was obtained, a place was aſſigned which was railed in, and convenient ſtations appointed for the judges and for the ſpectators; men and women being in ſeparate boxes. In the area were pitched two tents, one for the challenger, and one for the defendant: then each of the parties ſwore, that he fought fairly. There is an oath of this ſort on record, in a trial which ſhould have been by battle, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and as all oaths on ſuch occaſions were of the ſame tenor, it may not be amiſs to produce it. Thus it ran, This, hear you Juſtices, that I have this day neither eat, drank, nor have upon me either bone, ſtone, or glaſs, or any enchantment, ſorcery, or witchcraft, where through the power of God, might be inleaſed or diminiſhed, and the Devil's power increaſed (7). After the combat was over, the conqueror went and ſolemnly returned thanks to God, and in this caſe it appears, that he who was foiled, did alſo offer his arms.

[C] Buried under a handſome monument.] It is pity we have not an exact deſcription of this monument, becauſe we know particularly, from an ancient MS. of the enſigns of the Knights of the moſt noble order of the Garter, that this Sir John de Aſtley bore for his arms the coats of Aſtley and Harcourt quarterly, and a label of three points ermine (8), perhaps they may be upon this tomb. ASTON (Sir Arthur), an officer of note in King Charles I.'s army, was ſon of Sir Arthur Aſton of Fulham in Middleſex, who was the ſecond ſon of Sir Thomas Aſton of Aſton of Bucklow-Hundred in Cheſhire; 'an ancient and knightly family 'of that county (a).' He was a great traveller, and made ſeveral campaigns in foreign countries. Being returned into England about the beginning of the Grand Rebellion, with as

as many ſoldiers of note as he could bring with him, he took part with the King [A] againſt the Parliament. He commanded the dragoons in the battle of Edge-Hill, and with them did his Majeſty conſiderable ſervice. The King having a great opinion of his valour and conduct, made him Governor of the garriſon of Reading in Berkſhire (b), and Commiſſary-General of the Horſe (c): in which poſt he three times repulſed the Earl of Eſſex, who, at the head of the Parliament army, laid ſiege to that place. But Sir Arthur being dangerouſly wounded [B], the command was devolved on Colonel Richard Fielding, the eldeſt Colonel in the garriſon. Sir Arthur was ſuſpected of taking this opportunity to get rid of a dangerous command [C]. Some time after, he was appointed Governor of the garriſon of Oxford [D], in the room of Sir William Pennyman deceaſed (d). In September following, he had the misfortune to break his leg by a fall from his horſe, and was obliged to have it cut off; whereupon, on the twenty-fifth of December, he was diſcharged from his command, which was conferred on Colonel Gage (e). After the King's death, Sir Arthur was employed in the ſervice of King Charles II., and went with the flower of the Engliſh veterans into Ireland, where he was appointed Governor of Drogheda, commonly called Tredagh; 'at which time (Mr. Wood tells us) he laid 'an excellent plot to tire and break the Engliſh army (f).' But at length Cromwell having taken the town, about the tenth of Auguſt 1649, and put the inhabitants to the ſword [E], Sir Arthur the Governor was cut to pieces, and his brains beaten out with his

[A] He took part with the King.] The reader is to be informed, that Sir Arthur Aſton was a reputed Papiſt; and this, among other circumſtances, gave the King's enemies occaſion to reflect upon him, as favouring the Romiſh religion. Let us hear my Lord Clarendon. 'In this equipage the King marched, —— 'having in his whole army not one officer of the 'field who was a Papiſt, except Sir Arthur Aſton, 'if he were one; and very few common ſoldiers of 'that religion. However the Parliament in all their 'declarations, and their clergy much more in their 'ſermons, aſſured the people, that the King's army 'conſiſted only of Papiſts (1).' And in another place, 'Though he (the King) had ſome Papiſts entertained 'in his armies, yet all men truſted by him in ſuperior commands, were men of unblemiſhed integrity in the Proteſtant religion: and in all his 'armies he had but one general officer of the contrary religion, Sir Arthur Aſton, whom the Papiſts notwithſtanding would not acknowledge for a Papiſt '(2).'

[B] He was dangerouſly wounded.] 'Within a week 'after the beginning of the ſiege, Sir Arthur Aſton, 'the governor, being in a court of guard near the 'line, which was neareſt to the enemy's approaches, 'a cannon-ſhot accidentally lighted upon the top of 'it, which was covered with brick-tyle; a piece 'whereof, the ſhot going through, hit the governor 'on the head, and made that impreſſion upon him, 'that his ſenſes ſhortly failed him, ſo that he was not 'only diſabled afterwards from executing in his own 'perſon, but incompetent for counſel or direction. — 'This accident was then thought of great misfortune 'to the King; for there was not in his army an offi'cer of greater reputation, and of whom the enemy 'had greater dread (3).'

(3) Ib. p. 231.

[C] Sir Arthur was ſuſpected of taking this opportunity to get rid of a dangerous command.] Colonel Fielding, upon whom the command of the garriſon was devolved, having ſurrendered the town to the Parliament forces, was committed to priſon for ſo doing, and ordered to be tried by a court-martial. Upon his trial he pleaded, among other things, in his defence; That by the unfortunate hurt of the governor, the command was devolved upon him by his right of ſeniority, not any ambitious deſign of his own: that he had, from time to time, acquainted Sir Arthur Aſton with the ſtate and condition they were in, and though his indiſpoſition of health was ſuch, that he would not give poſitive orders, he ſeemed to approve of all that was done; and though, for the former reaſon, he refuſed to ſign the articles, yet they were read to him, and he expreſſed no diſlike of them. 'The truth of it is (ſays my 'Lord Clarendon) Sir Arthur Aſton was believed by 'many, not to be in ſo incompetent a condition to 'command, as he pretended; and that albeit his 'head was ſo much ſwoln, that he might not in 'perſon venture upon any execution, yet his under'ſtanding or ſenſes were not much diſtempered or 'diſcompoſed; and that he only poſitively waved 'meddling, out of diſlike of the condition they were 'in. And it is true, that when he came to Oxford, 'he could ſpeak as reaſonably of any matter, as ever 'I knew him before, or after (4).'

(4) Ib. p. 241.

[D] He was appointed governor of the garriſon of Oxford.] It was through the Queen's intereſt he obtained this poſt: for her Majeſty, being then at Oxford, thought ſhe ſhould be ſafer under the care and charge of a Roman Catholic, than of a Proteſtant governor. Sir Arthur's behaviour in this ſtation was not very agreeable to the people of that city. 'He 'had the fortune (ſays the noble hiſtorian hitherto cited) to be very much eſteemed where he was 'not known, and very much diſliked where he was; 'and he was by this time too well known at Oxford, to be beloved by any; which the King well 'underſtood, and was the more troubled, becauſe he 'ſaw the prejudice was univerſal, and with too much 'reaſon: and therefore his Majeſty had given an extraordinary commiſſion to the Lords of his council, 'to whoſe authority he was to ſubmit; which 'obliged him to live with a little more reſpect towards them, than he deſired to do; being a man of 'a rough nature, and ſo given up to an immoderate 'love of money, that he cared not by what unrighteous way he exacted it. There were likewiſe 'ſome officers of name, who, having then no charge 'in the army, ſtaid in the town; and thoſe, by the 'King's direction, the Lords diſpoſed to aſſiſt the 'governor, and particularly to take care of the ſeveral quarters of the town, one whereof was aſſigned to each of them (5).'

(5) Ib. Part ii. p. 526, 527.

[E] Cromwell —— put the inhabitants of Drogheda to the ſword.] To go on with Lord Clarendon; 'Before the Marquis of Ormond (General for the King) 'could draw his army together, Cromwell had beſieged Tredagh (or Drogheda); and though the 'garriſon was ſo ſtrong in point of number, and that 'number of ſo choice men, that they could wiſh for 'nothing more, than that the enemy would attempt 'to take them by ſtorm; the very next day after he 'came before the town, he gave a general aſſault, 'and was beaten off with conſiderable loſs. But, 'after a day more, he aſſaulted it again in two 'places, with ſo much courage, that he entered in 'both; and though the governor and ſome of the 'chief officers retired in diſorder into a fort, where 'they hoped to have made conditions, a panic fear 'ſo poſſeſſed the ſoldiers, that they threw down their 'arms upon a general offer of quarter; ſo that the 'enemy entered the works without reſiſtance, and put 'every man, governor (6), officer, and ſoldier, to the 'ſword; and the whole army being entered the town, 'they executed all manner of cruelty, and put every 'man that related to the garriſon, and all the citizens 'who were Iriſh, man, woman, and child, to the 'ſword; and there being three or four officers of 'name, and of good families, who had found ſome 'way, by the humanity of ſome ſoldiers of the ene'my, to conceal themſelves for four or five days, 'being afterwards diſcovered, they were butchered in 'cold blood (7).'

ASTON (Sir THOMAS), a brave and worthy gentleman in the reign of King Charles I., was the ſon of John Aſton, of Aſton in Cheſhire, Eſq; by his wife Maud, daughter of Robert Needham of Shenton in Shropſhire. He was entered a Gentleman-Commoner of Brazen-Noſe College in Oxford, in 1626-7; but was ſoon called home by his relations, and, being married, was created a Baronet in July 1628. In 1635 he was High-Sheriff of Cheſhire, being then eſteemed a perſon of good natural parts, and a high-ſlown Monarchiſt. Upon the approach of the Rebellion, he wrote ſome pieces againſt the Preſbyterians [A], and was afterwards the chief man in his country that took part with the King. During the civil war, he raiſed a party of horſe for his Majeſty's ſervice, which was beaten by a party of Rebels under Sir William Breerton of Honford near Nantwich in Cheſhire, on the twenty-eighth of July 1642; but Sir Thomas eſcaped with a ſlight wound. Some time after, he was taken in a ſkirmiſh in Staffordſhire, and carried priſoner to Stafford; where endeavouring to make his eſcape, a ſoldier ſpied him, and gave him a blow on the head; which, with other wounds he had a little before received, threw him into a fever, of which he died on the twenty-fourth of March 1645. His body was carried to Aſton, and interred in the chapel belonging to his own houſe (a). B.

ATHELING (EDGAR), the ſon of Edward, the ſon of Edmond Ironſide, King of England, by Agatha, daughter to Solomon, King of Hungary (a) [A], or rather of the Emperor Henry II. (b) In what year he was born is not certain; but he was very young in 1057, when his father and family were recalled into their native country, by their kinſman Edward the Confeſſor, then King thereof (c). His father died ſoon after his return, before the King had time to give him any eſſential marks of that kindneſs which he profeſſed to him (d). Edgar was carefully bred up by him, who was his great uncle, and was undoubtedly intended for his ſucceſſor, as the beſt authors aſſure us (e), and as his title Atheling, or Moſt Noble, implies; which is rightly noted by Mr. Selden, correcting in this reſpect Polydore Vergil, who miſtook it for a ſirname (f). But on King Edward's death, Edgar was deprived of his right, becauſe of his youth, his being born abroad, and his having too little experience for a crowned head in ſuch troubleſome times (g) [B]. Harold, the ſon of Earl Godwin, chiefly through the intrigues of the clergy (h), was preferred before him, for which they are ſeverely cenſured by ſome writers (i). This happened in the beginning of A. D. 1066. Harold, however, treated him with great reſpect, as long as he lived; after whoſe death and defeat in the fatal battle of Haſtings, the nobles and people in general looked upon Edgar as King, and

[A] By Agatha daughter to Solomon King of Hungary.] As to the father of Edgar, there is no colour of doubt, all authors agreeing him to be Edward the Outlaw, ſon to Edmond Ironſide, elder brother to the Confeſſor; conſequently the rights of Edward and our Edgar to the Crown, were prior to his own. This induced Buchanan to ſay, he ſent for Edgar in order to reſign to him the crown (1). This, however, is a mere dream of this inaccurate hiſtorian; for the perſon ſent for, was Edward, the father of Edgar, whom the King intended for his heir (2). That his mother's name was Agatha is clear, but not that ſhe was the daughter of Solomon, as Buchanan, following many Engliſh authors, aſſerts without ſcruple (3). Edward was ſent out of England about 1017, being then probably ſeven years old. Peter the German, who was the ſon of the Emperor, was then King of Hungary, and took him and his brother Edmond under his care (4). They continued in Hungary during the reigns of ſeveral Princes till about 1050, when Andrew, King of Hungary, concluding a peace with the Emperor Henry II., married his eldeſt ſon Solomon to one of the Emperor's daughters, and Edward to another. This Solomon did not mount the throne of Hungary 'till 1067, in the firſt year of William the Conqueror's reign (5), and becauſe Edgar and his mother ſought to fly thither, our hiſtorians concluded Agatha was his daughter (6), whereas ſhe was his wife's ſiſter. Ethelredus, who wrote expreſsly of the genealogy of the Engliſh Kings, who was particularly acquainted with this family, and flouriſhed within a ſhort time after Edgar Atheling's death, aſſerts his mother to have been the Emperor's daughter, and that Edward the Confeſſor ſent for Edward and his family from that Monarch's court (7).

[B] In ſuch troubleſome times.] Bromton tells us, many of the nobility were for Edgar. Sed quia puer erat et tanto oneri minus idoneus; i. e. But as he was a youth, and no way fit for ſuch a burthen, they conſented to accept Harold (8). This is the language of the faireſt writers; for ſome Abbey Chronicles pretend that Edward the Confeſſor named Harold for his ſucceſſor (9). John Fordun ſays, expreſsly, that Edward the Confeſſor, on the deceaſe of Edward the Outlaw, declared Edgar his ſucceſſor, and recommended him as ſuch to the nobility (10). Matthew Paris is remarkably clear, Edmundus autem latus ferreum Rex naturalis de Stirpe Regum, genuit Edwardum: Edwardus Eadgarum, cui de jure debebatur Regnum Anglorum. Edmund Ironſide, the natural King of this land, of the old royal ſtock begat Edward: Edward, Edgar, to whom of right appertained the crown (11).

even acknowledged him as ſuch (k). But William Duke of Normandy, awing them with his victorious army, was owned and crowned Monarch of England at Weſtminſter, in the ſame year (l). To him, if we credit ſome of our ancient hiſtorians, Edgar immediately ſubmitted, and was amongſt the number of thoſe, whom William carried with him as hoſtages, into Normandy (m). Other authors are ſilent on this head, but all agree, that in 1067, Edgar, attended by many of the prime nobility, retired firſt into Northumberland, afterwards into Scotland (n) [C]. The perſons who adhered to him, had ſo conſiderable an intereſt both at home and abroad, that they quickly drew together a numerous army, and therewith began to bid fair for unſettling the new eſtabliſhment. In 1068 (o), King William ſent Robert Comyn into the North, in order to expel Edgar and his aſſociates out of thoſe parts, conſtituting him Earl of Northumberland. But this great man had but an ill fate, being ſlain by ſuch forces as he had about him (p). The next year a great ſuccour came to theſe malcontents from Denmark, and more Engliſh Lords reconciling themſelves to Edgar, he made head againſt the Normans, and after ſeveral ſucceſsful engagements, made himſelf maſter of the city of York, and wintered between the Ouſe and Trent, notwithſtanding all the efforts of the Conqueror (q). In 1070 he was leſs fortunate. William found means by money and promiſes, to draw off the Danes and ſome of the Lords of his party, and in the end, obliged him to retire again into Scotland. Malcolm King of that country, married this year his ſiſter Margaret, ſo excellent a woman, that in her life-time ſhe was ſtyled the Good, and after her deceaſe was regarded as a Saint (r). This marriage enabled Edgar to make new attempts, in which he had moſtly the better, the King of Scots openly aſſiſting him, notwithſtanding King William had demanded him, and threatened to invade Scotland in caſe of refuſal (s). Some domeſtic troubles hindered that Prince from performing his threat for two years. In 1072, however, King William entered Scotland with an army, but with indifferent ſucceſs. Upon this he readily made peace with Malcolm, and regulated, according to ancient treaties, the bounds of their reſpective dominions (t). In this peace the Scots hiſtorians ſay Edgar Atheling was included, and, on his ſubmiſſion, received into King William's favour, which is very probable, ſince the war was on his account (u). In 1074 Edgar left Scotland where he had been ſo kindly entertained, and where his ſiſter was Queen [D]. He croſſed the ſea into Normandy, and was kindly received by King William, who gave him a grand allowance (w). Some of our authors ſay, it was a pound of ſilver a day, others twenty ſhillings. However, he was therewith contented, and lived quietly (x). William of Malmſbury, his contemporary (and who expreſsly takes notice that he was living when he wrote) ſpeaks of him in terms little to his advantage. He ſays he behaved meanly and fooliſhly in the King's court, and as an inſtance thereof, mentions his quitting his great allowance for an horſe (y). But this is not very conſiſtent with the teſtimonies of other authors, or with the general current of hiſtory [E]. After this ſubmiſſion our hiſtories are ſilent concerning him for many years. This, however, is a plain proof, that he acted like a man of honour towards the Norman, ſince in that ſpace there were many ſtirs, of which he might have made his advantage (z). In 1086, that is, about twelve years after his ſubmiſſion, Edgar, conceiving himſelf ill treated at court, retired from thence. This does not ſeem to ſpeak him of quite ſo mean a ſpirit as Malmſbury would make him. Certain it is, that even now he had the hearts of the Engliſh nation; ſince in the old Abbey Chronicles, we meet with this prayer on the mention of his retreat, May the Almighty give him honour (a), alluding to the little reſpect ſhewn him at court. But this, however,

[C] Afterwards into Scotland.] This was the ſecond time Edgar was ſet aſide. In the Saxon Chronicle we find, he was generally looked on as King, after the death of Harold; inſomuch, that the Abbot of Peterborough, then called Burh, was ſent by his Monks to Edgar for his approbation (12); becauſe, ſays the author, the people of this land thought he ought to have been King, and he graciouſly acknowledged him for Abbot. This, William, whoſe ſword had made him King, puniſhed ſeverely. Matthew Paris repeats, on this occaſion, his former aſſertion; Eadgarus Atheling, hæres legitimus Anglorum regni; i. e. Edgar Atheling, the lawful heir of the Engliſh kingdom, ſeeing his country in confuſion, endeavoured to retire to Hungary, but by a ſtorm was forced on the Scots coaſt (13). Hence his common appellation,

Edgar Atheling,
England's Darling.

[D] Where his ſiſter was Queen.] Many of our hiſtorians, to raiſe the credit of their country, would perſuade us, that this Queen civilized King Malcolm, and his Scots, making the King, as well as his ſubjects, almoſt barbarians (14). In this, however, they muſt be a little partial, ſince Malcolm was educated entirely in England, and was one of the greateſt monarchs of that age. He had by this Queen Margaret, ſix ſons, Edward, Edmund, Ethelred, Edgar, Athelred, and David; and two daughters, Maud the Good, who married Henry I., and Mary who married Euſtace, Earl of Bulloign (15). This King Malcolm favoured the Engliſh ſo much, and treated thoſe who fled to Scotland ſo well, that they remained there; and from them are deſcended ſome of the nobleſt houſes in that kingdom, as the Lindſeys, Vaux, Ramſays, Lovells, Sandilands, Foulis's, Wardlaws, Maxwells, &c. (16) M. Paris places Edgar Atheling's coming to court firſt in 1069, and ſays he afterwards retired into Scotland, and ſome time after that was reconciled to the King again (17).

[E] The general current of hiſtory.] We ſhall hereafter demonſtrate Malmſbury's ſpite to Edgar. At preſent let us conſider that he had behaved well in ſeveral battles; had now, and afterwards, the hearts of the nation; was always courted by foreign Princes; and, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, was truſted by William II. with an army to reſtore his nephew, which he performed. Theſe actions ſpeak him neither weak, nor mean-ſpirited: even our author's ſtory proves no more than that he deſpiſed money, from which and his loving this country, the Monk concludes him a fool (18).

was not without the King's conſent. On the contrary, Edgar obtained licence to ſail with a certain number of ſhips, and two hundred ſoldiers on board, to Apulia. This therefore was no diſgraceful flight, but rather an honourable exile. About the ſame time, his younger ſiſter Chriſtina became a nun in Ramſay Abbey (b). How long Edgar continued in Apulia is uncertain. Yet when he returned from thence he went into Normandy, where he was well received by Duke Robert, who gave him certain lands for his ſubſiſtence. Whether this was done to awe his brother William Rufus, who ſeized the kingdom of England, or purely to provide for an unhappy Prince, cannot now be determined. But, in 1091, on the concluſion of a ſolemn treaty between the brethren Robert and William, the latter procured Edgar Atheling's being diſpoſſeſſed of his lands, upon which he withdrew out of Normandy, and went into Scotland, to his brother-in-law King Malcolm (c). In the ſame year, this laſt mentioned Prince raiſed a puiſſant army, and therewith invaded England, and carried away much ſpoil; on the news whereof both brothers haſtened out of Normandy, and ſent a conſiderable force on board tranſports towards the North, that they might more ſpeedily aſſemble an army in thoſe parts; but being near Michaelmas, the weather proved ſtormy, and moſt of the men were loſt. King William II., and Duke Robert, raiſed however an army, and though it was winter, advanced therewith towards Scotland. Upon this Edgar interpoſed, reconciled the two Kings, and mediated a good peace (d). For this ſervice he was reſtored to King William's favour, and came back with the brothers to London. However, when Duke Robert returned into Normandy, Edgar choſe to accompany him, either becauſe he loved him beſt, or feared him leaſt (e). This was in the beginning of 1092. His ſtay in Normandy was but ſhort, for the next year we find him again in England, attending on, and in favour with William II. That Prince reſided at Glouceſter about Eaſter, and was there ſo ill, that his death was expected. On the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, 1093, Malcolm King of Scots, importuned him by letters to regulate certain differences according to treaty, on which William ſummoned him to Glouceſter, and ſent Edgar to conduct him (f). This he performed; but after all King William treated Malcolm very ill, who returning into Scotland, levied an army, entered Northumberland, and beſieging the caſtle of Alnwick, which had been unjuſtly taken from him, he was there treacherouſly ſlain, together with his eldeſt ſon Edward (g). This unfortunate event could not but afflict Edgar exceedingly, eſpecially when he ſaw his nephews deprived of their rights, the Scots ſetting up Donald Bane, i. e. Donald the White, whom the Engliſh writers call Dufenald, for their King, who was brother to Malcolm (h). Edgar ſent for his five nephews into England, and carefully brought them up; but not without ſome danger to himſelf if we credit the Scots hiſtorians. One Orgar reported to King William Rufus, that Edgar ſhould ſay boaſtingly to his nephews, that the right to the Engliſh crown was in him and in them. Edgar denied the charge, and was allowed to juſtify himſelf by combat. That is, he choſe a Knight to enter into the liſts for him, who was ſo happy as to conquer. Buchanan informs us, that the reaſon he did not fight in perſon, was becauſe Edgar at this time was old and infirm: but in this he was miſtaken, Edgar, not exceeding forty-three, and as we ſhall ſee, he went afterwards into Paleſtine (i). Two of Edgar's nephews died before they were of age, which hindered him from doing what he would otherwiſe have done for them. His third nephew, Edgar, growing towards man's eſtate, and the Scots inviting him, when they were weary of his uncle, to accept the crown, he reſolved to aſſiſt him in that undertaking. Applying therefore to King William, he procured a ſmall aſſiſtance from him, and therewith marched to the borders of Scotland, where his forces quickly increaſed, ſo as to enable him to look Donald in the face. It was in the winter of 1097, that he ſet forward on this expedition, and in the next ſpring, having defeated and taken Donald priſoner, he eſtabliſhed his nephew on the throne, and then came back again into England (k). After this we meet with no account of him, till ſuch time as with Robert the ſon of Godwin, a famous Knight, he undertook a journey into the Holy Land. It is probable this was in 1099 [F]. He was with Baldwin II., King of Jeruſalem, when beſieged in Rama, and having in their hazardous ſally, wherein they eſcaped thence, loſt his knight, he thought of returning. This was in 1102, and accordingly he came back ſoon after into Europe, received great civilities from the Greek and German Emperors, who importuned him to remain in their courts, which he civilly excuſed, and continued his journey either intoEngland or Normandy (l) [G]. Henry I. had

[F] It was probably in 1099.] Our conjecture is thus grounded. We cannot conceive, why Edgar ſhould have left the kingdom after Henry I. aſcended the throne, who married his niece, and was remarkably kind to his family; whereas it is eaſy to find the reaſon of his going in the end of William Rufus's reign. That Prince was an odd tempered man, Robert Duke of Normandy was already in the Holy Land; wherefore Edgar poſſibly choſe to follow him, rather than remain at the King's mercy, or hazard his nephew's ſafety, by retiring into Scotland.

[G] Either into England or Normandy.] William of Malmſbury is the only author who gives an account of this adventure of his: theſe are his words, 'He travelled with Robert, the ſon of Godwin, a 'valiant Knight unto Jeruſalem; and it ſo happened, 'that they were with King Baldwin, when beſieged 'by the Turks in Rama. This Prince ſallying 'eſcaped chiefly by the proweſs of Robert, who 'going before him, cut down the Turks on the 'right and left. But in the end, dropping his 'ſword, and overcome by numbers, Robert was 'taken; and, as it is ſaid, being carried into Ba-had now aſcended the Engliſh throne, and eſpouſed Maud, Edgar's niece; he had therefore all imaginable reaſon to expect a good reception at court, which however he either did not find, or elſe, it may be, declined. For we are certain, he was ſome ſhort time after his return from the Eaſt, in Normandy, with Duke Robert, for whom he had a great kindneſs. He even remained firm in his friendſhip to him, when King Henry invaded his dominions, and was taken priſoner fighting in his cauſe, as alſo was Duke Robert himſelf, at the fatal battle of Tenchebray, wherein the whole force of Normandy was routed; which fell out in the latter end of 1106 (m). King Henry dealt very ſeverely with the reſt of the priſoners;

'bylon, or Cairo in Egypt, and refuſing to deny 'Chriſt, was there ſlain. Edgar having loſt his 'Knight, returned; and being honoured with rich 'preſents, by the Greek and German Emperors, '(who on account of his nobility, would have re-'tained him in their courts) contemned all things, 'in regard to his native ſoil. For ſuch is the fond-'neſs of ſome men for their country, that they 'can reliſh nothing out of the climate wherein they 'were bred. Wherefore Edgar, deluded by thoſe 'notions, returned into England, and afterwards 'meeting various changes of fortune, ſpends now 'his extreme old age in an inglorious country retire-'ment (19).' On this, let us obſerve, that Britain was not Edgar's native country, but rather the German Emperor's dominions; that Malmſbury was provoked by his ſiding with Duke Robert, againſt his maſter, Henry I.; and that this diſcourſe is addreſſed to Robert Earl of Glouceſter, King Henry's natural ſon.

[Sir David Dalrymple hath ſhewn, that there is no little difficulty in determining who Agatha, the mother of Edgar Atheling, was. That ſhe could not be the daughter of Solomon, King of Hungary, is evident from the reaſons alledged in the note [A]: neither could ſhe be the daughter of the Emperor Henry the Second; for he had no children. The hypotheſis of Papebroch, who wrote the life of Margaret. ſiſter to Edgar, is, That, inſtead of Agatha, the daughter of Henry the Second, and ſiſter-in-law of Solomon, King of Hungary, we ought to read, Agatha the daughter of Bruno (brother of Henry the Second), and niece of Giſela, the wife of Stephen, King of Hungary (20). Solomon, according to Sir David Dalrymple, was born in 1051, and aſcended the throne of Hungary in 1062 (21). —— The title of Atheling, given to Edgar, doth not imply that he was undoubtedly intended for ſucceſſor to his great-uncle King Edward. Ædgar Atheling is Edgar the Noble. The Anglo-Saxons, as well as other nations, formerly uſed the word Ædeling to denote men of the noble claſs; although it may, by degrees, have been appropriated to the ſons of the royal family. Edward the Confeſſor might give the name of Ædeling to the grandſon of his elder brother King Edmund, without meaning to adopt him as his heir. It ſeems to have been merely an acknowledgment that he was a Prince of the blood-royal (22). —— The learned hiſtorian before mentioned farther obſerves, that there is a confuſion, hardly to be unravelled, as to the time and manner of Edgar's retreat into Scotland, and his ſiſter's marriage; and that conjecture alone can reconcile the diſcordant accounts (23). The ſame author gives entire credit to Malmſbury's repreſentation of the contemptible weakneſs of Edgar Atheling's underſtanding; and yet, not to mention other inſtances, his conduct in placing his nephew upon the throne of Scotland ſeems ſcarcely compatible with the idea of ſo much weakneſs (24). ——With reſpect to what is ſaid in the note [D], of ſome of the nobleſt houſes in Scotland being deſcended from the Engliſh who fled to Malcolm; ſuch as the Lindſays, Vaux's, Tours's, Preſtons, Sandilands, Biſſets, Foulis's, Wardlaws, and Maxwells, Sir David Dalrymple conſiders this liſt as drawn up from the imagination of Boece, without any regard to hiſtorical truth. 'Some of the names in it are 'Norman, others local. Boece alſo gives a liſt of 'families who came from Hungary with Queen 'Margaret, and ſettled in Scotland: as Crichton, 'Fotheringham, Giffard, Maul, Borthwick: how 'Crichton, Fotheringham, and Borthwick ſhould hap-'pen to be Hungarian names, I know not. Giffard 'was a Norman, and came over with the Conqueror; 'Du Cheſne, p. 1126. Every one knows that the 'family of Maul was greatly diſtinguiſhed in France 'before the Conqueſt (25)."——Though Malcolm King of Scotland was educated entirely in England, and derived, no doubt, conſiderable advantages and improvement from that circumſtance, yet it ſhould ſeem, that to his Queen Margaret muſt chiefly be aſcribed, any farther degrees of reformation and refinement of manners which might be introduced into Scotland in this period. Malcolm himſelf, with all his great qualities, could not read (26). The abilities and virtues of Margaret, allowance being made for the age in which ſhe lived, were very eminent, and render her much more deſerving of being celebrated than her brother Edgar Atheling. As we ſhall not have ſo proper an opportunity of doing juſtice to her merit, we ſhall here inſert her character, as drawn by the accurate hiſtorian above mentioned; referring our readers to the work itſelf for the notes with which the character is accompanied.

'In delineating the character of Margaret, the wife 'of Malcolm III. I follow the traces of Turgot her 'Confeſſor: "Far be it from my hoary head," ſays 'Turgot, "to feign or flatter. As God is my "witneſs and my judge, I relate nothing of Mar-"garet but what I know to be true: many things, "which I know to be true, I have omitted, becauſe "they would have appeared incredible."

'Some allowance, however, muſt be made for the 'ſecret bias of a panegyriſt, to magnify the virtues 'and extenuate the imperfections of the perſon whom 'he celebrates.

'From her earlieſt youth, Margaret ſtudied the 'ſcriptures, as they were then ſtudied, in the verbal 'ſenſe of the Vulgate. Her apprehenſion was acute, 'her memory tenacious, and her diligence unwearied; 'hence ſhe attained to an uncommon proficiency in 'what was then eſteemed to be knowledge. En-'dowed with all the graces of utterance, ſhe was, 'perhaps, inclined to diſplay her learning and her 'eloquence more than her royal eſtate required, or 'than became her ſex. "Often," ſays Turgot, "have I with admiration heard her diſcourſe on "ſubtile queſtions of theology, in preſence of the "moſt learned men of the kingdom."

'Of this he gives one example, too characteriſtical 'to be omitted in a work which I wiſh to be a hiſtory 'of manners, as well as of events.

'For the reformation of certain erroneous prac-'tices which prevailed in the Scottiſh church, Mar-'garet held frequent conferences with the clergy. 'The King underſtood the Gaelic language as well 'as the Saxon. He willingly performed the office 'of interpreter between his conſort and the Scottiſh 'eccleſiaſtics.

"Three days did did ſhe employ the ſword of the "Spirit, in combating their errors. She ſeemed "another St. Helena, out of the Scriptures con-"vincing the Jews."

'The right ſeaſon for celebrating Lent was the 'ſubject of this ſolemn conference. The Queen's 'arguments prevailed.

'Margaret appears to have affected an unuſual 'ſplendor about her court. She encouraged the im-'portation and the uſe of veſtments of various co-'lours. She was magnificent in her own attire; ſhe 'increaſed the number of attendants on the perſon 'of the King, augmented the parade of his public 'appearances, and cauſed him to be ſerved at table 'in gold and ſilver plate. "At leaſt," ſays the 'honeſt hiſtorian, "the diſhes and veſſels were gilt "or ſilvered over."

'There was what appears to us an air of oſten-'tatious trifling in her charities. Every morning 'ſhe prepared food for nine little children, all indi-'gent orphans: on her bended knees ſhe fed them. 'With her own hands ſhe miniſtered at table to ſoners; but as for Edgar, he diſmiſſed him freely. This is the laſt time he is mentioned in our hiſtories, and after his return into England, he went to paſs the remainder of his days in the country, where, according to Malmſbury, he was living in 1120, when he muſt have been ſeventy or thereabouts (n). In what year he died appears not, nor do we read that he was ever married. He was born during his father's exile, loſt him when his life would have ſecured him a crown, ſtruggled, though to no purpoſe, againſt the Conqueror, was through his whole life the ſport of fortune, and died full of years and in a dark obſcurity. To which we add, that till now, his life was never written, from a ſuppoſed want of materials, and from a real want of inclination, to glean from our ancient

' crouds of poor perſons, and waſhed the feet of ſix ' every evening.

' While the King was occupied in affairs of ſtate, ' ſhe repaired to the altar, and there, with long ' prayers, ſighs and tears, offered herſelf a willing ' ſacrifice to the Lord. In the ſeaſon of Lent, be- ' ſides reciting particular offices, ſhe went through ' the whole pſalter, twice or thrice, within the ' ſpace of twenty-four hours. Before the time of ' public maſs, ſhe heard five or ſix private maſſes; ' after that ſervice, ſhe fed twenty-four perſons; and ' then, and not till then, ſhe retired to a ſcanty ' aſcetic meal. She fell a victim to her long vigils, ' faſtings, and mortification.

' Thus have I faithfully deſcribed the ſhades, and ' marked all the blemiſhes in the character of this ' good woman; her zeal for matters indifferent or ' dubious; her little vanities of ſhew and equipage; ' her minute obedience of ſome evangelical precepts; ' her literal performance of others; and her unre- ' quired and fatal auſterities.

' I now undertake the more pleaſing employment ' of recording her exemplary virtues, and diſtinguiſh- ' ed uſefulneſs.

' She did not abuſe that influence, which the ' opinion of her worth had merited, in the coun- ' cils of Malcolm. To her he ſeems to have entruſted ' the care of matters reſpecting religion, and the ' internal polity of the kingdom. In both, there ' was much to reform.

' At that period, the clergy of Scotland had ceaſed ' to celebrate the communion of the Lord's ſupper. " We are ſinners," ſaid they, " and therefore we " dread to communicate unworthily." The Queen ' diſplayed to them the vanity of this ſuperſtitious or ' indolent excuſe.

' She reſtored the religious obſervance of Sunday, ' an inſtitution no leſs admirable in a political, than ' in a religious light.

' It was not uncommon for a man to marry his ' ſtepmother, or the widow of his brother. I pre- ' ſume that this was not owing to vague luſt, but to ' avarice; for it relieved the heir of a jointure.

' We may eaſily perceive how neceſſary, and how ' difficult, a reformation was in that kingdom, where ' the clergy omitted the celebration of the commu- ' nion; where the diſtinction between Sunday and ' work-days was diſregarded; and where inceſtuous ' alliances prevailed.

' In the adminiſtration of her houſehold, ſhe ſo ' blended ſeverity of manners with complacency, that ' ſhe was equally revered and loved by all who ap- ' proached her. She entertained many ladies about ' her perſon, employed their leiſure-hours in the ' amuſements of the needle, and gave a ſtrict atten- ' tion to the decency of their conduct: " In her " preſence," ſays Turgot, " nothing unſeemly was " ever done or uttered." A ſtrange picture of that ' age!

' On the education of her children, ſhe beſtowed ' the moſt conſcientious care. She enjoined their pre- ' ceptors to chaſtiſe them as often as they merited ' chaſtiſement. On them ſhe beſtowed her tendereſt ' thoughts in her dying moments.

' Turgot pathetically deſcribes his laſt interview ' with this affectionate mother. After long diſcourſe ' on her ſpiritual ſtate, ſhe thus addreſſed him: " Farewell; my life draws to a cloſe, but you may " ſurvive me long. To you I commit the charge of " my children, teach them, above all things, to " love and fear God; and, whenever you ſee any " of them attain to the height of earthly grandeur, " Oh! then, in an eſpecial manner, be to them as a " father and a guide. Admoniſh, and, if need be, " reprove them, leſt they be ſwelled with the pride " of momentary glory, through avarice offend God, " or, by reaſon of the proſperity of this world, be- " come careleſs of eternal life. This, in the pre- " ſence of him, who is now our only witneſs, I be- " ſeech you to promiſe and to perform."

' Her beneficence was unbounded. I ſpeak not of ' her public alms-giving, however liberal and unre- ' mitting. Her private ſolicitude to do good exceeds ' every encomium.

' We have ſeen, in the courſe of this hiſtory, ' that multitudes of unhappy Engliſh were led cap- ' tive into Scotland, and diſperſed over the country. ' The Queen employed her emiſſaries to examine ' their condition. Whenever their bondage appeared ' grievous, ſhe ſecretly paid their ranſom, and re- ' ſtored them to liberty, herſelf an exile from Eng- ' land!

' She was humble and ſelf-abaſed; ſhe judged with ' more ſeverity of herſelf than of others. She ' affectionately reproached her Confeſſor for his ' want of vigilance in diſcovering her faults.

' And, now that we have ſeen the fruits of this ' excellent woman in meekneſs, active virtue, and ' mercy, we are authoriſed to pronounce that her ' piety was ſincere.

' By a tedious and painful indiſpoſition, endured ' with exemplary patience, ſhe was brought very ' low. During a ſhort interval of eaſe, ſhe devoutly ' received the communion; ſoon after, her anguiſh ' of body returned with redoubled violence; ſhe ' ſtretched herſelf on her couch, and calmly waited for ' the moment of her diſſolution. Cold, and in the ago- ' nies of death, ſhe ceaſed not to put up her ſuppica- ' tions to heaven. Theſe were ſome of her words: " Have mercy upon me, O God; according to the " multitude of thy tender mercies, blot out my " iniquities; make me to hear joy and gladneſs, " that the bones which thou haſt broken may rejoice. " Caſt me not away from thy preſence, and take not " thy holy Spirit from me; reſtore unto me the joy " of thy ſalvation. The ſacrifices of God are a " broken ſpirit; a broken and a contrite ſpirit, O " God, thou wilt not deſpiſe. Do good, in thy " good pleaſure unto Zion, build the walls of Jeru- " ſalem." At that moment, her ſon Edgar, return- ' ing from the army, approached her couch. " How " fares it with the King and my Edward?" The ' youth ſtood ſilent. " I know all," cried ſhe, " I " know all: By this holy croſs, by your filial affec- " tion, I adjure you, tell me the truth." He anſwer- ' ed, " Your huſband and your ſon are both ſlain." ' Lifting her eyes and hands towards heaven, ſhe ' ſaid, " Praiſe and bleſſing be to thee, Almighty " God, that thou haſt been pleaſed to make me en- " dure ſo bitter anguiſh in the hour of my departure, " thereby, as I truſt, to purify me in ſome meaſure " from the corruption of my ſins; and thou, Lord " Jeſus Chriſt, who, through the will of the Father, " haſt enlivened the world by thy death, Oh! deli- " ver me." While pronouncing, deliver me, ſhe ' expired (27).'

There is a paſſage in Turgot which indicates an uncommon liberality of ſentiment for the time he wrote in, and which, as Sir David Dalrymple juſtly obſerves, ſeems to entitle him to a place in the Index Expurgatorius rather than in the Acta Sanctorum. ' Others, ſays Turgot, may admire in others the ' indications of ſanctity which miracles afford. I ' much more admire in Margaret the works of mercy. ' Such ſigns are common to the good and evil; but ' the works of true piety and charity are peculiar to the ' good. The one ſometimes indicate ſanctity, the other ' conſtitute the ſaint. With better reaſon, therefore, ' ought we to admire the deeds of Margaret, which ' made her a ſaint, than her miracles, had ſhe per- ' formed any, which could only have pointed her out ' to mankind as a ſaint (28).'] K.

hiſtorians, a multitude of little memorandums, concerning an injured unfortunate Prince. This juſtice we have at length done to his memory, and to the Engliſh hiſtory; which, from this article, we hope will appear not quite ſo barren, as ſome modern writers would repreſent it. C.

ATKINS or ETKINS (James), Biſhop of Galloway in Scotland, was the ſon of Henry Atkins Sheriff and Commiſſary of Orkney, and was born in the town of Kirkwall in the Stewartry of Orkney. He was educated in the college of Edinburgh, where he commenced Maſter of Arts; and from thence went to Oxford in 1637-8, to finiſh his ſtudies under the tuition of Dr. Prideaux, the Regius Profeſſor of Divinity. Soon after he was appointed Chaplain to James, Marquis of Hamilton, his Majeſty's High-Commiſſioner for Scotland; in which ſtation he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that, by the application of his noble patron upon his return to England, he obtained from the King a preſentation to the church of Birſa, in the Stewartry of Orkney; where continuing ſome years, his prudence, diligence, and faithfulneſs, in the diſcharge of his office procured him much veneration and reſpect from all perſons, eſpecially from his Ordinary, who conferred upon him the dignity of Moderator of the Preſbytery. In the beginning of the year 1650, when James, Marquis of Montroſe, landed in Orkney, Dr. Atkins was nominated by the unanimous votes of the ſaid preſbytery, to draw up a declaration in their names, containing the ſtrongeſt expreſſions of loyalty and allegiance to King Charles II., for which the whole preſbytery being depoſed by the aſſembly of the Kirk at that time ſitting at Edinburgh, Dr. Atkins was likewiſe excommunicated as one who held a correſpondence with the ſaid Marquis. At the ſame time the council paſſed an act for the apprehending and bringing him to his trial: but upon private notice from his kinſman Sir Archibald Primroſe, then clerk of the council, he fled into Holland, where he lay concealed till the year 1653; and then returning into Scotland, he ſettled with his family at Edinburgh, where he reſided quietly and obſcurely till the year 1660. Upon the reſtoration of the King, he accompanied Dr. Thomas Sydſerf, Biſhop of Galloway, (the only Scotch Biſhop, who ſurvived the calamities of the uſurpation) to London, where the Biſhop of Wincheſter preſented him to the rectory of Winfrith in Dorſetſhire. In 1677, he was elected and conſecrated Biſhop of Murray in Scotland, to the great joy of the epiſcopal party; and, in 1680, he was tranſlated to the ſee of Galloway, with a diſpenſation to reſide at Edinburgh [A]. He continued to govern his dioceſe ſeven years, and died at Edinburgh of an apoplexy, Oct. the 28th, 1687, aged 74 years. His body was decently interred in the church of the Grey-Friars [B], and his death was extremely regretted by all good and pious men (a) [C]. B.

[A] He had a diſpenſation to reſide at Edinburgh.] The reaſon of this diſpenſation, it ſeems, was, becauſe it was thought unreaſonable to oblige a reverend Prelate of his years, to reſide among ſuch rebellious and turbulent people, as thoſe of his dioceſe were; the effects of whoſe furious zeal had often appeared in their affronting, beating, robbing, wounding, and often murdering the curates (1).

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. ii. col. 1171.

[B] His body was decently interred in the church of the Grey-Fryars.] His funeral ſermon was preached by John, Biſhop of Dunkeld; and upon his coffin was placed this inſcription, compoſed by Dr. Pitcairne:

Maximus, Atkinſi, pietate, et maximus annis,
Ante diem, invita religione, cadis.
Ni caderes, noſtris inferret forſitan oris
Haud impune ſuos Roma ſuperba deos.

Which may be thus engliſhed;

Atkins, rever'd for piety and years,
Thou dieſt, and ſad religion is in tears.
For oh! did'ſt thou her righteous cauſe ſuſtain,
Rome and her gods might tempt our ſhores in vain.

[C] His death was extremely regretted by all good and pious men.] His ſincere piety, conſtant loyalty, ſingular learning, and true zeal for the Proteſtant religion, made his death a very great loſs to the Church of Scotland. He very zealouſly oppoſed the taking off the penal laws againſt the Papiſts in that kingdom; at which time, notwithſtanding the infirmities of age and ſickneſs under which he laboured, he was daily conveyed to the Parliament, where he publickly declared his averſion to the aboliſhing the ſaid laws, and uſed all his intereſt with the members, in perſuading them to a firm and conſtant adherence to the Proteſtant religion, and a zealous oppoſition to all deſigns which might be prejudicial thereto (2).

ATKINS (Richard), author of ſome pieces, particularly a Treatiſe Of the Original and Growth of Printing [A], was deſcended of a good family ſeated at Tuffleigh, in Glouceſterſhire; his father being ſon and heir of Richard Atkins, Eſq; Chief Juſtice of [A] He wrote ſeveral pieces, particularly a Treatiſe Of the Original and Growth of Printing in England.] The liſt of his works given us by Mr. Wood (1), conſiſts of I. The above-mentioned Treatiſe; printed at London, in 1664, in four ſheets, 4*to.* II. His Vindication, London 1669, 4to. III. A Relation of ſeveral paſſages in the weſtern war of England, in which himſelf was concerned. IV. Sighs and Ejaculations. Theſe two laſt were printed with the Vindication. I ſhall give the reader an extract from his Original and Growth of Printing in England, which he publiſhed by order of Sir William Morrice, then Secretary of State. It is tranſcribed from an old manuſcript Chronicle, ſaid to be preſerved in the Archbiſhop's palace at Lambeth, containing an hiſtorical account of the introduction of that noble art into this kingdom; and is as follows. 'Thomas Bourchier, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, moved 'the then King (Henry VI.) to uſe all poſſible means 'for procuring a mould (for ſo it was called) to be 'brought into this kingdom. The King (a good 'man, and much given to works of this nature) 'readily hearkened to the motion, and taking pri-'vate advice how to effect this deſign, concluded 'it could not be brought about without great ſe-'creſy, and a conſiderable ſum of money given to 'ſuch perſon or perſons, as would draw off ſome 'of the workmen from Harlem in Holland, where 'John Guthenberg had newly invented it, and was 'himſelf perſonally at work. 'Twas reſolved, that 'leſs than one thouſand marks would produce 'the deſired effect; towards which ſum, the Arch-'biſhop of Weſt-Wales, and one of Queen Elizabeth's Counſel of the Marches of Wales, and brother to Sir Edward Atkins of Lincoln's-Inn, one of the Barons of the Exchequer; and

'biſhop preſented the King with three hundred 'marks. The money being now prepared, the ma-'nagement of the deſign was committed to Mr. ROBERT 'TOURNOUR, who was then of the robes to the King, 'and a perſon moſt in favour with him, of any 'of his condition. Mr. TOURNOUR took to his aſ-'ſiſtance Mr. CAXTON, a citizen of good abilities, 'who trading much into Holland, might be a cre-'ditable pretence, as well for his going, as ſtaying 'in the Low-Countries. Mr. TOURNOUR was in diſ-'guiſe (his beard and hair quite ſhaven off); but 'Mr. CAXTON appeared known and public. They 'having received the ſum of one thouſand marks, 'went firſt to Amſterdam, then to Leyden, not 'daring to enter Harlem itſelf; for the town was 'very jealous, having impriſoned and apprehended 'divers perſons, who came from other parts for the 'ſame purpoſe. They ſtaid till they had ſpent the 'whole one thouſand marks in gifts and expences, 'ſo that the King was fain to ſend five hundred 'marks more; Mr. TOURNOUR having written to 'the King, that he had almoſt done his work, a 'bargain (as he ſaid) being ſtruck between him and 'two Hollanders for bringing off one of the work-'men, who ſhould ſufficiently diſcover and teach 'the new art. At laſt, with much ado, they got 'off one of the under-workmen, whoſe name was 'Frederic Corſells (or rather Corſellis), who late 'one night ſtole from his fellows in diſguiſe into 'a veſſel prepared before for that purpoſe, and ſo 'the wind (favouring the deſign) brought him ſafe 'to London. 'Twas not thought ſo prudent to ſet 'him on work at London, but by the Archbiſhop's 'means, who had been vice-chancellor, and after-'wards chancellor of the univerſity of Oxon, Cor-'ſellis was carried with a ſtrong guard to Oxon; 'which guard conſtantly watched to prevent Cor-'ſellis from any poſſible eſcape, till he had made 'good his promiſe in teaching how to print; ſo 'that at Oxford, Printing was firſt ſet up in Eng-'land; which was before there was any printing-'preſs, or Printer in France, Spain, Italy, or Ger-'many, except the city of Mentz, which claims 'ſeniority as to printing, even of Harlem itſelf; 'calling herſelf, Urbem Moguntinam artis typogra-'phicæ inventricem primam: though 'tis known to 'be otherwiſe, that city gaining that art by the 'brother of one of the workmen of Harlem, who 'had learned it at home of his brother, and after-'wards ſet up for himſelf at Mentz. This preſs at 'Oxon was at leaſt ten years before there was any 'printing in Europe (except at Harlem and Mentz), 'where alſo it was but new-born. This preſs at 'Oxford was afterwards found inconvenient to be 'the ſole printing place in England, as being too 'far from London, and the ſea; whereupon the 'King ſet up a preſs at St. Albans, and another at 'the abbey of Weſtminſter, where they printed ſe-'veral books of divinity and phyſic; for the King, 'for reaſons beſt known to himſelf and council, 'permitted then no law-books to be printed, nor 'did any Printer exerciſe that art, but only ſuch 'as were the King's ſworn ſervants, the King him-'ſelf paying the price and emolument for printing 'books.' But the authority of this Chronicle may well be called in queſtion for theſe reaſons; firſt, becauſe Mr. Atkins does not pretend to have ſeen the original, but only to have tranſcribed it from a copy, ſent him by an anonymous friend: ſecond-ly, he gives no account by whom it was written, or how it was bequeathed to the library at Lam-beth: thirdly, no author beſides Mr. Atkins, and thoſe who follow him, mention this Chronicle as being in that library: fourthly, it is not to be found there now, the late Earl of Pembroke having employed a perſon to ſearch for it, but in vain; laſtly, there are inconſiſtencies in it, and contradictions to plain facts, now certainly known. I ſhall not here enter upon an examination of this ſubject, but ſhall refer the reader to Mr. Palmer's General Hiſtory of Printing, where the miſtakes of this Chronicle are fully laid open, and the true origin of the Art hiſtori-cally deduced. I ſhall only add, that the deſign of Mr. Atkins's book is little more than an invective againſt the company of Stationers, and to prove, that Printing is a branch of the Royal Prerogative, and a Flower of the Engliſh Crown. B.

[Other arguments, beſides thoſe here alledged, are advanced by Dr. Middleton, to invalidate the autho-rity of the Chronicle publiſhed by Mr. Atkins; and the Doctor ſtrongly contends, that there was no printing in this kingdom till the introduction of it by Caxton. But Mr. Bowyer, in the notes to his abridgment of Dr. Middleton's Diſſertation on the Origin of printing in England, hath offered ſeveral reaſons to ſhew, that the account given in Atkins's record is not ſo incredible or improbable as hath by ſome perſons been imagined. A remakable parti-cular in this Chronicle, which hath ſince been prov-ed to be true, viz. 'that the city of Mentz gained 'the art of printing by the brother of one of the 'workmen of Harlem, who had learnt it at home 'of his brother, and afterwards ſet up for himſelf at 'Mentz,' is urged by Mr. Meerman, in his Origines Typographicæ, as a great confirmation of its authen-ticity, and that the author muſt have had his intelli-gence from ſome one who took it from the beſt mo-numents. Mr. Meerman hath, alſo, in general, aſſerted and maintained the genuineneſs and authori-ty of the record in queſtion. Dr. Middleton thinks, that Atkins, who by his manner of writing ſeems to have been a bold and vain man, might poſſibly be the inventor of it; or, at leaſt, that he was impoſed upon by ſome more crafty; who imagined that his intereſt in a law-ſuit he was engaged in with the company of Stationers, in defence of the King's pa-tents, and the warmth that he ſhewed in proſecuting it, would induce him to ſwallow for genuine what-ever was offered of the kind. On the other hand, Mr. Bowyer aſks, whether it be likely that Mr. At-kins would dare to forge a record, to be laid before the King and Council, and which his adverſaries, with whom he was at law, could diſprove. As At-kins ſays, that he received this hiſtory from a perſon of honour, who was ſome time keeper of the Lam-beth library, it was eaſy when he publiſhed it, April 25, 1664, to have confuted this evidence, if it was falſe. John Bagford in his hiſtory of printing at Ox-ford, blames thoſe who doubted of the authenticity of the Lambeth manuſcript; and tells us that he knew Sir John Birkenhead had an authentic copy of it, when, in 1665, he was appointed by the Houſe of Commons to draw up a bill relating to the exer-ciſe of that art. The manuſcript was probably ne-ver returned to the proper keeper of it, but was af-terwards burnt in the fire of London. — That print-ing was practiſed at Oxford, was a prevailing opinion long before Atkins. Bryan Twyne, in his Apologia pro antiquitate Academiæ Oxonienſis, publiſhed in 1608, informs us, it was ſo delivered down in ancient writ-ings; having heard probably of this Lambeth manu-ſcript. And King Charles the Firſt, in his letters patent to the univerſity of Oxford, March the 5th, in the eleventh year of his reign, 1635-6, mentions printing as brought to Oxford from abroad. All this evidence, in favour of Oxford, and of the ſtory of Frederick Corſellis, is mightily confirmed by a book with a date of its impreſſion from Oxford, Anno 1468, which is in the public library at Cambridge. It is a ſmall volume of forty-one leaves in quarto, with this title: 'Expoſicio Sancti Jeronimi in Sim-'bolum Apoſtolorum ad Papam Laurentium:' and at the end, 'Explicit expoſicio, &c. Impreſſa Oxonie, '& finita Anno Domini M,CCCC.LXVIII.XVII. 'Die Decembris.' If the authority of this book be admitted, it is a clear proof and monument of the exerciſe of printing in Oxford ſeveral years before Caxton began to deal in it. Dr. Middleton, indeed, endeavours to ſhew that the date is a falſe one; and, not to mention the reſt of his arguments, con-firms his opinion from this circumſtance, that we have no other fruit or production from the preſs at Oxford for eleven years next following. But this objection is invalidated by two conſiderations: firſt, that Corſellis's books may have been loſt, a thing by no means uncommon in thoſe days of ignorance; and ſecondly, and his mother ſecond daughter of Sir Edwin Sandys, of Latimer in Buckinghamſhire, Bart. by his wife the Lady Elizabeth Sandys, daughter and heireſs of William Lord Sandys of the Vine near Baſingſtoke in Hampſhire, deſcended from Margaret Bray, the only child of John Bray, next brother and heir to Sir Reginald Bray, Knight-Banneret, and Knight of the Garter, who died without iſſue. Our author, having been partly educated in Engliſh and grammar learning under two very bad maſters, was ſent to the college ſchool at Glouceſter; from whence he was removed, at fourteen years of age, to Baliol college in Oxford, and continued there about two years in the quality of a gentleman-commoner. From Oxford he removed to Lincoln's-Inn; and ſoon after travelled into France, with the ſon of Thomas Lord Arundel of Wardour by a ſecond venter: but that young gentleman dying before they could proceed farther, he returned home, improved himſelf in the accompliſhments of a courtier, and married. Afterwards, upon the breaking out of the Civil Wars in England, he raiſed a troop of horſe for the ſervice of the King at his own expence; by which he ſuffered much in his eſtate. After the Reſtoration of King Charles II., he was appointed one of the Deputy-Lieutenants of Glouceſterſhire; in which ſtation he diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a loyal ſubject of the King, and an affectionate ſon of the Church of England. His character is that of 'an ingenious and 'obſerving man, who ſaw the vanity of this world ſooner than others, though of elder 'years; which fitted him the better for another.' At length being committed priſoner to the Marſhalſea gaol in Southwark, for debt, he died there the fourteenth of September 1677, and was buried in the pariſh church of St. George the Martyr, by the care and appointment of Sir Robert Atkins, one of the Juſtices of the Court of Common-Pleas, and Edward Atkins, Eſq; afterwards one of the Barons of the Exchequer, both nearly related to the deceaſed (a).

ſecondly, that the civil wars broke out in 1469, which might probably oblige our Oxford printer to ſhut up his preſs. Mr. Bowyer produces, likewiſe, a paſſage from the ſecond part of Shakeſpeare's Henry the 6th, as a farther evidence of a more early introduction of printing into England than hath generally been ſuppoſed. The reſult of the whole is, that this fact doth not at all derogate from the honour of Caxton, who was the firſt perſon in England that practiſed the art of printing with fuſile Types, and conſequently the firſt who brought it to perfection: whereas Corſellis printed with ſeparate cut types in wood, being the only method which he had learnt at Harlem (2).

(2) Bowyer's Origin of Printing, p. 1.—30. 2d edition, Ibid. p. 43.

As the ſubject is curious, we ſhall inſert a ſhort abſtract of the riſe and progreſs of printing in general, which was drawn up ſome time ſince, on a different occaſion, from Mr. Bowyer's work.

'The honour of having given riſe to this art has 'been claimed by the cities of Harlem, Mentz, and 'Straſburgh.—To each of theſe cities it may be aſ-'cribed in a qualified ſenſe, as they made improve-'ments upon one another.—But the real inventor of 'printing was Laurentius of Harlem, who proceeded, 'however, no farther than to ſeparate wooden types. 'His firſt eſſay was about the year 1430; and he died 'about 1440, after having printed the Horarium, the 'Speculum Belgicum, and two different editions of Do-'natus. Some of Laurentius's types were ſtolen from 'him by one of his ſervants, John Geinsfleich ſenior, 'who became the firſt printer in Mentz, and publiſhed, 'in 1442, ALEXANDRI GALI Doctrinale, and PETRI 'HISPANI Tractatus. Theſe works were executed 'with wooden types, cut after the model of thoſe which 'he had ſtolen. In 1443, Geinsfleich ſenior entered 'into partnerſhip with Fuſt (who ſupplied money), 'Meidenbachius, and others; and, in 1444, they 'were joined by John Geinsfleich junior, who was diſ-'tinguiſhed by the name of Gutenberg. Gutenberg, 'by the aſſiſtance of his brother, Geinsfleich the elder, 'firſt invented cut metal types, with which was printed 'the earlieſt edition of the Bible. This edition ap-'peared in 1450, and the completing of it took up 'ſeven or eight years. Gutenberg uſed none but 'either wooden or cut metal types.

'The carrying of the art to perfection was owing to 'Peter Schoeffer, the ſervant and ſon-in-law of Fuſt, 'who invented the mode of caſting the types in matri-'ces; and who was probably the firſt engraver on 'copper-plates. The firſt book printed with the im-'proved types was DURANDI Rationale, in 1459. More 'copies of the earlieſt books were printed on vellum than 'on paper. This method, however, was ſoon chang-'ed; and paper was introduced for the greateſt part of 'the impreſſions, a few only being printed on vellum, 'for curioſities, and for the purpoſe of being illumi-'nated. With regard to the claim of Straſburgh, it 'appears, that Gutenberg had endeavoured to intro-'duce printing into that city before he joined his bro-'ther at Mentz; but without ſucceſs. The firſt actual 'printers at Straſburgh were Mentelius and Eggeſte-'nius; and there is no certain proof of a ſingle book 'having been printed there, till after 1462. The 'diſperſion of the Mentz Printers, in that year, occa-'ſioned the art to ſpread rapidly through Europe; 'and, in 1490, it reached even to Conſtantinople (3).'

(3) Ibid. The ſecond eſſay, paſſim.

The firſt Greek printing was a few ſentences of Tully's Offices, at Mentz, 1465, which were miſerably incorrect. In the ſame year, ſome Greek quotations, in an edition of Lactantius's Inſtitutes, were neatly printed, in a monaſtery in the kingdom of Naples. The firſt whole Greek book was the grammar of Conſtantine Laſcaris, at Milan, in 1476. The Roman type was introduced at Rome, in 1467, and was ſoon after brought to great perfection in Italy (4).]

Thomas Atkyns lived in the reign of King Edward III., and died in London, and was buried in the church of St. Peter Cheap, 2. Hen. IV., in the year 1401. Richard Atkyns, ſon of Thomas, followed the profeſſion of the Law, in Monmouthſhire. Thomas Atkyns, was ſon of Richard, and was of the ſame profeſſion. Richard Atkyns, ſon of Thomas died 11 Hen. VII. Thomas Atkyns, ſon of Richard, died 4 Hen. VIII., and was ſucceeded by David Atkyns, who married Alice, daughter of an eminent merchant in Chepſtow, and removed to Tuffleigh, near Glouceſter: he died 1552. Thomas Atkyns, ſon of David, married Margaret, daughter of John Cook of London, and was Judge of the Sheriffs Court in London: he argued the firſt caſe in Plowden's Commentaries, and died before his father 1551, and lies buried in Aldermanbury church in London. Richard Atkyns, ſon

This Sir Robert of whom we are to ſpeak, was born ſome time in the year 1621. He received the firſt tincture of letters, in his father's houſe in Glouceſterſhire, from whence he removed to the univerſity of Oxford, where he ſtudied in Baliol college for ſome time, and was removed thence to the Inns of Court, that is, as may be ſuppoſed from his arms in the chapel windows, to Lincoln's-Inn, where he applied himſelf very cloſely to the ſtudy of the Law (c), in which he became very eminent, as well as for his loyalty in thoſe melancholy times preceding and following the murder of King Charles I. On this account, he was in the month of April 1661, made Knight of the Bath, with many other perſons of the firſt diſtinction, at the coronation of King Charles II. (d). He was alſo, on the twenty-eighth of September in the ſame year, created Maſter of Arts, in full convocation at Oxford (e). Thenceforward he was conſidered in Weſtminſter-Hall, as one of the great ornaments of his profeſſion. In 1671, he was appointed one of the King's Serjeants at Law (f), and in 1672, he was appointed one of the Judges of his Majeſty's Court of Common-Pleas (g), in which honourable ſtation he behaved with great wiſdom and integrity, till the year 1679, when, from a foreſight of very troubleſome times, he thought fit to reſign, and to retire into the country, which he accordingly did (h). His attachment to the laws and liberties of his country, made him unwilling to afford any countenance, as he muſt have done if he had continued a Judge, to the arbitrary proceedings which about that time came into faſhion, and againſt which, he had with ſo much ſtrength of argument and profound learning declared, in the caſe of Sir Samuel Barnardiſton (i) [B]. In this retirement he acted as became ſo great a man; for as he did nothing to diſturb the government of his country, ſo he was far from meanly deſerting her cauſe, or that of her friends (k). In July, 1683, when the unhappy Lord Ruſſel was firſt impriſoned, on account of that conſpiracy, for which he afterwards ſuffered, application was made to Sir Robert Atkyns, for his advice, which, in ſo nice a conjuncture, and when it might have been ſo dangerous to himſelf, he did not either refuſe or decline. This letter, ſo curious in point of matter, and ſo declarative, not only of the prudence and learning, but of the courage and integrity of this worthy perſon, the reader will find in the notes [C]. The ſame perſon to whom Sir Robert wrote this letter, tranſmitted him, immediately on that noble Lord's conviction, a full and exact account of his trial, and the

He married Eleanor, daughter of Thomas Marſh, of Wareſley, in Huntingtonſhire, Eſq; and was one of the Juſtices of the Seſſions in North Wales, and one of the Council of the Marches of Wales: he died 1610, and lies buried at Hempſted. Sir Edward Atkyns, third ſon of Richard, (whoſe elder brothers have ſince been extinct) married Urſula, daughter of Sir Thomas Dacres, of Cheſhunt, in Hertfordſhire: he died one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, aged eighty-two years (1). It was Sir Robert Atkyns, whoſe Life we are now writing, who purchaſed the family ſeat and manor of Saperton, from Sir William Pool in 1660 (2). It was remarkable of this family, that there was always ſome perſon belonging thereto preſiding in ſome of the courts of judicature in this kingdom, for upwards of three hundred years (3).

[B] Declared in the caſe of Sir Samuel Barnardiſton.] This was a very nice and intricate affair; and in order to make it clear to our readers, we muſt give a ſhort account of this caſe from its beginning. Upon a writ out of the court of Chancery, bearing date 8 Febr. 25. Car. II., directed to Sir William Soame, Sheriff of Suffolk; commanding to return a Knight for that county, in the place of Sir Henry North, lately dead; Sir William made a double return, in one indenture, ſpecifying Sir Samuel Barnardiſton, to be duly elected, and in another, the Lord Huntingtower. This election being examined in parliament, Sir Samuel Barnardiſton, was declared duly elected; whereupon he brought his action of treſpaſs, upon the caſe, for the pains and expence, which he had been at, to obtain his ſeat in parliament, againſt Sir William Soame, in the King's-Bench. The defendant pleaded the general iſſue, and upon a trial, the jury found for the plaintiff, and gave him eight hundred pounds damages. Sir William Soame, ſued a Writ of Error in the Exchequer, and there two of the Judges of the Common-Pleas, and all the Barons of the Exchequer, were for reverſing the judgment given in the Court of King's-Bench as erroneous. But Sir William Ellis, and Sir Robert Atkyns, both judges of the Common-Pleas, were of opinion, that the judgment was good, and the argument here referred to, is, That made by Judge Atkyns, in ſupport of his opinion. In this argument he maintains, That the plaintiff had a juſt cauſe of action, that the law gave him a remedy, and that he had taken his proper remedy, by bringing an action upon the caſe. On each of theſe heads he inſiſted largely, from reaſon, law, and hiſtory, and then proceeded to anſwer all the objections that had been made againſt the judgment of the Court of King's-Bench. In the courſe of his harangue, it is manifeſt, that he was not a little apprehenſive of offending the Houſe of Commons, who were wont to look upon themſelves, as ſole judges in ſuch matters. But by wiſely declining to meddle with any points, which did not immediately regard the Record before them, he ſecured himſelf from danger, and ſuſtained, at the ſame time, the juriſdiction of the Courts in Weſtminſter-Hall, with much courage and learning. However, the judgment was reverſed, notwithſtanding all that he, and Sir William Ellis could ſay, and ſo the plaintiff loſt his damages, and ninety-eight pounds coſts. But Sir Robert Atkyns, in quieter times, thought fit to print his argument, and to intimate, that this caſe needed a redreſs, by error in Parliament (4). Nothing however was done therein, even after the Revolution. In the printed collection of our author's tracts, this is placed after his argument, in the caſe of William Williams, Eſq; but for what reaſon I cannot imagine, ſince it is prior in point of time, by no leſs than ten years, the Record in the caſe of Sir Samuel Barnardiſton, being of Trinity Term 26 Car. II., and that in the caſe of Williams, in Trinity Term 36 of the ſame King.

[C] The reader will find in the notes.] It is not certain, to whom this letter was addreſſed: probably it was to ſome noble relation, or to ſome ſolicitor, or other very intelligent perſon, who had the care of Lord Ruſſel's affairs. It has alſo no date; but that may be eaſily ſupplied. On the 28th of June, 1683, Lord Howard, who is the perſon hinted at to be particeps criminis in the following letter, ſurrendered, and

'I Am not without the apprehenſions of danger that may ariſe by adviſing in, or ſo much as diſcourſing of public affairs: yet no fear of danger ſhall hinder me from performing the duty we owe one to another, to counſel thoſe that need our advice, how to make their juſt defence, when they are called in queſtion for their lives; eſpecially if they are perſons that have, by their general carriage, and converſation, appeared to be men of worth, and lovers of their King and country, and of the religion eſtabliſhed among us. I will follow the method you uſe, and anſwer what you aſk, in the order I find it in your letters. I cannot ſee any diſadvantage or hazard, by pleading the general plea of Not Guilty: If it fall out upon the proofs, that the crime is only miſpriſion of treaſon, and not the very crime of treaſon, the jury muſt then find the priſoner not guilty of treaſon; and cannot, upon an indictment of treaſon, find the party guilty of miſpriſion, becauſe he was not indicted for the offence of miſpriſion; and treaſon, and miſpriſion of treaſon, are offences that the law hath diſtinguiſhed the one from the other, and the one is not included in the other; and therefore, if the proofs reach no farther, than to prove a miſpriſion, and amount not to treaſon, the priſoner may urge it for himſelf, and ſay, that the proofs do not reach to the crimes charged in the indictment; and if the Truth be ſo, the court ought ſo to direct the jury not to find it. Now being in company with others, where thoſe others do conſult and conſpire, to do ſome treaſonable act, does not make a man guilty of treaſon, unleſs by ſome words or actions, he ſignify his conſent to it, and approbation of it: but his being privy to it and not diſcovering of it, makes him guilty of miſpriſion of treaſon, which conſiſts in the concealing it, but it makes him not guilty of treaſon; and if the ſame perſon be preſent a ſecond time, or oftener, this neither does not make him guilty of treaſon, only it raiſes a ſtrong ſuſpicion, that he likes it, and conſents to it, and approves of it, or elſe he would have forborn, after being once amongſt them: But the ſtrongeſt ſuſpicion does not ſufficiently prove a guilt in treaſon, nor can it go for any evidence, and that upon two accounts. Firſt, the proofs in caſe of treaſon muſt be plain, and clear, and poſitive, and not by inference or argument, or the ſtrongeſt ſuſpicion imaginable: thus ſaith Sir Edward Coke, in many places in his 3d Inſtitutes in the chapter of High-Treaſon. Secondly, In an indictment of High-Treaſon, there muſt not only be a general charge of treaſon, nor is it enough to ſet forth of what ſort or ſpecies the treaſon is: As killing the King, or levying war againſt him, or coining money, or the like; but there muſt be alſo ſet forth ſome overt or open act, as the Statute of the 25th of Edward III., calls it, or ſome inſtance, given by the party or offender, whereby it may appear, he did conſent to it, and conſult, and approve of it: And if the barely being preſent, ſhould be taken, and conſtrued, to be a ſufficient overt, or open act, or inſtance, then there is no difference between treaſon, and miſpriſion of treaſon; for the being preſent without conſenting, makes no more than miſpriſion: therefore there muſt be ſomething more than being barely preſent to make a man guilty of treaſon, eſpecially ſince the law requires an overt or open act, to be proved againſt the priſoner accuſed. See Sir Edward Coke's 3d Inſtitutes, fol. 12, upon thoſe words of the ſtatute (per overt fact) and that there ought to be direct and manifeſt proofs, and not bare ſuſpicions or preſumptions, be they never ſo ſtrong and violent. See the ſame fol. in the upper part of it, upon the word Proveablement. And the ſtatute of the 5th of Edward VI. cap. ii. requires, that there ſhould be two witneſſes to prove the crime: ſo that if there be but one witneſs, let him be never ſo credible a perſon, and never ſo poſitive, yet if there be no other proof, the party ought to be found not guilty; and thoſe two witneſſes muſt prove the perſon guilty of the ſame ſort or ſpecies of treaſon. As for example, if the indictment be for that ſpecies of treaſon, of conſpiring the King's death, both witneſſes muſt prove ſome fact, or words tending to that very ſort of treaſon; but if there be two witneſſes, and one proves the priſoner conſpired the death of the King, and the other witneſs prove the conſpiring to do ſome other ſort of treaſon, this comes not home to prove the priſoner guilty upon that indictment: for the law will not take away a man's life in treaſon, upon the teſtimony and credit of one witneſs; it is ſo tender of a man's life, the crime and the forfeitures are ſo great and heavy. And as there muſt be two witneſſes, ſo by the ſtatute made in the thirteenth year of his preſent Majeſty, cap. i. (intituled, for the ſafety of his Majeſty's perſon) thoſe two witneſſes muſt not only be lawful, but alſo credible perſons. See that ſtatute in the 5th paragraph, and the priſoner muſt be allowed to object againſt the credit of all, or any of the witneſſes; and if there be but one witneſs of clear and good credit, and the reſt not credible, then the teſtimony of thoſe that are not credible muſt go for nothing, by the words and meaning of this ſtatute: See the ſtatute. Now were I a jury-man, I ſhould think no ſuch witneſs a credible witneſs, as ſhould appear either by his own teſtimony, or upon proof made by others againſt him, to have been particeps criminis, for that proves him to be a bad, and conſequently not ſo credible a man; eſpecially, if it can appear, the witneſs has trepanned the priſoner into the committing of the crime: Then the witneſs will appear to be guilty of a far higher crime, than the priſoner, and therefore ought not to be believed as a credible witneſs againſt the priſoner; for he is a credible witneſs that has the credit of being a good and honeſt man, which a trepanner cannot have; and this trepanning proves withal, that the trepanner did bear a ſpite and malice againſt the perſon trepanned, and intended to do him a miſchief, and deſigned to take away his life. Shall ſuch a one be a credible witneſs, and believed againſt him? God forbid! Then again, it cannot but be believed, that ſuch perſons as have been guilty of the ſame crime, will, out of a natural ſelf-love, be very forward, and willing to ſwear heartily, and to the purpoſe, in order to the convicting of others, that they may, by this ſervice, merit their pardon, and ſave their own lives: and for this reaſon are not ſo credible witneſſes, ſuch as the ſtatute of 13 Car. II., does require. Read over the whole chapters of Sir Edward Coke, of high-treaſon, and of petty-treaſon; for in this latter of petty-treaſon, there is much matter that concerns high-treaſon. I wiſh with all my ſoul, and I humbly and heartily pray to Almighty God, that theſe gentlemen, that have given ſo great proof of their love to the true religion, and of the juſt rights and liberties of their country, and of their zeal againſt Popery, may upon their trial appear innocent; I am ſo ſatisfied of their great worth, that I cannot eaſily believe them guilty of ſo horrid a crime. I pray God to ſtand by them, in the time of their diſtreſs. I wiſh I might have the liberty fairly to give them what aſſiſtance I could, in that wherein I might be any way capable of doing it. I beſeech Almighty God, to heal our diviſions, and eſtabliſh us upon the ſure foundation of peace and righteouſneſs. I thank you, for the favour you have done me, by imparting ſome public affairs, which might perhaps have been unknown to me, or not known till after a long time; for I keep no correſpondence. When there is an occaſion, pray oblige me by a further account, eſpecially what concerns theſe gentlemen; and though I have written nothing here, but what is innocent and juſtifiable, yet that I may be the ſurer againſt any memory (l). This letter which is to be found in his printed works, is dated the twenty-third of July, 1683, two days after Lord Ruſſel was executed, which however could not be known to him at that diſtance (m). His great zeal for liberty, and his known affection for ſeveral perſons, at that time under the diſpleaſure of the government, would certainly have drawn him into ſome inconveniencies, if his own prudence in keeping very little correſpondence, the popular opinion of his great integrity, and the King's perſonal eſteem, had not protected him. We may be the more fully perſuaded of this, from the following inſtance. One Mr. Laurence Braddon, having taken upon him to proſecute the diſcovery of what he called the Earl of Eſſex's murder, whom he ſuppoſed to have been aſſaſſinated in the Tower, though the Coroner's inqueſt had found him felo de ſe; applied himſelf to one Mr. Hugh Speke, a young gentleman of fortune, and who had the honour to be well acquainted with Sir Robert Atkins, to whom he wrote a very warm letter, in recommendation both of Mr. Braddon and the deſign he was upon, intreating Sir Robert to aſſiſt him therein. This letter, however, never came to Sir Robert's hand; for Mr. Braddon being apprehended in the country, the letter was found upon him, and though in February 1683-4, he was convicted at the King's-Bench-Bar for a miſdemeanor, in conſpiring to make the people believe, that the Earl of Eſſex was murdered, and with him Mr. Hugh Speke, merely for writing the aforeſaid letter, for which he was fined a thouſand pounds, yet Sir Robert Atkyns was never queſtioned, though his name was ſo often mentioned in the courſe of thoſe proceedings (n). It was not long after, that our public-ſpirited lawyer gave an open teſtimony of his unſhaken zeal for the laws and liberties of his country, by his excellent argument in the caſe between the King and Sir William Williams, who was proſecuted by the Attorney General, for ſigning an order for the printing of Dangerfield's narrative, by order of the Houſe of Commons, he being at that time Speaker of the Houſe. In this argument, Sir Robert entered deeply into the nature and power of Parliaments, and ſhowed a prodigious ſkill, not only in the laws, but in the hiſtory and antiquities of this kingdom, for which reaſon, this argument of his, when it came to be printed, was looked upon as a political, as well as a law tract, and as ſuch is ſtill in the higheſt eſteem (o) [D]. In the ſucceeding reign of James II., he gave another ſignal proof of his knowledge as a lawyer, and his ſteadineſs as a patriot, by his argument in the caſe of Sir Edward Hales, which hath been alſo printed, and, like the author's other works, received with juſt admiration and applauſe (p) [E]. This piece he ſupported by another, in anſwer to a book publiſhed by Sir Edward Herbert, Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, wherein Sir Edward endeavoured to juſtify the judgment given in that cauſe by authorities (q) [F]. When matters came to a criſis, and things ſeemed

'diſadvantage or miſconſtruction, pray take the pains 'to tranſcribe what notes you think fit, out of this 'large paper, but ſend me this paper back again, 'incloſed in another, by the ſame hand that brings 'it. There is, nor ought to be, no ſuch thing as 'conſtructive treaſon; it defeats the very ſcope 'and deſign of the ſtatute of the 25th of Edw. III., 'which is to make a plain declaration, what ſhall 'be adjudged treaſon by the ordinary courts of 'Juſtice. The conſpiring any thing againſt the 'King's perſon, is moſt juſtly taken to be, to con-'ſpire againſt his life; but conſpiring to levy war, 'or to ſeize the guards, is not conſpiring againſt 'the King's life; for theſe are treaſons of a different 'ſpecies.

'Your faithful friend and ſervant,

[D] And as ſuch, is ſtill in the higheſt eſteem.] The title to this tract is, The Power, Juriſdiction, and Privilege of Parliament, and the Antiquity of the Houſe of Commons aſſerted (6). The occaſion of it was this, An information was exhibited againſt William Williams, Eſq; late Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, for endeavouring to ſtir up ſedition and procure ill-will, between the King and his ſubjects, by appointing a certain ſeditious and infamous libel, intitled, The Information of Thomas Dangerfield, to be printed and publiſhed. The defendant pleaded to the juriſdiction of the court, ſetting forth, that he was Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, and that, in obedience to their order, he had appointed that Narrative to be printed; wherefore he demanded the judgment of the Court of King's-Bench, whether it ought to take farther cognizance of the matter. Sir Robert Atkyns's argument is in ſupport of this plea, and therein he undertakes to prove three propoſitions. Firſt, That what was done in this caſe, was done in a courſe of juſtice, and that in the higheſt court of the nation, and according to the law and cuſtom of Parliament. Secondly, That however, that which was done in this caſe, was not to be imputed to the defendant, who acted in it but as the ſervant, or miniſter, of the Parliament, though in a very honourable ſtation. Thirdly, That theſe, being matters tranſacted in Parliament, and by the Parliament, the Court of King's-Bench ought not to take conuſance of them, nor had any juriſdiction to judge or determine them. To each of theſe points, Sir Robert ſpeaks freely, fully, and from the beſt authorities. It muſt be allowed, that he ſometimes digreſſes pretty far, but the reaſon is viſible: he intended to give the people a juſt idea of the ſubject, which at that time was extremely neceſſary, and it muſt be acknowledged, that this argument of his admirably anſwered his purpoſe.

(6) Atkyns's Tracts, p. 1.

[E] Received with juſt admiration and applauſe.] The title of this treatiſe is, An Enquiry into the Power of diſpenſing with Penal Statutes (7). The reaſon of it is this: An action was brought in Eaſter Term, in the ſecond year of King James II., againſt Sir Edward Hales, for acting as a Colonel of Foot, without receiving the Sacrament, or taking certain oaths appointed by an act of Parliament, to be taken within a certain time; whereupon he was legally indicted in the county of Kent, and convicted, whereby the plaintiff became entitled to the forfeiture of five hundred pounds. To this the defendant pleaded, that the King, by his letters patent, had diſpenſed with his taking the Sacrament, or the oaths, and thereupon demurred generally: The plaintiff joined in demurrer, and judgment was given for the defendant. This induced Sir Robert Atkyns, to conſider at large the doctrine of Diſpenſations, which in this diſcourſe is fully handled.

(7) Atkyns's Tracts, p. 177.

[F] Given in that cauſe by authorities.] While Sir Robert was employed in writing this treatiſe, the Lord Chief Juſtice Herbert, ſent abroad a book entitled, A ſhort Account of the Authorities in Law, upon which Judgment was given in Sir Edward Hales's Caſe. The reaſon of his writing it was, becauſe he apprehended a diſquiſition would be made into seemed ripe for bringing about that great change, since called the Revolution, Sir Robert Atkyns did all that could be expected from him, to further and promote it. On this account, he was received with great marks of distinction by King William and his royal consort, who, in the month of May, 1689, made him Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, Sir Edward Nevill, Nicholas Lechmere, and John Turton, Esquires, being the other Barons (r). This dignity, however, did not hinder him from vindicating in print, the memory of the deceased Lord Russel, who, though his attainder was reversed by act of Parliament, yet there were not wanting some who maintained the justice of his sentence with great eagerness. Against these, Sir Robert Atkyns wrote two pieces with the same spirit and accuracy visible in his other discourses, though he was then very far in years, and had also much business upon his hands (s) [G]. On the nineteenth of October, 1689, the Marquis of Halifax, whom the Lords had chosen for their Speaker, desired to be excused from discharging that office any longer; upon which, the Lord Chief Baron Atkyns was immediately chosen in his stead, and so continued till the Great Seal was given to Sir John Somers, in the beginning of the year 1693 (t). The last act of this great man's life, which deserves to be particularly taken notice of, is his speech to Sir William Ashurst, Lord Mayor of London elect, when he was sworn before him in the Exchequer, October 30, 1693 (u). The government was then very apprehensive, and thought it necessary to convince the people of their danger; for which no man was thought to be more fit than the Chief Baron, who discharged his duty with great zeal and spirit, and with proportionable success. This speech hath also been preserved, and will always afford entertainment to the curious, on account of the extraordinary matters of fact mentioned therein (w) [H]. In the beginning of the Summer, 1695, Sir Robert Atkyns shewed an inclination of resigning his great into this affair in Parliament; and therefore he thought it incumbent on him, to give the clearest account he could, of his own conduct in that affair. Sir Robert Atkyns having before written on the subject, and maintained the reverse of most of the propositions maintained by the Chief Justice, conceived it to be absolutely necessary for him to join to his former book, an examination and refutation of this treatise of Sir Edward Herbert (8). In doing this, he treated him however with all the candour and decency imaginable; and though he leaves no stone unturned to shew the insufficiency of what had been alledged, in favour of the judgment, given in the Court of King's-Bench; yet throughout the whole, he expresses a great respect for the Chief Justice, and admits, that in the pronouncing this judgment, all the Judges, except two, concurred in his opinion. In discussing the doctrine of Dispensations, Sir Robert had frequent occasion to mention the Canon Law, and the proceedings in Ecclesiastical courts; but not thinking that what he had said therein was full enough, he resolved to compose another treatise on that subject, which he accordingly did. It is entitled, A Discourse concerning the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, in the Realm of England, occasioned by the late Commission in Ecclesiastical Causes. It is a very clear, as well as a very learned piece, containing a great deal of matter in a very little room; so that whoever reads it, and is inclined to pursue the plan there laid down, may be in a short time acquainted with all that is to be met with, in our law or history, on this subject. This tract is generally annexed to that on the Dispensing Power, which is the reason of my giving an account of both in one note.

(8) Ibid. p. 291.

[G] Also much business on his hands.] The first defence of the Lord Russel's innocency (9), was written in answer to a piece intitled, An Antidote against Poison; wherein the last speech of the Lord Russel was examined, and great pains taken to prove, that it was artful rather than sincere; and many arguments added to shew, that this Lord suffered justly, and that the complaints of his friends had no foundation. Sir Robert Atkyns, in his answer, keeps close to the printed trial, and endeavours to make it plain, that, according to the rules of law, the indictment was insufficient, and that with respect to the rule of legal evidence, there was a great deficiency in point of proof. Soon after the publication of this answer, and while a bill was depending in Parliament for reversing the Lord Russel's attainder, the author of the Antidote appeared again in print. His piece was called, The Magistracy and Government of England vindicated, &c. Wherein he used a good deal of rough language, and treated Sir Robert Atkyns very tartly. It was generally supposed, that the author of the tracts was Sir Bartholemew Shower, an eminent lawyer, and one of the King's counsel, at Lord Russel's trial. Sir Robert Atkyns intimates, so much in his reply, which he called, A Farther Defence of Lord Russel's Innocency (10). In this piece he shews the weakness of his adversary's arguments, and, with great solidity of reason, exposes a practice in the preceding reigns of making florid rhetorical speeches, against prisoners tried for high-treason, on which he expressly charges the death of Lord Russel. Sir Robert also insists on the expediency of allowing state prisoners counsel at their trials, and what he advances on this head, is so clear and so convincing, that it raised that spirit among the true Patriots of those times, to which we owe the enjoyment of an excellent law to that purpose. In the same treatise, Sir Robert maintains, that King Charles's guards were troops maintained in defiance of law, the trained bands being, as he says, the proper guards of their King and country; and therefore he thinks, the laying an attempt against these guards in the indictment, as an act of overt-treason, was insufficient; and he cites an expression of the Lord Chief Justice at the trial, which seems to prove his Lordship thought so too.

(10) Ibid. p. 385.

[H] Extraordinary matters therein mentioned.] In this celebrated harangue (11), Sir Robert draws a terrible picture of the power and designs of the French King: He says, his intention was to become Monarch of the West, that he intended to subdue England, and settle Popery therein; he magnifies his power at sea, as equal to that of England, Holland, and Spain, taken together. Next he proceeds to shew, that King Charles II., and King James II., had entered into engagements with the French King, in order to make themselves absolute, and to settle Popery here. In the third place, he speaks of the changes made in the coronation oaths of King Charles I., and King James II. After this, he proceeds to compliment the Lord Mayor, assuring him, that the choice made by the city at that juncture, gave great pleasure to all good men. This leads him to speak of the functions of a Mayor, which are very concisely described, and pathetically recommended to the consideration of the person to whom he spoke. At the conclusion of his harangue, he touches again on the French King, with a good deal of warmth. How seasonable this speech was, and of how great service to the government, appears from its having passed through several editions, and its being preserved with other curious papers in that valuable collection of State Tracts, in the reign of King William (12), which is so deservedly esteemed. All these pieces of Sir Robert Atkyns, have been collected into one volume; and whoever inclines to be thoroughly informed of the true constitution of his country, of the grounds and reasons of the Revolution, and of the danger of suffering great office. He was then in the ſeventy-fourth year of his age, and might well be eſteemed deſirous of paſſing the reſt of his days in quiet. Yet it is a prevailing opinion, that his reſignation was owing to another and more ſecret cauſe; viz. His failing in his deſign of becoming Maſter of the Rolls, in the room of Sir John Trevor (x). Some pains were taken to perſuade the Lord Chief Baron from this reſolution: but he continued ſteadily fixed therein; ſo that in the beginning of June, 1695, Sir Edward Ward, then Attorney-General, was made choice of, to preſide in the Court of Exchequer. Sir Robert Atkyns thenceforward laid aſide all thoughts of public affairs, and retired to his ſeat of Saperton-hall in Glouceſterſhire, where he ſpent the laſt fourteen years of his life in eaſe and quiet. He died in the beginning of the year 1709, aged eighty-eight years (y). He was a man of great probity, as well as of great ſkill in his profeſſion; and a warm friend to the Conſtitution, which he was ready to maintain againſt all opponents. Beſides the ſeveral learned tracts mentioned in the notes, he is ſaid to have been the author of a treatiſe, againſt the exorbitant power of the court of Chancery (z). In the courſe of his life he was twice married, firſt to Mary, daughter of Sir George Clerk, of Walford in Northamptonſhire, and a ſecond time, to Anne, daughter of Sir Thomas Dacres (a). He left behind him an only ſon, Sir Robert Atkyns (of whom in the next article), and to him deſcended three very conſiderable eſtates in the county of Glouceſter, viz. Saperton, Pinbury, and Swell, with a fine ſeat belonging to each of them. Theſe eſtates he entailed, in caſe the iſſue male of his ſon ſhould fail, on the iſſue male of his brother, Sir Edward Atkyns, Knt. but this ſettlement he was afterwards prevailed upon to break through (b). Having mentioned this Sir Edward Atkyns, it may not be amiſs to inform the reader, that he was our author's younger brother, though his predeceſſor in the Exchequer, having ſat as Lord Chief Baron there, in the reign of King James II. This Sir Edward was the father of Sir Richard Atkyns, who was Colonel of a regiment of horſe, in the reign of King William III., and though he died a very young man, yet he had the reputation of being a gallant and experienced officer (c).

ing prerogative to joſtle law, cannot read a better or a plainer book. His ſtile is ſtrong, but not ſtiff; there is a mixture of wit, but of ſuch wit, as is proper to the ſubject. It comes in pertinently, and ſerves to enlighten, not to amuſe or miſlead, the reader: whatever he ſays, is ſupported by authorities, and there is ſuch a viſible candour in all his diſcourſes, that if a man does not reliſh his arguments, he muſt at leaſt admire the manner in which they are offered. In a word, whether we conſider him in his private, or in his public ſtation; as a gentleman or as a judge; as an eminent lawyer, or a diſtinguiſhed patriot; as a ſtateſman, or an author; we ſhall ſee nothing but what is great and amiable, worthy of love and of reſpect, and of that veneration which is due to virtuous men from poſterity. C.

ATKYNS (Sir ROBERT) junior, ſon to the former Sir Robert Atkyns, by Anne, daughter of Sir Thomas Dacres, of Hertfordſhire. He was born in the year 1646 (a), and educated with great care under the eye of his father. He became very early a great lover of, and in a ſhort ſpace a great proficient in, the laws and hiſtory of his country in general, which by degrees led him to that undertaking, which will for ever preſerve his memory (b). As he had a very conſiderable eſtate ſettled upon him, he affected chiefly a country life, and was eminent for all the virtues which could adorn an Engliſh gentleman. He was choſen to repreſent his county in Parliament, as often as he would accept that great honour (c). His knowledge and integrity induced many of his neighbours to make him the arbitrator of their differences, which he readily undertook, and generally executed to the ſatisfaction of both parties (d). He married Louiſa, daughter to Sir John Carteret, of Hawnes in Bedfordſhire (e); but having by her no iſſue male, he gave occaſion thereby to his father, to ſettle his eſtate on the male iſſue of Sir Edward Atkyns, which ſettlement was the unlucky occaſion of a law-ſuit between the father and ſon (f). As for this Sir Robert Atkyns, of whom we are now ſpeaking, though he differed pretty much from his father in his opinions [A], yet he inherited both his prudence and his probity, and was equally eſteemed and beloved by men of all parties (g). His deſign of writing the Hiſtory of Glouceſterſhire took birth from an intention of the ſame ſort in Dr. Parſons, Chancellor of the dioceſe of Glouceſter, who had been at great pains and trouble to collect the materials for ſuch a work, in the compiling of which, he was hindered by many great infirmities, and a general declining ſtate of health (b). Sir Robert Atkyns having once conceived the uſe and value of ſuch a hiſtory, thought himſelf obliged to carry on, and to compleat it, as a juſt return for that great affection, which the inhabitants of this county had manifeſted for his family, and for himſelf (i). After once he had undertaken it, he was indefatigable in the enquiry after, and procuring all the numerous helps neceſſary to ſo extenſive a deſign; and having ſucceeded in this ſcheme of his, beyond perhaps his own expectations, he digeſted his matter into an eaſy and familiar method, that after all the trouble he had ſuſtained, his reader might feel as little of it as poſſible. This great and valuable work he lived to perfect, and ſend to the preſs, though he did not ſurvive long enough to ſee it publiſhed (k). A fire which conſumed the houſe of Mr. Bowyer the Printer, deſtroyed a great part of the copies of this Hiſtory of Glouceſterſhire, which conſequently render it ſcarce and dear, for which reaſon it ſeemed neceſſary to give the reader a view of its contents in the notes (l) [B]. This learned and worthy gentleman reſided uſually at Pinbury Park in Glouceſterſhire during the ſummer, and at his houſe in Weſtminſter during the winter ſeaſon; where, in 1711, he was ſeized with a dyſentery, of which he died on the twenty-ninth of October, in the ſame year, in the ſixty-fifth year of his age, having ſurvived his father ſomewhat more than a year (m). His corpſe was carried down to Glouceſterſhire, and interred in the pariſh church of Saperton, where a noble monument was erected to his memory, by Louiſa Lady Atkyns, his diſconſolate widow (n) [C]. It is worthy of remark, that two authors of the moſt oppoſite principles, Anthony Wood (o), and the author of the Annual Hiſtory of Europe, ſpeak with equal reſpect of our author (p), which ſhows that the virtues of ſome men can command the reſpect of all parties.

[B] A view of its contents in the notes.] The title of this work is plain and comprehenſive, viz. The Antient and Preſent State of Glouceſterſhire, by Sir Robert Atkyns. It is a large folio, conſiſting of 859 pages, excluſive of the preface and index. In the firſt place, our author gives us preparatory inſtructions for the better underſtanding the enſuing diſcourſe. Theſe introductory remarks conſiſt of abundance of curious particulars, ſuch as, An hiſtorical account of the ſeveral religious foundations within the dioceſe; A view of our antient conſtitution; The original of our laws; The riſe of our national councils. Then he proceeds to ſhew, That there were but fifty lay freeholders in Glouceſterſhire, in the reign of King William I.; and of theſe, their families, deſcents, and eſtates, there is a diſtinct account. We are next preſented with a general deſcription of the county, and of the city of Glouceſter: then comes the hiſtory, in regular order, under fifteen heads. 1. We are informed in what Hundred each pariſh lies, its diſtance from Glouceſter, and from the two next market towns, with the beſt account that can be had of the derivation of its name, and an account of the religious houſe, or ancient family, to which it belonged. 2. Contains the hiſtorical antiquities of each place, with ſo much of Doomeſday book, as relates to Glouceſterſhire; and in many of the pariſhes, the ſucceſſion of proprietors is ſet down for ſix or ſeven hundred years. 3. Gives the names of the Lords of manors, and a genealogical hiſtory of their families. 4. Shews the deanery each pariſh belongs to, that is the rural deanery. 5. Sets down the value of every living, the names of the patrons and incumbents from the Reformation. It gives alſo the value of impropriations and exempted tythes. 6. Exhibits the true ſtate of the firſt fruits, tenths, and other charges of the clergy. 7. Gives the Hiſtory of the charities, deſcribes their form, and whatever is remarkable in them. 8. Preſerves the memorial of monuments, as a due encouragement to virtue. 9. Enumerates the charities in each pariſh above twenty pounds. 10. Shews the extent of every pariſh, the nature of the ſoil, the brooks, rivers, &c. 11. Sets down the names of the ſeveral hamlets in each pariſh, with the number of their families, and their diſtance from the pariſh church. 12. Gives the number of houſes, inhabitants, and freeholders. 13. Contains the yearly births and burials. 14. Informs us of the public taxes, and how they have altered from time to time in method of collection, and in proportion. 15. Preſents us with the trade, the battles and curioſities of each place. The whole is enriched with maps, plans, and curious draughts of all the gentlemens ſeats in the county. Ancient records in the Tower are duly applied to ſuch places as they have any relation to. And whatever is to be met with in the works of Camden, or Dugdale, in Latin, is here tranſlated into Engliſh, that the uniformity of the work might be preſerved. There is alſo exhibited a table of the coats of arms of the nobility and gentry in the county, antient and modern. In ſhort, all the pains poſſible have been taken to make this as compleat a hiſtory of the county, as it could be in the power of one man to frame; and with a little induſtry, any native of Glouceſterſhire may from time to time add whatever is neceſſary to preſerve it always perfect.

[C] By Louiſa Lady Atkyns, his diſconſolate widow.] There is on this monument a very copious inſcription (2), containing a juſt character of the deceaſed; but inaſmuch as there is nothing contained therein which the reader will not find in this life, it has not been thought neceſſary to tranſcribe it. Let this however be remarked that it ends thus: His ſorrowful widow erected this monument to his memory, though he left behind him one more durable, THE ANCIENT AND PRESENT STATE OF GLOSTERSHIRE. C.

(2) At the end of the preface.

[Within a little more than theſe twenty years, a neat monument hath been erected in Weſtminſter Abbey, nearly oppoſite to Shakeſpeare's, to the memory of Sir Robert Atkyns ſenior, his brother Sir Edward Atkyns, and Sir Robert Atkyns junior. The inſcription is a long one; but for the reaſon juſt aſſigned with regard to Lady Atkyns's monument for her huſband, it is not neceſſary that it ſhould here be inſerted.] K.

He was one of the many children of Lewis Atterbury, of Great Houghton, in that county; where the family of Atterbury flouriſhed for many years (1). In 1654, he became Rector of Great or Broad Riſington, in the dioceſe and county of Glouceſter; and, after the Reſtoration, took a preſentation for that benefice under the Great Seal, and was inſtituted again to confirm his title to it. On the eleventh of September, 1657, he was admitted Rector of Milton, or Middleton-Keynes, in Buckinghamſhire; and took the ſame method of corroborating his title to this living, at the King's return (e). July the twenty-fifth, 1660, he was made Chaplain Extraordinary to Henry Duke of Glouceſter (f); and the ſame year, December the firſt, was created Doctor in Divinity (g). In 1693, returning from London, he was unfortunately drowned near his own houſe (h), leaving behind him two ſons, Lewis and Francis (i). He publiſhed three occaſional Sermons [B].

ATTERBURY (Lewis), an eminent Divine, elder brother of Dr. Francis Atterbury, Biſhop of Rocheſter (a), was born at Caldecot, in the pariſh of Newport-Pagnel, in Buckinghamſhire, the ſecond of May, 1656 (b). He was educated at Weſtminſter School, under the celebrated Dr. Buſby, between whom, and our Divine's father, Dr. Lewis Atterbury, there was a friendſhip and intimacy. In the eighteenth year of his age, he was ſent to Chriſt-Church in Oxford, and matriculated in that univerſity the tenth of April, 1674, under the tuition of Dr. George Walls. The twenty-firſt of September, 1679, he was ordained Deacon at Chriſt-Church, by Dr. John Fell, Biſhop of Oxford, and Dean of that college. He commenced Maſter of Arts the fifth of July, 1680; and, the year following, was ordained Prieſt, at Bugden, by Dr. Thomas Barlow, Biſhop of Lincoln [A]. In 1683, he officiated as Chaplain to Sir William Pritchard, Knight, then Lord Mayor of London. In February, 1684, he was inſtituted Rector of Sywell in Northamptonſhire; which living he afterwards reſigned, upon his accepting of other perferment. The eighth of July, 1687, he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Civil Law. In December, 1688, he married Penelope, the daughter of Mr. John Bedingfield (c) [B]. In 1691, we find him Lecturer of St. Mary Hill in London; and, not long after his marriage, he ſettled at Highgate [C], where he ſupplied the pulpit of the Reverend Mr. Daniel Lathom, who was very old, and had loſt his ſight. Upon the death of this gentleman, Dr. Atterbury was unanimouſly elected, the ſixteenth of June, 1695, by the truſtees of that chapel, to be their preacher; being, at the ſame time, one of the ſix preaching Chaplains to the Princeſs Anne of Denmark, at Whitehall and St. James's: which place he continued to ſupply, after that Princeſs's acceſſion to the throne, and likewiſe during part of the reign of King George I. In September, 1707, he was preſented, by the Queen, to the Rectory of Sheperton in Middleſex, the incumbent thereof being deprived for neglecting to take the oaths within the time limited by law. On the third of March, 1719, he was collated by Dr. John Robinſon, Biſhop of London, to the rectory of Hornſey in Middleſex; in which pariſh the chapel of Highgate is ſituated. Dr. Atterbury never roſe to any dignity in the Church, as might have been expected from the power and intereſt of his brother, who even refuſed him the Archdeaconry of Rocheſter, in his own gift [D]. At about ſeventy years of age, he had a ſlight ſtroke of the palſy, which occaſioned his going frequently to

[A] He was ordained Prieſt — by Doctor Barlow, Biſhop of Lincoln.] What hopes that Prelate then entertained of our young Divine, appears from the certificate of his ordination, in which the Biſhop teſtifies, 'That he was a perſon (both for life and learning) 'capable and worthy of Orders,' and that 'it did further appear, by a good and pious Sermon he then 'preached before the ſaid Biſhop, that he was able to 'execute the miniſterial function with benefit to any 'congregation, to the cure of which Providence ſhould 'call him (1).'

[B] He married Penelope, the daughter of Mr. John Bedingfield.] Of this marriage came three ſons and a daughter. The firſt and ſecond ſon died in their infancy. The third ſon, named Bedingfield Atterbury, was born the 8th of January, 1693, and, after a ſchool education at Weſtminſter, was ſent to Chriſt-Church in Oxford, and matriculated the 9th of April, 1713. He commenced Maſter of Arts the 20th of January, 1718, and took Deacon's orders. He was a ſober, modeſt, and ingenious young gentleman. But the hopes, which his parents and friends conceived of him, were ſoon diſappointed; for he died of the ſmall-pox the 27th of December, 1718. Dr. Atterbury's daughter, named after her mother, was born the 15th of June, 1699; married to Mr. George Sweetapple, of St. Andrew's, Holbourn, Brewer; and died in Auguſt, 1725, leaving one daughter, who lived to inherit her grandfather's fortune, but died about ſeven months after him, the 3d of June, 1732, in the eleventh year of her age. Mrs. Atterbury, the mother, died the firſt of May, 1723 (2).

(2) Ibid, p. 9, 10.

[C] He ſettled at Highgate.] When he firſt reſided there, he obſerved what difficulties the poor in the neighbourhood then underwent, for want of a good Phyſician or Apothecary; and therefore he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Phyſic, and, having attained a good ſkill therein, he practiſed it (gratis) occaſionally among his poor neighbours (3).

(3) Ibid. p. 11.

[D] His brother (the Biſhop of Rocheſter) refuſed him the Archdeaconry of Rocheſter.] The editor of Dr. Atterbury's Sermons has given us ſome letters, which paſſed between the two brothers upon this occaſion. The firſt is from the Doctor to the Biſhop, upon a report of the death of the Archdeacon of Rocheſter. The Biſhop had, the day before, given his brother reaſons, to Bath; where he died [E], after a ſhort illneſs, on the twentieth of October, 1731*. He publiſhed ſeveral Sermons, and other pieces [F]; and, ſince his death, two volumes of his Sermons have been publiſhed by the Reverend Mr. Edward Yardley, Archdeacon of Cardigan [G].

ſons, why he thought it improper to make him his Archdeacon. To which the Doctor here replies: 'Your Lordſhip very well knows, that Lanfranc, 'Archbiſhop of Canterbury, had a brother for his 'Archdeacon; and that Sir Thomas More's father 'was a puiſne Judge, when he was Lord Chancellor. 'And thus, in the ſacred hiſtory, did God himſelf 'appoint, that the ſafety and advancement of the 'Patriarchs ſhould be procured by their younger brother; and that they, with their father, ſhould live 'under the protection and government of Joſeph (4).' In anſwer to this, the Biſhop informs his brother, that the Archdeacon was not dead, but well, and likely to continue ſo: 'When he was in danger, of late, ſays 'he, the firſt perſon I thought of was you. But there 'are objections againſt that, in point of decency—It 'had been a much properer poſt for my nephew, if 'God had pleaſed to ſpare his life (5).' This is followed by two others, from the Biſhop to his brother, acquainting him, that he had reſolved to collate Dr. Brydges, the Duke of Chandois's brother, to the Archdeaconry of Rocheſter, then actually vacant; aſſuring him at the ſame time, he would uſe all his endeavours to procure him ſome good dignity in the Church, 'Such, ſays he, as you, and I, and all the world ſhall 'agree, is every way proper for you (6).' Dr. Atterbury was far from being ſatisfied with the reaſons aſſigned by the Biſhop for his refuſal; as appears by his laſt letter, in which he ſays: 'I cannot imagine what 'indecency there can be, to have raiſed your elder 'brother in place under you—There is ſome ſhew of 'reaſon, I think, for the non-acceptance, but none 'for the not giving it.—I hope I ſhall be content with 'that meaner poſt, in which I am, my time, at longeſt, being but ſhort in this world, and my health not 'ſuffering me to make thoſe neceſſary applications 'others do: Nor do I underſtand the language of the 'preſent times; for I find, I begin to grow an old 'faſhioned gentleman, and am ignorant of the weight 'and value of words, which in our time riſe and fall 'like ſtock (7).'

[E] He died at Bath.] By his will he gave directions to be buried at Highgate, and that a monument ſhould be erected in the chapel, and an inſcription in ſuch or like words as he ſhould leave behind him. All which was punctually complied with: A fluted marble column, with a pedeſtal and capital of the Corinthian order, ſurmounted with his paternal arms, being ſet up on the wall near the pulpit, with an inſcription on the pedeſtal, expreſſing his ſeveral preferments, his marriage, iſſue, age, and death. Underneath the baſe of the column, is a book opened; on the leaves of which is, Abi, ſpectator, et te brevi moriturum ſcito; i. e. Go, ſpectator, and know that thou ſhalt ſoon die (8). By his ſaid will, Dr. Atterbury gave ſome few books to the libraries at Bedford and Newport, and his whole collection of pamphlets, amounting to upwards of 200 volumes, to the library of Chriſt Church, Oxford. He charged his eſtate for ever with the payment of 10*l.* yearly to a ſchoolmiſtreſs, to inſtruct girls at Newport-Pagnel, which ſalary he had himſelf in his life-time paid for many years. He remembered ſome of his friends, and left a reſpectful legacy of an hundred pounds to his dear brother, in token of his true eſteem and affection. He likewiſe made the Biſhop's ſon (after his grand-daughter, who did not long ſurvive him) heir to all his fortune (9).

[G] Two volumes of his Sermons, publiſhed by the Reverend Edward Yardley, Archdeacon of Cardigan.] Theſe Sermons are publiſhed in compliance with the Will of the deceaſed, who deviſeth to the publiſher of them, whom he appointed his Executor, all his manuſcript Sermons, and other manuſcript books and papers of his writing or compoſition, deſiring that he do reviſe and ſelect ſuch of them, as he ſhall think may ſerve to the honour of God, and bring no diſcredit to his memory, and that he do cauſe ſuch to be printed (10). Moſt of theſe diſcourſes, the editor aſſures the public (11), were noted by the author to be printed, though they had not all his laſt hand to fit them for the preſs; and that, in the reviſal of them, he hath taken care to do juſtice both to the author and the reader. We ſhall ſubjoin the character he gives of the author and his ſermons. 'If nature was more laviſh in giving his brother, the Biſhop, the moſt ornamental 'and uſeful endowments of a fine genius, a ready wit, 'an eloquent pen, and an engaging and proper elocution; ſhe was not wanting in beſtowing on our 'author good and ſound natural parts, which, even 'in his youth, he much improved by ſevere ſtudies. 'By his conſtant and repeated pulpit exerciſes, for 'upwards of forty years together, he acquired the 'reputation of a plain, uſeful, and ſolid preacher. 'The drift of his diſcourſes was to make men better 'Chriſtians, and therefore he never choſe to dwell 'upon nice and high ſpeculations; and whenever he 'did enter upon thoſe more elevated ſubjects, his 'principal endeavour was, to render ſuch conſiderations uſeful towards amending the lives of his congregation. His delivery was akin to the ſtile of 'his diſcourſes, plain and eaſy, without any manner 'of affectation. His ſtyle has nothing in it of labour, and, perhaps, may ſometimes, by nicer judges, 'be taxed with want of accuracy: But, the truth is 'this;

ATTERBURY (Francis), Biſhop of Rocheſter in the reigns of Queen Anne and King George I., was born the 6th of March, 1662, at Middleton, or Milton Keynes, near Newport-Pagnel, in Buckinghamſhire (a). He had his education in Grammar learning at Weſtminſter-School; and from thence, in 1680, was elected a Student of Chriſt-Church college in Oxford (b): where he ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf for the politeneſs of his wit and learning; and gave early proofs of his Poetical Talents, in a Latin verſion of Mr. Dryden's Abſalom and Achitophel [A], an Epigram on a Lady's Fan [B], and a tranſlation of two Odes of Horace [C]. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, June the thirteenth, 1684 (c); and that of Maſter, April the twentieth, 1687 (d). This year, he made his firſt Eſſay in controverſial writing, in a piece, entitled, An Anſwer

Cognovere pias nondum pia ſæcula fraudes
Arte Sacerdotum, nondum vetuere maritos
Multiplici celebrare jugo connubia leges;
Cum vir ſponſarum numeraverat agmen, & uni
Non ſervire toro, fato adverſante, coactus
Plurima fertilibus produxit ſtemmata lumbis;

Jam pridem multos utero ſatis ubere natos
Jeſſidi peperit: ſed ſacra cubilia vernæ
Cum premerent, ſoboles obliquo tramite ſceptrum

Nec forma inferior, ceſſit virtute nec ulli:
An magè divino pater inſpiratus amore
Ipſum progenuit majore libidinis œſtro

Felicem dederint ad ſceptra virilibus anſam
Formæ ornamentis, & iter proclive paraſſent;
Huic Fama in campis ſonuit matura remotis,

[B] His Epigram on a Lady's Fan.] The reader may ſuppoſe the Fan to be a white one, and that the author borrowed it, and wrote the following lines between the ſticks:

Flavia the leaſt and ſlighteſt toy
Can with reſiſtleſs art employ:
This Fan in meaner hands would prove
An engine of ſmall force in love;
Yet ſhe, with graceful air and mien,
Not to be told, or ſafely ſeen,
Directs its wanton motions ſo,
That it wounds more than Cupid's bow;
Gives coolneſs to the matchleſs dame,
To every other breaſt a flame.

[C] His tranſlation of two Odes of Horace.] The firſt is, The Dialogue between Horace and Lydia, Od. 9. Lib. iii.

Horace.

Whilſt I was fond, and you were kind,
Nor any dearer youth reclin'd
On your ſoft boſom, ſought to reſt,
Phraates was not half ſo bleſt.

Lydia.

Whilſt you adored no other face,
Nor lov'd me in the ſecond place,
My happy celebrated fame
Outſhone ev'n Ilia's envy'd flame.

Horace.

Me Chloe now poſſeſſes whole,
Her voice and lyre command my ſoul;
Nor wou'd I death itſelf decline,
Cou'd her life ranſom'd be with mine.

Lydia.

For me young lovely Calais burns,
And warmth for warmth my heart returns:
Twice cou'd I life with eaſe reſign,
Cou'd his be ranſom'd once with mine.

Horace.

What if ſweet love, whoſe bands we broke,
Again ſhou'd tame us to the yoke;
Shou'd baniſh'd Chloe ceaſe to reign,
And Lydia her loſt pow'r regain?

Lydia.

Tho' Heſperus be leſs fair than he,
Thou wilder than the raging ſea,
Lighter than down, yet gladly I
With thee wou'd live, with thee wou'd die.

The other is, Od. 3. Lib. iv.

He, on whoſe birth the Lyric Queen
Of numbers ſmil'd, ſhall never grace
The Iſthmian gauntlet, nor be ſeen
First in the fam'd Olympic race:
He ſhall not, after toils of war,
And taming haughty monarchs pride,
With laurell'd brows conſpicuous far,
To Jove's Tarpeian temple ride.
But him the ſtreams, that warbling flow
Rich Tyber's flow'ry meads along,
And ſhady groves (his haunts) ſhall know
The maſter of th' Æolian ſong.
The ſons of Rome, majeſtic Rome!
Have fix'd me in the Poets choir,
And envy now, or dead or dumb,
Forbear to blame what they admire.
Goddeſs of the ſweet-ſounding lute,
Which thy harmonious touch obeys,
Who canſt the finny race, tho' mute,
To cygnets dying accents raiſe;
Thy gift it is, that all with eaſe
My new unrival'd honours own;
That I ſtill live, and living pleaſe,
O Goddeſs, is thy gift alone.

to ſome Conſiderations on the Spirit of Martin Luther, and the Original of the Reformation [D]. During his ſtay in the univerſity, he is generally thought to have borne no inconſiderable part in the famous Controverſy, between Dr. Bentley, and the Honourable Mr. Charles Boyle (afterwards Earl of Orrery), concerning the genuineneſs of Phalaris's Epiſtles [E]; though Mr. Atterbury's name was not made uſe of on that occaſion (e). At what time he entered into Holy Orders, is not certainly known: but, in 1693, upon the death of his father, he made application to the Earl of Nottingham, to ſucceed in the rectory of Milton, which he then called the height of his ambition and wiſhes, as being the place of his birth. But, being diſappointed in his expectation of this preferment (*), and long ſince tired of a college life [F], Mr. Atterbury reſolved to quit the univerſity, and produce himſelf on a more active ſcene: and accordingly, making London his reſidence, he ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſuch a manner, that he was appointed one of the Chaplains in Ordinary to King William and Queen Mary, and was elected preacher at Bridewell, and Lecturer of St. Bride's (f). In 1694, our young Divine preached a remarkable Sermon at Bridewell chapel, before the governors of that and Bethlehem hoſpital, on the Power of Charity to cover Sin (g); to which Mr. Benjamin Hoadly (ſince Biſhop of Wincheſter) publiſhed ſome Exceptions [G]. The ſame year he was warmly attacked for his Sermon, preached before the Queen at Whitehall, entitled,

[D] His anſwer to ſome conſiderations on the ſpirit of Martin Luther, and the original of the Reformation.] The Conſiderations on the Spirit of Martin Luther were publiſhed under the name of Mr. Abraham Woodhead, an eminent Roman Catholic of thoſe times, who wrote ſeveral tracts in defence of the Church of Rome: but the true author was Mr. Obadiah Walker, Maſter of Univerſity College. Mr. Atterbury's Anſwer was publiſhed the 10th of Auguſt, 1687, and preſently after animadverted upon by Mr. Thomas Deane, Fellow of Univerſity College (4). Another edition of the Anſwer was publiſhed at London, in 1723, in 8*vo*. It is a very learned performance, and written with uncommon ſpirit and vivacity. It refutes all the objections brought againſt Luther's doctrines and manners, and concludes with obſerving, that, 'Let the Spirit of Martin Luther be as 'evil as it is ſuppoſed to be, yet the proof of this 'would not blaſt any ſingle truth of that religion he 'profeſſed; though upon a faithful inquiry it will be 'found, that his life was led up to thoſe doctrines 'he preached, and his death was the death of the 'Righteous.' This vindication of that great Reformer induced Biſhop Burnet (5) to rank the author among thoſe eminent Divines, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their admirable defences of the Proteſtant Religion. Our Prelate himſelf, in that part of his ſpeech, at his trial, in which he vindicates himſelf from the ſuſpicion of a ſecret inclination to Popery, appeals to this book, as well as the whole tenor of his preaching and writings ever ſince: and Mr. Wynne, his counſel, obſerves, in his defence of the Biſhop, how grievous it was for one, of his Lordſhip's character and function, to be charged with deſigns in favour of Popery, who was the only Clergyman in England, that ever thought it worth his while to draw his pen in defence of Martin Luther, the great inſtrument of our Reformation from Popery.

[E] He is thought to have born no inconſiderable part in the controverſy ——— concerning the genuineneſs of Phalaris's Epiſtles.] The occaſion of the controverſy was this. The honourable Mr. Boyle, afterwards Lord Orrery, was a ſtudent in Chriſt-Church, and under the tuition of Mr. Atterbury, when, about the year 1695, he obliged the world with a new edition of Phalaris's Epiſtles; in the Preface to which, he complains of Dr. Bentley, the King's Library-keeper, who had (pro ſolita ſua humanitate) denied him the inſpection of a valuable manuſcript. This ſarcaſm ſo exaſperated the Doctor, that, in order to his revenge on Mr. Boyle, he publiſhed a long letter to Dr. Wotton, who was then employed in writing on the State of ancient and modern Learning; in which he undertakes to prove, that the Epiſtles, which go under the name of Phalaris, are ſpurious, and probably the work of ſome modern ſophiſt. This drew from Mr. Boyle a reply, ſo full of genteel ſatire and fine raillery, that, on which ſide ſoever truth and argument may be ſuppoſed to lie, the wit, and the laugh too, were evidently on Mr. Boyle's. This reply was ſaid to be written, jointly, by a ſelect club of ingenious men belonging to Chriſt-Church; among whom Mr. Boyle's tutor was thought to be the chief. And this is plainly alluded to in that witty performance, The Battle of the Books, &c. where Mr. Boyle is introduced, on the ſide of the Ancients, clad in a ſuit of armour which had been given him by all the gods (6). Mr. Budgell, however, is of opinion (7), that Mr. Boyle muſt have been the author of the greateſt part of that book, ſince the ſame ſtyle and ſpirit runs through the whole piece, ſo that it muſt have been formed and put together by one hand; and he never yet heard, he tells us, any reaſon to doubt but that hand was the late Earl of Orrery. Mr. Stackhouſe (8) thinks it evident, from the ſtrength of genius, warmth of invention, and eaſy diſplay of wit and learning, in Mr. Boyle's reply, that Dr. Bentley was foiled by ſome eminent maſter, however decent it might be thought at that time for a young gentleman to give him the Coup de Grace, and ſharpen it with this ſarcaſm; Pallas te hoc vulnere, Pallas immolat.

[F] He grew tired of a college life.] This we learn from a letter of his to his father, dated from Oxford, October 24, 1690 (9); in which he expreſſes himſelf thus: 'My pupil (Mr. Boyle) I never 'had a thought of parting with till I left Oxford. I 'wiſh I could part with him to-morrow on that ſcore; 'for I am perfectly wearied with the nauſeous circle 'of ſmall affairs, that can now neither divert nor in'ſtruct me. I was made, I am ſure, for another 'ſcene, and another ſort of converſation; though it 'has been my hard luck to be pinned down to this. 'I have thought, and thought again, Sir, and for ſome 'years: now, I have never been able to think otherwiſe, than that I am loſing time every minute I ſtay 'here. The only benefit I ever propoſe to myſelf 'by this place, is ſtudying; and that I am not able to 'compaſs. Mr. Boyle takes up half my time; and 'I grudge it him not, for he is a fine gentleman: 'and while I am with him, I will do what I can to 'make him a man. College and univerſity buſineſs 'take up a great deal more; and I am forced to be 'uſeful to the Dean in a thouſand particulars; ſo that 'I have very little time.'

[G] His ſermon —— on The Power of Charity to cover Sin; to which Mr. Hoadley publiſhed ſome Exceptions.] Mr. Atterbury's text was, Charity ſhall cover the multitude of ſins, 1 Pet. iv. 8. which words of St. Peter he explains in this ſenſe; "That the virtue of Charity is of ſo great price in the ſight of "God, that thoſe perſons, who poſſeſs and exerciſe it "in any eminent manner, are peculiarly entitled to "the Divine favour and pardon, with regard to numberleſs ſlips and failings in their duty, which they "may be otherwiſe guilty of: This great Chriſtian "perfection, of which they are maſters, ſhall make "many little Imperfections to be over-looked and unobſerved; it ſhall cover the multitude of Sins (10)." Mr. Hoadley, in the Poſtſcript to his Second Lettter to Dr. Atterbury, publiſhed in 1708 (11), excepted againſt this doctrine, as farther enlarged and explained by Mr. Atterbury. Among other things, he ſays: 'If 'God will accept of one duty in lieu of many others, 'and if our performance of That ſhall be our Juſti'fication, notwithſtanding our omiſſion of many others: 'this is a ſort of Salvation, in my judgment, un'worthy entitled, The Scorner incapable of True Wiſdom (b) [H]. But the largeſt field of controverſy, in which he ever engaged, was that which opened itſelf in the year 1700, and continued four years, between him, Dr. Wake (afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury), and others, concerning the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of Convocations [I]: in which

We ſhall not enter into the controverſy, but only obſerve, that the author of the Sermon did not think fit to make any reply to the Exceptions.

[H] His ſermon, entitled, The Scorner incapable of true Wiſdom.] It was immediately attacked in a piece, entitled, A Twofold Vindication of the late Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and of the Author of the Hiſtory of Religion; the firſt Part defending the ſaid Author againſt the Defamations of Mr. Francis Atterbury's Sermon, and both thoſe eminent Perſons againſt a traiterous libel, entitled, The Charge of Socinianiſm againſt Dr. Tillotſon conſidered. In Two Letters to the Honourable Sir R. And a Word in Defence of the eminent Biſhop of Saliſbury. By another Hand,* London, 1696, in octavo. The author of the Hiſtory of Religion, vindicated in this piece, was Sir Robert Howard, who, taking himſelf to be meant, in that paſſage of Mr. Atterbury's ſermon, where he ſays, that 'Some men, who write 'pretended Hiſtories of Religion, are beholden to the 'real religion of others, that their hiſtories are not 'written (12),' obſerves in a letter prefixed to the abovementioned piece, how improper a place (the pulpit) Mr. Atterbury had taken to vent a paſſion unſuitable to Chriſtianity, or common morality. 'Yet 'he ſeems (adds Sir Robert) to have a Chriſtian conſi-'deration, that hinders him from writing ſomebody's 'life: if he means mine, I will free him from his 'tender Chriſtianity, and own that I writ the Hiſtory 'of Religion; and if he pleaſes to uſe the freedom I 'give him, I aſſure him, I ſhall not be diſpleaſed with 'any truth that he can write: but if his uſual paſſion 'guides him other ways, I ſhall attend him with ſuch 'anſwers, and make him ſuch ſuitable returns, as will 'be proper for the occaſion, and conſider his calling 'with as little reſpect, as he did the ſacred place 'where he choſe to rail.' The author of the firſt letter ridicules one of the reaſons, aſſigned by our preacher, Why the ſcorner ſeeketh wiſdom, and findeth it not, namely, Becauſe the ſcorner is a man of quick and lively parts, and ſuch men are apt to give themſelves a looſe, beyond plain reaſon and common ſenſe (13): 'That is, ſays our author, the Scorner ſeeks 'for what he has, and he miſſes it, becauſe he poſ-'ſeſſes it:' And, 'According to him (Mr. Atter-'bury), the only hopeful Candidate of Wiſdom is 'Sancho Pancha.'

[I] His controverſy with Doctor Wake, and others, concerning the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of Convocations.] The curious reader will be pleaſed to ſee here a ſhort hiſtory of this remarkable controverſy, with ſome account of the many books and pamphlets it occaſioned. In the year 1697, came out an anonymous pamphlet in 4*to*, entitled, A Letter to a Convocation-Man, concerning the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of Convocations, ſuppoſed to be written by the Reverend Dr. Binckes, on occaſion of the interruption of thoſe aſſemblies. The chief points the author inſiſted upon, were, 1ſt, The Clergy's Right to meet in Synods, according to the Canons of the Chriſtian Church, and the Conſtitution of this Realm: 2dly, Their Right of aſſembling in Convocation as often as a new Parliament meets and ſits: And, 3dly, A Right of treating and deliberating about ſuch affairs as lie within their proper ſphere, and of coming to fit reſolutions upon them, without being neceſſitated antecedently to qualify themſelves for ſuch acts and debates, by a licence under the Broad Seal of England. The opinions of men in both Houſes of Convocation were ſtrangely divided about theſe queſtions: ſome thinking them rights entirely due to the Clergy, and eſſential to the being of Eccleſiaſtical Synods; others looking upon them as introductive of too bold an independency, and as encroachments on the regal authority. Among thoſe of the latter opinion, appeared Dr. Wake (afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury), who, in the year 1697, publiſhed his book, entitled, The Authority of Chriſtian Princes over their Eccleſiaſtical Synods aſſerted, with particular reſpect to the Convocations of the Clergy of the Realm and Church of England; occaſioned by a late Pamphlet, entitled, A Letter to a Convocation-Man, &c. In this book, he endeavours to prove, 1ſt, That the right of calling the Clergy together in Synods is veſted ſolely in the Prince: 2dly, That the Clergy, ſo aſſembled, have no right to debate or determine any point of doctrine or diſcipline, without his permiſſion: 3dly, That the Prince may annul, alter, or ſuſpend the execution of any of their conſtitutions or decrees: and, laſtly, that no Synod can diſſolve itſelf without conſent of the Prince. The ſame year, came out an anonymous piece, ſaid to be written by one Mr. Wright, a gentleman of the Law, entitled, A Letter to a Member of Parliament, occaſioned by a Letter to a Convocation-Man, &c. the author of which maintains the ſame opinions with Dr. Wake. Not long after, Dr. Wake's book was attacked by Mr. Samuel Hill, Rector of Kilmington, in an anonymous piece, entitled, Municipium Eccleſiaſticum: or, The Rights, Liberties, and Authorities, of the Chriſtian Church aſſerted, againſt all oppreſſive Doctrines and Conſtitutions; occaſioned by Dr. Wake's Book, &c. 1697, 8vo. This produced from the Doctor, An Appeal to all the true Members of the Church of England in behalf of the King's Eccleſiaſtical Supremacy, as by Law eſtabliſhed, by our Convocations approved, and by our moſt eminent Biſhops and Clergymen ſtated and defended, againſt both the Popiſh and Fanatical Oppoſers of it. London, 1698, 8*vo*. Mr. Hill defended himſelf, in a piece, entitled, The Rights of the Chriſtian Church farther defended, in Anſwer to the Appeal of Dr. Wake, 1698, 8*vo*. The next year appeared, on Dr. Wake's ſide of the queſtion, a ſmall anonymous tract, entitled, A Brief Inquiry into the Ground, Authority, and Rights of Eccleſiaſtical Synods, upon the Principles of Scripture and right reaſon; occaſioned by a late Book, entitled, Municipium Eccleſiaſticum, 1699, 8*vo*. And, much about the ſame time, another, entitled, Some Thoughts on a Convocation, and the Notion of a Divine Right, &c. 1699, 4to. The next year, Mr. Atterbury entered into the controverſy, and publiſhed his Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an Engliſh Convocation ſtated and vindicated, in Anſwer to a late Book of Dr. Wake's, entitled, The Authority of Chriſtian Princes, &c. and ſeveral other Pieces, London, 1700, 8vo. This book appeared, at firſt, without the author's name; but, the year following, Mr. Atterbury publiſhed a ſecond edition, with his name prefixed to it, and very conſiderable additions, which were printed ſeparately for the uſe of the purchaſers of the firſt edition. He treats Dr. Wake's book as 'a ſhallow, empty, performance; written without 'any knowledge of our conſtitution, any ſkill in the 'particular ſubject of debate; upon ſuch principles as 'are deſtructive of all our Civil, as well as Eccle-'ſiaſtical Liberties; and with ſuch aſperſions on the 'Clergy, both dead and living, as were no leſs in-'jurious to the body, than his doctrine.'—— 'The very beſt conſtruction, he tells us, that has been 'put upon Dr. Wake's attempt by candid readers, is, 'that it was an endeavour to advance the prerogative 'of the Prince in Church matters as high, and to de-which, however, the truth of the queſtion may be ſuppoſed to lie, he diſplayed ſo much learning and ingenuity, as well as zeal for the intereſts of his order, that the Lower

'preſs the intereſt of the Subject ſpiritual as low as 'ever he could, with any colour of truth.' ——— 'Were all Doctor Wake ſays ſtrictly true and juſtifi-'able, adds our author, yet whether the labouring 'the point ſo heartily as he does, and ſhewing him-'ſelf ſo willing to prove the Church to have no rights 'and privileges, be a very decent part in a Clergy-'man, I leave his friends to conſider. —— But, when 'all a man advances, is not only ill deſigned, but ill 'grounded, and his principles are as falſe, as they 'are ſcandalous (as I have evidently proved his to be), 'there are no names and cenſures too bad to be be-'ſtowed on ſuch writers, and their writings (14).' This may ſerve to ſhew the ſpirit, with which Mr. Atterbury entered into this controverſy. The ſecond edition is dedicated to The Archbiſhops of the Provinces and the Preſidents of the Convocations of Canterbury and York. We ſhall not enter into a detail of the principles and arguments advanced in this book, which are directly the reverſe of thoſe laid down by Doctor Wake; but ſhall give the reader Dr. White Kennet's character of it (15). 'The bulk of this book, ſays 'the Doctor, the ſpacious preface to it, the number 'of citations, and, above all, the ſpirit of aſſurance, 'made people think this would determine the whole 'matter. And then the artificial giving a great and 'juſt character of the King, the many inſinuating ad-'dreſſes to the Commons, the pretty ways of ingra-'tiating with the inferior Clergy, the high zeal 'for our Church, and pleading fundamental rights 'and liberties of it, with the briſkneſs of running 'down an adverſary into the utmoſt contempt and 'odium; all this was apt to create in many a kind 'reception of the book; which when ſet off with 'the induſtrious applauſe of conſiderable people, who 'admire every thing of themſelves and their own, 'gave all poſſible advantage to the cauſe and this de-'fence of it.' Mr. Atterbury having, in his Rights, &c. occaſionally remarked upon Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation, as too free in cenſuring the manners of the Clergy, though 'capable of this ex-'cuſe, that the author, being a ſtranger, might not 'then have thoroughly acquainted himſelf with the 'ſtate of our Church, or the character of its mem-'bers;' his Lordſhip wrote a piece againſt him, entitled, Reflections on a Book, entitled Rights, &c. 1700, 4to; wherein he obſerves, that the author of the Rights, &c. 'had ſo entirely laid aſide the Spirit 'of Chriſt, and the characters of a Chriſtian, that, 'without large allowances of charity, one can hardly 'think, that he did once reflect on the obligations he 'lay under to follow the humility, the meekneſs, and 'the gentleneſs of Chriſt. So far from that, he ſeems 'to have forgot the common decencies of a man or of 'a ſcholar.' His Lordſhip adds, that 'A book writ 'with that roughneſs and acrimony of ſpirit, if well 'received, would be a much ſtronger argument againſt 'the expediency of a Convocation, than any he 'brings or can bring for it.' The year following, Dr. White Kennet, afterwards Biſhop of Peterborough, undertook a particular reply to Mr. Atterbury's book, in his Eccleſiaſtical Synods, and Parliamentary Convocations, in the Church of England, hiſtorically ſtated, and juſtly vindicated from the Miſrepreſentations of Mr. Atterbury, Part I., 1701, 8*vo*. In the Preface, he tells us, the Hiſtorical part of the argument, in this diſpute, had been very falſely repreſented, and the zeal for our Church was indeed without any knowledge in the conſtitution of it. He charges Mr. Atterbury with great unfairneſs and diſingenuity in the ſecond edition of his book, in which are a vaſt number of material alterations in points of Hiſtory and Law, not one of which he has mentioned in the Addenda, though he had profeſſed to the world, that all the alterations of moment were contained in thoſe ſeparate ſheets. He declares the motives of his own writing to be, 'To reprove that deriding and inſulting way of 'raillery and wrath, that wounds religion, and does 'but weaken that Church, whoſe prieſts ſhall ſo at-'tempt to vindicate her rights and powers; to pro-'mote the peace of our Mother-Church, by the King 'and Parliament's conſtant protection of her; and to 'requeſt his brethren, not to ſet up for independence 'and another fatal ſeparation; which none but their 'enemies can project or wiſh.' Soon after came out a pamphlet in 4*to*, ſuppoſed to be written by Doctor Richard Weſt, entitled, The Principles of Mr. Atterbury's Book conſidered, and his Arguments againſt Dr. Wake, and others, ſtated and examined; and another in 4*to*, entitled, Mr. Atterbury's Arguments for the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an Engliſh Convocation conſidered. The ſame year, Dr. Hody, Chaplain to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, publiſhed his Hiſtory of Engliſh Councils and Convocations, in 8vo. There appeared likewiſe, about the ſame time, an anonymous pamphlet in 8*vo*, entitled, The Regal Supremacy in Eccleſiaſtical Affairs. This was followed by Some Remarks upon the Temper of the late Writers about the Convocations, particularly Dr. Wake, Dr. Kennet, and the Author of Mr. Atterbury's Principles, &c. by a Gentleman in the Country, 1701, 4to. This piece is not intended as a defence of Mr. Atterbury, but only to ſhew, that his antagoniſts, notwithſtanding their pretences to moderation, have failed in that point in their writings. Dr. Kennet then publiſhed An Occaſional Letter on the Subject of Engliſh Convocations, 1701, 8*vo*, in vindication of the temper, with which he had proceeded in the controverſy. The ſame year, came out a pamphlet in 4*to*, ſaid to be written by Dr. Edmund Gibſon (now (*) Biſhop of London), entitled, A Letter to a Friend in the Country, concerning the Proceedings of the preſent Convocation; in which he vindicates the Archbiſhop's right to prorogue the Lower Houſe of Convocation, as well as the Upper. This was preſently anſwered by a pamphlet, aſcribed to Mr. Atterbury, entitled, The Power of the Lower Houſe of Convocation to adjourn itſelf, vindicated from the Miſrepreſentations of a late Paper, &c. Then followed a pamphlet, ſuppoſed to be written by Dr. George Hooper (afterwards Biſhop of Bath and Wells), entitled, A Narrative of the Proceedings of the Lower Houſe of Convocation, relating to Prorogations and Adjournments, from Monday, Feb. 10, 1700 (Engliſh Account), to Wedneſday, June 25, 1701. Drawn up by the Order of the Houſe, 4to. Soon after, came out, by the author of the Letter to a Friend, &c. a Reply to the two foregoing pieces, entitled, The Right of the Archbiſhop to continue or prorogue the whole Convocation, aſſerted in a Second Letter, &c. 1701, 4to. This was followed by A Letter to the author of the Narrative, containing A Vindication of the Proceedings of ſome Members of the Lower Houſe, with relation to the Archbiſhop's Prorogation of it, May 8, 1701, 4to. This was anſwered (it was ſaid, by Mr. Atterbury himſelf) in a piece, entitled, A Letter to a Clergyman in the Country, concerning the Choice of Members, and the Execution of a Parliament-Writ, for the enſuing Convocation; dated Nov. 17, 1701, 4to. The author recommends a more than ordinary care in the choice of members, conſidering the preſent diſputes between the two Houſes; which if they are determined in prejudice of the lower Clergy, there will be an end of the rights and liberties of their Houſe, and they will become from that moment an uſeleſs and inſignificant part of the conſtitution. This was followed by a Second Letter upon the ſame ſubject, dated Dec. 10, 1701. In anſwer to both theſe pieces, appeared The Caſe of the Præmunientes conſidered, 1701, 4to: And, about the ſame time, another Reply, entitled, The late Pretence of a conſtant Practice, to enter the Parliament, as well as the Provincial, Writ in the Front of the Acts of every Synod, conſidered in a Letter to the Author of that Aſſertion, &c. 1701, 4to. This was followed by a ſecond Reply, entitled, The late Pretence, &c. further conſidered and diſproved, &c. 1701, 4to. This occaſioned A Third Letter to a Clergyman in the Country, &c. in defence of the two former, dated Jan. 8, 1701, by the ſame hand; which was preſently replied to in An Anſwer to a Third Letter, &c. wherein the great Diſingenuity of the Author of it is plainly ſhewn, and the Raſhneſs and Falſehood of his former Aſſertion is fully proved upon him, 1701, 4to. In 1702, came out Dr. Atterbury's Caſe of the Schedule ſtated, wherein an Account is given of the Riſe and Deſign of that Inſtrument, and of the Influence it hath on the Adjournments of the Lower Houſe of Convocation; and all the Authorities urged in behalf of the Archbiſhop's

Lower Houſe of Convocation returned him their thanks [K], and the univerſity of Oxford complimented him with the degree of Doctor in Divinity [L]. January the twenty-ninth, 1700, he was inſtalled Archdeacon of Totneſs, being promoted to that dignity by ſhop's ſole Power to prorogue the whole Convocation are occaſionally examined. By a Member of the Lower Houſe of Convocation, 4to. This was anſwered in a piece, ſuppoſed to be written by Dr. Edmund Gibſon, intitled, The Schedule reviewed, or the Right of the Archbiſhop to continue or prorogue the whole Convocation, cleared from the Exceptions of a late Vindication of the Narrative of the Lower Houſe, and of a Book, intitled, The caſe of the Schedule ſtated, 1702, 4*to*. This was followed by The Parliamentary Original, and Rights of the Lower Houſe of Convocation cleared, and the Evidences of its Separation from the Upper Houſe produced on ſeveral Heads, particularly in the Point of making ſeparate Applications (as a diſtinct Body of Men) to other Bodies or Perſons, in Purſuance of an Argument for the Power of the Lower Houſe to adjourn itſelf, 1702, 4*to*. About the ſame time, Mr. Nicolſon, afterwards Biſhop of Carliſle, publiſhed A Letter to Dr. White Kennet, in defence of his Hiſtorical Library, againſt Mr. Francis Atterbury's Objections to that work, in his Rights, &c. in which he treated Mr. Nicolſon, with a good deal of abuſe and invective, particularly, for defining Convocations to be only occaſional aſſemblies of the Biſhops and inferior Clergy, for ſuch Purpoſes as the King ſhall direct, when they meet. The year following, Dr. Gibſon publiſhed, A ſhort State of ſome preſent Queſtions in Convocation, particularly of the Right to continue or prorogue; by way of Commentary upon the Schedule of Continuation, 1703, 4to. To this Dr. George Hooper replied in his Summary Defence of the Lower Houſe of Convocation, particularly concerning Adjournments, in Anſwer to a Pamphlet, intitled, A Short State, &c. 1703, 4*to*. This was anſwered by Dr. Gibſon, in his Marks of a defenceleſs Cauſe in the Proceedings and Writings of the Lower Houſe of Convocation, particularly in their Third and laſt Syſtem of Principles invented by the Vindicator of their Narrative, and repeated in a Pamphlet, intitled, A Summary Defence, &c. 1703, 4*to*. The ſame author likewiſe publiſhed, The pretended Independence of the Lower Houſe upon the Upper, a groundleſs Notion, &c. being a Vindication of Synodus Anglicana, and the Schedule Reviewed; together with the Integrity of their Author, from the Cenſures and Reflections of a late Pamphlet, intitled, The Parliamentary Original, &c. 1703, 4*to*. About this time, our author's original antagoniſt in this controverſy, Dr. Wake, publiſhed his large work, intitled, The State of the Church and Clergy of England in thir Councils, Synods, Convocations, Conventions, and other public Aſſemblies, hiſtorically deduced from the Converſion of the Saxons to the preſent Time; occaſioned by a Book, intitled, The Rights, Powers, and Privileges, &c. 1703, Folio. In the Preface, he tells us, that, upon his firſt peruſal of Dr. Atterbury's book, he ſaw ſuch a ſpirit of wrath and uncharitableneſs, accompanied with ſuch an aſſurance of the author's abilities for ſuch an undertaking, as he had hardly ever met with in the like degree before. Afterwards he ſays, 'In my examination of the whole book, I found in it 'enough to commend the wit, though not the ſpirit 'of him who wrote it.—To pay what is due even to 'an adverſary; it muſt be allowed, that Dr. Atterbury 'has done all, that a man of forward parts and a 'hearty zeal could do, to defend the cauſe which he 'had eſpouſed. He has choſen the moſt plauſible topics of argumentation; and he has given them all 'the advantage, that either a ſprightly wit or a good 'aſſurance could afford them. But he wanted one 'thing; he had not Truth on his ſide: and error, 'though it may be palliated, and by an artificial manager, ſuch as Dr. Atterbury without controverſy is, 'be diſguiſed ſo as to deceive ſometimes even a wary 'reader, yet it will not bear a ſtrict examination. 'And accordingly I have ſhewn him, notwithſtanding 'all his other endowments, to have deluded the world 'with a mere Romance; and, from the one end of his 'diſcourſe to the other, to have delivered a hiſtory, 'not of what was really done, but of what it was his 'intereſt to make it believed had been done.' Dr. Atterbury made no reply to Dr. Wake's book; ſo that here the Convocation diſpute ended for the preſent, there being little after this of any importance written on the ſubject, till the year 1708, in which Dr. Atterbury publiſhed, without his name, Some Proceedings in the Convocation, A. D. 1705, faithfully repreſented: To which is prefixed an Account of the ſeveral ineffectual Attempts at divers Times made by the lower Clergy, towards quieting all Diſputes, and proceeding upon Synodical Buſineſs, 4to. This was anſwered in a pamphlet, intitled, Partiality detected, or a Reply to a late Pamphlet, intitled, Some Proceedings, &c. diſcovering the many partial Repreſentations and unjuſt Reflections, contained in the ſaid Pamphlet, particularly as to what concerns the Proceedings of the Convocation in Ireland, 1708, 4to. Before we conclude this remark, we will tranſcribe a ſhort ſtory, relating to the diſputes then on foot, from a Pamphlet, intitled, The preſent State of Convocations, in a Letter, &c. 1702, 4*to*; after premiſing, that Dr. Atterbury had declared, in one of his pieces, that, If he deceived his readers, he was contented to forfeit all credit with any good man for ever. 'After the form of prorogation had been this day '(February the 12th) read and ſigned in the Upper 'Houſe, as the Clergy were departing out of the 'Jeruſalem-Chamber, Dr. Atterbury towards the door 'was earneſtly puſhing on ſome members, and crying, 'Away to the Lower Houſe, to the Lower Houſe. The 'Chancellor of London, turning back to him, aſked, 'If he were not aſhamed to be always promoting contention and diviſion? Dr. Atterbury anſwered to this 'effect; That he was not aſhamed to be for the rights 'of the Clergy; that there never was an inſtance before the laſt year, where the Clergy were diſmiſſed by 'a prorogation in the Upper Houſe. The Chancellor 'replied; I am afraid, Sir, you are not to be believed; 'for I think, by your own confeſſion, you have forfeited 'your credit with all good men for ever.' We ſhall conclude with Biſhop Burnet's ſevere reflections on our author's conduct in theſe diſputes. Having obſerved, that the High-Church party of that time had ſet up a complaint of the want of convocations, the danger of the Church, &c. he ſays (16): 'Some books were 'writ to juſtify it, with great acrimony of ſtile, and a 'ſtrain of inſolence, that was peculiar to one Atterbury, who had indeed very good parts, great learning, and was an excellent preacher, and had many 'extraordinary things in him; but was both ambitious 'and virulent out of meaſure, and had a ſingular 'talent of aſſerting paradoxes with a great aſſurance, 'ſhewing no ſhame when he was detected in them, 'though this was done in many inſtances. But he let 'all theſe paſs, without either confeſſing his errors, or 'pretending to juſtify himſelf. He went on ſtill venting new falſehoods in ſo barefaced a manner, that he 'ſeemed to have outdone the Jeſuits themſelves. He 'thought the government had ſo little ſtrength or credit, that any claim againſt it would be well received. 'He attacked the Supremacy of the Crown with relation to eccleſiaſtical matters, which had been hitherto maintained by all our Divines with great 'zeal.'

[K] The Lower Houſe of Convocation returned him thanks.] On the 8th of April, 1701, Dr. Finch, having been ſent with a meſſage from the Lower to the Upper Houſe of Convocation, returned with an account, that no meſſage would be received from them for want of the Prolocutor's preſence. Hereupon the Dean of Glouceſter took occaſion to obſerve, that, ſince the Upper Houſe refuſed this correſpondence with them, it was now time for that Houſe to return their thanks to Mr. Atterbury, for his learned pains in aſſerting and vindicating the rights of Convocation. Upon which a debate enſued, and it was propoſed to change the form of thanks, from learned pains in aſſerting and vindicating, to his endeavours to aſſert and vindicate; but, upon a diviſion, it was carried for the firſt motion, and the thanks of the Houſe returned accordingly (17).

[L] The Univerſity of Oxford complimented him with the degree of Doctor in Divinity.] In conſequence of the vote of the Lower Houſe of Convocation mentioned in the laſt remark, a letter was ſent to the univerſity of Oxford, expreſſing, that, whereas Mr. Francis Atterbury, late of Chriſt Church, had ſo happily aſſerted the rights and privileges of an Engliſh Convocation, as to

by Sir Jonathan Trelawny, then Biſhop of Exeter (i). The ſame year he was engaged with ſome other learned Divines, in reviſing an intended edition of the Greek Teſtament, with Greek Scholia, collected chiefly from the Fathers, by Mr. Archdeacon Gregory (k). Upon the acceſſion of Queen Anne, in 1702, Dr. Atterbury was appointed one of her Majeſty's Chaplains in Ordinary (l); and, in October 1704 (m), he was advanced to the Deanery of Carliſle [M]. About two years after this, he was engaged in a diſpute with Mr. Hoadly, concerning the advantages of Virtue with regard to the preſent life [N], occaſioned by his Sermon, preached the thirtieth of Auguſt, 1706, at the funeral of Mr. Thomas Bennet, a Bookſeller (n). In 1707, Sir Jonathan Trelawny, then Biſhop of Exeter, appointed him one of the Canons Reſidentiaries of that Church; and, in 1709, Sir John Trevor, a great diſcerner of men and their abilities, was ſo ſtruck with his fame, and charmed with his eloquence, that he made him Preacher of the Rolls-chapel (o). This year he was engaged in a freſh diſpute with Mr. Hoadly, concerning Paſſive Obedience [O], occaſioned by his Latin Sermon, entitled, Concio ad Clerum Londinenſem habita in Eccleſia S. Elphegi (p). In 1710, came on the famous trial of Dr.

to merit the ſolemn thanks of the Lower Houſe of it for his learned pains upon that ſubject; it might be hoped, that the Univerſity would be no leſs forward in taking ſome public notice of ſo great a piece of ſervice to the Church: And that the moſt proper and ſeaſonable mark of reſpect to him, would be to confer on him the degree of Doctor in Divinity by diploma, without doing exerciſe, or paying fees. The univerſity approved the contents of this letter, and accordingly created Mr. Atterbury Doctor in Divinity (18).

[M] He was advanced to the Deanery of Carliſle.] Upon his nomination, either through ignorance of the common forms, or an over-haſtineſs to get poſſeſſion, he took out his inſtruments before his predeceſſor Dr. Graham had reſigned. This miſtake he endeavoured to rectify in the following extraordinary manner. When he firſt waited on Dr. Nicolſon, then Biſhop of Carliſle, that prelate demanded of him a formal reſignation from Dr. Graham, without which, he told him, he could not admit him. The new-appointed Dean ſeemed to laugh at this demand: but the Biſhop, who reſolved to ſhew Dr. Atterbury no favour, and barely to do him juſtice, continuing obſtinate, the Doctor, to his no ſmall mortification, was kept a whole month at Carliſle, unadmitted, and ſlightly regarded, till the reſignation, inſiſted on, was produced. This reſignation, however, upon examination, was found to have a flaw in it; the date of it being almoſt a month ſubſequent to Dr. Atterbury's collation, which rendered the latter null and void. Hereupon being returned to London, he contrived to invite the Dean of Wells, his predeceſſor, to a certain place; where he deſired him to antedate his reſignation; and, inſtead of the fifth of Auguſt, to date it the 8th of July, that ſo it might be reconciled to his letters patent of collation. The Dean of Wells, who thought the propoſal a very odd one, deſired a day's time to conſider of it; and, having adviſed with his friends, and an eminent Civilian, who all aſſured him, the practice was both ſcandalous and dangerous, he ſent a civil letter to Dr. Atterbury, excuſing himſelf for not complying with his requeſt. When the Doctor found this ſtep ineffectual, he took another no leſs extraordinary; for a friend of his endeavoured to prevail with a conſiderable officer in Chancery, to alter the date of the Reſignation in the original Record. But this propoſal was likewiſe rejected; and ſo the public inſtruments continued irregular (19). All the reflection we ſhall make upon this ſtory, is, that in the Civil Law, the clandeſtine alteration of dates is Crimen Falſi, and the bare attempt to do it Subornatio Falſi.

[N] His diſpute with Mr. Hoadly concerning the advantages of virtue with regard to the preſent life.] Dr. Atterbury's Sermon, which occaſioned this diſpute, was on 1 Cor. xv. 19. If in this life only we have hope in Chriſt, we are of all men moſt miſerable. Which he explains thus: 'If all the benefits, we 'expect from the Chriſtian inſtitution, were confined 'within the bounds of this preſent life, and we had 'no hopes of a better ſtate after this, of a great 'and laſting reward in a life to come; we Chriſtians 'ſhould be the moſt abandoned and wretched of 'creatures: all other ſorts and ſects of men would 'evidently have the advantage of us, and a much 'ſurer title to happineſs than we (20).' In proof of which aſſertion, he endeavours to ſhew, that, were there no other life but this, Firſt, men would really be more miſerable than beaſts; and, ſecondly, the beſt men would be often the moſt miſerable: 'I mean, ſays he, as far as happineſs or miſery 'are to be meaſured from pleaſing or painful ſenſations; and, ſuppoſing the preſent to be the only 'life we are to lead, I ſee not, but that this might 'be eſteemed the true meaſure of them (21).' This doctrine Mr. Hoadly examined, in A Letter to Dr. Francis Atterbury, concerning Virtue and Vice (22), publiſhed in 1706; in which he undertakes to ſhew, that Dr. Atterbury has extremely miſtaken the ſenſe of his text: that 'the Apoſtle ſpeaks of Chriſtians 'profeſſing faith in Chriſt; Dr. Atterbury, of perſons 'practiſing the moral precepts of religion; the Apoſtle ſpeaks of the condition of ſuch Chriſtians, 'in a ſtate of the moſt bitter perſecution; Dr. Atterbury, of the condition of virtuous perſons, in 'the ordinary courſe of God's providence; the Apoſtle deſigns nothing by his aſſertion and ſuppoſition, but to ſhame thoſe ignorant, unwary, profeſſors of Chriſtianity, out of the denial of a general reſurrection; Dr. Atterbury, on the contrary, 'draws from them an abſolute argument for the 'certainty of a future ſtate: So that upon the review it ſeems evident, that Dr. Atterbury has miſtaken 'the aſſertion itſelf, the perſons concerning whom 'the Apoſtle intends it, the times to which he manifeſtly limits it, and the concluſion which he deſigned ſhould be drawn from it (23). Mr. Hoadly, then, endeavours to ſhew, that the practice of virtue, even in this life, contributes more to the happineſs of mankind, than that of vice; for which, beſides the arguments from reaſon and nature, he produces the expreſs declarations of ſcripture. Dr. Atterbury, in his volume of Sermons, publiſhed by himſelf, prefixed a long Preface to the Sermon at Mr. Bennet's funeral; in which he replies to Mr. Hoadly's arguments, and produces the concurrent teſtimonies of expoſitors, and the authorities of the beſt writers, eſpecially our Engliſh Divines, in confirmation of the doctrine he had advanced. In anſwer to this Preface, Mr. Hoadly publiſhed, in 1708, A ſecond Letter, &c. and, in the Preface to his Tracts, tells us, theſe two Letters againſt Dr. Atterbury were deſigned to vindicate and eſtabliſh the tendency of virtue and morality to the preſent happineſs of ſuch a creature as man is; which he eſteems a point of the utmoſt importance to the Goſpel itſelf.

[O] His Diſpute with Mr. Hoadly concerning Paſſive Obedience.] Doctor Atterbury in his pamphlet, intitled, Some Proceedings in Convocation, A. D. 1705, faithfully repreſented, had charged Mr. Hoadly (whom he ſneeringly calls, the modeſt and moderate Mr. Hoadly) with, 'treating the body of the eſtabliſhed Clergy, 'with language more diſdainful and reviling, than 'it would have become him to have uſed towards 'his Preſbyterian antagoniſt, upon any provocation, 'charging them with rebellion in the Church, whilſt 'he himſelf was preaching it up in the State.' This induced Mr. Hoadly to ſet about a particular examination of Dr. Atterbury's Latin Sermon; which he did in a piece, intitled, A Large Anſwer to Dr. Atterbury's Charge of Rebellion, &c. London, 1710, wherein he endeavours to lay open the Doctor's artful management of the controverſy, and to let the reader into his true meaning and deſign; which, in an

Dr. Sacheverell, whoſe remarkable ſpeech on that occaſion was generally ſuppoſed to have been drawn up by our author, in conjunction with Dr. Smalridge and Dr. Friend (q). The ſame year Dr. Atterbury was unanimouſly choſen Prolocutor of the Lower Houſe of Convocation, and had the chief management of affairs in that Houſe [P]. The eleventh of May 1711, he was appointed, by the Convocation one of the Committee for comparing Mr. Whiſton's doctrines with thoſe of the Church of England; and, in June following, he had the chief hand in drawing up A Repreſentation of the preſent State of Religion (r) [Q]. In 1712, Dr. Atterbury was made Dean of Chriſt-Church [R], notwithſtanding the ſtrong intereſt and warm applications of ſeveral great men in behalf of his competitor Dr. Smalridge (s). The next year ſaw him at the top of an Appendix to the Anſwer, he repreſents to be 'The 'carrying on two different cauſes, upon two ſets of 'contradictory principles,' in order to 'gain himſelf 'applauſe amongſt the ſame perſons at the ſame 'time, by ſtanding up for and againſt liberty; by 'depreſſing the prerogative, and exalting it; by 'leſſening the executive power, and magnifying it; 'by loading ſome with all infamy, for pleading for 'ſubmiſſion to it in one particular, which he ſup-'poſeth an encroachment, and by loading others 'with the ſame infamy, for pleading againſt ſub-'miſſion to it, in caſes that touch the happineſs of 'the whole community.' This, he tells us, is 'A 'method of controverſy ſo peculiar to one perſon '(Dr. Atterbury) as that he knows not that it hath 'ever been practiſed, or attempted by any other 'writer.' Mr. Hoadly has likewiſe tranſcribed, in this Appendix, ſome remarkable paſſages out of our author's Rights, Powers, and Privileges, &c. which he confronts with others, from his Latin Sermon.

[P] He had the chief management of affairs in that houſe.] Biſhop Burnet, in his account of this Convocation (24), having obſerved, that the Queen, in appointing a committee of Biſhops to be preſent, and conſenting to their reſolutions, not only paſſed over all the Biſhops made in King William's reign, but a great many of thoſe named by herſelf, and ſet the Biſhops of Briſtol and St. David's, then newly conſecrated, in a diſtinction above all their brethren, by adding them to the committee, upon the indiſpoſition of the Archbiſhop and others, adds: 'All 'this was directed by Dr. Atterbury, who had the 'confidence of the chief miniſter; and becauſe the 'other Biſhops had maintained a good correſpondence 'with the former miniſtry, it was thought fit to 'put the marks of the Queen's diſtruſt upon them, 'that it might appear with whom her royal favour 'and truſt was lodged.' The ſame hiſtorian informs us (25), that, in this Convocation, a doubt being ſuggeſted, whether the Queen's licence, by which ſhe had appointed the above-mentioned committee, did ſtill ſubſiſt after a prorogation by a royal writ, and the Attorney-General having given his opinion, that it was ſtill in force, whereupon the Biſhops went on with the buſineſs, with which the former ſeſſions had ended; Dr. Atterbury thereupon ſtarted a new notion, that, 'As in a Seſſion of Parliament, a prorogation 'put an end to all matters not finiſhed, ſo that they 'were to begin all a-new, the ſame rule was to be 'applied to Convocations;' in purſuance of his favourite notion, that 'The proceedings in Parlia-'ment were likewiſe to be obſerved among them.' This being contrary to precedents, and the expreſs words of the royal writ, by which the Archbiſhop had prorogued the Convocation, the Biſhops did not agree to it, but reſolved to adhere to the method of former Convocations. And this occaſioned a diſpute between the two houſes, which put a ſtop to all buſineſs, ſo that they could not determine thoſe points, which had been recommended to them by the Queen.

[Q] He drew up a Repreſentation of the preſent State of Religion.] Let us hear Biſhop Burnet's account of this affair. The Convocation, he tells us (26), having entered on the conſideration of the matters referred to them by the Queen; and a committee being appointed to draw up a Repreſentation of the preſent State of the Church and of Religion in the nation; after ſome heads were agreed on, 'Atterbury 'procured, that the drawing up of this might be left 'to him: and he drew up a moſt virulent declama-'tion, defaming all the adminiſtrations from the time 'of the Revolution. Into this he brought many im-'pious principles and practices, that had been little 'heard of or known, but were now to be publiſhed, 'if this ſhould be laid before the Queen.' The Lower Houſe, he adds, agreed to Atterbury's draught; but the Biſhops laid it aſide, and ordered another Repreſentation to be drawn in more general and more modeſt terms. But it was not ſettled, which of theſe two draughts ſhould be made uſe of, or, whether any Repreſentation at all ſhould be made to the Queen. The author of the Memoirs of Queen Anne (27), ſpeaking of this affair, tells us, 'The 'leading men among the Clergy, eſpecially thoſe, 'who ſought after honour and preferment, were 'zealous to go hand in hand with the new Miniſtry, 'and to ſtrengthen the Houſe of Commons in all 'their hot proceedings. Among others, Dr. Atter-'bury had a deep ſhare in this buſineſs, and led moſt 'of the clergy by his pretended zeal for their in-'tereſts. This Repreſentation was very long, and 'contained a great deal concerning the atheiſm and 'irreligion of the times, which they aſcribed chiefly 'to the late growth of hereſy and ſchiſm, and to 'the printing of wicked and atheiſtical books, which 'tended to promote many dangerous opinions; the 'fault being laid chiefly on thoſe who had been 'lately in power.' The Repreſentation in queſtion, though never preſented, was yet printed and diſperſed; and ſoon after was attacked in a pamphlet, intitled, The Nation vindicated from the Aſperſions caſt on it in a late Pamphlet, intitled, A Repreſentation of the preſent State of Religion, &c. in which the author undertakes to prove, againſt the Repreſentation, firſt, that the nation is much mended, in point of licentiouſneſs, and impiety, ſince the Revolution; ſecondly, that the Repreſentation gives a diſingenuous and unfair account of the ſpreading of Atheiſm, Deiſm, and Hereſy, and, whilſt it complains of the growth of Popery, advances ſuch notions, as, were they true, would oblige the nation to return to the church of Rome; and, thirdly, that it has omitted the chief cauſe of theſe evils, the miſconduct of our ſpiritual guides; which conſidered, it is next to a miracle, he ſays, that the laity are ſo good and virtuous as they are at preſent.

[R] He was made Dean of Chriſt-Church.] 'No 'ſooner was he ſettled there, ſays the writer of his 'life (28) till all ran into diſorder and confuſion. 'The Canons had been long accuſtomed to the mild 'and gentle government of a Dean (*), who had 'every thing in him that was endearing to mankind, 'and could not therefore brook the wide difference 'that they perceived in Dr. Atterbury. That impe-'rious and deſpotic manner, in which he ſeemed 'reſolved to carry every thing, made them more 'tenacious of their rights, and inclinable to make 'fewer conceſſions, the more he endeavoured to graſp 'at power, and tyrannize. This oppoſition raiſed 'the ferment, and, in a ſhort time, there enſued ſuch 'ſtrife and contention, ſuch bitter words and ſcan-'dalous quarrels among them, that 'twas thought 'adviſeable to remove him, on purpoſe to reſtore 'peace and tranquility to that learned body, and 'that other colleges might not take the infection. 'A new method of obtaining preferment, by in-'dulging ſuch a temper, and purſuing ſuch practices, 'as leaſt of all deſerve it! In a word, adds this 'writer, wherever he came, under one pretence or 'other, but chiefly under the notion of aſſerting his 'rights and privileges, he had a rare talent of 'fomenting diſcord, and blowing the coals of con-'tention; which made a learned ſucceſſor *, in 'two of his preferments, complain of his hard fate, 'in being forced to carry water after him, to ex-'tinguiſh the flames, which his litigiouſneſs had every 'where occaſioned.'

his preferment, as well as of his reputation: for, in the beginning of June 1713, the Queen, at the recommendation of the Earl of Oxford, advanced him to the Biſhopric of Rocheſter, and Deanery of Weſtminſter; and he was conſecrated at Lambeth the 4th of July following (t). It is ſaid, he had in view the Primacy of all England, and that his credit with the Queen and Miniſtry was ſo conſiderable, and his ſchemes ſo well laid, as probably to have carried it, upon a vacancy, had not her Majeſty's death, in Auguſt 1714, prevented him (u). At the beginning of the ſucceeding reign, his tide of proſperity began to turn; and he received a ſenſible mortification preſently after the coronation of King George I., when, upon his offering to preſent his Majeſty (with a view, no doubt, of ſtanding better in his favour) with the Chair of State and Royal Canopy, his own perquiſites as Dean of Weſtminſter, the offer was rejected, not without ſome evident marks of diſlike to his perſon (w). During the rebellion in Scotland, which broke out in the firſt year of this reign, Biſhop Atterbury gave an inſtance of his growing diſaffection to the eſtabliſhed government, in refuſing to ſign the Declaration of the Biſhops [S]. Beſides which, he conſtantly oppoſed the meaſures of the Court in the Houſe of Lords, and drew up ſome of the moſt violent Proteſts with his own hand (x). Thus he went on, 'till the year 1722, when, the Government having reaſon to ſuſpect him of being concerned in a plot in favour of the Pretender [T], he was accordingly apprehended, on the 24th of Auguſt, and committed priſoner to the Tower [U]. This commitment of a Biſhop, upon a ſuſpicion of high treaſon, as it was a thing rarely practiſed ſince the Reformation,

[S] He refuſed to ſign the Declaration of the Biſhops.] In that juncture of affairs, when the Pretender's Declaration was poſted up in moſt market-towns, and, in ſome places, his title proclaimed, it was thought proper, by moſt bodies of men, to give the government all poſſible aſſurance of their fidelity and allegiance; and accordingly there was publiſhed A Declaration of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhops in, and near, London, teſtifying their abhorrence of the preſent Rebellion; and an exhortation to the Clergy, and people under their care, to be zealous in the diſcharge of their duties to his Majeſty King George. This paper the Biſhop of Rocheſter, and by his inſtigation, Biſhop Smalridge, refuſed to ſign, on pretence of a juſt offence taken at ſome unbecoming reflections caſt on a party, not inferior to any (they ſaid) in point of loyalty. The words objected to were theſe: We are the more concerned, that both the Clergy and People of our Communion ſhould ſhew themſelves hearty friends to the Government upon this occaſion, to vindicate the honour of the Church of England; becauſe the chief hopes of our enemies ſeem to ariſe from diſcontents artificially raiſed among us; and becauſe ſome, who have valued themſelves, and have been too much valued by others, for a pretended zeal for the Church, have joined with Papiſts in theſe wicked attempts; which as they muſt ruin the Church, if they ſucceed, ſo they cannot well end without great reproach to it, if the reſt of us do not clearly and heartily declare our deteſtation of ſuch practices. The reader muſt be left to judge, whether there be any thing in theſe words ſo exceptionable, as to countenance ſuch a behaviour, at ſuch a time.

[T] The Government having reaſon to ſuſpect him of being concerned in a Plot, in favour of the Pretender, &c.] Various methods were attempted (as we learn from the Report of the Secret Committee of the Houſe of Commons), and various times fixed, for putting this deſign in execution. The firſt intention was to have procured a regular body of foreign forces to invade theſe kingdoms, at the time of the elections for members of Parliament. But the conſpirators, being diſappointed in this expectation, reſolved, next, to make an attempt at the time, it was generally believed, his Majeſty intended to go to Hanover, by the help of ſuch officers and ſoldiers, as could paſs into England, unobſerved, from abroad, under the command of the late Duke of Ormond; who was to have landed in the river, with a great quantity of arms, provided in Spain for that purpoſe. The Tower, at the ſame time, was to have been ſeized, and the city of London made a place of arms. But this deſign alſo being diſappointed by many concurring events, the conſpirators found themſelves under a neceſſity of deferring their enterprize, 'till the breaking up of the camp: during which interval, they laboured, by their agents and emiſſaries, to corrupt and ſeduce the officers and ſoldiers of the army; and depended ſo much on their defection, as to entertain hopes of placing the Pretender on the throne, though they ſhould have no aſſiſtance from abroad. What ſhare our Prelate was ſuſpected to have had in this conſpiracy, appears from the ſame Report, which charges him with carrying on a traiterous correſpondence, in order to raiſe an inſurrection in the kingdom, and to procure foreign forces to invade it. In ſupport of which accuſation, three letters were produced, ſuppoſed to be written by the Biſhop, to General Dillon, the late Lord Mar, and the Pretender himſelf, under the feigned names of Chivers, Muſgrave, and Jackſon. This occaſioned a Reſolution of the Houſe of Commons, March the 11th, 1723, That Francis, Lord Biſhop of Rocheſter, was principally concerned in forming, directing, and carrying on a wicked and deteſtable conſpiracy, for invading theſe kingdoms with a foreign force, and for raiſing inſurrections, and a rebellion at home, in order to ſubvert our preſent happy Eſtabliſhment in Church and State, by placing a Popiſh Pretender on the Throne.

[U] He was apprehended and committed priſoner to the Tower.] Two officers, the Under-Secretary, and a Meſſenger, went about two o'clock in the afternoon, to the Biſhop's houſe at Weſtminſter, where he then was, with orders to bring him, and his papers, before the Council. He happened to be in his night-gown, when they came in; and being made acquainted with their buſineſs, he deſired time to dreſs himſelf. In the mean time his Secretary came in; and the officers went to ſearch for his papers; in the ſealing of which, the Meſſenger brought a paper, which he pretended to have found in his cloſe-ſtool, and deſired that it might be ſealed up with the reſt. His Lordſhip obſerving it, and believing it to be a forged one of his own, deſired the officers not to do it, and to bear witneſs, that the paper was not found with him. Nevertheleſs, they did it; and, though they behaved themſelves with ſome reſpect to him, they ſuffered the Meſſengers to treat him in a very rough manner, threatening him, if he did not make haſte to dreſs himſelf, they would carry him away undreſt as he was. Upon which, he ordered his Secretary to ſee his papers all ſealed up, and went himſelf directly to the Cockpit, where the Council waited for him (29). The behaviour of the Meſſengers, upon this occaſion, ſeems to have been very unwarrantable, if what the author of A Letter to the Clergy of the Church of England, &c. tells us, be true, that the perſons, directed by order of the King and Council, to ſeize his Lordſhip and his papers, received a ſtrict command to treat him with great reſpect and reverence. However this was, when he came before the Council, he behaved with a great deal of calmneſs, and they with much civility towards him. He had liberty to ſpeak for himſelf as much as he pleaſed, and they liſtened to his defence with a great deal of attention; and, what is more unuſual, after he was withdrawn, he had twice liberty to re-enter the Council-chamber, to make for himſelf ſuch repreſentations and requeſts as he thought proper. It is ſaid, that, while Reformation, ſo it occaſioned various ſpeculations among the people [W]. On the 23d of March, 1722-3, a Bill was brought into the Houſe of Commons, for inflicting certain pains and penalties on Francis Lord Biſhop of Rocheſter; a copy of which was ſent to him, with notice that he had liberty of Counſel and Solicitors for making his defence. Under theſe circumſtances, the Biſhop applied, by petition, to the Houſe of Lords, for their direction and advice, as to his conduct in this conjuncture [X]; and, on the fourth of April, he acquainted the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, by a letter, that he was determined to give that Houſe no trouble, in relation to the Bill depending therein; but ſhould be ready to make his defence againſt it, when it ſhould be argued in another Houſe, of which he had the honour to be a member (y). On the ninth, the Bill paſſed the Houſe of Commons [Y], and was the ſame day ſent up to the Houſe of Lords for their concurrence (z). On the ſixth of May, being the day appointed by the Lords for the while he was under examination, he made uſe of our Saviour's Anſwer to the Jewiſh Council, while he ſtood before them; If I tell you, you will not believe me; and if I alſo aſk you, you will not anſwer me, nor let me go. After three quarters of an hour's ſtay at the Cock-pit, he was ſent to the Tower, privately, in his own coach, without any manner of noiſe or obſervation (30). As to his behaviour, and treatment within thoſe walls, they are neither ſo material, nor ſo certainly known, as to deſerve a particular narration; though, if his own account may be credited, his uſage there was far from being juſtifiable: for, in his Speech to the Houſe of Lords, he makes this complaint: 'I have been under a 'very long and cloſe confinement, and have been 'treated with ſuch ſeverity, and ſo great indignity, 'as, I believe, no priſoner in the Tower, of my age, 'and function, and rank, ever was; by which means 'what ſtrength and uſe of my limbs I had, when 'I was firſt committed in Auguſt laſt, is now ſo far 'declined, that I am very unfit to make my defence againſt a bill of ſuch an extraordinary nature. 'The great weakneſs of body and mind, under which 'I labour, ſuch uſage, ſuch hardſhips, ſuch inſults, 'as I have undergone, might have broken a more 'reſolute ſpirit, and much ſtronger conſtitution, than 'falls to my ſhare.' And in a letter of his, which was intercepted the 26th of February 1722-3, there is the following paſſage, of very dark and ambiguous import: 'You may, ſays he to his friend, 'when you ſee Br——y, impart the ſtory of that 'villany to him, and deſire his advice upon it, at 'what time, and in what manner, it may be proper 'for me to bring that matter upon the ſtage, and 'ſhew what extraordinary methods are taken to get 'at me, and beg the Lords protection in the caſe 'againſt ſuch vile practice. I hope William has 'not given into it, and then my way will (ſome 'time or other) be clearer towards a complaint: 'Whenever it is proper, I think the raſcal, my 'neighbour, may be ſummoned before the Lords, 'and made to tell, who employed him to proffer 'ſuch ſums, and be puniſhed by them for ſuch prac-'tices.' Who the perſon is, whom he ſtigmatizes with ſo odious a character, is not ſo apparent; but we may venture to ſay, it could be no one employed by the government to uſe him ill, much leſs to oppreſs him by methods of violence and corruption. It is true, there was an unhappy miſunderſtanding between him and Colonel Williamſon, Deputy-Lieutenant of the Tower, from his very firſt commitment; but, whether this dark paſſage has any relation thereto, we cannot ſay.

[W] This Commitment — occaſioned various ſpeculations among the people.] Thoſe, who were the Biſhop's friends, and pretended to the greateſt intimacy with him, laid the whole odium of the matter upon the Miniſtry. They knew the Biſhop ſo well, they ſaid, his love to our Conſtitution, and attachment to the Proteſtant Succeſſion, his profeſſed abhorrence of Popery, and ſettled contempt of the Pretender, and his caution, prudence, and circumſpection, to be ſuch, as would never allow him to engage in an attempt of ſubverting the Government, ſo hazardous in itſelf, and ſo repugnant to his principles; and therefore, they imputed all to the malice and management of a great Miniſter of State or two, who were reſolved to remove him, on account of ſome perſonal prejudices, as well as the conſtant moleſtation he gave them in Parliament, and the particular influence and activity he had ſhewn in the late election. The friends to the Miniſtry, on the other hand, were ſtrongly of opinion, that the Biſhop was ſecretly a favourer of the Pretender's cauſe, and had formerly been tampering with things of that nature, even in the Queen's time, and while his party was excluded from power; but upon their re-admiſſion, had relinquiſhed that purſuit, and his confederates therein, and became a good ſubject again. They urged, that the influence which the late Duke of Ormond had over him, aſſiſted by his own private ambition and revenge, might prompt him to many things, contrary to his declared ſentiments, and inconſiſtent with that cunning and caution, which, in other caſes, he was maſter of. And to obviate the difficulty, ariſing from the Biſhop's averſion to Popery, and the Pretender's bigotry to that religion, they talked of a new-invented ſcheme of his, not to receive the Pretender, whoſe principles were not to be changed, but his ſon only, who was to be educated a Proteſtant in the Church of England, and the Biſhop to be his guardian, and Lord-Protector of the kingdom, during his minority (31). Theſe, and many more ſpeculations, amuſed the nation at that time, and men, as uſual, judged of things by the meaſure of their own affections and prejudices.

(31) Ib. p. 90—92.

[X] He applied to the Houſe of Lords for their direction and advice, as to his conduct in this conjuncture.] He particularly deſired their opinion in relation to a ſtanding order of that Houſe, prohibiting, under a penalty, any Lord to appear, either in perſon, or by his counſel, before the Houſe of Commons, to anſwer any accuſation there. The Debates among the Lords, upon this occaſion, were many; the privileges peculiar to their Houſe were largely inſiſted on, and the late encroachments, made upon them by the Commons, loudly complained of; but at laſt it was carried, by a majority of ſeventy-eight to thirty-two, that the Biſhop, being only a Lord in Parliament, and no Peer, might, without any diminution to the honour of that Houſe, appear, if he thought fit, in the Houſe of Commons, and in what manner he thought fit, make his defence and vindication there. The Biſhop, however, was not pleaſed with this conceſſion, nor willing to truſt his cauſe, where he thought himſelf injured, and even prejudged (32).

(32) Ib. p. 102, 103.

[Y] The Bill paſſed the Houſe of Commons.] The tenor of it was this: 'That after the firſt of June, '1723, he ſhall be deprived of all his offices, digni-'ties, promotions, and benefices, eccleſiaſtical what-'ſoever, and that, from thenceforth, the ſame ſhall be 'actually void, as if he were naturally dead; that he 'ſhall for ever be diſabled, and rendered incapable, 'from holding or enjoying any office, dignity, or 'emolument, within this realm, or any other his Ma-'jeſty's dominions; as alſo from exerciſing any office, 'Eccleſiaſtical or Spiritual, whatever; that he ſhall 'ſuffer perpetual exile, and be for ever baniſhed this 'realm, and all other his Majeſty's dominions; that 'he ſhall depart out of the ſame by the 25th of 'June next; and if he return into, or be found 'within this realm, or any other his Majeſty's do-'minions, after the ſaid 25th of June, he, being 'thereof lawfully convicted, ſhall ſuffer as a felon, 'without benefit of Clergy, and ſhall be utterly in-'capable of any pardon from his Majeſty, his heirs 'or ſucceſſors: That all perſons, who ſhall be aid-'ing and aſſiſting to his return into this realm, or 'any other his Majeſty's dominions, or ſhall conceal 'him within the ſame, being lawfully convicted 'thereof, ſhall be adjudged guilty of felony, with-'out the firſt reading of the Biſl, Biſhop Atterbury was brought to Weſtminſter [Z], to make his defence. The Counſel for the Biſhop were, Sir Conſtantine Phipps, and William Wynne, Eſq; for the King, Mr. Reeve and Mr. Wearg. The proceedings continued above a week; and on Saturday May the eleventh, the Biſhop was permitted to plead for himſelf; which he did in a very eloquent ſpeech [AA]. On Monday the thirteenth, he was carried, for the laſt time, from the Tower, to hear the reply of the King's Counſel to his Defence [BB]. On the fifteenth, the Bill was read the third time; and, after

' out benefit of Clergy; that if any of his Majeſty's ' ſubjects (except ſuch perſons as ſhall be licenſed ' for that purpoſe under the ſign manual) ſhall, after ' the 25th of June, hold any correſpondence in per- ' ſon with him, within this realm, or without, or ' by letters, meſſages, or otherwiſe, or with any per- ' ſon employed by him, knowing ſuch perſon to be ' ſo employed, they ſhall, on conviction, be adjudged ' felons, without benefit of Clergy: And laſtly, that ' offences againſt this Act, committed out of this ' realm, may be tried in any county within Great- ' Britain (33).'

[Z] He was brought to Weſtminſter.] The firſt day, he was diſturbed in his paſſage thither, by the clamours and inſults of the mob; but, upon his application to the Houſe of Lords for ſafety and protection, ſtrict orders were given to ſeize and ſecure all who ſhould be guilty of ſuch inhumanity, and a guard appointed to defend his perſon; ſo that, all the week after, he paſſed along the ſtreets very quietly, and without moleſtation, being pitied, rather than reviled (34).

(34) Memoirs, &c. p. 109.

[AA] His Speech.] As it is not our deſign, and indeed would ſpin this article out to too great a length, to take a view of the evidence for and againſt the Biſhop, we ſhall only ſelect a paſſage or two from his ſpeech, in which he plays the Orator, and endeavours to work upon the paſſions of his hearers. ' Here is a Plot, ſays he, of a year or two ſtanding, ' to ſubvert the Government, with an armed force; ' an invaſion from abroad; an inſurrection at home; ' juſt when ripe for execution, it is diſcovered; and ' twelve months after the contrivance of this ſcheme, ' no conſultation appears, no men correſponding to- ' gether, no proviſion made, no arms, no officers pro- ' vided, not a man in arms; and yet the poor Bi- ' ſhop has done all this. What could tempt me to ' ſtep thus out of my way? Was it ambition, and ' a deſire of climbing into a higher ſtation in the ' Church? There is not a man in my office, farther ' removed from this than I am. Was money my ' aim? I always deſpiſed it too much, conſidering ' what occaſion I am now like to have for it: for out ' of a poor Biſhoprick of five hundred pounds per ' annum, I have laid out no leſs than a thouſand ' pounds towards the repairs of the church and Epiſ- ' copal palace; nor did I take one ſhilling for dila- ' pidations. The reſt of my little income has been ' ſpent, as is neceſſary, as I am a Biſhop. Was I ' influenced by any diſlike of the Eſtabliſhed Reli- ' gion, and ſecretly inclined towards a Church of ' greater pomp and power? I have, my Lords, ever ' ſince I knew what Popery was, oppoſed it; and ' the better I knew it, the more I oppoſed it. I be- ' gan my ſtudy in Divinity, when the Popiſh contro- ' verſy grew hot, with that immortal book of Tillot- ' ſon's; when he undertook the Proteſtant cauſe in ' general; and as ſuch, I eſteemed him above all. ' You will pardon me, my Lords, if I mention one ' thing: Thirty years ago, I writ in defence of Mar- ' tin Luther (35), and have preached, expreſſed, and ' wrote to that purpoſe from my infancy; and what- ' ever happens to me, I will ſuffer any thing, and, ' by God's grace, burn at the ſtake, rather than de- ' part from any material point of the Proteſtant ' religion, as profeſſed in the Church of England. ' Once more; Can I be ſuppoſed to favour arbitrary ' power? The whole tenor of my life has been other- ' wiſe: I was always a friend to the liberty of the ' ſubject, and, to the beſt of my power, conſtantly ' maintained it: I may have been thought miſtaken ' in the meaſures I took to ſupport it; but it matters ' not by what Party I was called, ſo my actions are ' uniform.' Afterwards, ſpeaking of the method of proceeding againſt him as unconſtitutional, he ſays: ' My ruin is not of that moment to any number of ' men, to make it worth their while to violate, or ' even to ſeem to violate, the Conſtitution in any de- ' gree, which they ought to preſerve againſt any at- ' tempts whatſoever. Though I am worthy of no ' regard; though whatſoever is done to me, may, ' for that reaſon, be looked upon to be juſt; yet ' your Lordſhips will have ſome regard to your own ' laſting intereſt, and that of poſterity. This is a ' proceeding, with which the Conſtitution is unac- ' quainted; which, under the pretence of ſupporting ' it, will at laſt effectually deſtroy it. For God's ' ſake, lay aſide theſe extraordinary proceedings; ſet ' not up theſe new and dangerous precedents. I, for ' my part, will voluntarily, and chearfully, go into ' perpetual baniſhment, and pleaſe myſelf that I am, ' in ſome meaſure, the occaſion of putting a ſtop to ' ſuch precedents, and doing ſome good to my ' Country; and will live, wherever I am, praying ' for its proſperity; and do, in the words of Father ' Paul, to the State of Venice, ſay, Eſto perpetua: ' It is not my departing from it, I am concerned for; ' let me depart, and let my country be fixed upon the ' immoveable foundation of law and juſtice, and ſtand ' for ever.' After a ſolemn proteſtation of his inno- cence, and an appeal to the Searcher of Hearts, for the truth of what he had ſaid, he concludes thus: ' If on any account, there ſhall ſtill be thought by ' your Lordſhips, to be any ſeeming ſtrength in the ' proofs againſt me; if, by your Lordſhips judgments, ' ſpringing from unknown motives, I ſhall be thought ' to be guilty; if for any reaſons, or neceſſity of ſtate, ' of the wiſdom and juſtice of which I am no com- ' petent judge, your Lordſhips ſhall proceed to paſs ' this Bill againſt me; I ſhall diſpoſe myſelf quietly ' and tacitly to ſubmit to what you do; God's ' Will be done: Naked came I out of my mother's ' womb, and naked ſhall I return; and, whether ' he gives or takes away, bleſſed be the name of the ' Lord!'

[BB] The Reply of the King's Counſel to his Defence.] Mr. Reeve and Mr. Wearg were both men of great knowledge and ſagacity in the Law, but of different talents in point of eloquence. Their Speeches on this occaſion were made public; and they ſeem to have formed their Replies, deſignedly, in a different way. The former ſticks cloſe to the matter in evidence, and enforces the charge againſt the Biſhop with great ſtrength and perſpicuity: The latter anſwers all his objections, and refutes the arguments brought in his defence, in an eaſy, ſoft, manner, and with great ſimplicity of reaſoning. Mr. Reeve is wholly employed in facts, in comparing and uniting together circumſtances, in order to corroborate the proofs of the Biſhop's guilt: Mr. Wearg is chiefly taken up in ſilencing the complaints of the Biſhop and his Council, and replying to every thing they advance, in order to invalidate the allegations of his innocence. The one, in ſhort, poſſeſſes the minds of the Lords with ſtrong convictions againſt the Biſhop: The other diſpoſſeſſes them of any favourable impreſſion, that might poſſibly be made upon them by the artifice of his defence. And accordingly Mr. Reeve is ſtrong, nervous, and enforcing; but Mr. Wearg, ſmooth, eaſy, and inſinuating, both in the manner of his expreſſion, and the turn of his periods. Mr. Wearg pays the higheſt compliments to the Biſhop's eloquence: but, at the ſame time, repreſents it as employed to impoſe upon the reaſon, and miſguide the judgment of his hearers, in proportion as it affected their paſſions; and he endeavours to ſtrip the Biſhop's defence of all its ornaments and colours of Rhetoric. We ſhall only tranſcribe a paſſage from the concluſion of his ſpeech, in which he aſſerts the lenity of the Government in the mildneſs of the puniſhment to be inflicted on the Biſhop. ' The nature of the puniſhment, ſays ' Mr. Wearg, has been much talked of in the courſe ' of theſe proceedings, and great lamentations made ' upon after a very long and warm debate [CC], paſſed on the ſixteenth, by a majority of eighty-three to forty-three. On the twenty-ſeventh the King came to the Houſe, and confirmed it by his royal aſſent. It is ſaid, his Majeſty paſſed this Bill with ſome regret, being much concerned, as he expreſſed it, that there ſhould be juſt cauſe of dooming to perpetual baniſhment a Biſhop of the Church of England, and a man of ſuch eminent parts and learning. To alleviate, however, in ſome meaſure, the ſeverity of this ſentence, the Biſhop's daughter, Mrs. Morrice, was permitted to attend her father in his travels; and his ſon-in-law, Mr. Morrice, by virtue of his Majeſty's ſign manual, had leave to correſpond with him. On the eighteenth of June 1723, this eminent Prelate, having the day before taken leave of his friends, who, from the time of paſſing the Bill againſt him, to the day of his departure, had free acceſs to him in the Tower, embarked (aa) on board the Aldborough man of war, and landed the Friday following at Calais. From thence he went to Bruſſels; and afterwards to Paris, where he reſided till his death, ſoftening the rigours of his exile by ſtudy, and converſation with learned men; and by a conſtant epiſtolary correſpondence with the moſt eminent ſcholars, particularly with M. Thiriot, an ingenious French gentleman, for whom he had a great eſteem, and who has obliged the public with ſome of the Biſhop's Original Letters, which are chiefly Critiques on ſeveral French authors. Biſhop Atterbury died at Paris the fifteenth of February 1731. His body was brought over to England, and interred the twelfth of May following, in Weſtminſter Abbey [DD]. Some time before his death, he publiſhed a vindication of himſelf, Biſhop Smalridge, and Dr. Aldrich, from a charge, brought againſt them by Mr. Oldmixon, of having altered and interpolated the copy of Lord Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion [EE]. Biſhop Atterbury's Sermons are extant in four volumes in octavo: thoſe contained in the two firſt were publiſhed by himſelf,

' upon it; but ſurely without any reaſon: for I may ' venture to affirm, this is the mildeſt puniſhment ' that ever was inflicted for ſuch an offence. His ' life is not touched; his liberty nor property af- ' fected; he is only expelled the ſociety, whoſe ' government he diſapproves, and has endeavoured ' to ſubvert; and deprived of the public employ- ' ment, which the Government had entruſted him ' with: the enjoyment of his life, his private eſtate, ' and his liberty under any other government, that ' may be more agreeable, is allowed him. This is ' ſcarce to be called a puniſhment, being nothing ' more than what was abſolutely neceſſary for the ' public ſecurity.'

[CC] ——— A very long and warm debate.] The Speakers for the Bill were, amongſt others, the Duke of Argyle, the Earls of Peterborough, Cholmondley, and Finlater, Lord Lechmere, Dr. Willis, Biſhop of Sarum, and Dr. Gibſon, Biſhop of London: Thoſe againſt it, the Earl of Strafford, Duke of Wharton, the Earls Poulet, and Cowper; the Lords Bathurſt, Trevor, and Gower; and Dr. Gaſtrel, Biſhop of Cheſter. The principal arguments alledged againſt the Bill were, the dangerous conſequences of ſuch an extraordinary way of proceeding, and the want of legal, and ſufficient, evidence againſt the Biſhop: The arguments in its favour were, beſides aſſerting the legality, and ſufficiency of the evidence, the neceſſity of applying extraordinary remedies to extraordinary diſeaſes, and that, when the very being of the State lies at ſtake, if the Common-Law cannot reach great offenders, the Legiſlature ought to exert itſelf. The Bill did not paſs without a ſtrong Proteſt, ſigned, Wharton, Strafford, Bruce, Poulet, Dartmouth, Craven, Hay, Bathurſt, Gower, Weſton, Exeter, Willoughby Br. [DD] He was buried in Weſtminſter Abbey.] His funeral was performed in a very private manner, attended only by his ſon-in-law, Mr. Morrice, and his two Chaplains, Dr. Savage, and Dr. Moore. Upon the urn, which contained his bowels, was inſcribed, In hac urna depoſiti ſunt cineres Franciſci Atterburi, Epiſcopi Roffenſis.

[EE] He publiſhed a Vindication of himſelf ——— from the charge ——— of altering and interpolating Lord Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion.] Mr. Oldmixon, in the Preface to his Hiſtory of the Stuarts, ſuggeſts, that ' The Hiſtory of the Rebellion, as it ' was publiſhed at Oxford, was not entirely the ' work of the Lord Clarendon;' that, in the original Manuſcript, ' the characters of the Kings, whoſe ' reigns are written, were different from what they ' appear in the Oxford Hiſtory;' and that the copy had been ' altered and interpolated, while it was at ' the preſs.' As a confirmation of this ſuggeſtion, he produces a letter (from Colonel Ducket) in which that gentleman affirms, that Mr. Edmund Smith, of Chriſt-Church, author of the Tragedy of Phædra and Hippolytus, had declared to him, a little before his death, in 1710, that ' what was publiſhed under ' Clarendon's name, was only patch-work; and that ' he himſelf was employed by Dr. Aldrich, Dr. At- ' terbury, and Dr. Smalridge, ſucceſſive Deans of ' Chriſt-Church, to interpolate and alter the original;' and that, ' Among ſeveral hundreds of alterations ' and additions, he had made by their order, the ' application of the famous ſaying, concerning Cinna ' (37), to the character of Mr. Hampden was one.' This paſſage of Mr. Oldmixon's preface was tranſlated into French, and publiſhed in the Bibliotheque Raiſonnée, &c. (38), and Dr. Atterbury ſtrongly called upon to juſtify himſelf; which he did in a piece, dated from Paris, the 26th of October 1731, and intitled, Biſhop Atterbury's Vindication of Biſhop Smalridge, Dr. Aldrich, and himſelf, from the ſcandalous reflections of Oldmixon, relating to the publication of the Lord Clarendon's hiſtory. This Vindication was ſent by him, with a letter, to the author of the Bibliotheque, &c. who publiſhed them both in French in that Journal (39). The Biſhop, in juſtification of himſelf, declares, he never ſaw Lord Clarendon's hiſtory in manuſcript, either before or ſince the publication of it, nor ever read a line of it but in print; and that, with regard to Mr. Smith, he never (as far as he could recollect) exchanged a word with him in all his life, nor ſo much as knew him by ſight, till after the edition of that hiſtory. As for Biſhop Smalridge, he was not any way concerned in preparing it for the preſs; the reviſal of the manuſcript being ſolely intruſted to the care of Biſhop Sprat, and Dean Aldrich, by the Earl of Rocheſter, who himſelf aſſiſted in that work; and all three were perſons of known probity and truth, and incapable of conſpiring in a deſign to impoſe on the public. He then urges the improbability of any alterations having been made in that hiſtory, not only from the expreſs declaration of the editors, in the Preface to the Firſt Volume, that They who put forth the Hiſtory, durſt not take upon them to make any alterations in a work of this kind, &c. but alſo from the great difficulty, if not impoſſibility, of imitating the author's ſtile and manner, particularly his characters, which are allowed to be the moſt diſtinguiſhed and beautiful part of the work, and to be really inimitable. And as to the words in the cloſe of Mr. Hampden's character, they are perfectly in my Lord Clarendon's manner, and contain nothing new in them, but only ſum up in ſhort, what he has ſcattered through different parts of the Firſt Volume. With reſpect to the teſtimony of Mr. Smith, Dr. Atterbury obſerves, that, as it was undoubtedly falſe, in regard to Dr. Smalridge and himſelf, ſo is it as little to be relied upon in regard to Dr. Aldrich; his perſonal averſion for whom, and the well-known reaſons of it, making it altogether incredible, that he ſhould have the leaſt ſhare in his confidence, on ſo nice, or indeed on any occaſion.

himſelf, and dedicated to his great patron Sir Jonathan Trelawny, Biſhop of Wincheſter; thoſe in the two laſt were publiſhed after his death, by Dr. Thomas Moore, his Lordſhip's Chaplain [FF]. His Epiſtolary Correſpondence with Mr. Pope [GG] is extant in the collection of that Poet's Letters. As to Biſhop Atterbury's character, however the moral and political part of it may have been differently repreſented by the oppoſite parties, it is univerſally agreed, that he was a man of great learning and uncommon abilities, a fine writer, and a moſt excellent preacher [HH].

[FF] The two laſt Volumes of his Sermons were publiſhed by Dr. Moore, his Lordſhip's Chaplain.] The editor, in excuſe of himſelf, for not publiſhing a greater number of the Biſhop's poſthumous Sermons, ſince every one will naturally conclude, that he left a great many more behind him, having been a conſtant Preacher about twenty years, and an occaſional one a great deal longer; tells us, in his preface, that the true reaſon of his not doing it was this: 'He (the Biſhop) burnt a good many of them himſelf at Paris, and, by a writing found among what 'were left, ſignified, that theſe were the only ones 'fit to be printed; ſo that, without acting contrary to the Biſhop's opinion of his own performances, of which he was certainly the beſt judge, 'no more could, and therefore no more ought to 'be publiſhed: and it being from thence reſolved, 'that no more ſhould, the only effectual way, adds 'the Editor, was, to commit the reſt to the flames: 'which was accordingly done, in my preſence, by 'William Morrice, Eſq; his dutiful and worthy ſon-'in-law and executor.'

[GG] His Epiſtolary Correſpondence with Mr. Pope.] Among the letters, which paſſed between the Biſhop and that gentleman, for whom he had the higheſt friendſhip and eſteem, is the following, dated from the Tower, April 10, 1723.

'Dear Sir,

'I Thank you for all the inſtances of your friend-'ſhip, both before, and ſince my misfortunes. A 'little time will compleat them, and ſeparate you 'and me for ever. But in what part of the world 'ſoever I am, I will live mindful of your ſincere 'kindneſs to me; and will pleaſe myſelf with the 'thought, that I ſtill live in your eſteem and affection 'as much as ever I did; and that no accidents of 'life, no diſtance of time or place, will alter you 'in that reſpect. It never can me, who have loved 'and valued you ever ſince I knew you, and ſhall 'not fail to do it when I am not allowed to tell 'you ſo; as the caſe will ſoon be. Give my 'faithful ſervices to Dr. Arbuthnot, and thanks for 'what he ſent me, which was much to the purpoſe; 'if any thing can be ſaid to be to the purpoſe, in 'a caſe that is already determined. Let him know, 'my defence will be ſuch, that neither my friends 'need bluſh for me, nor will my enemies have great 'occaſion of triumph, though ſure of the victory. 'I ſhall want his advice before I go abroad, in 'many things. But I queſtion whether I ſhall be 'permitted to ſee him, or any body but ſuch as are 'abſolutely neceſſary towards the diſpatch of my 'private affairs. If ſo, God bleſs you both! and 'may no part of the ill fortune that attends me 'ever purſue either of you! I know not but I may 'call upon you, at my hearing, to ſay ſomewhat 'about my way of ſpending my time at the Deanery, 'which did not ſeem calculated towards managing 'plots and conſpiracies. But of that I ſhall conſider— 'You and I have ſpent many hours together upon 'much pleaſanter ſubjects; and that I may preſerve 'the old cuſtom, I ſhall not part with you now, till 'I have cloſed this letter with three lines of Milton, 'which you will, I know, readily, and not without 'ſome degree of concern, apply to, your ever affectionate, &c.

[HH] He was a man of great learning and uncommon abilities, a fine writer, and a moſt excellent preacher.] His learned friend Biſhop Smalridge, in the ſpeech he made, when he preſented him to the Upper Houſe of Convocation, as Prolocutor, ſtyles him, Vir in nullo literarum genere hoſpes, in pleriſque Artibus et Studiis diu et feliciter exercitatus, in maxime perfectis literarum diſciplinis perfectiſſimus; i. e. 'One, 'who is well acquainted with all parts of literature, 'long and ſucceſsfully exerciſed in moſt arts and 'ſtudies, and moſt accompliſhed in thoſe ſciences, 'which admit of the greateſt perfection.' In his controverſial writings, he was ſometimes too ſevere upon his adverſary, and dealt rather too much in ſatire and invective: but this his panegyriſt imputes more to the natural fervor of his wit, than to any bitterneſs of temper, or prepenſe malice. Sit igitur veniæ, ſit laudi, ſit gratitudini locus; ſi quid forte aſperius, ſi quid ardentius, ſi quid liberius effuderit, lector paulo humanior id non odio, non livori, nec arrogantiæ tribuet, ſed aut ingenio ſuapte natura aliquantulum præfervido, aut fortaſſe iracundiæ, in milite pro aris fociſque acriter dimicante, in filio ab injuria et vi matrem ſuam eripiente, facilè ignoſcendæ. Quod ſi plures in illius ſcriptis effulgent virtutes, ſi res tractaverit cognitu difficiles, utiles, jucundas; ſi eas validiſſimis argumentis firmaverit; ſi puro ac dilucido ſermone in ipſis legentium animis inſcripſerit; eruditione apud eruditos, eloquentia apud diſertos ſuus conſtet honos; i. e. 'Be there then room left for 'pardon, for praiſe, for gratitude. If ſome ſharp, 'warm, and free expreſſions have fallen from him, 'a good-natured reader will not aſcribe them to reſentment, envy, or arrogance; but either to a natural warmth of diſpoſition, or perhaps to a paſſion, 'very excuſable in a ſoldier, who is fighting for all 'that is near and dear to us, and a ſon, who endeavours 'to reſcue his mother from injury and violence. But 'if many and great beauties ſhine in his writings; if 'he has treated of things, in themſelves difficult, ſo as 'to make them uſeful and entertaining; if he has 'confirmed them by the ſtrongeſt arguments; if he has 'imprinted them in the minds of his readers by a 'purity and perſpicuity of ſtyle; let the learned give 'due applauſe to his learning, and the eloquent ſet 'a juſt value on his eloquence.' In his Sermons, however, he is not only every way unexceptionable, but highly to be commended. There is that exactneſs of method, and juſtneſs of thought, thoſe weighty arguments, judicious reflections, and unaffected eloquence running through the whole; as denote him the celebrated preacher he was, and not undeſerving this commendation given him by his friend. Quo audientium plauſu apud Populum, apud Magiſtratum, apud Clerum, apud Senatores, apud Aulicos è roſtris frequenter concionatus eſt! Qua facundia et Mariæ in cælum jam receptæ aures ſæpe demulſit, et Sororis Animum gravi ac recenti dolore fere oppreſſum recreavit! i. e. 'With what applauſe has he often 'preached before the People, the Magiſtrates, the 'Clergy, the Senate, and the Court! How often 'has he charmed the ears of the late Queen Mary, 'now with God; and with what addreſs did he 'adminiſter conſolation to her ſiſter (*), almoſt op-'preſſed and overcome by her late affliction (†)!' The truth is, his talent as a preacher was ſo excellent and remarkable, that it may not improperly be ſaid, that he owed his preferment to the pulpit, nor any hard matter to trace him, through his writings, to his ſeveral promotions in the Church. We ſhall conclude Biſhop Atterbury's character as a preacher, with the encomium beſtowed on him by the author of the Tatler (40); who, having obſerved that the Engliſh clergy too much neglect the art of ſpeaking, makes a particular exception with regard to our Prelate (‡); who, ſays he, 'has ſo particular a regard to his congre-'gation, that he commits to his memory what he has 'to ſay to them; and has ſo ſoft and graceful a 'behaviour, that it muſt attract your attention. 'His perſon (continues this author), it is to be confeſſed, is no ſmall recommendation; but he is to be highly commended for not loſing that advantage, and adding to the propriety of ſpeech (which might paſs the criticiſm of Longinus), an action, which would have been approved by Demoſthenes. He has a peculiar force in his way, and has many of his audience, who could not be intelligent hearers of his diſcourſe, were there no explanation as well as grace in his action. This art of his is uſed with the moſt exact and honeſt ſkill. He never attempts your paſſions, till he has convinced your reaſon. All the objections, which you can form, are laid open and diſperſed, before he uſes the leaſt vehemence in his Sermon; but when he thinks he has your head, he very ſoon wins your heart, and never pretends to ſhew the beauty of holineſs, till he has convinced you of the truth of it.' ['Any one who hath a genius for poetry,' ſays a learned correſpondent, 'will agree with me in wiſhing that Atterbury had never had any other occupation but poetry. His fame as a politician or a divine is not equal to what he deſerves for his tranſlation,' (viz. of the 3d Ode of the 4th Book of Horace) 'which is, without exception, the beſt in any language that I have met with.' This, undoubtedly, is carrying the encomium on Dr. Atterbury's poetical talent very far; and yet we can ſcarcely venture to ſay that it is carried too far. There is ſomething ſo exceedingly beautiful in the ſpecimens which are given of his early turn for poetry, that it is greatly to be regretted that he did not more direct his thoughts that way. Perhaps no Ode of Horace hath ſo frequently been tranſlated as the dialogue between him and Lydia. This we have often been ſurpriſed at, as certainly there is nothing extraordinary in the Ode itſelf. The chief thing that recommends it, is the eaſy elegance and gracefulneſs of its expreſſion, which is probably the reaſon why it hath been ſo popular, and hath produced ſuch a number of imitators; of whom, however, few have ſucceeded. Of all the verſions of it that we recollect at preſent, Atterbury's is by far the beſt. Were we not afraid of offending our claſſical readers, we ſhould almoſt be tempted to ſay, that it is equal to the original; a thing which can ſcarcely ever be ſaid of the tranſlations of Horace. The tranſlation of the other Ode is in the higheſt degree beautiful. The Ode itſelf, in the original, is peculiarly excellent and delightful; and Dr. Atterbury hath moſt happily ſucceeded in clothing it in an Engliſh dreſs. It was judicious in Dr. Francis not to attempt a new verſion of this Ode, after ſo admirable a one was furniſhed to his hands. And he juſtly obſerves, that by Biſhop Atterbury's ſucceſs we may be convinced that it is not impoſſible to render Horace into Engliſh without any great loſs of his original beauties (41).

(41) Francis's Horace. Vol. ii. p. 138 2d edition. 12mo.

Dr. Atterbury did real ſervice to the Proteſtant religion in vindicating the character of Luther. For though his obſervation at the cloſe of his work (inſerted in the note D) is ſtrictly true, and the Reformation ſtands on an unſhaken baſis, whatever were Luther's principles, diſpoſitions, views, and conduct; yet, as mankind will always be affected by the private characters of thoſe who are at the head of religious parties, it is uſeful to vindicate their characters, when they have been repreſented in a falſe and injurious light. This, too, is a debt which, in ſtrict juſtice, is due to them. Of all the calumnies thrown upon Luther, that of his motive for oppoſing the Pope's Indulgences hath ſpread the wideſt, and been the moſt univerſally received. It hath been aſſerted by a prodigious multitude of writers, and more lately by Mr. Hume, that the Auſtin Friars had uſually been employed in Saxony to preach Indulgences, and from this truſt had derived both profit and conſideration; that this occupation, in 1517, being given to the Dominicans, Luther, in reſentment of the affront which had been put upon his order, began to preach againſt the abuſes that were committed in the ſale of Indulgences; and that, being provoked by oppoſition, he proceeded even to decry Indulgences themſelves. But the learned tranſlator of Moſheim's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory hath ſhewn, in a very convincing manner; firſt, that it is not true, that the Auſtin Friars had been uſually employed in Saxony to preach Indulgences; ſecondly, that, in the time of Luther, the preaching of Indulgences was become ſuch an odious and unpopular matter, that it is far from being probable, that Luther would have been ſolicitous about obtaining ſuch a commiſſion, either for himſelf or for his order; and thirdly, that he was never accuſed of any ſuch motives, either in the edicts of the Pontiffs of his time, or amidſt the other reproaches of the cotemporary writers, who defended the cauſe of Rome, and who were far from being ſparing of their invectives and calumnies. From the year 1517, to 1546, when the diſpute about Indulgences was carried on with the greateſt warmth and animoſity, not one writer ever ventured to reproach Luther with the ignoble motives which have ſince been aſcribed to him. Even Cochlæus was ſilent upon the ſubject during the life of Luther; though he broached the calumny after the death of that great reformer (42).

(42) Maclaine's Tranſlation of Moſheim's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, Vol. iii. p. 304—306. 8vo. edition of 1774.

Dr. Atterbury was not ſo happy in his other controverſial writings as he was in his firſt eſſay of that kind. In the diſpute with Dr. Bentley, though the public in general ſeemed to favour Mr. Boyle, which was owing, in a conſiderable meaſure, to the diſguſt that had been conceived at Dr. Bentley's haughty and overbearing manner, it is now, we believe, almoſt univerſally agreed that that great critic had not only truth, reaſon, and learning on his ſide, but more of wit and vivacity than would at that time be acknowledged. Of this conteſt we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter (43).

(43) Under the Articles BENTLEY and BOYLE.

In all Dr. Atterbury's controverſies with Hoadly, he appears to have been peculiarly unfortunate. He might be ſuperior to Dr. Hoadly in point of genius, and perhaps he might excel him in ſome kinds of learning. But there were ſeveral important reſpects in which he was greatly inferior to that eminent and admirable man. He had not the ſame calmneſs of mind, and freedom from prejudice in the inveſtigation of truth. He had not an equal talent for clear, ſober, and ſolid diſquiſition and reaſoning. He had not a ſimilar wiſdom and rectitude of thinking. Hoadly was engaged in the cauſe of genuine Chriſtianity, and in the defence of the liberties of mankind; and therefore, had his abilities been far leſs than they were, he would have had no ſmall advantage over Dr. Atterbury, whoſe ſplendid parts were employed in the ſupport of falſe and narrow principles, both of religion and government.

In his grand controverſy concerning the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of Convocations, he was oppoſed by very able antagoniſts. With all his learning, he had men of ſtill ſuperior learning, at leaſt with regard to the points debated, to contend with; and they exceeded him in judgment, and in moderation of temper. This diſpute, which, when it was carried on, warmly engaged the attention and paſſions of the nation, ſeems now to be almoſt forgotten. It was, however, at that time, a matter of great importance, and well worthy of a diligent examination. Even controverſies, which afterwards are apt to be regarded as inſignificant, have their utility. They exerciſe the abilities and improve the reaſon of mankind. They ſerve to explode errors and claims which are hurtful to the intereſts of truth and liberty. And if, which is no impoſſible caſe, ſimilar errors and claims ſhould, in the revolutions of things, again be obtruded upon the world, we know where to apply for the materials and arguments by which they may be refuted.

As, in the note [I], an account is only given of the principal writings which appeared in the conteſt relating to the powers and privileges of convocations, we ſhall add, from Biſhop Nicolſon's Hiſtorical Library, a complete catalogue of the pieces which were publiſhed on that occaſion. In this catalogue, we cannot well avoid repeating the titles of the books and tracts already mentioned, becauſe they afforded a pretence for publiſhing ſeveral of the other compoſitions. The Biſhop has ranged them into four claſſes.

Whatever may be thought of Dr. Atterbury's ſermon on the Scorner, which, perhaps, hath ſomething blameable as well as commendable in it, the remark at the cloſe of the note [H], made by Sir Robert Howard, is a very unfair one; for the Doctor did not ſuppoſe that wiſdom and quickneſs of parts meant the ſame thing.

Biſhop Atterbury's refuſal of ſigning the declaration of his epiſcopal brethren, during the rebellion in Scotland, was not the only teſtimony he at that time afforded of his diſaffection to government.

Another

Another remarkable proof of it was his conduct to Mr. Gibbin, curate of Graveſend. When the Dutch troops, which came over to aſſiſt in ſubduing the rebellion, were quartered at that place, the officers requeſted of Mr. Gibbin the uſe of his Church one Sunday morning for their chaplain to preach to their ſoldiers, alledging that the like favour had been granted them in other pariſhes, and promiſing that the ſervice ſhould begin at ſix in the morning, that it might not interfere with that of the town. The requeſt was granted, the Chaplain preached, and his congregation was diſmiſſed by nine o'clock. But Dr. Atterbury was ſo incenſed at this tranſaction, that he ſuſpended Mr. Gibbin for three years. The ſuſpenſion, however, was deemed ſo injurious by the inhabitants of Graveſend, that they ſubſcribed a ſum to Mr. Gibbin more than double the income of his Church; and the affair being repreſented to the King, his Majeſty gave him the rectory of North Fleet in Kent, which living he afterwards exchanged for Birch near Colcheſter in Eſſex, where he died July 29, 1752. He was a very ingenious, learned, and worthy Clergyman, who had greatly improved and enlarged his mind by his travels into France, Italy, and other countries, with Mr. Addiſon (45). ——— A farther ſtriking inſtance of Biſhop Atterbury's attachment to the Pretender, is related, by the author of the memoirs of Lord Cheſterfield, from Dr. Birch's manuſcript papers. 'Lord Harcourt, leaving the 'old miniſtry, provoked Atterbury's abuſive tongue. 'He, in return, declared, that, on the Queen's 'death, the Biſhop came to him and to Lord Bo- 'lingbroke, and ſaid, nothing remained but imme- 'diately to proclaim K. J. He further offered, if 'they would give him a guard, to put on his lawn 'ſleeves and head the proceſſion (46).'

(46) Maty's memoirs of the Earl of Cheſterfield, p. 279.

The following anecdote, often mentioned by Lord Cheſterfield, and which Dr. Maty, to the beſt of his remembrance, hath given in that celebrated nobleman's own words, is too remarkable to be omitted. 'I went to Mr. Pope one morning at Twickenham, 'and found a large folio Bible with gilt claſps lying 'before him upon his table; and, as I knew his 'way of thinking upon that book, I aſked him jocoſe- 'ly, If he was going to write an anſwer to it? It is 'a preſent, ſaid he, or rather a legacy, from my 'old friend the Biſhop of Rocheſter. I went to take 'my leave of him yeſterday in the Tower, where I 'ſaw this Bible upon his table. After the firſt com- 'pliments, the Biſhop ſaid to me, My friend Pope, 'conſidering your infirmities, and my age and exile, 'it is not likely that we ſhould ever meet again; 'and therefore I give you this legacy to remember 'me by it. —— Does your lordſhip abide by it your- 'ſelf?——I do.——If you do, my Lord, it is but 'lately. May I beg to know what new light or 'arguments have prevailed with you now, to enter- 'tain an opinion ſo contrary to that which you en- 'tertained of that book all the former part of your 'life?—— The Biſhop replied, We have not time 'to talk of theſe things; but take home the book; 'I will abide by it; and I recommend to you to do 'ſo too, and ſo God bleſs you! (47)'—— It is inſinuated in this anecdote, that Dr. Atterbury had long been known, among his friends, to be a ſceptic, or an unbeliever, with regard to revelation. But we cannot, upon the authority of a ſingle ſtory, which is not corroborated by other facts, readily give credit to ſuch a ſuppoſition. Whatever were the Biſhop's faults, we do not recollect any thing that indicates a diſbelief or a doubt of the truth of Chriſtianity. His actions and writings rather diſplay him in the light of a fiery zealot and bigot, than in that of an infidel; though it is acknowledged that theſe different characters may unite, and have united in the ſame perſons. His ſermons on the miraculous propagation of the goſpel, and on a ſtanding revelation's being the beſt means of conviction, not to mention others of his diſcourſes, are agreeable and important evidences of his attachment to the Chriſtian religion. It is obſervable, that he generally treats unbelievers with contempt, as an ignorant, ſuperficial, and conceited ſet of men; which he would ſcarcely have done had he been of the ſame ſentiments. For, though a man may conceal, or deny, or even perſecute the opinions which he himſelf holds, it is not very likely that he ſhould appear to deſpiſe the retainers of them. There is an ardour of affection and eſteem in Mr. Pope's two laſt letters to Dr. Atterbury, written to him when he was in the Tower, which that eminent poet, who valued himſelf upon his moral character, could not well have expreſſed to the Biſhop, if he had known that he had acted the baſe and hypocritical part of publicly profeſſing and defending that religion which he privately diſavowed (48).

(47) Ibid. p. 279, 280.

In the account of our prelate, the affliction which he ſuſtained, by the death of his daughter, in 1729, ſhould not have been paſſed over. He himſelf hath related this event in a very affecting manner, in a letter to Mr. Pope: 'The earneſt deſire of meeting 'one I dearly loved, called me abruptly to Montpe- 'lier; where, after continuing two months, under 'the cruel torture of a ſad and fruitleſs expectation, I 'was forced at laſt to take a long journey to Tou- 'louſe; and even there I had miſſed the perſon I 'ſought, had ſhe not, with great ſpirit and courage, 'ventured all night up the Garonne to ſee me, which 'ſhe above all things deſired to do before ſhe died. By 'that means ſhe was brought where I was, between 'ſeven and eight in the morning, and lived twenty 'hours afterwards, which time was not loſt on either 'ſide, but paſſed in ſuch a manner as gave great 'ſatisfaction to both, and ſuch as, on her part, every 'way became her circumſtances and character. For 'ſhe had her ſenſes to the very laſt gaſp, and exerted 'them to give me, in thoſe few hours, greater marks 'of duty and love than ſhe had done in all her life- 'time, though ſhe had never been wanting in either. 'The laſt words ſhe ſaid to me were the kindeſt of 'all; a reflection on the goodneſs of God, which 'had allowed us in this manner to meet once more, 'before we parted for ever. Not many minutes 'after that, ſhe laid herſelf on her pillow, in a ſleep- 'ing poſture, placidaque ibi demum morte quiévit.

'Judge you, Sir, what I felt, and ſtill feel on this 'occaſion, and ſpare me the trouble of deſcribing it. 'At my age, under my infirmities, among utter 'ſtrangers, how ſhall I find out proper reliefs and 'ſupports? I can have none, but thoſe with which 'reaſon and religion furniſh me, and thoſe I lay hold 'on, and graſp as faſt as I can. I hope that he, who 'laid the burthen upon me (for wiſe and good pur- 'poſes no doubt) will enable me to bear it in like 'manner as I have born others, with ſome degree of 'fortitude and firmneſs.'

(48) Pope's Works, Vol. v. p. 351—355.

In his letters to Mr. Pope, Biſhop Atterbury appears in a very pleaſing light, both as a writer and as a man. In eaſe and elegance they are ſuperior to thoſe of Mr. Pope, which are more ſtudied. There are in them ſeveral beautiful references to the claſſics. The Biſhop excelled in his alluſions to ſacred as well as to profane authors. In his ſermons, he often brings in a Text of ſcripture with wonderful ingenuity; not in the original ſenſe, but with an accommodation to ſome preſent circumſtance. Were we to judge of him as a man, from theſe letters only, we ſhould be ready to think that it was his ſole wiſh to ſpend his life in a learned and elegant ſocial intercourſe with a few private friends: and yet nothing could be more diſtant from his real character. He was undoubtedly poſſeſſed of a reſtleſs ambition, and the early traces of this temper are diſcernible in the letter to his father, inſerted in the note [F]. By the way, the latter part of that letter is written with an impropriety which Dr. Atterbury would ſcarcely have forgiven in another perſon. 'Mr. Boyle takes up 'half his time, buſineſs a great deal more, and he is 'forced to be uſeful to the Dean in a thouſand par- 'ticulars, ſo that he has very little time.'

We find, in one of the Annual Regiſters, a letter from the Biſhop to his ſon Obadiah, at Chriſt-church, Oxon; but when it was written, and whence obtained, doth not appear (49). There is a total ſilence concerning this ſon of his, in all the accounts we have ſeen of our celebrated prelate. However, that he had a ſon, is evident from what is mentioned, in note [E], under the article of Dr. Lewis Atterbury. Perhaps, like Cicero's Tullia, his daughter was the favourite, and from her he might derive his chief conſolation.

Though Oldmixon's charge concerning the altering and interpolating of Lord Clarendon's hiſtory of the Rebellion, hath occaſionally been repeated by zealous writers, we have no doubt of its being entirely falſe and groundleſs. This, we think, hath deciſively been ſhewn by thoſe who have vindicated the publiſhers of that Hiſtory. The original paſſage concerning Hampden hath been ſeen by many reſpectable perſons, and, among others, by the late Dr. Birch, whoſe evidence is unexceptionable (50).

(50) Monthly Review, Vol. xix. p. 232—238. New Biog. Dict. Vol. i. p. 485.

In 1768, a ſmall quarto pamphlet was publiſhed at Edinburgh, intitled, 'The private correſpondence 'of Dr. Francis Atterbury, Biſhop of Rocheſter, and 'his friends, in 1725;' which correſpondence was occaſioned by the following circumſtance. On the 2d of April, in the year laſt mentioned, upon a motion made by General Wade, and ſeconded by Mr. Duncan Forbes, the Houſe of Commons ordered a bill to be brought in, 'for more effectually diſarming the Highlanders, in that part of Great Britain 'called Scotland, and for the better ſecuring the 'peace and quiet of that part of the kingdom.' The bill, being offered the next day, paſſed through both Houſes with little oppoſition, excepting that in the upper houſe it was proteſted againſt by the Duke of Wharton, and the Lords Gower, Scarſdale, Boyle, and Litchfield; and, on the 31ſt of May, it received the royal aſſent. While this act was depending, Dr. Atterbury appears to have thought that the diſcontent and reſentment it would raiſe among the Highlanders might be improved to the purpoſe of exciting ſome commotions in favour of the Pretender. Accordingly, he invited Cameron of Lochiel, Sir Hector Maclean, and Cameron's ſon, to a conference upon the ſubject; and he applied, likewiſe, to the Marquis of Seaforth, and the captain of Clanronald. Theſe applications produced ſeveral letters and memorials to the Pretender, with his anſwers, relative to the deſign and means of making an attempt upon Scotland; which, however, was found, in the end, to be impracticable. The papers contained in the private correſpondence are, a letter from the Biſhop to Cameron; A Letter from Sir Hector Maclean, Lochiel, and Clanronald to the Pretender; A Memorial to the ſame, by the Marquis of Seaforth, and Clanronald; Another Memorial given into the Biſhop of Rocheſter, by Sir Hector Maclean, and Lochiel; The Pretender to the Marquis of Seaforth, Sir Hector Maclean, Clanronald, and Lochiel; An Anſwer, by Sir Hector Maclean, and Lochiel; Sir Hector Maclean to Lochiel; Copy of a Letter from the Pretender to the two laſt mentioned Gentlemen; Biſhop of Rocheſter to Sir Hector Maclean; and Lord Inverneſs to Lochiel. From the whole it is evident, that Atterbury was the firſt mover and prime conducter of this abortive ſcheme for ſtirring up a rebellion. The papers paſſed through his hands; and the Pretender, in his Letter to the Marquis of Seaforth, &c. ſays, 'I remark with pleaſure, the Biſhop of Rocheſter's 'forwardneſs to execute all my orders to this end 'with the utmoſt vigour, and as time doth not allow 'me to particulariſe them here, I ſhall refer you to 'him as to all particulars.'

The authenticity of this correſpondence hath never been queſtioned; and it is eſtabliſhed, in the publication of it, by an engraved ſpecimen of Dr. Atterbury's hand-writing. Such was the man who, in writing to Mr. Pope, in 1722, could ſay, 'to be 'quiet, and to live to myſelf, with the few, the very 'few friends I like, is the point, the ſingle point, I 'now aim at;' and who, in a letter to the ſame great poet, written when he had long been in exile, could declare, 'that that part of the conſtitution 'which wounded him unjuſtly, and itſelf through 'his ſide, ſhould ever be dear to him; and that his 'laſt wiſh ſhould be, like that of father Paul, Eſto 'perpetua (51)!'

From the General Dictionary we learn, that Dr. Atterbury is ſaid to have tranſlated Virgil's Georgics in Engliſh, and to have written an Harmonia Evangelica (52). Every man of taſte would be glad to ſee the tranſlation of the Georgics, if ſuch a work exiſts. How cloſely the Biſhop had ſtudied Virgil, is apparent from his elegant diſſertation on the Japyx, of that divine poet; in which he endeavours to prove, that under the character of Japyx Antonius Muſa, an eminent phyſician and a polite ſcholar at Rome, in the reign of Auguſtus, was intended to be deſcribed.

(52) General Dict. Vol. ii. p. 445.

However excellent our prelate might be as a critic, his ſkill in muſic was very indifferent, if we are to credit Sir John Hawkins: 'The late Dr. Atterbury, 'Biſhop of Rocheſter,' ſays that writer, 'who, it is 'ſuppoſed had learned a little of muſic from Dr. 'Aldrich, affected to think with the ancients that 'the diateſſaron was a perfect conſonance. He drew 'up a ſmall tract on the ſubject of muſic, wherein he 'complains, in very affecting terms, of the injuries 'which the diateſſaron has ſuſtained from modern 'muſicians, by being degraded from its rightful ſituation among the concords; and concludes with an 'ardent wiſhes and prayers for its reſtoration, as he 'could have offered up for that of his maſter. A 'manuſcript of the tract above mentioned was formerly in the hands of Mr. Tonſon the bookſeller. 'It appeared to be a very futile performance, written 'probably while the author was at college, extremely 'rhetorical and declamatory, abounding with figures, 'but deſtitute of argument.' The contempt with which Sir John Hawkins is ſometimes apt to treat eminent men, is diſcernible in the preceding paſſage (53).

(53) Hiſt. of Muſic, Vol. ii. p. 192.

It is ſaid, that Atterbury deſcribed Pope as mens curva in corpore curvo. If this be true, it is much to the diſhonour of the Biſhop, conſidering the warm profeſſions of friendſhip and affection which he made to that poet. But we would willingly hope, notwithſtanding the defects in Dr. Atterbury's character, that he was not capable of applying that expreſſion to his friend; or, if he did make uſe of it, that it could only be in a confined and qualified ſenſe, and upon ſome peculiar occaſion (54).] K.

AUBREY, in Latin ALBERICUS (JOHN), deſcended from an antient genteel family in Wiltſhire (a), was born at Eaſton-Piers, in the North diviſion of that county, November the third, but whether in 1625, or 1626, is uncertain (b). He was chriſtened very ſoon after his birth, being, as himſelf expreſſes it, weakly, and not in a probability of living (c). He received the firſt tincture of letters, in the grammar ſchool at Malmſbury, under Mr. Robert Latimer, who taught there forty years, and was the Preceptor of his countryman (as being alſo a native of Wiltſhire) the famous Thomas Hobbes (d) [A], with whom, as he commenced a friendſhip, even in his childhood, ſo he maintained it, as long as Mr. Hobbes lived, without declenſion or interruption. May the ſixth, 1642, Mr. Aubrey was entered as a gentleman-commoner of Trinity college at Oxford (e). There he purſued his ſtudies with much diligence, and dedicated himſelf early to the ſervice of his country, by making her Hiſtory and Antiquities his peculiar delight. About this time, the ſcheme of that invaluable work the Monaſticon Anglicanum, was talked of in the univerſity; to which Mr. Aubrey not only contributed all the aſſiſtance which his pains and induſtry could afford, but preſerved to poſterity, at his own expence, a curious draught of the remains of Oſney Abbey, near Oxford, which were entirely deſtroyed in the Grand Rebellion (f) [B]. In 1646, he was admitted a ſtudent of the Middle-Temple; but the death of his father, which happened on the twenty-firſt of October, 1652, and ſeveral eſtates in the counties of Wilts, Surrey, Hereford, Brecknock, and Monmouth, which brought him alſo many law-ſuits, hindered him from applying himſelf to that ſtudy, to which, otherwiſe, he would have devoted his thoughts (g). Theſe law-ſuits, together with other inevitable misfortunes, by degrees eat up all his eſtates, and forced him to lead a more active life than he was otherwiſe inclined to, engaged him in frequent and expenſive journies, and not a little diſcompoſed the natural mildneſs of his diſpoſition. He did not, however, entirely abandon his books, or break off his acquaintance with the learned at Oxford, or at London. On the contrary, he kept up a cloſe correſpondence with the lovers of Antiquity, and Natural Philoſophy, in the univerſity, and furniſhed the celebrated Anthony Wood, with a conſiderable ſhare of the materials, out of which he compoſed his two large and uſeful works (b). He likewiſe preſerved an intimacy with thoſe great wits and profound ſcholars, who then met privately, and were afterwards formed into the Royal Society. At London, Mr. Aubrey frequented Miles's coffee-houſe, in the New Palace Yard, where the famous Harrington was ſurrounded every evening by all the men of parts and reading, which that fertile age produced. There they ballotted, diſputed on government, and gave a free looſe to their ſentiments on all ſorts of ſubjects (i). A little after the Reſtoration, Mr. Aubrey went to Ireland, and returning from thence in the autumn of 1660, narrowly eſcaped ſhipwreck near Holy-Head (k). On the firſt of November, 1661, his notes inform us, that he ſuffered another ſhipwreck. I then, ſays he, made my firſt addreſſes in an ill hour to Joan Sommer (l). When he married is uncertain; but from this remark, we may be ſure that he found no great felicity in that ſtate. In the year 1662, he was elected and admitted a Fellow of the Royal Society. In June 1664, he travelled through France to Orleans, and returned again to England in the month of October. In 1666, he ſold his eſtate in Wiltſhire, and his troubles coming then very thick upon him, he was obliged to diſpoſe by degrees of all he had left, ſo that in the ſpace of four years, he was reduced, not only to ſtraights but to indigence (m). Yet his ſpirit remained unbroken, as appears by his own remark on his circumſtances. From 1670, ſays he, I have, I thank God, enjoyed a happy delitescency (n). This obſcurity, which he calls happy, conſiſted in following the bent of his genius, while he owed his ſubſiſtence to the kindneſs of his friends; and in labouring to inform that world, in which he knew not how to live. His chief benefactreſs was the then Lady Long, of Draycot in Wilts, in whoſe houſe he had an apartment, and by whom he was generouſly ſupported as long as he lived. But how long that was is uncertain. All that is known concerning it is this, that he died on a journey at Oxford, in his way to Draycot, ſuddenly, and was there buried, as near as can be conjectured, in 1700 (o). He was a man of good natural parts, much learning, and indefatigable application, a great lover of, and diligent ſearcher into, Antiquities, a good Latin poet, an excellent naturaliſt, but withal ſomewhat credulous, and ſtrongly tinctured with ſuperſtition. As to his works, we ſhall give a full account of them in a note [C].

[A] The famous Thomas Hobbes.] The author of the life of Mr. Aubrey placed before his antiquities, and alſo before his miſcellanies, tells us, that at the grammar-ſchool of Malmeſbury, he was contemporary with Mr. Hobbes (1). Father Niceron copies this in his Memoirs (2). From him it is tranſcribed into the two laſt editions of Moreri (3). And yet without queſtion it is a very groſs error, as the reader from the following obſervations will perceive. Mr. Hobbes was born, as Mr. Aubrey himſelf tells us, April 5, 1588 (4). When he was fourteen years old (5), he went from the grammar-ſchool to the univerſity, which of conſequence muſt be in 1602, that is, at leaſt twenty-three years before Mr. Aubrey was born. The miſtake aroſe thus: Anthony Wood, who ſpeaks very ſparingly of Mr. Aubrey, though he was under great obligations to him, tells us as it were by chance in his life of Thomas Hobbes; that Mr. Aubrey and he, that is, Mr. Hobbes, were bred under the ſame maſter, and Dr. Blackbourne in the Latin life, ſaying ſo too (6), the writer of his life ſuppoſing they muſt have been ſo at the ſame time, ſet it down ſo without any farther inquiry, and theſe implicit copiers have reported it with as little judgment.

As to the nature of this work it appears ſufficiently from the title: however, it may not be amiſs to add the firſt paragraph of the author's dedication, dated in 1696, and addreſſed to James (Bertie) Earl of Abingdon. 'My Lord, when I enjoyed the content-'ment of ſolitude in your pleaſant walks and gar-'dens at Lavington, the laſt ſummer, I reviewed ſe-'veral ſcattered papers which had lain by me for 'ſeveral years, and then preſumed to think, that if 'they were put together, they might be ſomewhat 'entertaining: I therefore digeſted them there in this 'order, in which I now preſent them to your Lord-'ſhip. The matter of this collection is beyond human 'reach, we being miſerably in the dark as to the 'œconomy of the inviſible world, which knows what 'we do, or incline to, and works upon our paſſions, 'and ſometimes is ſo kind as to afford us a glimpſe 'of its preſcience.' In 1697, as appears by a letter dated the firſt of June in that year, directed to Mr. Awnſham Churchill, bookſeller, Mr. Aubrey corrected for the preſs a printed copy of his book with conſiderable alterations and additions, intended doubtleſs for a ſecond edition (11), which did not however appear 'till after the death both of the author and the bookſeller, viz. in 1721, in 8vo. containing 236 pages, the index included. To this edition is prefixed ſome memoirs of the life of the author, by the editor of that edition.

III. A Perambulation of the County of Surrey, begun 1673, ended 1692. This work the author left behind him in manuſcript, and it was printed and publiſhed in the year 1719, in 5 Vols. 8vo. The author's account of this laborious undertaking is worthy notice. 'In the year 1673, ſays he, it was my intention to 'have deſcribed the pleaſant county of Surrey, which 'I am ſorry I did not compleat. Not finiſhing it, 'I made an abſtract of all natural remarks, a copy 'whereof, I after gave to Dr. Robert Plott of Oxford, 'when he had publiſhed his new hiſtory of Oxford-'ſhire, hoping that he would have been pleaſed to 'undertake the finiſhing of mine, and go through 'with it, but he would not hearken to it. For, ſaid 'he, the next county I go upon in this kind will be 'Staffordſhire, and if any other it ſhall be my native 'county of Kent, which is a great county. I lent my 'papers to my worthy friend Mr. A. Wood, to extract 'ſome notes for his hiſtory of the univerſity of Ox-'ford. In October laſt 1691, he deſired me to take 'them with me and tranſcribe them fair, and to 'preſerve them, there being many good remarks, 'that deſerve not to be buried in oblivion. I wiſh 'I had done it ſoon after my perambulation, while 'the idea of them was freſh and lively.——They 'will be of ſome uſe to ſuch as love antiquities, or 'natural hiſtory; and on that account, I expoſe them 'to the view of the candid reader, wiſhing him as 'much pleaſure in the peruſal of them as I had in 'the ſeeing of them (12).' This addreſs is dated, St. Thomas's day, 1691; but the perambulation itſelf bears date May 1, 1692, conformable to the title. The editor tells us, that he reſurveyed the county, and brought the account of monuments, &c. down to 1718.

IV. The Natural Hiſtory of the North Diviſion of Wiltſhire. An unfiniſhed manuſcript remaining in the Muſæum at Oxford (13). In the dedication prefixed to this manuſcript, addreſſed to Thomas Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, he gives this account of his work. 'I was from my childhood affected with the 'view of things rare, which is the beginning of 'philoſophy, and though I have not had leiſure to 'make any conſiderable progreſs in it, yet I was 'carried on by a ſecret ſtrong impulſe to undertake 'this taſk; I knew not why, unleſs for my own 'private pleaſure; credit there was none, for it pro-'cures the diſreſpect and contempt of a man's neigh-'bours, but I could not be quiet till I had obeyed 'this ſecret call.———I am the firſt that ever 'made an eſſay of this kind for Wiltſhire, and for 'ought I know in the nation, having begun it in '1666 (14).' This dedication is dated, Greſham College, June 6, 1685. But he afterwards changed his opinion as to a patron. For in the dedication of his miſcellanies before-mentioned, to the Earl of Abingdon in 1696, he has theſe words: 'My Lord, it 'was my intention to have finiſhed my deſcription of 'Wiltſhire, half finiſhed already, and to have dedi-'cated it to your Lordſhip, but my age is now too far 'ſpent for ſuch undertakings; I have therefore devolv-'ed that taſk on my countryman, Mr. Thomas Tan-'ner*, who hath youth to go through with it, and a 'genius proper for ſuch an undertaking.' However, this manuſcript never was publiſhed, though it is ſaid, the copy at Oxford is very fair, and more correct than any other of his writings.

This is ſaid to have been written at the command of King Charles II., who meeting Mr. Aubrey at Stone Henge, as his Majeſty was returning from Bath, he was pleaſed to converſe with him in relation to that celebrated monument of antiquity; as alſo to approve of his notion concerning it, which was this: That both it and the Stones in Oxfordſhire, were the remains of places dedicated to ſacred uſes by the Druids, long before the time of the Roman Invaſion (15). This MS. was in the hands of the late Mr. Awnſham Churchill, and is ſtill in being (16); ſo that very poſſibly ſome time or other it will be printed.

[At a meeting of gentlemen at the Devizes in Wiltſhire, in March 1659, for chooſing knights of the ſhire, it was propoſed that a ſurvey of the county ſhould be taken, after the manner of Dugdale's Warwickſhire. Mr. Aubrey undertook the northern diviſion; and it is this book, and not the natural hiſtory of the county, which he ſpeaks of as half finiſhed, and devolves to the care of his countryman, Biſhop Tanner. The manuſcript, ſome uſe of which hath been made by Biſhop Gibſon, in his edition of Camden, is entitled, 'An eſſay towards a deſcrip-'tion of the North-Diviſion of Wiltſhire, by me 'John Aubrey, of Eaſton Pierſe.' Fol. The plan of the natural hiſtory which he deſigned of this county, divided into chapters, is among his other manuſcripts in the muſæum at Oxford (21). From a letter of Dr. Ralph Bathurſt to Mr. Aubrey, dated Auguſt 25, 1693, it appears that the learned Dr. Thomas Gale had written annotations on the MONUMENTA BRITANNICA. It is apprehended that theſe annotations, which muſt have been very valuable, did not accompany the manuſcript which was in Mr. Awnſham Churchill's poſſeſſion. Among Mr. Aubrey's manuſcripts at Oxford, there is one very little known, but valuable. It is an account of Engliſh writers, particularly our poets, with many of whom Aubrey was intimately acquainted; and it contains ſeveral new and curious anecdotes of their lives. It was lent to Wood, while he was drawing up his Athenæ; but Wood greatly caſtrated the manuſcript while in his poſſeſſion. Wood's account of Milton, the firſt that ever appeared in print, and which has ſince furniſhed the ſubſtance of all the materials now extant of Milton's life, was literally taken from this manuſcript (22).

AUDLEY, or according to the old and proper manner of spelling it, ALDITHLEY, for the former is only a corruption of the latter (a), an antient and noble family, deriving their name from the village of Aldithley in Staffordshire (b), being in truth no other than a branch of the most noble and antient family of Cerdon, settled at the aforesaid place in the reign of King John. Of this family was,

AUDLEY (JAMES) Lord Audley, of Heleigh in the county of Stafford, born about the year 1314, being the seventh of Edward II. (a) By the special favour of Edward III., he had livery of all the lands of his inheritance, in the third year of that Prince's reign, though he was not then of full age (b). This Prince, soon after, did him a greater favour: Roger Mortimer Earl of March, who was this Lord's guardian, had, in his minority, exacted from him a recognizance for ten thousand marks, which debt, on the attainder of Mortimer, becoming due to the King, he totally discharged the Lord Audley therefrom (c). In 1343, the same Prince made him Governor of Berwick upon Tweed, and the two next years he served in France (d). In 1348, he was elected into the noble Order of the Garter, then first founded (e), and in 1353, he reduced a great part of the country of Valois (f). In 1356, and thirtieth of Edward III. [A], he was present at the famous battle of Poictiers, where, having demanded of the Black Prince leave to charge in the front, it was, on account of a vow he had made, given him. There, with four Esquires who attended him, he performed such extraordinary feats of arms, as distinguished him from all the gallant noblemen, who that day engaged. At length, however, he was so grievously wounded, that his Esquires were constrained to bear him out of the field of battle, to lay him under a hedge, and there take off his armour, and bind up his wounds. As soon as the French were beaten, the Prince enquired for Lord Audley, and being informed that he was grievously wounded, and lay in a litter hard by, By my faith, said he, of his hurts I am right sorry, go and ask if he may be brought hither, otherwise I will go to him where he is. Then two of his Knights went to Lord Audley, and said, Sir, the Prince desireth greatly to see you. Ah Sirs, replied he, I thank the Prince, that he is pleased to think of so poor a Knight as I am. Then he directed his servants to carry him in his litter to the Prince, into whose presence when he came, his Highness embraced him with great tenderness, and after many compliments, said, Sir James, I, and all here present, acknowledge you to have distinguished yourself from us all, in the bloody business of this day; wherefore I retain you for ever to be my Knight, with five hundred marks of yearly revenue, which I shall assign you of my heritage in England. Sir, said Lord Audley, God grant me to deserve the great goodness you have shewn me; and so he took his leave, being very feeble. This annuity Lord Audley bestowed upon his four faithful Esquires, which

[A] In 1356, and thirtieth of Edward III.] The battle of Poictiers was fought on Monday the 19th of September, 1356. The English army was commanded by Edward, Prince of Wales, and did not consist of above nine thousand men at the most: the French army under King John consisted of fifty thousand foot, and as many horse, among whom were the flower of the French nobility, as Froissard says expressly (1). The King of France, and his youngest son Philip, who bravely defended his father, when his two elder brothers were fled, were both taken prisoners, with many other persons of great quality, with as many private men as the English army could with safety to themselves carry away (2). Daniel in his history gives us a short account of the Lord Audley's adventure, but as short as it is, there are some mistakes. His words are these, The most remarkable instance of honour and valour, was the Lord James Audley, who having vowed to be the foremost of the battle performed his word, and confirmed it with many wounds; for which the Prince having rewarded him with five hundred marks per annum fee simple in England; he presently gave it to four of his Esquires, who had underwent the same dangers as himself. The Prince knowing it, asked him whether he did not accept his gift? He answered yea, but those men had deserved it as well as himself, and had more need of it. The Prince was well pleased at this reply; and gave five hundred marks more to him; as if he resolved that so much worth should not go unrewarded (3). It is certain, that Mr. Daniel had no authority for suggesting that the Prince at first took amiss what the Lord Audley had done. In the next place, the last gift was not five, but six hundred marks. By his manner of wording it, one would imagine the last gift was fee simple, whereas, it was not, as is shewn in the text. Speed in his history mentions but one gift, which he says, the Lord Audley divided amongst his Esquires, and yet, which is remarkable, he cites Froissard (4). It is also observable, that our own old historian Henry Knyghton is silent as to him, though he gives us a most particular account of this battle (5), and I should have said the same thing of Walsingham; if I had not found him quoted to prove the contrary in Dugdale. For as he is printed in Mr. Camden's collection; thus he writes (6), Ibi claruit Victoria Domini Jac. Arundel Militis, qui potenti Virtute confregit, & perforavit aciem Gallicorum, &c. Mr. Dugdale leaving out the proper name, applies the rest of the passage to Lord Audley, by what authority I know not (7). He cites indeed another edition of Walsingham in his margin, but in that citation there is a visible error (8), for he makes Walsingham place this victory under 1357; whereas all other historians, and Walsingham with them, fix it to the year preceding. All I would infer from these remarks is this, that the French historians, who treat either expressly or occasionally of our affairs, and especially of our wars in France, ought to be sedulously examined, because in them many particulars are found unrecorded by, and very probably absolutely unknown to, our own historians, who being most of them sedentary men, and taking their accounts from others, are less likely to be acquainted with minute circumstances than those who lived upon the spot, and were more immediately concerned in the event of those military exploits of which they write.

coming to the Prince's ears, he ſending for him, ſaid, My Lord, we thank you for doing what we ought to have done, and we give you beſides, a penſion of ſix hundred marks by the year (g). This account we have from Froiſſard, and it appears to have been exactly true from the records, wherein we find an annuity of four hundred pounds to the Lord Audley, charged on the coinage of the Stanneries in Cornwall, during the life of the Lord Audley, and a year afterwards (h). In 1360, he attended King Edward III., and his three ſons, in their wars in France (i); and in the year following, ſwore to the peace then concluded in the name of King Edward (k). For theſe ſervices he was appointed Conſtable of the caſtle of Glouceſter for life (l); and was alſo Governor of Aquitain, and Seneſchal of Poictou (m). He gave likewiſe to his ſon Nicholas, one hundred pounds in money, one dozen of ſilver veſſels, and all the armour for his own body. To his daughter Margaret Hillary, ten pounds in money; and to the Monks of Stilton Abbey, ten pounds to pray for his ſoul (p). He deceaſed the firſt of April in the ſame year (q), and was ſucceeded in his honours and large eſtate by his only ſon Nicholas [B], then fifty years of age.

Now this John was the ſon of another John Touchet, by Joan the elder ſiſter of Margaret, and daughter of that Lord Audley, whoſe Life this note refers to (9), whereby the ancient Barony of Heleigh paſſed into the family of Touchet, and the late Earl of Caſtlehaven ſat in the Britiſh Houſe of Peers by that title.

AUDLEY (EDMUND), ſon of James, Lord Audley, by Eleanor his wife, but what year he was born in does not appear (a). He was educated in Lincoln College in Oxford, and in the year 1463, took the degree of Batchelor of Arts in that univerſity, and it is preſumed, that of Maſter of Arts alſo, though it does not appear from the regiſter, which is imperfect (b). In 1471, he became Prebendary of Farendon in the church of Lincoln, and in October, 1475 (c), attained the like preferment in the church of Wells. On Chriſtmas day the ſame year, he became Archdeacon of the Eaſt riding of Yorkſhire, and had other conſiderable preferments (d). Theſe preferments he quitted, on his being promoted to the Biſhopric of Rocheſter, in 1480, being the twentieth of Edward IV., in which ſee he ſucceeded John Ruſſel, who was tranſlated to Lincoln, and who was tutor to Edward Prince of Wales (e). In 1492, being the eighth of Henry VII, our Biſhop Audley was tranſlated to Hereford (f), and thence in 1502, being the eighteenth of the ſame King, to Saliſbury, and about that time was made Chancellor of the Moſt Noble Order of the Garter (g). He was a man of learning [A], and of a generous ſpirit. In 1518, he gave four hundred pounds to Lincoln College to purchaſe lands, and beſtowed upon the ſame houſe the patronage of a chantry, which he had founded in the cathedral church of Saliſbury (h). He was a benefactor likewiſe to St. Mary's Church in Oxford, and contributed to the erecting the curious ſtone pulpit therein. Biſhop Godwin likewiſe tells us, that he gave the organs (i); but Anthony

[A] He was a man of learning.] It may appear a little odd to the critical reader, that the life of this Biſhop ſhould find a place in this work, though he makes no figure in hiſtory, and was no writer. But when our reaſons are heard, we make no doubt we ſhall ſtand excuſed. It is very reaſonable in a Dictionary of this nature, to inſert what can be collected of perſons any way remarkable. Now Biſhop Audley is certainly the moſt eminent inſtance of the early exerciſe of the power of tranſlating which is to be met with. His being of a noble family, probably was the ſole motive to his firſt preferments; but we may naturally conclude, that he owed his tranſlation to his two laſt Biſhoprics, to the attachment of himſelf and his family to the Lancaſtrian Line. Beſides, when Dr. Seth Ward endeavoured to fix the honour of Chancellor of the Garter to his ſee of Saliſbury, he modeſtly called it, a reſtoring of it, becauſe it had belonged to this his predeceſſor. Our Biſhop Audley was himſelf a man of letters, though no author, and a great encourager of learning in others, for which we find him particularly complimented in a letter from the Univerſity of Oxford, the occaſion of which was this: Amongſt other Oxford Divines, there was one Edward Powell, who had written a book under the title of Propugnaculum ſummi ſacerdotii Evangelici ac ſeptenarii Sacramentorum adverſus M. Lutherum, fratrem fumoſum et Wicliniſtum inſignem, lib. iii. Lond. 1523. 4*to*, that is, The Bulwark of the Papacy and Seven Sacraments againſt Martin Luther, &c. (1) which, as it was intended to check what was then thought Hereſy, was very acceptable to the univerſity; by order of which, a letter was written to compliment the Biſhop of Saliſbury, who was patron to this Powell, and who had given him a Prebend in his Cathedral (2). A Letter was alſo written to Dr. Powell himſelf, and another to the King (3), in which all the books compiled againſt Luther and his writings by members of this univerſity are enumerated, and this book of Powell's is particularly commended (4). Our Biſhop alſo, as a mark of his reſpect to the univerſity of Oxford, in which he had been bred, gave to Chichley's Cheſt, which had been then lately robbed, the ſum of two hundred pounds, which in thoſe days was a conſiderable benefaction (5).

AUDLEY, or rather AWDELY (THOMAS), descended of an ancient and honourable, nay, if we might altogether depend on the authority of a certain author (a), we might add, once noble family, of the county of Essex [A]. He was born in 1488, but in what month does not appear. Being by nature endowed with great abilities, from his ancestors he inherited an ample fortune, and was also happy in a regular education; passing from the university, whether of Cambridge or of Oxford, is not certain, to the Inns of Court (b). At what time he was entered of the Inner-Temple, does not appear, but in the year 1526, being the eighteenth of Henry VIII., Mr. Audley, then in the thirty-ninth year of his age, was Autumn Reader of that House (c). At this time, there is reason to believe, he read on the Statute of Privileges, which he handled with such caution, and, withal, with so much learning and eloquence, that he acquired great reputation thereby (d). This, with the Duke of Suffolk's recommendation, to whom he was Chancellor, brought him to the knowledge of his Sovereign (e), whose affairs, at that time, needing men of Audley's character, who, with the learning of a Lawyer, had all the politeness usually acquired in Courts, favour quickly followed. He was, by the King's influence, chosen Speaker of that Parliament, which sat first on the third of November, 1529, in the twenty-first year of the King (f); which, from the acts passed therein, is by some styled the Black Parliament, and by others, on account of its duration, the Long Parliament (g). As soon as the House of Commons proceeded to business, great complaints were made therein against the Clergy, and against the proceedings in Ecclesiastical Courts, upon which, several bills were ordered to be brought in (h), which put the whole Order into a ferment, and especially provoked some of the Prelates. Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, inveighed boldly against these transactions, in the House of Lords, with which the House of Commons were so much offended, that they thought proper to complain of it, by their Speaker to the King (i). The Bishop was thereupon forced to explain himself, and Sir William Fitzwilliams, in the King's name, excusing the matter, with respect to his Lordship, to the House, it ended there with respect to him; but as to the business of Reformation, it went on more briskly than ever, as the reader will see in the note [B]. The best historians agree, that great care was taken by the King, or at least by his Ministry, to have such persons chosen into this

[A] Once noble family in Essex.] Lloyd, the Biographer, speaking of this noble person, says, His birth was generous, his education more, Essex bred him to that honour which his ancestors lost (1). It is true, there is not much to be built on this author's authority, his affectation of eloquence transporting him sometimes, where the love of truth would never have carried him. However, suppose that Lloyd's expression proves only that he was an Essex man, which, however, is what might have been proved without him, since it is affirmed by Fuller and the author of the Worthies of England (2), and then let us see what we can make of his suggestion, that our Chancellor's family was noble before he was made a Baron by creation. Sir William Dugdale says expressly, that he knows not what family our Audley sprung from: he goes farther, and from the arms asserts, that he was not of the ancient family of Audley (3), which, however, may be doubted: for Dugdale himself informs us, that Hugh Audley Earl of Gloucester, was with others assigned to array all the able men of Essex in the 13th of Edward III. And though it be true, that this noble family ended in that Earl, yet it is as true, that there were others of this name settled in the same county of Essex, who had summons to Parliament in the reigns of Henry V., and his son Henry VI. Now it is by no means either impossible, or improbable, that in the subsequent reigns of Edward IV., and Richard III (4), this family might be much distressed, and there might be very plausible reasons offered in favour of their changing even their paternal coat, in order to preserve a fair estate; and this would tally exactly with Lloyd's expression of our Lord Audley's recovering an honour his ancestors had once possessed. This will appear still more feasible, if we consider this Lord's arms as they are exhibited by Dugdale himself (5), compared with those of the Earl of Castlehaven, who bears the arms of the ancient family of Audley, as he enjoys a Barony, in right of being descended from a female of that house.

[B] As the reader will see in the note.] It is requisite that we should give a distinct account of this speech, because there is a good deal of diversity among our historians with respect to this matter. In that life of Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, which is said to be written by Dr. Baily, we are told, that at the same time the writs were directed to the counties, &c. for the election of Members, there came private letters directing whom they should chuse, which letters few or none durst disobey; so that, to use my author's expression, there was a Parliament filled to the King's heart's desire (6). The same author farther tells us, 'The 'regulation of all abuses of the Clergy were referred 'to the House of Commons, where severe complaints 'against the whole Clergy, as well as against particular Clergymen, were daily presented, whereof some 'the House of Lords took into consideration, and 'some they rejected (7).' I have transcribed this sentence entire, that the nonsense of it might appear to be the author's own. After this, what credit can we give to his speech, which is penned in a stile not agreeable to those times, and concludes thus, 'My 'Lords, I will tell you plainly what I think, that 'except you resist manfully by your authorities, this 'violent heap of mischiefs offered by the Commons, 'you shall see all obedience first drawn from the 'Clergy, and, secondly, from yourselves; and, if 'you search into the true causes of all these mischiefs 'which reign among them, you shall find that they 'all arise through want of faith (8).' He then proceeds to inform us, that the Commons, by their Speaker, Mr. Audley, complained grievously to the King, as if the Bishop represented them as Infidels or Heretics. Whereupon he owns the King sent for Bishop Fisher and reproved him, though according to our author, this Houſe of Commons as would proceed therein readily and effectually, and with the ſame view, Audley (k) was made choice of, to ſupply the place of Sir Thomas More, who was become Speaker of the Lord's Houſe, and Chancellor of England. The New Houſe and its Speaker juſtified his Majeſty's expectations, by the whole tenor of their behaviour, but eſpecially by the paſſing of a law, which, as it is not to be found among our ſtatutes, we ſhall take the liberty to mention here. The King, it ſeems, had borrowed very large ſums of money of particular ſubjects, and had entered into obligations for the repayment of the ſaid ſums. The Houſe being informed of this, brought in, and paſſed a Bill, in the preamble of which they declared, that inaſmuch as thoſe ſums had been applied by his Majeſty to public uſes, therefore they cancelled and diſcharged the ſaid obligations (l), &c. The King, to ſhew how well he was pleaſed with this loyal Houſe, continued the Parliament, which ſat again in the month of January, 1530-1. In this ſeſſion alſo many extraordinary things were done; amongſt the reſt, there was a law made, whereby the Clergy were exempted from the penalties they had incurred, by ſubmitting to the legantine power of Wolſey. This took its riſe in the Lord's Houſe, and when it came down to the Commons, they were for inſerting a clauſe in favour of the laity; being conſcious, that many of themſelves had alſo incurred the penalties of the ſtatute. But the King took umbrage at this. He ſaid, that acts of Grace ought to flow ſpontaneouſly, and that this was not the method of obtaining what they wanted. In ſhort, the Houſe, notwithſtanding the interceſſion of its Speaker, and ſeveral of its members, who were the King's ſervants, was obliged to paſs the bill without the clauſe; but when they had done ſo, the King granted them likewiſe a pardon, and ſo they parted very well pleaſed with each other, the Houſes riſing in the month of June (m). In the receſs, the King thought it neceſſary to have a letter written to the Pope by the Lords and Commons, or rather by the three eſtates in Parliament, which letter was drawn up and ſigned by Cardinal Wolſey, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, four Biſhops, two Dukes, two Marquiſſes, thirteen Earls, two Viſcounts, twenty-three Barons, twenty-two Abbots, and eleven Members of the Houſe of Commons (n). Lord Herbert tells us, this letter was written by Parliament; but this is a miſtake, ſince the letter is dated the thirteenth of July, and the Houſes roſe on the twenty-firſt of the preceding month (o). The purport of this letter, was to engage the Pope to grant the King's deſire in the divorce buſineſs, for the ſake of preventing a civil war, on account of the ſucceſſion, and to threaten him if he did not, to take ſome other way. To gratify the Speaker for the great pains he had already taken, and to encourage him to proceed in the ſame way, the King made him this year Attorney for the duchy of Lancaſter (p), advanced him in Michaelmas term, to the ſtate and degree of a Serjeant at Law (q), and on the fourteenth of November following, to that of his own Serjeant (r). In January, 1531-2, the Parliament had its third ſeſſion, wherein the grievances occaſioned by the exceſſive power of the Eccleſiaſtics and their courts, were regularly digeſted into a book, which was preſented by the Speaker, Audley, to the King (s). The King's anſwer was; He would take advice, hear the parties accuſed ſpeak, and then proceed to Reformation (t). In this ſeſſion, a bill was brought into the Houſe of Lords, for the better ſecuring the rights of his Majeſty, and other perſons intereſted in the care of wards, &c. which rights, it was alledged, were injured by fraudulent wills and contracts. This bill, when it came into the Houſe of Commons, could not make its paſſage at all: nay, the Members were ſo much out of humour, that they expreſſed a deſire of being diſſolved, alledging, That they had ſat too long, and been at too great an expence. But the King would not permit this: however, after they had done ſome buſineſs, they had a receſs to the month of April (u). When they next met, the King ſent for the Speaker, and delivered to him the anſwer which had been made to the roll of grievances, preſented at their laſt ſitting (w). The Houſe was very little ſatisfied therewith, and indeed their temper was now pretty much altered. For, towards the cloſe of the month, one Mr. Themſe moved, That the Houſe would intercede with the King, to take back his Queen again (x). The King extremely alarmed at this, on the thirtieth of April, 1532, ſent for the Speaker, whom he diſcourſed to this effect: 'That he was amazed at what had paſſed in the 'Houſe, and that he marvelled, any among them ſhould meddle in buſineſſes which 'could not properly be determined there. As for this particular, that it concerned his 'ſoul ſo much, that he many times wiſhed the marriage had been good; but ſince the 'Doctors of the univerſities had generally declared it unlawful, he could do no leſs 'than abſtain from her company. Which, therefore, he wiſhed him to take as the true 'reaſon, without imputing it to any wanton appetites; ſince, being in the one-and-'fortieth year of his age, it might be juſtly preſumed, ſuch motions were not ſo quick author, he juſtified to the King's face all he had ſaid; which drew from his Majeſty this admonition, to uſe his words for the time to come more temperately (9). And that, ſays this author, was all, which gave the Commons little ſatisfaction. This is ſo far from being true, that Fiſher explained away his ſpeech, and ſaid, That in ſpeaking of want of faith, he intended only the people of Bohemia, which explanation of his was reported to the Houſe of Commons by the King's command, and thereupon the buſineſs dropt (10). But what demonſtrates the ſpeech in Baily's life to be a forgery, is the mention therein made of a bill for veſting the ſmall monaſteries in the King; which Bill however was not brought in, in 1529, when this ſpeech was made, but in 1535.

'with him; all which, that they might the better understand, he had informed himself 'in all parts of Christendom concerning strange marriages; and that, saving in Spain and 'Italy, he could never find any man had so much as married two sisters, if the first was 'carnally known. But for the brother to marry the brother's wife, was so abhorred 'among all nations, that he never heard any Christian so did but himself, and therefore 'wished them to believe that his conscience was troubled (y).' On the eleventh of May, the King sent for the Speaker, Audley, again, and then told him, That he had found that the Clergy of his realm were but half his subjects, or scarcely so much, every Bishop and Abbot at the entering into his dignity, taking an oath to the Pope, derogatory to that of their fidelity to the King, which contradiction he desired his Parliament to take away. Upon this motion of the King's, the two oaths he mentioned were read in the House of Commons, which House would probably have complied with the King's request, if the plague had not forced his Majesty to put an end to the session somewhat abruptly (z). This was on the fourteenth of May, and two days after, viz. May the sixteenth, 1532, Sir Thomas More, Knt. then Lord Chancellor of England, went suddenly, without acquainting any body with his intention, to Court, his Majesty being then at York Place, and there, about three in the afternoon, surrendered up the seals to the King (a). The King going out of town to East-Greenwich, carried the seals with him, and there, on Monday the twentieth of May, delivered them to Thomas Audley, Esq; with the title of Lord Keeper, and at the same time conferred on him the honour of knighthood (b). On the sixth of September following, Sir Thomas delivered the old seal, which was much worn, and received a new one in its stead, yet with no higher title (c): but on the twenty-sixth of January, 1533, he again delivered the seal to the King, who kept it a quarter of an hour, and then delivered it to him, with the title of Lord Chancellor; in execution of which office, he sealed, in the King's presence, a subpœna to one John Gilbert (d). A little after, the King granted to him the scite of the priory of Christ Church, together with all the church plate, and lands belonging to that house (e), concerning which gift, there is a great deal said by our historians, and not a little falsehood and confusion in what they say, as in the note the reader will perceive [C]. In his high office, he did the business of the King as effectually as when Speaker of the House of Commons. For in July 1535, he sat in judgment on Sir Thomas More, his predecessor (as he had before on Bishop Fisher), who, though in the month of November, 1534, he had been attainted of misprision of treason (f), yet he was now indicted of high-treason, for that he had traiterously imagined to deprive the King of his title and dignity of Supreme Head of the Church, in respect to which, he first malicioſe ſilebat; i. e. kept a malicious silence, and had afterwards said, the act about supremacy was a two-edged sword; for, if one answer one way, it will confound his soul, and if the other, his body. Upon which indictment the jury found him guilty (g). The Lord Chancellor, Audley, then pronounced judgment of death upon him. This done, we are told, that Sir Thomas More said, that he had for seven years bent his mind and study upon this cause, but as yet he found it no where writ by any approved Doctor of the Church, that a layman could be head of the Ecclesiastical State. To this Audley returned, 'Sir, will you be reckoned wiser, or of a better conscience, than 'all the Bishops, the Nobility, and the whole kingdom?' Sir Thomas rejoined, 'My 'Lord Chancellor, for one Bishop that you have of your opinion, I have a hundred of 'mine,

[C] As in the note the reader will perceive.] As to the history of the dissolution of this Priory, it remains at present in a sort of chaos, out of which it will be a difficult thing to produce order; yet as our subject leads us to it, we shall do therein what we may. Fuller in his Church History writes, that 'King 'Henry VIII., for reasons best known to himself, 'singled out the Priory of Christ-Church near Aldgate, and dissolved the same. This he bestowed as 'a boon on Thomas Audley, Speaker in the Parliament, and indeed it was an excellent receipt to clear 'his voice, to make him speak shrill and loud for his 'master (11).' Bishop Burnet tells us, that in his opinion this Priory was dissolved, or rather suppressed, in virtue of the Pope's Bull, and censures Fuller for his reflection on the Speaker, 'because, says he, Audley, 'when he received this gift, was not Speaker, but 'Chancellor (12).' But both Fuller and he are mistaken in their dates, and in some measure in the fact. Fuller, who says it was surrendered by the Prior, for whose name he leaves a blank, on a promise of preferment, places it in the month of July, 1531 (13). Bishop Burnet says, it was suppressed in 1533 (14). The truth of the matter is, that the Prior, Nicholas Hancock, with the consent of his chapter, on account of the bad circumstances the convent was in, did surrender under the seal of their house all that they were possessed of into the hands of the King. This Act is subscribed by Nicholas Hancock, the Prior, and eighteen other persons, and is attested by a Notary Public to have been done spontaneously, solemnly, and authentically, on the 24th day of February, 1531, according to the computation of the Church of England: That is, on the 24th of February, 1531-2, and in the 23d of Henry VIII. (15); seven months after the date given us by Fuller, and about two years earlier than the date mentioned by Bishop Burnet. Yet the Bishop is right in censuring Fuller; for though the Priory was surrendered to the King in 1531, yet he did not give it to Audley till after he was Chancellor, and this donation was confirmed by Act of Parliament in 1534 (16). Fuller is also mistaken in asserting, that this was the first religious house surrendered to the King's use, since it is certain that the Monastery at Sheene had been surrendered in the month of November preceding (17). Hall in his Chronicle tells us, that the Priory church and steeple were offered to whosoever would take them down; but no body accepting this offer, Sir Thomas Audley was forced to be at more charges than he could make of the materials; the workmen with great labour beginning at the top, loosed stone from stone, and throwing them down, most part of them were broken in the fall, and remained useless (18). Fuller carries this history farther, 'As for the Lord Audley, 'says he, on whom this Priory was bestowed, Marga'ret, his sole daughter and heir, was married to Tho'mas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, who dwelt therein, 'and from him was called the Duke's-Place (19).'

'mine, and that among thoſe that have been Saints; and for your one Council, which 'what it is God knows, I have on my ſide all the General Councils for a thouſand years 'paſt; and for one kingdom, I have France and all the other kingdoms of the Chriſtian 'world.' He added alſo, that their act was not well made, becauſe they had ſworn profeſſedly to do nothing againſt the Church, which, throughout all Chriſtendom, is one, entire and undivided; wherefore they had not authority, without the conſent of other Chriſtians, of making laws, or ſo much as aſſembling a council againſt the union and concord of the Chriſtian world. 'But I am not ignorant,' added he, 'why you have adjudged 'me to death; namely, becauſe I would never aſſent to the buſineſs of the King's new ma-'trimony (b).' As our Chancellor was very active in the buſineſs of the divorce, he was no leſs ſo in the buſineſs of abbies, and had particularly a large hand in thoſe proceedings, which were previous to the diſſolution of the religious houſes, which had not two hundred pounds by the year (i). This was in the twenty-ſeventh of Henry VIII., and the bill ſticking long in the Houſe of Commons, his Majeſty became impatient, and therefore ſent for the Members of that Houſe to attend him in his gallery, where he paſſed through them with a ſtern countenance, without ſpeaking a word: the members not having received the King's command to depart to their Houſe, durſt not return till they knew the King's pleaſure; ſo they ſtood waiting in the gallery. In the mean time the King went a hunting, and his Miniſters, who ſeem to have had better manners than their maſter, went to confer with the Members: to ſome they ſpoke of the King's ſteadineſs and ſeverity; to others, of his magnificence and generoſity. At laſt the King came back, and paſſing through them again, ſaid, with an air of fierceneſs peculiar to himſelf, That if his bill did not paſs, it ſhould coſt many of them their heads. Between the Miniſters perſuaſions and the King's threats, the matter was brought to an iſſue: the King's Bill, as he called it, paſſed; and by it, he had not only the lands of the ſmall monaſteries given him, but alſo their jewels, plate, and rich moveables (k). This accompliſhed, methods were uſed to prevail with the Abbots of larger foundations to ſurrender. To this end, the Chancellor ſent a ſpecial agent to treat with the Abbot of Athelny, to offer him an hundred merks per annum penſion; which he refuſed, inſiſting on a greater ſum (l). The Chancellor was more ſucceſsful with the Abbot of St. Oſithes in Eſſex, with whom he dealt perſonally; and, as he expreſſes it in a letter to Cromwell, the Viſitor-General, by great ſolicitation prevailed with him; but then he inſinuates, that his place of Lord Chancellor being very chargeable, he deſired the King might be moved for addition of ſome more profitable offices unto him (m). In ſuing for the great abbey of Walden, in the ſame county, which with much ado he obtained; beſides extenuating its worth, he alledged under his hand, that he had in this world ſuſtained great damage and infamy in ſerving the King, which the grant of that ſhould recompence (n). But if the year 1536 was grateful to him in one reſpect, it was far from being ſo in another; ſince, notwithſtanding the obligations he was under to Queen Anne Bullen, he was obliged, by the King's command, to be preſent at her apprehenſion and commitment to the Tower (o). He ſat afterwards with Cranmer Archbiſhop of Canterbury, when he gave ſentence of divorce on the pre-contract between the Queen and the Lord Piercy (p); and on the fifteenth of May, in the ſame year, he ſat in judgment on the ſaid Queen (q), notwithſtanding we are told by Lloyd, that with great addreſs he avoided it (r). The lengths he had gone in ſerving the King, and his known diſlike to Popery, induced the northern rebels in the ſame year, to name him as one of the evil counſellors, whom they deſired to ſee removed from about the King's perſon (s); which charge, however, his Majeſty, as far as in him lay, wiped off, by his well-penned anſwer to the complaints of thoſe rebels, wherein an excellent character is given of the Chancellor (t). When the authors of this rebellion came to be tried, the Chancellor declined ſitting as Lord High-Steward, which high office was executed by the Marquis of Exeter (u), on whom ſhortly after, viz. in 1538, Audley ſat as High-Steward, and condemned him, his brother, and ſeveral other perſons, to ſuffer death as traitors (w). In the latter end of the ſame year, viz. on the twenty ninth of November, 30 Hen. VIII., the Chancellor was created a Baron of this realm, by the ſtile of Lord Audley of Walden in the county of Eſſex, and was likewiſe inſtalled Knight of the Garter (x). In the ſeſſion of Parliament in 1539, there were many ſevere acts made, and the prerogative carried to an exceſſive height. The eſtabliſhing thoſe which were ſtiled the Six bloody Articles, may well ſerve as an inſtance of the former, and the giving the King's proclamation the force of a law, is a pregnant proof of the latter. It does not very clearly appear, who were the King's principal Counſellors in theſe matters; but it is admitted by the beſt hiſtorians, that the rigorous execution of theſe laws, which the King firſt deſigned, was prevented by the interpoſition of the Lord Audley, in conjunction with Cromwell, who was then Prime Miniſter, and the Duke of Suffolk, the King's favourite throughout his whole reign (y). In the beginning of the year 1540, the Court was exceſſively embarraſſed. Cromwell had brought about the marriage between his maſter and Anne of Cleves, and the King, from the beginning, expreſſed a great coldneſs for the Lady: however, he married her, and heaped extraordinary honours upon his Miniſter, created him Earl of Eſſex, made him Lord High-Chamberlain of England, and honoured him with the Garter, which he ſeems to have done only to make his fall the greater, and by ſo much the more acceptable to the people: for ſhortly after he was committed to the Tower, and attainted by bill, which though it ſeems to have been a method made uſe of merely to avoid his trial by his Peers, yet it was paſſed in the Houſe of Lords without oppoſition, or ſo much as one vote againſt it, which ſhews the diſpoſition of the times, and the temper of the Chancellor (z). Immediately after his fall, a new queſtion was ſtirred in Parliament, viz. How far the King's marriage was lawful? This was referred to the judgment of a ſpiritual court; and there are yet extant the depoſitions of Thomas Lord Audley, Lord Chancellor, Thomas, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Thomas, Duke of Norfolk, Charles, Duke of Suffolk, and Cuthbert, Lord Biſhop of Durham, wherein they jointly ſwear, that the papers produced to prove the retraction of the Lady Anne's contract with the Duke of Lorrain, were inconcluſive and unſatisfactory (a). Other Lords and Ladies depoſed to other points, and the iſſue of the buſineſs was, that the marriage was declared void by this court, which ſentence was ſupported by an act of Parliament, affirming the ſame thing, and enacting, That it ſhould be high-treaſon to judge or believe otherwiſe (b). This obſtacle removed, the King married the Lady Catherine Howard, niece to the Duke of Norfolk, and couſin-german to Anne Bullen (c). Nothing is clearer from hiſtory, than that the Chancellor was ſtreightly attached to the Houſe of Norfolk; and yet in the latter end of the year 1541, he was conſtrained to be an inſtrument in the ruin of the unfortunate Queen; information of her bad life before her marriage, being laid firſt before the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and by him communicated to the Chancellor (d). The King being made acquainted with the matter, appointed Lord Audley one of the Commiſſioners to examine her, which they did, and there is yet extant a letter ſubſcribed by him and the other Lords, containing an exact detail of this affair, and of the evidence on which, in the next ſeſſion of Parliament, the Queen and others were attainted (e). The whole of this buſineſs was managed in Parliament by the Chancellor, and there is reaſon to believe, that he had ſome hand in another buſineſs tranſacted in that ſeſſion; which was the opening a door for the diſſolution of hoſpitals, the King having now waſted all that had accrued to him by the ſuppreſſion of abbies (f). Some other things of the like nature were the laſt teſtimonies of the Chancellor's concern for his maſter's intereſt; but the next year he did ſtill more for the Houſe of Commons. The caſe is very remarkable, and therefore we ſhall relate it. In the 34th of Henry VIII., George Ferrers, Eſq; Burgeſs for Plymouth, was arreſted, and carried to the Compter, by virtue of a writ from the Court of King's Bench. The Houſe, on notice thereof, ſent their Serjeant to demand their Member; in doing which, a fray enſued at the Compter, his mace was broke, his ſervant knocked down, and himſelf obliged to make his eſcape as well as he could. The Houſe, upon notice of this, reſolved they would ſit no longer without their Member, and deſired a conference with the Lords; where, after hearing the matter, the Lord Chancellor Audley declared the contempt was moſt flagrant, and referred the puniſhment thereof to the Houſe of Commons; whereupon Thomas Moyle, Eſq; who was then Speaker, iſſued his warrant, whereby the Sheriff of London, and ſeveral other perſons, were brought to the bar of the Houſe, and committed, ſome to the Tower, and ſome to Newgate (g). This precedent was gained by the King's want of an aid, who at that time expected the Commons would offer him a ſubſidy; the Miniſtry, and the Houſe of Lords, knowing the King's will, gave the Commons the compliment of puniſhing thoſe who had impriſoned one of their Members. Dyer, mentioning this caſe, ſays, 'The Sages of the 'Law held the commitment of Ferrers legal, and though the privilege was allowed him, 'yet was it held unjuſt (h).' As the Chancellor had led a very active life, he grew now infirm, though he was not much above fifty years old, and therefore began to think of ſettling his family and affairs. But previous to this, he obtained from the King a licence to change the name of Buckingham College in Cambridge, into that of Magdalen, or Maudlin (i) ſome will have it, becauſe in the latter word his own name is included (k). To this college he was a great benefactor, beſtowed on it his own arms, and is generally reputed its founder (l). His capital ſeat was at Chriſt-Church in town, and at Walden in Eſſex; and to preſerve ſome remembrance of himſelf and fortunes, he cauſed a magnificent tomb to be erected in his new chapel at Walden (m). About the beginning of April, 1544, he was attacked by his laſt illneſs, which induced him to reſign the ſeals: but he was too weak to do it in perſon, and therefore ſent them to the King, who delivered them to Sir Thomas Wriotheſley, with the title of Keeper, during the indiſpoſition of the Chancellor (n); which is a circumſtance not remarked by any of our hiſtorians, and which, notwithſtanding, we ſhall fully juſtify in a note [D]. On the nineteenth of April, Lord Audley made his will, wherein, amongſt other things, he directs, that his executors ſhould

In the firſt of James I., he was created Earl of Suffolk, and being afterwards Lord High-Treaſurer of England, he built on the ruins of the Abbey of Walden, that noble palace, which, in honour of our Chancellor, he called Audley-End (t). EPITAPH of Thomas Lord Audley, in Walden-Church.

The ſtroke of Death's inevitable dart,
Hath now (alas!) of life bereft the heart
Of Sir Thomas Audley, of the Garter Knight, Late Chancellor of England, under our Prince of might;
Henry the Eighth, worthy of high renown,
And made by him, Lord Audley of this town.
Obiit ultimo Aprilis, A. D. 1544. Henrici 36.

To this we will add his character as contained in the following Elegy, the diction of which is far from being deſpicable, as the matter is perfectly conſiſtent with his hiſtory:

Treaſure of arms and arts, in whom were ſet
The mace and books, the court and college met,
Yet both ſo wove, that in that mingled throng
They both comply, and neither, either wrong,
But pois'd and temper'd, each reſerv'd its ſeat,
Nor did the learning quench, but guide the heat;
The Courtier was not of the furious ſtrain,
The hand that acts, doth firſt conſult the brain;
Hence grew commerce betwixt advice and might,
The Scholar did direct the Courtier right,
And as our perfumes mixt, do all conſpire,
And twiſt their curles about the hallow'd fire,
'Till in that harmony of ſweets combin'd
We can nor muſk, nor ſingle amber find,
But gums meet gums, and their delights ſo crowd,
That they create one undiſtinguiſh'd cloud;
So to thy mind theſe rich ingredients preſt,
And were the mould and fabric of thy breaſt,
Learning and courage mixt, and temper'd ſo,
The ſtream could not decay, nor overflow;
And in that equal tide, thou didſt not bear,
From courage, raſhneſs; nor from learning fear (22).

[In the Parliamentary Hiſtory, there are the heads of ſeveral ſpeeches delivered by Sir Thomas Audley on different occaſions, chiefly as Lord Chancellor. But they contain nothing in them peculiarly remarkable; being either mere explanations of the buſineſs for which the two Houſes were aſſembled, or elſe abounding with the praiſes of King Henry the Eighth. In an age of the meaneſt compliances with the will of the Prince, Lord Audley undoubtedly equalled, if he did not exceed, all his contemporaries in ſervility. We do not meet with a ſingle inſtance in which he dared to have an opinion, or will of his own. However contradictory the King's meaſures and commands might be to Lord Audley's private ſentiments, or to reaſon and juſtice, he inſtantly obeyed. He brought in the bill for the Six Articles, which the timid Cranmer had the courage to oppoſe for three days together. And what did Lord Audley gain by the forfeiture of his integrity? He obtained, it may be ſaid, a fortune and a peerage. But his time was ſpent in perpetual drudgery; he muſt have been kept in continual terror by his imperious and tyrannical maſter; and he was worn out when he was not much more than fifty years of age. The whole duration of his public life was not fifteen years (23).

The caſe of George Ferrers is a very remarkable one in the Hiſtory of Parliamentary Privilege, and hath been greatly agitated in the warm debates which have been carried on upon that ſubject, during the preſent reign. An account of it may be ſeen in many writers, and more recently in a publication of Mr. Hatſell's, Chief Clerk of the Houſe of Commons (24). Mr. Hatſell is of opinion, from the many new and extraordinary circumſtances attending the caſe of Ferrers, that the meaſures which were adopted, and the doctrine which was now firſt laid down with reſpect to the extent of the privileges of the Houſe of Commons, was more owing to Ferrers's being a ſervant of the King's, than that he was a Member of the Houſe of Commons.] K.

AVESBURY (ROBERT of), a very ancient Engliſh hiſtorian. We are altogether ignorant at what time he was born, or who were his parents; but as to his condition, he tells us himſelf, in the title of his hiſtory, that he was Regiſter of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's Court (a). His deſign ſeems to have been the compoſing a hiſtory of the reign of that glorious Prince Edward III., from ſuch authentic materials as

came to his hands, but when he had ran through about thirty years, he was very probably ſurprized by death, in the latter end of the year 1356, or in the beginning of the year following (b). As he propoſed to himſelf only a plain narrative of facts, illuſtrated by exact copies of ſuch public papers as came into his power; he did not trouble himſelf much about the elegance of his ſtyle. We may however affirm, that it is far from being harſh, or diſagreeable, allowing for the bad taſte and rudeneſs of thoſe times, and that the apparent candour and impartiality of the hiſtorian, makes us full amends for his want of eloquence. His accuracy in point of dates, is another very great advantage, which our author has, over moſt of the writers of his time, and his care in ſtating all public actions from records, rather than from his own notions, is another incident, which renders his hiſtory truly valuable. One may juſtly wonder how ſo curious a MS. as this came to lie ſo long hid, even from ſome of the moſt induſtrious ſearchers after Engliſh antiquities. The learned and induſtrious Leland moſt certainly never ſaw it; otherwiſe we cannot doubt of his taking notice of it. It was likewiſe unknown to Bale, though he had a great collection in this way, and was particularly curious about MSS. which concerned our hiſtory. Fox, the Martyrologiſt, had ſeen it (c). Archbiſhop Parker had it in his cuſtody, and peruſed it (d). So had John Stowe, who mentions Aveſbury in his Chronicle (e), and, from him, Pits ventures to tell us, that he flouriſhed about 1340, though he is ſo modeſt as not to pretend to any acquaintance with his works (f). A foreign writer, following this authority, fixes him to the ſame year (g). What is not a little extraordinary, the famous Mr. Jocelyn, chaplain to Archbiſhop Parker, never ſaw this MS. though in his patron's poſſeſſion (h): neither in later times did it come to the hands of the induſtrious Anthony Wood (i), otherwiſe he would certainly have cited it in his hiſtory and antiquities of the univerſity of Oxford, there being in this hiſtory, a large account of a ſquabble between the ſcholars and townſmen of Oxford, in 1354 (k), of which Wood ſpeaks copiouſly from other writers (l). At laſt, after being ſo long buried in obſcurity, the indefatigable Thomas Hearne printed it at Oxford, from a MS. belonging to Sir Thomas Seabright (m). This MS. was the ſame that had formerly been in the hands of Archbiſhop Parker, from whom it paſſed to William Lambard, the famous Antiquary, from him to Thomas Lambard, and at length it came to Sir Roger Twyſden, a remarkable lover of Engliſh hiſtory, and with the reſt of his valuable library, was purchaſed by Sir Thomas Seabright (n). Beſides theſe, there are two other MSS. in being, one in the Harleian Library, and the other, in the Univerſity Library at Cambridge, with both which, the accurate printed edition was compared. All theſe MSS. are thought to be as old, as the time in which our author flouriſhed. There is joined to this hiſtory, and in the ſame hand-writing, a French chronicle, from the firſt planting of Britain, to the reign of King Edward III.; but this, Mr. Hearne, with good reaſon, conceives to have been the work of ſome other author, and therefore did not print it with Aveſbury's hiſtory (o). In all probability, the reaſon they were thus joined together was this, that the French chronicle ends exactly where our author begins. That Aveſbury himſelf could not ſo eaſily write in French, appears plainly from this, that he choſe to inſert long papers in that language, in his Latin hiſtory; whereas he would ſurely have tranſlated them, if he had been ſo well ſkilled in French, or elſe have written the whole in that language, which would have made it more uniform. In the Harleian MS. this chronicle hath the following title, Cronica Gallice, cujuſdam Anonimi, à primis incolis Britanniæ uſque ad initium Regni Regis E. III., vulgo nuncupat, fructus temporum (p). This title was placed there by Sir Symonds d'Ewes, Knight and Baronet, a celebrated Antiquary, and once the poſſeſſor of that MS. There were likewiſe added to the MS. copies, certain notes of a miſcellaneous nature, under the title of, Minutiæ; i. e. Trifles. Theſe too are denied by Mr. Hearne, to have been written by Aveſbury: however, he has preſerved them, as well as a genealogical table, which ſhows the right Edward III. had to the crown of France (q). As this ancient hiſtorian is ſo little known to the generality of readers, and as the printed copy of his works is now become as ſcarce as many MSS., it cannot be improper to give a conciſe account of his work, and the character it bears in the judgment of ſome of the ableſt critics in this kind of learning, in the notes [A]. In the ſame place, the reader will alſo find a farther account of

He opens his hiſtory with the marriage of Edward the Second with Iſabella the daughter of Philip the French King, ſirnamed the Fair, which was ſolemnized the 25th of January 1307. By which lady he had his ſon Edward, afterwards King Edward the Third, in the year 1313. He then proceeds to ſhew, that King Edward the Second reigned with

of Mr. Hearne's edition of this author, which is the more neceſſary, becauſe, in his appendix, there are ſeveral curious pieces, which the inquiſitive reader will be glad to hear of, and know where to find. This method we ſhall make uſe of, whenever we mention any of the old hiſtorians publiſhed by him, becauſe as theſe books grow every day more ſcarce, their contents ought to be publiſhed elſewhere, and eſpecially in a work like this [B]. A few of the Minutiæ alſo are added as curioſities worthy particularly the Engliſh reader's notice, who cannot ſo much as have a chance of meeting with them any where elſe. Beſides, they ſerve to ſhow, what odd fragments are ſometimes met with in ancient MSS. and the care that was taken before printing was invented, to preſerve whatever might be of uſe, either to the learned, or to the common ſort of people [C].

with a continued ſeries of ill fortune for nineteen years, till Queen Iſabella and her ſon Edward landing with ſome foreign troops at Harwich, and joining with the Barons, dethroned him. Edward the Third then entered upon the government, being but fourteen years old, and was ſolemnly crowned at Weſtminſter on the feaſt of the converſion of St. Paul, in the year 1326 (2). After this, we have the hiſtory of the famous Roger Mortimer, to the time of his fall and death. The pretenſions of Edward the Third to the kingdom of Scotland come next under the author's care, and are very largely treated, and then in its order, the hiſtory of the war carried on in that country, the victory of Huntinemore, and the peace with the Scots (3). After this we have an account of King Edward's pretenſions to the French crown, with the war that followed in ſupport of them: a particular account of the great atchievements of King Edward, and of his ſon Edward the Black Prince, with ſeveral original letters of the Prince and Sir John Wyngfield (4). Another Scots war employs afterwards his pen, in which King David Bruce was taken priſoner. He alſo relates very minutely, all the tranſactions between King Edward and the Baliol family, the taking and retaking the town of Berwick, and concludes his work with an account of a bad ſeaſon in the year 1356 (5). Then follows a liſt of the perſons killed and taken priſoners in the famous battle of Poictiers, which was fought by Edward the Black Prince, on the 19th of September in the ſame year (6). Dr. Robert Brady made great uſe of our hiſtorian, and mentions him with much reſpect in theſe words. Robert of Aveſbury wrote the life of Edward the Third, and as he reports of himſelf, was Keeper of the Regiſtry of the Court of Canterbury; he lived in the time of Edward the Third. A MS. in Sir Symonds D'Ewes' library in Stow Lanthorn in Suffolk (7). Mr. Tyrrell cites him alſo, and ſays he was a conſiderable writer of that age, and very exact in his account of King Edward's actions beyond the ſea, as having taken them from ſeveral original letters of perſons of note (8). It ſeems the MS. this gentleman had, went no lower than the year 1355; but that publiſhed by Mr. Hearne, contains the occurrences of the next year to the end of ſummer, or rather to the beginning of autumn (9).

[B] Eſpecially in a work like this.] Before this edition of Aveſbury by Hearne, there is a Preface of forty pages, dated from Edmund Hall in Oxford, the 21ſt of November 1720. It contains a very large account of the MSS. made uſe of in this edition, together with abundance of literary anecdotes which one would hardly expect there. He is particularly hard upon Anthony Wood, whom he charges with making uſe of the MS. collections of Twyne and Langbain, without quoting them, and this he tells us of his own knowledge (10). There are alſo ſome curious remarks on the ſtory of Roſamond, and explanatory notes on the fray between the townſmen and ſcholars of Oxford mentioned in the text (11). Then follow teſtimonies relating to the author, and a liſt of the ſubſcribers to this edition. The book itſelf comes next, and contains 255 pages. It is very carefully printed from the MS. with various readings, and all the marginal remarks of the ſeveral poſſeſſors of the MS. he had conſulted, together with ſuch emendations as could be collected from Walſingham and other ancient Engliſh hiſtorians. The Minutiæ take up eleven pages excluſive of a ſcheme, ſhewing the genealogy of Edward the Third, and his claim in conſequence thereof to the crown of France.

(10) Præfat. ad R. de Aveſbury, p. xxviii.

(11) Ibid. p. xxxiii.

Thus far the MS. We have then in one leaf, a liſt of the Saxon authors, which had come to the hands of Mr. John Jocelyn mentioned in the text (12). To this is added another liſt of the MS. writers of Engliſh hiſtory, and the places where their works were to be found (13). It contains 28 pages. Both theſe were printed from MSS. in the Cotton library. We come now to Mr. Hearne's Appendix. The firſt piece we meet with there is a tranſcript of an old Beadle's book at Oxford: it belonged formerly to Anthony Wood, and contains a great many curious things: it conſiſts of 14 pages, and is illuſtrated with notes and references (14). The ſecond paper is a collection of MS. notes, relating to the ancient orders of the Univerſity of Oxford (15). Then we have a letter written by Dr. Chriſtopher Potter, relating to the privileges of the Univerſity of Oxford, with the form of degrading Mr. William Prynne. This was ſent to the editor by the reverend and learned Mr. Baker of St. John's (16). The fourth piece is a tranſcript of a very ancient roll relating to the manor of Woodſtock, made in the reign of Edward the Firſt, and of which the editor had this copy, through the kindneſs of John Brydges, Eſq; of Lincoln's-Inn, a great collector of ſuch curioſities (17). The laſt piece, and indeed the moſt curious of them all, is a tranſcript of the love-letters, between Henry the Eighth, and Anne Bullen, taken from the originals kept in the Vatican at Rome, A. D. 1682 (18). After the Index there follows in this, as in moſt of Mr. Hearne's books, a liſt of the pieces publiſhed by him at that time, and which is a full proof of the uſefulneſs of ſuch notes as this. There is inſerted in this catalogue a very curious piece printed from an authentic MS., the title of which follows: Injunctions given in the viſitation of the moſt Reverend Father in God, the Lord C. Pole's Grace, Legate de Latere, by his Subdelegate, James, by the permiſſion of God, Biſhop of Glouceſter throughout his Dioceſe of Glouceſter 1556 (19).

AUGUS-

AUGUSTIN, or, by contraction, AUSTIN (St.) uſually ſtyled the Apoſtle of the Engliſh, and the firſt Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was originally a Monk in the convent of St. Andrew at Rome, and had his education under St. Gregory, afterwards Pope Gregory I. [A]; by whom he was diſpatched into Britain, together with forty other Monks of the ſame order, for the converſion of the Engliſh Saxons to the Chriſtian religion (a). This miſſion was undertaken about the year of Chriſt 596 [B]. Auguſtin and his companions having proceeded a little way on their journey, began to diſreliſh their employment, and concluded it was more adviſeable to return, than to take ſo long a journey to a ſavage and infidel nation, to whoſe language they were utter ſtrangers. This reſolution being taken, they diſpatched Auguſtin to Rome, to obtain the Pope's leave for their return: but that Monk ſoon came back with a letter of exhortation to the Miſſionaries [C], by which they were encouraged to proſecute their undertaking (b). At the ſame time the Pope wrote to Etherius, Archbiſhop of Arles (c) [D], and to the King and Queen of the Franks, to aſſiſt them with neceſſaries in their

[A] St. Gregory, afterwards Pope Gregory I.] This pious and good Pope had himſelf projected, and undertaken, the converſion of the Engliſh Saxons, before his advancement to the See of Rome. For, walking one day through the market, and obſerving certain beautiful youths expoſed to ſale, he aſked of what country they were; and being informed they were Britons, he fetched a deep ſigh, and ſaid, it was a lamentable conſideration, that the prince of darkneſs ſhould be maſter of ſo much beauty, and that ſo fine an outſide ſhould have nothing of God's grace within. The ſight of theſe youths made ſo great an impreſſion on Gregory's piety, that he applied himſelf to Pope Benedict, earneſtly requeſting that ſome perſons might be ſent to preach Chriſtianity in Britain. But perceiving nobody willing to undertake the miſſion, he offered himſelf for the ſervice, and, with the Pope's leave, ſet forward on his journey, to the great regret of the Clergy and people of Rome. He had not been gone above two or three days, before the Pope had a remonſtrance delivered to him in the ſtreets for ſending away Gregory, and was therefore obliged to recall him. Johannes Diaconus, in his Life of St. Gregory, tells this ſtory ſo well, that the learned reader ſhall have the pleaſure of ſeeing here the original. Quadam die, cum advenientibus nuper negotiatoribus, multa venalia in foro Romanæ urbis fuiſſent propoſita, multique ad emendum undique confluxiſſent; contigit et Gregorium virum Deo digniſſimum præterire. Qui cernens inter alia pueros corpore candidos, forma pulcherrimos, vultu venuſtos, capillorum quoque nitore perſpicuos, eſſe venales, interrogavit mercatorem de qua patria illos attuliſſet. Ille reſpondit, de Britannia inſula, cujus incolarum omnium facies ſimili candore fulgeſcit. Gregorius dixit: Chriſtiani ſunt iidem inſulani, an adhuc Paganis erroribus implicantur? Mercator reſpondit, Non ſunt Chriſtiani, ſed Paganis tenentur laqueis irretiti. Tum Gregorius graviter ingemiſcens, heu, proh dolor, inquit, quam ſplendidas facies princeps tenebrarum nunc poſſidet, tantaque frontis ſpecies vacuam ab interna Dei gratia mentem geſtat! Rurſum interrogavit quod eſſet vocabulum gentis illius? Mercator reſpondit, Angli vocantur. Bene, inquit, Angli, quaſi Angeli, quia Angelicos vultus habent, et tales in cœlis Angelorum decet eſſe concives. Iterum ergo interrogat, quod nomen haberet ipſa Provincia? Mercator reſpondit, Provinciales illi Deiri vocantur. Et Gregorius, Bene, inquit, Deiri, quia De Ira ſunt eruendi, et ad Chriſti gratiam convocandi. Rex, ait, illius provinciæ quomodo nuncupatur? Mercator reſpondit; Aelle. Et Gregorius alludens ad nomen, dixit, Bene rex dicitur Aelle, Alleluia etenim in laudem creatoris in partibus illis oportet decantari. Mox itaque accedens ad Benedictum Apoſtolicæ ſedis Pontificem, cœpit vehementer expetere, ut in Britanniam aliquos verbi miniſtros mitteret. Quo cum neminem velle ire cognoſceret, ſemet ipſum quoque non dubitavit ingerere, dummodo ſibi pontifex licentiam commodaret. Qui licet cum magna cunctatione totius cleri ac populi, Gregorium ſponte proficiſci cupientem, abire permiſit, imprecatus ei divinitus proſpera miniſtrari. De cujus abſentia Romani plurimum perturbati, deliberato conſilio, trifario per loca viæ contigua unde Pontifex ad B. Petri Baſilicam profecturus erat, partiuntur, eumque turmatim taliter alloquuntur: Petrum offendiſti, Romam deſtruxiſti, quia Gregorium dimiſiſti. Quibus ſententiis omnino Papa perterritus, miſit continuo nuntios qui virum domini revocarent. A quibus, trium dierum itinere jam emenſo, compulſus eſt (licet magnopere triſtaretur) ad proprii monaſterii curam redire (1). I hope Punning is no offence to Religion; if it is, I know not how we ſhall excuſe St. Gregory, who, upon ſo very ſerious an occaſion as the converſion of poor ignorant Pagans to Chriſtianity, could not forbear quibbling three times in a very ſhort converſation with a merchant upon that ſubject.

[B] This miſſion was undertaken in the year of Chriſt 596.] Bede, and the whole ſtream of authors after him, aſſign this date; ſo that the year, in which Auguſtin was ſent into Britain, is paſt diſpute. How long he continued in this iſland, till death took him away, is not ſo generally agreed. Moſt of the writers in Wharton (2), who have given us the ſucceſſion of the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, tell us, that Auguſtin ſat ſixteen years, and place his death in the year 616, about twenty years after his arrival in Britain. But Wharton (3) and the editor of Bede (4), have ſhewn, with great probability, that he died in 604 or 605, and conſequently the interval from his miſſion to his death comprehends no more than eight or nine years.

[C] Pope Gregory's Letter of exhortation to the Miſſionaries.] In this letter he tells them, 'it is 'better not to enter upon a worthy deſign, than to 'break off what is commendably begun.' For this reaſon he earneſtly beſeeches them 'to exert themſelves to the utmoſt in carrying on the great work 'they were engaged in, and not to be diſcouraged at 'the fatigues of the journey, or cenſures of bad men; 'but to preſs forward with the greateſt zeal and application, being well aſſured they ſhould be rewarded with eternal glory in heaven.' By the ſame letter he enjoined them to pay obedience to Auguſtin as their Abbot, and concludes with his benediction, wiſhing them ſucceſs in their labours. But let us produce the letter itſelf. It is extant in the ſixth Book of St. Gregory's Letters (5).

[D] —— Etherius, Archbiſhop of Arles.] It is generally taken for granted, that here is a miſtake in the printed copies of Bede, and that Etherius is put inſtead of Virgilius, ſince Etherius was at that time Biſhop of Lyons. But whether the miſtake conſiſts in that, is a matter of doubt. For, in the firſt place, the their journey: by means of which recommendations they were every where entertained with great kindneſs and reſpect, and furniſhed with interpreters [E]. And now Auguſtin and his companions, having taken their journey through France, embarked for Britain, and, landing in the Iſle of Thanet, ſent ſome of the French interpreters to King Ethelbert [F], acquainting him that they were come from Rome with the moſt joyful tidings, and offering him an everlaſting kingdom in Heaven. The King, having for the preſent ordered them to continue in the iſle of Thanet, ſome time after ſent for them, and gave them audience, ſitting in the open air [G]. Auguſtin having opened his commiſſion, the King told them, their doctrine was new to him, and that he could not ſuddenly recede from the religion of his country: however, as their coming was with a kind intention, he gave them leave to convert as many of his ſubjects as they could, and aſſigned their place of reſidence at Dorovernum, ſince called Canterbury [H]; which they

the letter, which is in Bede inſcribed to Etherius Archbiſhop of Arles, is not to be found under that title in the collection of Gregory's Letters. In the next place, there is in that collection another Letter to Virgilius, Archbiſhop of Arles, of the ſame tenor, but a different form. From whence we may collect, that the miſtake is rather in the letter itſelf, than in the inſcription. Auguſtin being ready to ſet out on his journey, Pope Gregory wrote ſeveral letters in the ſame day; the originals of which lying together in his Holineſs's ſcrutore were tranſcribed by Nothelmus: and why might he not take one for another, and, by miſtake, tranſpoſing the names and titles, carry the letter which was written to Etherius, Biſhop of Lyons, in the room of that which was written to Virgilius, Archbiſhop of Arles?

[E] They were —— furniſhed with French interpreters.] Biſhop Godwin obſerves from hence, that the language of the Anglo-Saxons and Franks was at that time much the ſame: which is not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, ſince thoſe two nations were both of German original, and were tranſplanted into Britain and Gaul much about the ſame time, it being not above an hundred and fifty years ſince the arrival of the Saxons in this iſland. Nam præterquam quod humaniſſime ubique accepti ſunt, comitatui illorum non paucos adinvenerunt qui interpretum vice fungerentur; ut eadem quodammodo lingua Angli Francique tunc uſi videantur; quod à ratione quidem non abhorret, cum uterque et Franci et Angli (ſive Anglo-Saxones malueris appellare) Germaniæ fuerint populi, unde iſti in Britanniam ante annos 150, illi in Galliam 130 vix dum elapſis migraverint (6).

(6) Godwin, de Præſul. Angl. edit. 1616, p. 43.

[F] —— Ethelbert, King of Kent.] This Prince's dominions, as Bede obſerves (7), extended as far as the Humber. It is true, the kingdoms of the Eaſt-Saxons and the Eaſt-Angles were now in being: but Ethelbert being a more potent Prince than the reſt, ſeveral of thoſe petty kings were tributaries to him. He was at that time married to Bertha, daughter of Clotaire I., King of the Franks. That Lady was a Chriſtian, and, by the articles of her marriage, had the free exerciſe of her religion allowed her, and a church in the ſuburbs of Canterbury, called St. Martin's. One Luidhard a French Biſhop (8), who came over with her, officiated as her Chaplain and Confeſſor (9). Chriſtianity having this countenance at Ethelbert's court, we may reaſonably imagine that ſeveral of the Saxons were either brought over, or at leaſt diſpoſed for converſion, before the arrival of Auguſtin. And thus, by theſe preparatory ſteps, the way was paved for the Miſſionaries, and King Ethelbert diſpoſed to give them a more favourable reception. For this reaſon Capgrave (10) calls Luidhard Auguſtin's Harbinger, and affirms, that he prepared the way for his coming, and made his enterprize more practicable. Which remark will appear very reaſonable to any one, who conſiders with what unexpected kindneſs Auguſtin was received at his firſt arrival in Britain.

[G] The King —— gave them audience, ſitting in the open air.] The reaſon why Ethelbert received them in this manner proceeded forom a ſuperſtitious fancy, which made him decline truſting himſelf in a houſe with theſe ſtrangers; for fear, if they had dealt in the black art, they might have ſurprized his underſtanding, and proved too hard for him. Caverat enim ne in aliquam domum ad ſe introirent, vetere uſus augurio, ne ſuperventu ſuo, ſi quid maleficæ artis habuiſſent, eum ſuperando deciperent (11). 'But theſe good men,' continues Bede, 'held no 'correſpondence with the Devil, but had their authority and credentials from Heaven. When they 'were introduced to the King, they carried a ſilver 'croſs for their banner, together with the picture 'of our bleſſed Saviour, and, ſinging divine ſervice, 'they put up their prayers to God Almighty for 'his bleſſing on themſelves and thoſe they came to 'convert.' At ille non dæmoniaca, ſed divina virtute præditi veniebant, crucem pro vexillo ferentes argenteam, et imaginem Domini ſalvatoris in tabula depictum, lætaniaſque canentes, pro ſua ſimul, et eorum propter quos et ad quos venerant, ſalute æterna Domino ſupplicabant (12). Baronius (13), in tranſcribing this paſſage of Bede, falls into ſome tragical reflections on the condition of the modern Church of England. He repreſents the caſe, as if the Engliſh, in his time, had, in a manner, apoſtatized from Chriſtianity. He tells us, that Auguſtin the Apoſtle of the Engliſh was a Monk, and that the reſt of the Miſſionaries were of the ſame order; that they appeared at their audience, and made their entrance into Canterbury, with the croſs and the picture of our Saviour carried before them: and then he complains, that theſe things were all forgotten and laid aſide by the modern Engliſh. Let us hear how Mr. Collier replies to this charge. That author obſerves, that the terms of communion ſtand by no means upon the ſame foot they did in Gregory the Great's time (14). Then he proceeds to a particular refutation of the Cardinal's charge. 'It may be replied, in the firſt place, '(ſays he) as to the monaſtic life, that the Church 'of England has not declared againſt it in any of her 'articles. Beſides, the Cardinal may remember, that 'the diſſolution of Abbies here, was an act of the 'State, and not of the Church; that it was prior 'to the Reformation, and carried on by a prince 'and parliament of the Roman Communion in all 'points, excepting the Supremacy. Secondly, As to 'the croſs and our Saviour's picture, the Church 'of England has a great regard for both of them, 'and makes uſe of the firſt in the ſolemn admi-'niſtration of Baptiſm. 'Tis true, we dare not carry 'our reſpects to the lengths of the Church of Rome. 'And if we examine the paſſage in Bede, though 'we find St. Auguſtin, and his companions, carried 'the croſs, and our Saviour's picture, in their 'proceſſion, yet there is not the leaſt intimation that 'they worſhipped them. Nay, 'tis plain that image-'worſhip was none of the doctrine of Rome in that 'age: for Pope Gregory the Great determines flatly 'againſt it.' Here Mr. Collier produces part of two letters, written by St. Gregory to Serenus Biſhop of Marſeilles (15), in proof of his aſſertion; and then goes on to ſhew, that this Pope did not carry the ſupremacy up to the pretenſions ſince inſiſted on by the court of Rome, as appears from his complaint againſt John Biſhop of Conſtantinople, for taking the title of Univerſal Biſhop upon him (16), and from three other letters, one to the Emperor Mauritius (17), the ſecond to Anaſtatius Biſhop of Antioch (18), and the laſt to Eulogius Biſhop of Alexandria (19).

Auguſtin was ſo ſucceſsful in his labours for the propagation of Chriſtianity, that it is ſaid he baptized ten thouſand perſons of both ſexes, in one day, in the river Swale [L]. And now, by direction of the Pope, he went over to Arles in France, where he was conſecrated Archbiſhop and Metropolitan of the Engliſh nation [M] by the Archbiſhop of that place; after which, returning into Britain, he diſpatched away Lawrence, a Prieſt, and Peter, a Monk, to Rome, to acquaint the Pope

[K] — Till the converſion of the King himſelf.] This Prince could not long hold out againſt the exemplary life of the Miſſionaries, the reaſonableneſs of their doctrine, and the miracles wrought by Auguſtin, in confirmation of it. In ſhort, King Ethelbert was baptized, and his example had a wonderfull effect in promoting the converſion of his ſubjects. One part of his conduct on this occaſion deſerves the higheſt commendation. Though he was extremely pleaſed at his ſubjects becoming Chriſtians, yet he compelled no body to his own belief, only beſtowing more countenance and affection upon thoſe that were proſelyted to Chriſtianity. For he had learned (ſays venerable Bede) from his inſtructors in the way of ſalvation, that force and dragooning was not the method of the Goſpel; that the religion of Jeſus Chriſt was to make its way by argument and perſuaſion; to be matter of choice, and not of compulſion. Didicerat enim a Doctoribus auctoribuſque ſuæ ſalutis, ſervitium Chriſti voluntarium non coactitium eſſe debere (23). I ſhall leave the reader to make his own reflexions on this matter, and to compare the ſpirit of moderation and Chriſtian charity, which actuated St. Auguſtin and King Ethelbert, with that perſecuting inquiſitorial, ſpirit, which has ſince prevailed in the Church of Rome.

(23) Bede, ubi ſupra, c. 26.

[L] Auguſtin baptized ten thouſand perſons in one day in the river Swale.] This we are told by Gervaſe: 'Beatus autem Auguſtinus verbum Dei 'prædicans, et ubique pedibus non in equis faleratis 'incedens, concurrentibus populis baptizavit una die 'promiſcui ſexus decem millia in flumine quod ab 'incolis Sualewe vocatur, prope Eboracum (24) — 'But St. Auguſtin, preaching the word of God, and 'going about every where on foot, not on a horſe 'with rich trappings, baptized in one day a mixed 'multitude of both ſexes, in number ten thouſand, in 'a river near York, called by the inhabitants Sua-'lewe.' Camden (25) gives us the following extract from an ancient fragment of that age, in which the ſtory is thus related. Upon one ſingle Chriſtmas-day (to the eternal honour of the Engliſh nation) Auſtin baptized above ten thouſand men, beſides an infinite number of women and children. But, pray, how ſhould Prieſts, or others in holy orders, be got, to baptize ſuch a prodigious number? The Archbiſhop, after he had conſecrated the river Swale, commanded by the criers and principal men, that they ſhould with faith go in two by two, and in the name of the holy Trinity baptize each other. Thus were they all regenerate, by as great a miracle, as once the people of Iſrael paſſed through the divided ſea, and through Jordan, when it was turned back. For in the ſame manner here, ſo great a variety of ſex and age paſſed ſuch a deep channel, and yet (which in human account is incredible) not one received harm. A ſtrange miracle this was! but what is yet a greater, the river cures all diſeaſes and infirmities. Whoever ſteps in faint and diſordered. comes out ſound and whole. What a joyful ſight was this for angels and men! ſo many thouſands of a proſelyte nation coming out of the channel of the ſame river, as out of the womb of one mother! one ſingle pool preparing ſo many inhabitants for the heavenly manſions. Hereupon Pope Gregory (with all the companies of the Saints above) broke forth into joy, and could not reſt till he had written to Eulogius, the holy Patriarch of Alexandria, moſt joyfully to congratulate him upon ſo vaſt a number being baptized on one Chriſtmas-day. But this ſtory is not without its difficulties. For in the firſt place, the river Swale, in which this wonderful Baptiſm was performed, is ſaid to be near York. But it does not appear from Bede, that Auguſtin ever travelled ſo far northward. In the next place, what theſe authors aſcribe to Auguſtin, is by Bede related of Paulinus Archbiſhop of York; who, according to that hiſtorian, baptized in the river Suale, which runs by Catterick. Baptizabat in fluvio Sualua, qui vicum Cataractam præterfluit (26). Nevertheleſs, we have the teſtimony of Pope Gregory, in the above-mentioned letter to Eulogius Patriarch of Alexandria, that Auguſtin baptized no fewer than ten thouſand converts. The truth of the caſe ſeems to be, that our Miſſionary baptized his converts, not in the Suale near York, but in another river of the ſame name at the mouth of the Medway. The miſtake of Gervaſe and others aroſe from confounding Auguſtin with Paulinus. I ſhall only obſerve farther, that the view of theſe writers, in ſending him ſo far northward, ſeems to have been, partly to give the higher idea of his labours and his authority, and partly to make it the more probable that he was the occaſion of the ſlaughter of the Monks of Bangor (27).

[M] He was conſecrated Archbiſhop and Metropolitan of the Engliſh nation.] Baronius pretends, that Auguſtin was conſecrated a Biſhop in France, before his arrival in Britain (28). This he infers from St. Gregory's letter to Eulogius Patriarch of Alexandria, in which he acquaints him that the new Engliſh converts were baptized the Chriſtmas after Auguſtin's arrival (29). If this be true, Bede muſt be miſtaken in reporting that he travelled from Britain to Arles for the Epiſcopal character. But, in the beginning of the next century (30), the Cardinal ſeems to quit the authority of Pope Gregory's epiſtle, to rely upon Bede; for he tells us, that Auguſtin, purſuant to the Pope's inſtructions, went from Britain to Arles for his conſecration. M. Rapin cenſures Auguſtin for being in too much haſte to take upon himſelf the dignity of an Archbiſhop. 'Had he been content (ſays that author) with the 'ſimple title of Biſhop, there would have been no-'thing extraordinary in it. But one cannot help 'being ſurprized to ſee him aſpire to the dignity 'of an Archbiſhop, at a time when there was as 'yet no Biſhop under his juriſdiction. It is true, 'the Pope had given him leave to aſſume that title, 'in caſe his miſſion was followed with ſucceſs. But, 'by ſucceſs, it is moſt probable Gregory meant the 'general converſion of the Engliſh, and not that of 'a part only of the kingdom of Kent, one of the 'ſmalleſt of the Heptarchy. How great a progreſs ſoever Auguſtin had made in reſpect to the ſhort 'time of his abode in Britain, it was however but 'ſmall in compariſon of what remained to be con-'verted. So that his precipitation in aſſuming 'the dignity of Archbiſhop and Primate of Eng-'land, at a time when there was but one ſingle 'church there, namely that of Canterbury, is doubtleſs not very much to his honour. All that can 'be ſaid in his juſtification is, that the progreſs, 'which Chriſtianity made at its firſt ſetting out at 'Canterbury, gave him reaſon to think that the 'converſion of the reſt of England would ſoon fol-'low (31).'

I. Queſtion, 'How 'ought the Biſhops to behave towards their Clergy? 'Into how many portions ought the offerings at the 'altar to be diſtributed? And how is a Biſhop to act 'in the church?' With reſpect to the firſt point, the Pope refers Auguſtin to St. Paul's Epiſtles to Timothy. With regard to the ſecond, he tells him, that the Roman Church requires the Biſhops to divide the revenues of the church into four portions; the firſt for the Biſhop, the ſecond for the Clergy, the third for the Poor, and the fourth for the repairs of the churches. As to the third point, which would have been very obſcure, if the Pope had not cleared it up in his anſwer, he ſays, that Auguſtin being a Monk, ought not to live ſeparated from his brethren, but after the cuſtom of the firſt Chriſtians, who had all their goods and poſſeſſions in common. He adds, that if there were any of the brethren, who had not received holy orders, and who could not contain, they were at liberty to marry, and might receive their portions in their own houſes; becauſe it is ſaid in Scripture, that, in the beginning of Chriſtianity, diſtribution was made to each according to their neceſſities. As to other Chriſtians, the Pope tells him, it was not neceſſary to preſcribe any rule concerning the giving alms to them, ſince Jeſus Chriſt himſelf has ſaid, Give alms of ſuch things as you have, and behold all things are clean unto you. II. Queſtion. 'Since there is but one Faith, how 'comes it to paſs, that the cuſtoms of Churches are 'different in relation to public worſhip, and that 'the Gallican and Roman Churches are not uniform 'in this matter?' The Pope adviſes him, upon this head, to take from each Church, what he ſhould judge to be moſt ſuitable and convenient for the Church of England. III. Queſtion. 'What puniſh-'ment ought to be inflicted on thoſe, who rob or 'plunder the church of its goods?' Gregory anſwers, that we ought to diſtinguiſh the motives of the theft, whether it was through neceſſity or covetouſneſs; and that, in puniſhing the robber, we ſhould proceed with gentleneſs and charity. As to the meaſure of the reſtitution to be made to the church, he decides, that ſhe ought by no means to receive more than ſhe loſt. IV. Queſtion. 'May two bro-'thers marry two ſiſters, who are not related to 'them by blood?' Gregory anſwers, that ſuch marriages are lawful. V. Queſtion. 'Within what de-'gree of conſanguinity are marriages lawful?' Pope Gregory bars this relation no farther than couſin-germans; ſo that one remove from this nearneſs of blood, leaves the parties at liberty to inter-marry; which is more than the preſent Church of Rome allows. VI. Queſtion. 'May a Biſhop be conſecrated 'by one Biſhop alone, when the diſtance of place 'makes it inconvenient for the Biſhops of other 'dioceſes to aſſemble for that purpoſe?' Gregory replies, that, for the preſent, Auguſtin being the only Biſhop in England, there was a neceſſity he ſhould ordain Biſhops without aſſiſtants: but, to avoid the like inconvenience for the future, he orders him to eſtabliſh Biſhops in places not too far diſtant from each other. VII. Queſtion. 'How am I to behave 'with reſpect to the French, and Britiſh Biſhops?" The Pope anſwers peremptorily, that he gives him no juriſdiction over the French Biſhops, becauſe the Archbiſhops of Arles had for a long time received the Pall from his predeceſſors, and he did not think it lawful to deprive them of the authority they were in poſſeſſion of; but as to the Britiſh Biſhops, he puts them all under Auguſtin's juriſdiction. VIII. Queſtion. 'Is it lawful to baptize a woman, who is with child?' The Pope anſwers in the affirmative, not apprehending any inconvenience that might ariſe from ſuch practice. IX. Queſtion. 'How long ought a woman 'to ſtay, after her lying-in, before ſhe is re-admit-'ted into the Church?' Gregory limits no time, but allows women to enter into the Church as ſoon after their delivery, as they can with ſafety. X. Queſtion. 'How long after the birth of a child, ought the 'ceremony of baptiſm to be deferred?' The Pope allows baptiſm to be adminiſtered, the very moment after the birth. XI. Queſtion. 'How long ought 'the huſband to ſtay, after the wife's lying-in, be-'fore he returns to her embraces?' Gregory gives a very long anſwer to this queſtion, and takes occaſion to blame thoſe mothers, who ſuffer their children to be ſuckled by ſtrange nurſes, aſcribing ſo blameable a practice to their incontinence; for which reaſon he decides, that the huſband ought not to return to his wife, till after the child is weaned. Nevertheleſs he permits thoſe women, who do not ſuckle their children, to lie with their huſbands after the uſual time of purgation. XII. Queſtion. 'Is it law-'ful for a woman to enter into the Church at all 'times?' The Pope has a great deal of reaſoning upon this head, and concludes, that the infirmities of women ought not to hinder them from aſſiſting at the public devotions of the Church. XIII. Queſtion. 'May a man, who has lain with a woman, come 'into the Church, or receive the Communion, be-'fore he has waſhed himſelf?' Here, Gregory, as uſual, makes a good number of diſtinctions, and concludes, that ſuch men would do better to refrain ſome ſhort time from going into the church, or receiving the Communion. XIV. Queſtion. 'Is it 'lawful for a man, after impure dreams, to receive 'the Communion; and, if he be a Prieſt, may he 'adminiſter it?' The Pope's anſwer to this queſtion is exceedingly full of diſtinctions, between what is, and what is not, a ſin. At laſt he concludes, that a man, under ſuch circumſtances, ought to abſtain from the Communion. Nevertheleſs, he allows a Prieſt in this caſe to adminiſter the Sacrament, provided no other can be found to officiate in his room. Theſe are the difficulties, of which Auguſtin deſired a ſolution from his Holineſs. It is true, they do not ſerve to give us the higheſt idea imaginable of this Miſſionary's judgment. However, Gregory thought it proper to reply to them in the fulleſt manner, as if they had been of the laſt importance. He had the converſion of the Engliſh very much at heart; and for this reaſon, he is ſo far from diſcouraging Auguſtin, that he beſtows the higheſt commendations on him.

[O] He received from Pope Gregory the Pall.] This being the firſt example in our hiſtory of the Pall being ſent into England, I ſhall here entertain the reader a little with the form, antiquity, and deſign of this habit of diſtinction, and the great conſequences it has drawn along with it. The PALL, as Harpsfield (33) deſcribes it, is a ſmall piece of woollen cloth, put over the Archbiſhop's ſhoulders, when he officiates. It is not ornamented with any rich dye, but is of the original colour of the wool on the ſheep's back. It is laid upon St. Peter's tomb, by the Biſhops of Rome, and then ſent away to the reſpective Metropolitans. This ancient ceremony is ſuppoſed to ſignify theſe two things; firſt, that the homelineſs of the Pall might prevent the Archbiſhop's growing vain, from the richneſs of the reſt of his habit; ſecondly, that, conſidering the Pall was taken from St. Peter's tomb, he might be careful to adhere to St. Peter's doctrine. Thus far Harpsfield. But the learned Peter de la Marca, Archbiſhop of Paris, has a much larger and more inſtructive diſcourſe upon this ſubject. As to the form, he obſerves (34), that the modern Pall is very different from the ancient. That now in uſe is nothing but a border of white woollen cloth, made round, and thrown over the ſhoulders; from which hang two other pieces, the one falling down upon the breaſt, and the other upon the back; the whole ornamented with red croſſes, and tacked on with three golden pins. But the ancient Pall was a rich robe of ſtate, and hung down to the ground, being the ſame with that which the Greeks called Ωμοφοριον. This the Latins called Pallium; which is a proof that it was an entire garment, and not, as at preſent, a cover the ſettling epiſcopal Sees in Britain [P], and ordered him not to pull down the idol-temples, but convert them into Chriſtian churches [Q]; cautioning him withal not to be puffed up with the miracles (g) he was enabled to work in confirmation of his miniſtry only for the ſhoulders, breaſt, and back. And Pope Gregory informs us, in one of his letters (35), that it was a magnificent habit, deſigned to put the Prelate in mind, that his life ought to anſwer the dignity of his habit. The learned Peter de la Marca obſerves farther (36), that the Pall was part of the Imperial habit, and that the Emperors gave the Patriarchs leave to wear it. Thus Conſtantine's Donation, inſerted in Gratian's Decretum, informs us, that the uſe of the Pall was given to the Biſhop of Rome by that Prince. It is true, De Marca acknowledges this donation to be a counterfeit evidence: nevertheleſs the antiquity of it is not very inconſiderable, it being extant in the time of Charles the Great, and Adrian I. (37) So that the Pall's being a favour from the Emperors, is an opinion of above eight hundred years ſtanding. This point may be farther proved by unqueſtionable authority; for Liberatus Diaconus tells us (38), that Anthimus, Patriarch of Conſtantinople, being expelled his See, returned the Pall to the Emperor Juſtinian; which muſt imply, that he had received it from that Prince. De Marca produces ſome other proofs of this point (39), which the reader may conſult, if he is not already ſatisfied. Among other encroachments of the Papal on the Imperial power, the privilege of granting the Pall was no inconſiderable one, as it made the Archbiſhops and Patriarchs entirely dependent on the See of Rome. The neceſſity of procuring the Pall, was decreed in the eighth General Council of Conſtantinople, held in the year 872, in the Pontificate of Adrian II. This council paſſed a Canon to oblige the Metropolitans to receive confirmation from their reſpective Patriarchs, either by impoſition of hands, or the grant of the Pall. This Canon is not in the Greek text of the Council, but only in the verſion of Anaſtaſius. However, we may infer thus much from it, that it was no leſs cuſtomary for the Eaſtern Patriarchs, to ſend the Pall to the Metropolitans within their juriſdiction, than for the Pope to ſend it to thoſe of the Weſt (40). After the Metropolitans of Europe had ſubmitted to the above-mentioned Canon, and owned themſelves obliged to receive the Pall, they had new conditions of ſervitude impoſed upon them by the See of Rome. For now they were obliged to promiſe obedience and ſubjection to the Apoſtolic See under their hand-writing. This new law was introduced by Boniface, Archbiſhop of Mentz, in the Synod held by him, A. D. 742 (41). Gregory VII., who was of an enterprizing temper, reſolved to ſecure the ſubjection of the Metropolitans by a ſtronger tye, and accordingly changed the promiſe of obedience into the following oath of allegiance; Non ero in conſilio, neque in facto, ut vitam, aut membra, aut Papatum perdant. i. e. 'I will neither be aſſiſting with my perſon or 'advice, to the intent that they (the Popes) may 'loſe life, limb, or Popedom (42).' As to the Pall, the Decretals, publiſhed by order of Pope Gregory IX., in the XIIIth century, obliged every Archbiſhop not to call a council, bleſs the chryſm, conſecrate churches, or ordain Biſhops, till he had received his Pall from the See of Rome; at the delivery of which he was to ſwear fidelity to the Pope.

[P] The Pope gave him directions concerning the ſettling Epiſcopal Sees in Britain.] This he did in a letter dated the 10th of the Kalends of June. After acquainting him, that he had ſent him the Pall, as a mark of his eſteem for the great ſervice he had done in converting the Engliſh, he orders him to erect twelve Sees within his Province, and that the Biſhop of London ſhould receive the Pall from the Apoſtolic See. He likewiſe orders him to ſettle a Biſhop at York; adding, withal, that, if that city and the adjacent country ſhould become Chriſtians, he was to form it into a Province, with twelve Suffragans under the Metropolitan of York; to which Archbiſhop his Holineſs deſigned to ſend a Pall, with this reſervation, that he ſhould be ſubject to the Primate of Canterbury. His Holineſs proceeds to direct, that, after Auguſtin's death, the Archbiſhop of York was to preſide over the Biſhops ordained by him, and to be perfectly independent of the See of London; that the precedency of the Biſhops of London and York was to be regulated by the priority of their conſecrations; and that they ſhould act with unanimity for the common intereſt of Chriſtianity, and not claſh or interfere with each other. I ſhall tranſcribe the letter itſelf. It is extant in Bede (43).

Et quia nova Anglorum Eccleſia ad omnipotentis Dei Gratiam eodem domino largiente, et te laborante perducta eſt, uſum tibi Pallii in ea ad ſola Miſſarum ſolemnia agenda concedimus: ita ut per loca ſingula duodecim Epiſcopos ordines, qui tuæ ſubjaceant ditioni, quatenus Lundonienſis civitatis Epiſcopus ſemper in poſterum a Synodo propria debeat conſecrari, atque honoris Pallium ab hac ſancta et apoſtolica, cui Deo auctore deſervio, ſede percipiat. Ad Eburacam vero civitatem te volumus epiſcopum mittere, quem ipſe judicaveris ordinare; ita duntaxat, ut ſi eadem civitas cum finitimis locis verbum Dei receperit, ipſe quoque duodecim Epiſcopos ordinet, et Metropolitani honore perfruatur; quia ei quoque, ſi vita comes fuerit, Pallium tribuere Domino favente diſponimus; quem tamen tuæ fraternitatis volumus diſpoſitioni ſubjacere: poſt obitum vero tuum ita Epiſcopis quos ordinaverit præſit, ut Lundonienſis Epiſcopi nullo modo ditioni ſubjaceat. This letter is the more curious and important, as it contains the original plan of the Engliſh Hierarchy, and as it gave riſe to the frequent diſputes in ſucceeding ages between the Sees of Canterbury, York, London, and St. Andrew's in Scotland.

[Q] Gregory ordered him not to pull down the Idol-temples, but convert them into Chriſtian churches.] The reaſon of this injunction was this; that the natives, by frequenting the ſame temples they had been always accuſtomed to, might be the leſs ſhocked at their entrance into Chriſtianity. And therefore his Holineſs directed, that the idols ſhould be deſtroyed, and thoſe places of worſhip ſprinkled with holy water. And, whereas it had been their cuſtom to ſacrifice oxen to their falſe gods, he adviſed, that, upon the anniverſary of each church's conſecration, the people ſhonld erect booths round about it, and feaſt therein, not ſacrificing their oxen to devils, but killing them for their own refreſhment, and praiſing God for the bleſſing. And thus by allowing them ſome gratifications of ſenſe, they might reliſh Chriſtianity the better, and be raiſed by degrees to the nobler pleaſures of the mind. And here Gregory alledges the example of God himſelf, who, when he diſcovered himſelf to the Iſraelites in Egypt, did not miniſtry [R]. Auguſtin, having fixed his See at Canterbury, dedicated an old church, formerly built by ſome Roman Chriſtians, to the honour of our Saviour; and King Ethelbert founded the abbey of St. Peter and St. Paul, ſince called St. Auguſtin's (b) [S]. (b) Ibid. c. 33. Being thus ſupported by the intereſt of King Ethelbert, Auguſtin made an attempt to ſettle a correſpondence with the Britiſh Biſhops, and to bring them to a conformity with the Roman Church [T]. To this purpoſe a conference was held at a place in Worceſterſhire ſince called Auguſtin's Oak; where the Archbiſhop endeavoured to perſuade the Britiſh Prelates to make but one communion, and aſſiſt in preaching to the unconverted Saxons. But failing in this attempt, he was willing to appeal to the ſupernatural evidence of a miracle; and accordingly, at the cloſe of the diſpute, a blind Saxon being brought to the Britiſh Biſhops for a cure, and not meeting with relief, was carried to St. Auguſtin, who preſently reſtored him to ſight. But this not yet ſatisfying the Biſhops, a ſecond conference was propoſed and held [U]; which proving as unſucceſsful as the former, not forbid them the cuſtomary rites of ſacrificing, but transferred their worſhip from the devil to himſelf (44). Thus Pope Gregory condeſcended to the weakneſs of the new converts, and complied with part of their prejudices, as a more likely expedient to reconcile them to Chriſtianity, than if he had indulged them in no circumſtance of their former cuſtoms, but had driven them wholly from one extreme to another.

[R] —— Cautioning him not to be puffed up with the miracles, he was enabled to work, in confirmation of his miniſtry.] After having premiſed his great ſatisfaction at the converſion of the Engliſh, he lets him know he was convinced, that God had wrought ſurprizing miracles in favour of his miſſion. He tells him, he had reaſon to rejoice, that the exterior pomp and dazzling luſtre of miracles, had brought the Engliſh to the inward reformation and ſpiritual advantage deſigned by them; but, on the other ſide, he ought to be afraid, leſt, through human infirmity, he ſhould grow vain upon this privilege. And therefore he deſires him to remember, that, when the diſciples told our Saviour, with an air of tranſport, Lord, even the devils are ſubject unto us through thy name, they received this anſwer: Rejoice not, that the ſpirits are ſubject unto you, but rather rejoice that your names are written in heaven, Luke x. 17. He proceeds to exhort the Archbiſhop to examine the ſtate of his mind with great care and impartiality, otherwiſe the power of working miracles might prove a ſnare to him. He adviſes him to conſider, how much the Engliſh were the favourites of heaven, ſince God enabled him to alter the courſe of nature, and perform ſuch wonderful things, to promote their converſion. He adviſes him farther, frequently to recollect his own failings; this being a good expedient to preſerve his humility, and ſuppreſs the tumours of pride. Laſtly, he puts him in mind, that whatever degrees of ſupernatural power were beſtowed upon him, they were not deſigned for figure and greatneſs, nor given for his own ſake; but intended principally for the advantage of thoſe, whoſe happineſs he was ſent to procure. *Scio, frater chariſſime, quia omnipotens Deus per dilectionem tuam in gentem quam eligi voluit, magna miracula oſtendit; unde neceſſe eſt, ut de eodem dono cæleſti et timendo gaudeas, et gaudendo pertimeſcas. [T] Auguſtin attempted to ſettle a correſpondence with the Britiſh Biſhops, and to bring them to a conformity with the Roman Church.] The Britons, from the firſt time of planting Chriſtianity in the iſland, had conſtantly followed the rules and cuſtoms left them by their firſt maſters. But the Church of Rome had made certain alterations in the manner of celebrating divine ſervice, to which it pretended all other Churches ought to conform. The Churches of the Weſt, as being the neareſt to Rome, were the moſt eaſily gained; and almoſt all of them, excepting thoſe of France and Milan, conformed at laſt to the Roman Ritual. But Britain ſtill continued, as it were, A World apart. Since the embaſſy of Lucius to Pope Eleutherius, the Britons had very little communication with the Biſhops of Rome. They acknowledged them only as Biſhops of a particular Dioceſe, or, at moſt, as heads of a Patriarchate, on which they did not think the Britiſh Church ought to be any way dependent. They were ſo far from receiving orders from the Pope, that they were even ſtrangers to his pretenſions. But Auguſtin, full of zeal for the intereſts of the See of Rome, made an attempt to bring them to acknowledge the ſuperiority of the Pope over all other Churches. It is not eaſy to ſay, how far Auguſtin intended to have led them, ſince it does not appear, that he had any inſtructions on this head from Gregory I., who was very far from aſpiring to that exceſs of authority, which his ſucceſſors arrogated to themſelves. However, it cannot be denied, that this Pope claimed a juriſdiction over the churches of Britain, ſince, in his letter to Auguſtin, he appointed him Metropolitan of the whole iſland. Nor can it be ſuppoſed, that Auguſtin would have inſiſted ſo ſtrongly on this article, if he had not been very ſure of the Pope's approbation.

[U] A ſecond conference was propoſed, and held.] The appearance at this aſſembly was much greater than at the former; for now there came ſeven Britiſh Biſhops, and a great many learned Monks from the monaſtery of Bancornaburg, or Bangor, who were under the direction of their Abbot, Dinoth. Theſe Britons, at their ſetting forward to the Synod, applied former, Auguſtin is ſaid to have threatened the Britons with a terrible calamity, as a puniſhment of their diſobedience; which, the hiſtorians tell us, accordingly fell upon them (i) [W]. In the year 604. Auguſtin conſecrated two of his companions, Mellitus and Juſtus, the former to the See of Rocheſter, and the latter to that of London. The ſame plied themſelves to a certain Hermit, eminent for virtue and good ſenſe; and aſked his opinion, whether they ſhould give up the uſages and traditions of their Church, and acknowledge the pretenſions of Auguſtin. His anſwer was; if he was a man of God, they ought to be governed by him. They deſired to be informed how they ſhould know whether he was, or not. He replied, 'Our Saviour 'ſays; Take my yoke upon you, for I am meek and 'lowly in heart. If therefore Auguſtin be a man 'of an affable and humble diſpoſition, it is very 'probable he has taken the yoke of Chriſt upon 'him, and offers you the ſame privilege. But if 'his behaviour be haughty and inſolent, it is plain 'he is no agent from Heaven, nor is his diſcourſe 'to be regarded.' They aſked him farther, by what marks they were to diſcover his temper of mind. The Hermit anſwered, they ſhould manage it ſo, that Auguſtin and his company ſhould come firſt to the place; and then, if he roſe up to ſalute them at their coming in, they might conclude, that he was ſent from God; but if he neglected to pay them this civility, they might return his contempt, and have nothing to do with him (47). Baronius is by no means pleaſed with the Hermit's criterion: he calls him a falſe Prophet, and charges him with laying down a wrong mark of humility (48). But why all this hard language upon the poor Anchoret, whom Bede acknowledges to have been eminent both for piety and prudence? But the Cardinal pretends to juſtify his ſatire from this text of St. John: If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine receive him not into your houſe, neither bid him God ſpeed. Where he ſeems not to have conſidered, that thoſe who were to be received thus coldly, and kept at ſuch a diſtance, were ſuch as denied our Saviour's being come in the fleſh. But Auguſtin could not charge the Britons with any infidelity or apoſtaſy from the faith; and therefore he might have received them with reſpect and civility. But Baronius will have it, that Auguſtin knew them to be an obſtinate people, and that they were not to be moved by the authority of the Apoſtolic See. If this be true, why did he give himſelf all this trouble, and appoint a ſecond meeting? Beſides, the Cardinal might have remembered, that it was always the cuſtom of the Church, to treat Heretics, and even Heathens, with common civility. But ſtill the Cardinal will not allow, that Auguſtin's not riſing up to ſalute the Britons, was a ſufficient ground for rejecting his propoſals. What, ſays he, are malefactors to except againſt the authority of their judge, becauſe he will not compliment them? Our Saviour enjoined obedience to the Scribes and Phariſees, becauſe they ſat in Moſes's ſeat; for their pride was no forfeiture of their authority. Thus Baronius argues upon the ſuppoſition of the Pope's ſupremacy, which was a doctrine the Britiſh Church knew nothing of. But to proceed to the conference. When the Britons came into the Synod, and found that Auguſtin received them ſitting, they reſented the affront, and warmly oppoſed every thing offered by him. The articles inſiſted on by Auguſtin were; that they ſhould celebrate Eaſter, and adminiſter Baptiſm, according to the practice of the Roman Church; and that they ſhould acknowledge the Pope's authority. If they would comply in theſe reſpects, and aſſiſt in the converſion of the Saxons, he would bear with the diſagreement of their cuſtoms in other caſes. But the Britons replied, they could yield none of the points conteſted (49). As to the Pope's authority, what their ſenſe was upon that article, appears by Abbot Dinoth's anſwer, who ſpoke for the reſt. He told Auguſtin, 'That the Britiſh Churches owed the de-'ference of brotherly kindneſs and charity to the 'Church of God, the Pope of Rome, and to all 'Chriſtians; but they knew of no other obedience 'due from them to him, whom they called the 'Pope; that, for their parts, they were under the 'direction of the Biſhop of Caerleon upon Uſk, who, 'under God, was their ſpiritual overſeer and di-'rector.' This part of the conference is not related by Bede, but was tranſcribed from a manuſcript by Sir Henry Spelman (50), who has given it us in Welſh, Engliſh, and Latin, and tells us, he had it from Mr. Peter Moſtin, a Welſh gentleman. It appeared to Sir Henry to be a very old manuſcript, tranſcribed from an older, but without date or author. However, to weaken the authority of this manuſcript, it is objected, that there was at that time no Biſhop of Caerleon upon Uſk, nor had been, ſince the metropolitical juriſdiction had been tranſlated to Menevia, by St. David. In anſwer to which, it is granted, that, from the time of Dubricius, the See was transferred, firſt to Landaff, and then to St. David's; but this latter tranſlation was not agreed to by all the Britiſh Biſhops; and Caerleon being the ancient metropolitical See, it was no abſurdity to mention that place, in a diſpute which turned upon ancient right. But the certainty of the Britiſh Churches rejecting the Pope's authority, does not depend on the credit of this Welſh manuſcript. For the point is ſufficiently clear from Bede, who tells us (51), the Britiſh Clergy declared againſt owning Auguſtin for their Archbiſhop: whereas, had they acknowledged the Pope's ſupremacy, they could not but have ſubmitted to Auguſtin, who acted under his commiſſion. If it be enquired why the Britiſh Clergy were ſo tenacious of their old cuſtoms, as to break with Auguſtin, rather than alter their way of keeping Eaſter, and adminiſtering Baptiſm; it may be replied, that theſe terms were not required of them, as conditions of brotherly communion, but as marks of ſubmiſſion and inferiority. And therefore, the Britiſh Biſhops, perceiving their liberties were ſtruck at, and reſenting, at the ſame time, the ſeeming diſreſpect with which they were treated, were by no means in a diſpoſition to comply with any propoſitions Auguſtin could make to them.

[W] Auguſtin is ſaid to have threatened the Britons with a terrible calamity —— which —— accordingly fell upon them.] Being diſappointed at the ſucceſs of this Synod, he ſaid to them, at going away, If ye will not accept of peace with your brethren, ye ſhall receive war from your enemies; and if ye will not preach the way of life to the Engliſh, ye ſhall ſuffer death from their hands, by way of revenge. This unfriendly prediction, Bede tells us, was afterwards fulfilled; for Ethelfrid, King of Northumberland, marched with a great army to Caerleon, and made a terrible ſlaughter of the Britons. The deſcription of this battle, in which near twelve hundred of the Monks of Bangor were put to the ſword, may be ſeen in Bede (52), who takes care to inform us, that it was fought after the death of Auguſtin. But ſeveral writers are of opinion, that this paſſage of Bede is interpolated, becauſe it is not found in King Alfred's Saxon verſion, And Biſhop Godwin (53) takes notice of a Charter ſigned by Ethelbert and Auguſtin, in the year 605, which he makes to be the year of this battle. In anſwer to theſe objections, it may be obſerved, that, though the conteſted paſſage be not in King Alfred's tranſlation, yet it was in all the moſt ancient manuſcripts of the original (54); and that Alfred omitted tranſlating it, becauſe the hiſtory of Auguſtin's Life was not yet finiſhed; for, in the next chapter, he is ſaid to have conſecrated two Biſhops, Mellitus and Juſtus. As to the objection of Auguſtin's ſigning King Ethelbert's charter, the learned Sir Henry Spelman obſerves (55), that it was the Saxon cuſtom of that age, to paſs eſtates and privileges without inſtruments in writing; and that King Withred, who reigned about the year 700, was the firſt who introduced written deeds; ſo that all the charters, prior to this time, are to be ſuſpected of forgery. Farther, that Auguſtin died in the year 604, and before the ſlaughter of the Monks of Bangor, the learned Wharton endeavours to put beyond all queſtion. For he alledges the teſtimony of an ancient book, cited by William Thorn; from whence it is evident, that Auguſtin and Pope Gregory both died in the ſame year; but it is paſt all all diſpute, that the latter died in 604 (56). It is of great conſequence to ſettle this point, ſince no leſs depends upon it, than the truth or falſehood of an accuſation, which reflects the higheſt infamy on the memory of Auguſtin. For he is charged with having been, not only the author, but even the principal actor, in the tragedy above-mentioned. Biſhop Godwin, who is not inclined to ſpeak favourably of Auguſtin, calls him, with a ſneer, an excellent Prophet indeed, who could ſo readily foretel, what was in his own power to bring to paſs. Vatem ſcilicet præclarum, qui illa potuit prædicere, quæ ut efficeret, in ſua novit eſſe poteſtate (57)! Then he goes on to acquaint us, that, by his authority and influence over King Ethelbert, he eaſily prevailed with that Prince to make war with the Britons, and to excite Ethelfrid, King of Northumberland, againſt them. And in ſupport of this charge, he cites the following paſſage out of one Thomas Graius, who (he tells us) lived three hundred years ago, and wrote Annals in the French language. 'Auguſtinus ab 'Epiſcopis et aliis inter Britannos doctis hominibus 'hoc pacto rejectus, Ethelberto Cantiorum regi tam 'graviter conqueſtus eſt, ut exercitum protinus gran-'dem collegerit, et in eos impetum faciens, mag-'num illorum numerum interfecerit, quorum nihilo 'magis miſertus eſt quam ſolet lupus ovicularum.— 'Auguſtin, being in this manner rejected by the Biſhops 'and other learned men among the Britons, complained 'ſo heavily thereof to Ethelbert, King of Kent, that 'that Prince immediately levied a conſiderable army, 'and falling upon them, deſtroyed great multitudes of 'them, taking no more pity of them than a wolf 'does of a flock of ſheep.' Then the Biſhop goes on to acquaint us farther, upon the authority of a very ancient anonymous manuſcript, which he does not cite, that Ethelbert, at the inſtigation of Auguſtin, borrowed forces of Ethelfrid, King of Northumberland, for carrying on the war againſt the Britons inhabiting Wales; and that Archbiſhop Auguſtin himſelf came up with them, and gained a complete victory over them, at Cheſter (58). If this account were a true one, the Biſhop might well exclaim; Nimium profecto hæc ſapiunt ambitionem et potentiæ in immenſum augendæ cupiditatem illam effrenem, qua ſemper a primis incunabulis Roma laboravit (59). i. e. 'Such proceedings ſurely ſavour a little too much 'of that ambition and unbounded thirſt after power, 'which the See of Rome has conſtantly diſcovered.' Bnt if Auguſtin, as is moſt probable, died before the ſlaughter of the Britons, then one half at leaſt of the ſtory is falſe; and if one half be not true, the reader is left to judge what credit the other part deſerves. As a farther juſtification of Auguſtin from the charge in queſtion, let us cite Mr. Collier. 'As 'for Auguſtin's prediction of this calamity (ſays that 'author), it does not at all infer, he was any way 'inſtrumental in it. It amounts only to a warm ex-'preſſion, dropt upon a diſappointment, and a pro-'bable conjecture upon the poſture of affairs; for, 'at that time, the country was much embroiled, 'and the Britons ſurrounded with formidable ene-'mies, ſo that unleſs, by cloſing with Auguſtin, they 'procured King Ethelbert for their ally, he fore-'ſaw the caſe might probably go hard with them. 'Beſides, we are to obſerve, that the defeat was 'given the Britons by King Ethelfrid, a Pagan Prince, 'whoſe dominions lay beyond the Humber, and by 'conſequence could be no homager to King Ethel-'bert. For theſe reaſons, there is no manner of 'likelihood, that Auguſtin ſhould have any intereſt 'or correſpondence with him. To this we may add, 'in the laſt place, that the annals of Ulſter reckon 'the ſlaughter of the Britiſh Monks by King Ethel-'frid to the year of our Lord 613, which was 'certainly after the death of Archbiſhop Auguſtin: 'And this computation is allowed by the learned 'Primate Uſher (60).' Nicholas Trivet, who wrote a Chronicle in Norman French, tells us, as he is cited by Sir Henry Spelman (61), that the cruelty of King Ethelfrid, in falling upon thoſe unarmed Monks, was quickly revenged upon him. For this Prince marching forward, after the victory, towards Bangor, was encountered by a freſh body of Britons, who killed above ten thouſand of his men, routed the reſt, and purſued Ethelfrid as far as the Humber.

[X] His body was removed, and placed in the church, by Wido, Abbot of Canterbury.] William Thorn informs us, that, on the 8th of the Ides of September, A. D. 1091, Abbot Wido tranſlated the body of St. Auguſtin from the place where it had lain near five hundred years, and placed all the larger bones, together with the Saint's head, in a ſtone-coffin; on which was this inſcription:

Inclitus Anglorum Preſul, pius, et decus altum, Hic AUGUSTINUS requieſcit corpore Sanctus.

But leaſt the Danes and Normans, who made frequent incurſions on thoſe parts of Kent, ſhould deprive the nation of ſo valuable a treaſure; therefore, when the ceremony of the tranſlation was over, and the people were retired home, the venerable Abbot, with a few of the ſenior Monks, went privately into the church by night, and taking out the Saint's head, and part of his body, excepting only the ſmaller bones and ſome aſhes, they placed them in a ſmall urn, ſtrongly ſecured with iron and lead; which they hid in the wall under the Eaſt-window. And as there were but a few brethren entruſted with the ſecret, the memory of it was ſoon extinct; and the body lay concealed an hundred and thirty years, till the time of Abbot Hugh III (62); when on the fifth of the Kalends of May, A. D. 1221, it was diſcovered, and honourably depoſited in three different places. That Abbot to excite the devotion of the people, did, at his own expence, cauſe the Saint's head to be ornamented with gold and precious ſtones, and repoſited by itſelf (63). At laſt, on the third of the Kalends of May, A. D. 1300, Thomas Findon, then Abbot of Canterbury, depoſited St. Auguſtin's relics in a marble tomb, adorned with beautiful carved work; adding withal to the above-mentioned diſtich, this other, in which he expreſſed his great affection for the memory of that Saint:

Againſt the authority of this inſcription, and its pretenſion to ſo great antiquity, it is uſually objected, that the term Archiepiſcopus (Archbiſhop) was not then in uſe in the Weſtern Church; as not being commonly allowed to Metropolitans (according to Mabillon and others) till about the ninth Century (66). miracles to St. Auguſtin, of which we ſhall give the reader a ſpecimen below [Z]. As to his character; Biſhop Godwin charges him with a reſtleſs ambition, by which he occaſioned great diſturbances in this iſland [AA]; and that writer is of opinion, that the Engliſh were not ſo much obliged to the Church of Rome for the ſucceſs of Auguſtin's miſſion, as is generally pretended [BB]. But in favour of Auguſtin, it muſt be ſaid, that he lived ſuitably to the character of a Miſſionary, and practiſed great auſterities. And if he betrayed any reſtleſſneſs of temper, or ſtrained his authority too far in reſpect to the Britons, it ought to be placed to the account of human infirmities, and covered by his greater merit: This is certain; he engaged in a glorious undertaking, ſurmounted danger and diſcouragement, and was bleſſed with wonderful ſucceſs. And what ought to endear his memory to us, is, that he was a ſignal inſtrument in the hand of providence, in eſtabliſhing Chriſtianity in this iſland. The obſervation of the feſtival of St. Auguſtin was firſt enjoined in a ſynod held under Cuthbert Archbiſhop of Canterbury (n), and afterwards by the Pope's bull in the reign of King Edward III. [Z] The Popiſh writers have — aſcribed ſeveral miracles to St. Auguſtin, of which we ſhall give a ſpecimen.] William Thorn relates, that, when Auguſtin firſt landed in the iſle of Thanet, at his getting out of the ſhip, he ſtepped upon a ſtone, which retained the print of his foot, as if it had been only mud. That hiſtorian adds, that this ſtone was taken up, and preſerved in a chapel, built by the Saint in that very place; and that great multitudes of people reſorted thither annually, on the day of its depoſition, to pay their devotions to it, and for the recovery of their health (69). John Bromton mentions a very clear fountain of water, which Auguſtin, by his prayers, cauſed to ſpring up, at a time when he wanted water for baptizing (70). The ſame author tells us ſo very extraordinary a ſtory of St. Auguſtin, that I ſhall give it the reader at length. That Prelate coming one day to preach at a village called Cumpton, in Oxfordſhire, the Prieſt of that town complained to him, that a certain officer in the army refuſed to pay him his tythes. Whereupon Auguſtin ſent for the officer, and gently reprimanded him for his obſtinacy in withholding the church's dues. But the ſoldier ſtill refuſing to comply, Auguſtin threatened him with excommunication; and then going up to the altar, he ſaid aloud in the hearing of all the people, Let no excommunicated perſon be preſent at the Maſs. This being ſaid, a dead corpſe, which had been buried in the church porch, came immediately out of its grave, and, going into the church-yard, ſtood there erect and motionleſs, during the celebration of Maſs. The people, who ſaw it, came in a fright to Auguſtin, and related the matter. Whereupon the Archbiſhop, preceded by the Croſs and Holy Water, and accompanied by all the people, went to the place, and demanded of the dead body, who he was? To whom the corpſe replied: When you commanded on God's part, that no excommunicated perſon ſhould be preſent at the Maſs, the Angels of God, who conſtantly attend your ſteps, caſt me out of the place where I was buried, telling me, that Auguſtin, the friend of God, commanded all ſtinking carcaſſes to be thrown out of the Church of God. For, in the time of the Britons, before the fury of the Anglo-Saxons had laid waſte this country, I was Lord of this village; and, though often admoniſhed by the Prieſt of this church, I refuſed paying tythes, 'till being excommunicated by him I died, and was caſt down into hell. Hereupon Auguſtin and all the company wept bitterly. Then Auguſtin bid the dead body ſhew him where the Prieſt lay buried; which being done, and a few dry bones being found, the Saint addreſſed himſelf to prayer, and then ſaid, In the name of God, I command thee to ariſe, for I have buſineſs with thee. Immediately the bones began to unite, and in a ſhort time the Prieſt ſtood before them; who, at the Saint's command, pronounced abſolution on the excommunicated corpſe; after which, both the dead bodies returned to their graves, and fell into duſt. Then Auguſtin, calling the officer, aſked him, if he yet perſiſted in refuſing to pay his tythes. But he, trembling and aſtoniſhed, fell at the Saint's feet, and confeſſed his crime; and, beſtowing all his goods on the church, he became a conſtant follower of Auguſtin, till the day of his death (71). If the reader is not yet ſatisfied, he may read a great deal more of ſuch Legendary ſtuff in the author cited in the margin (72).

By Gregory Biſhop of Rome, who had* 'no more authority over our England, than Auguſtin 'himſelf. I will grant likewiſe, that he was ſent '*to preach to the Engliſh. The Britons, it is true, had received the Chriſtian faith a conſiderable time before Auguſtin's arrival; but the Saxons, who were idolators, having driven the natives into Wales, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the greateſt part of the iſland, Heatheniſm had reſumed its antient ſeat in Britain, and the great work of converſion was to be undertaken afreſh. And if the labours of St. Auguſtin ſucceeded ſo far, as to lay a ſufficient foundation for the gradual propagation of Chriſtianity, till the whole country ſhould at length embrace it; the praiſe and the thanks due to ſo bleſſed a work ought not to be the leſs, becauſe it pleaſed God to take the labourer to himſelf long before it was finiſhed. I might add, that Paulinus, who preached to the Northumbrians, was conſecrated by Juſtus, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was contemporary and fellow-labourer with Auguſtin himſelf; ſo that our miſſionary may be conſidered as an inſtrument in the converſion of that kingdom, though he did not live to be witneſs of it. B.

[Mr. Collier's anſwer to Baronius, in the note [G], ſavours greatly of ſuperſtition. He might have given a more direct and proper anſwer, by going upon enlarged principles, and ſhewing the abſurdity, and hurtfulneſs in general, of Monkiſh inſtitutions. He might have alledged, that theſe inſtitutions, and other corruptions of Popery, were wiſely and juſtly diſcarded by the Proteſtant Church of England.

The moderation of King Ethelbert, in not compelling his ſubjects to embrace Chriſtianity, was worthy of commendation. However, his beſtowing more countenance and affection on thoſe who became proſelytes, though natural enough, would, in ſome meaſure, have the effect of mixing worldly motives with their converſion.

That Auguſtin was a Biſhop before he landed in England, is not only aſſerted by Baronius, but maintained with very conſiderable ſtrength of evidence, by Mr. Wharton, in his Anglia Sacra. Pope Gregory, in a letter to Brunechild, Queen of France, written in 597, calls Auguſtin Fratrem et Co-epiſcopum. It appears that he was conſecrated in Gaul or Germany, in the latter end of the year 597; ſo that, according to this account, Bede is miſtaken in aſſerting that he went to Arles for the purpoſe of receiving conſecration, after he had preached the Goſpel with ſucceſs in Kent (75). Biſhop Tanner expreſſes his approbation of what Mr. Wharton hath advanced upon the ſubject (76). According to this laſt author, though Auguſtin was appointed to his miſſion, by Pope Gregory, in 596, he did not land in the iſle of Thanet till 597 (77).

The queſtions propoſed by Auguſtin to Gregory, and the anſwers of that prelate, ſtrongly diſplay the ſpirit of the Theology which then prevailed, and ſhew on what trifling matters it was employed. We ſee here the tendencies to that ſchool divinity which afterwards was carried to the moſt ridiculous exceſs.

The confidence with which Gregory, in the note [R], ſpeaks of the miracles wrought by Auguſtin is ſomewhat ſurprizing. Did it ariſe from credulity or deceit? Perhaps, it is difficult to ſay; though candour would incline one to impute it to the former principle. No rational man will now believe that any miracles were performed by Auguſtin. If he had a power of working them, why was he not poſſeſſed of the gift of tongues, the moſt neceſſary of all miracles to a preacher of the Goſpel among foreign nations, and with which the real Apoſtles of Chriſt were actually endowed? Whereas Auguſtin was obliged to make uſe of French interpreters.

Mr. Wharton, having offered good reaſons to prove that Auguſtin died on the 26th of May, 604, infers from thence that the charge brought againſt him of having promoted the ſlaughter of the Britons and the Monks of Bangor, cannot be true (78). On the other hand, Dr. Cave ſtrenuouſly maintains the truth of the charge; and contends that he might be the adviſer of the fact, even if it ſhould be allowed (which the Doctor is by no means willing to do) that it did not take place till after Auguſtin's death (79). Tanner ſeems at firſt diſpoſed to embrace Cave's opinion; but afterwards rather retracts it, in conſequence of what had been advanced by Mr. Wharton (80).

Notwithſtanding what is ſaid, in the cloſe of the article, in anſwer to Biſhop Godwin, the preſent editors cannot help thinking that the reflections of that writer are, upon the whole, exceedingly juſt. Whatever virtues Auguſtin might be poſſeſſed of, and whatever praiſes may be due to him for introducing Chriſtianity into a part of the iſland, it cannot well be denied that he was a man of a very ambitious ſpirit. Beſides this, his religion was mixed with much ſuperſtition; and he was a vehement promoter of the riſing claims and pretenſions of the Biſhop of Rome. Neither hath full juſtice always been done to thoſe who, before Auguſtin's landing, had, even in Kent, prepared the way for his preaching the Goſpel with acceptance and ſucceſs. Theſe were Bertha, King Ethelbert's Queen; Luidhard, her Biſhop and Chaplain; and the reſt of her French attendants. Godwin hath taken care to ſet this matter in a proper light (81).

AUNGERVYLE (RICHARD), commonly known by the name of Richard de Bury, was born at St. Edmundſbury in Suffolk, in 1281 (*), the ninth of King Edward I. (a) His father, Sir Richard Aungervyle, Kt. dying while he was young, his uncle ——— Willowby, a Prieſt, took a particular care of his education; and when he was fit ſent him to Oxford, where he ſtudied Philoſophy and Divinity (b), and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning, and regular and exemplary life [A]. When he had finiſhed his ſtudies there, he became a Benedictine Monk at Durham (c). Soon after he was made tutor to Prince Edward, afterwards King Edward III. (d) And being Treaſurer of Guienne in 1325, he ſupplied Queen Iſabel, when ſhe was plotting againſt her huſband King Edward II., with a large ſum of money out of that Exchequer. For which being queſtioned by the King's party, he narrowly eſcaped to Paris, where he was forced to hide himſelf ſeven days in the tower of a church (e). When King Edward III. came to the Crown, he loaded his tutor Aungervyle with honours and preferments. For he at firſt made him his Cofferer, then Treaſurer of the Wardrobe, Archdeacon of Northampton, Prebendary of Lincoln, Sarum, and Litchfield (†), and afterwards Keeper of the Privy-Seal. This laſt place he enjoyed five years, and was in that time ſent twice embaſſador to the Pope. In 1333 he was promoted to the Deanery of Wells, and before the end of the ſame year, being choſen Biſhop of Durham, he was conſecrated about the end of December [B] at Chertſey in Surrey; the Kings of England and Scotland, the Queen, the two Archbiſhops, five Biſhops, ſeven Earls, and many other perſons being preſent. The next year he was appointed High-Chancellor, and in 1336 Treaſurer of England (f). In 1338 he was twice ſent with other Commiſſioners to treat of a peace with the King of France, though to no purpoſe (g). As to his character, he was not only one of the learnedeſt men of his time, but alſo a very great patron and encourager of learning. Petrarch he frequently correſponded with: And had for his chaplains, Thomas Bradwardin and Richard Fitzralph, afterwards Archbiſhops, the firſt of Canterbury, and the ſecond of Armagh; Richard Bintworth ſoon after Biſhop of London, and Walter Segrave of Chicheſter; and Walter Burley, J. Mandut, Rob. Holcot, R. Killington, Doctors of Divinity, the moſt eminent men in that age. His cuſtom was, to have ſome of his attendants read to him while he was at meals, and when they were over, to diſcourſe with his chaplains upon the ſame ſubject. He was likewiſe of a very bountiful and charitable temper; every week he made eight quarters of wheat into bread, and gave it to the poor. Whenever he travelled between Durham and Newcaſtle, he diſtributed eight pounds ſterling in alms; between Durham and Stockton five pounds; between Durham and Auckland five marks; and between Durham and Middleham five pounds (b). But the nobleſt inſtance of his generoſity and munificence, was the public library he founded at Oxford, for the uſe of the ſtudents (i). This library he furniſhed with the beſt collection of books that was then in England; fixed it in the place where Durham, now Trinity-College, was built afterwards; and writ a treatiſe containing rules for the management of the library, how the books were to be preſerved, and upon what conditions lent out to ſcholars [C]. He appointed five keepers, to whom he granted yearly ſalaries [D]. This worthy perſon having thus employed himſelf in works of charity and munificence, died at his manor of Auckland, April 24, 1345; and was buried in the ſouth part of the croſs iſle of the cathedral church of Durham, to which he had been a benefactor (k).

[B] He was conſecrated about the end of December.] Biſhop Godwin ſays, he was conſecrated the 19th of December; but it appears from Walſingham that it was a miſtake. For the perſon conſecrated about that time, was a Monk of Durham, whom the reſt of the Monks had choſen Biſhop, againſt the King's inclination. Wherefore, upon the King's recommendation, the Pope nominated Richard de Bury, who was conſecrated accordingly, cito poſt feſtum natalis domini, ſoon after Chriſtmas. The Monk being a Biſhop without a Biſhoprick, ſine Epiſcopatu Epiſcopus, returned to his cloyſter, where he died ſoon after (2). I cannot, by the way, but take notice of a very viſible miſtake that hath crept into Walſingham, at line 24 of the ſame page; the words—nomine Richardum de Bury—ought certainly to be blotted out.

[C] He writ a treatiſe, &c.] This book he entitled Philobiblos, from whence he came to be called himſelf Philobiblos, a lover of books; and very juſtly, if, as he ſays himſelf in the preface to it, his love of them was ſo violent, that it put him in a kind of rapture, and made him neglect all his other affairs. He finiſhed it at Auckland, January 24, 1344-5, being juſt ſixty-three years of age (3). It was printed at Spires in 1483, at Paris by Badius Aſcenſius in 1500, by the learned Thomas James at Oxford in 1599, 4*to*, and at Leipſic in 1674, at the end of Philologicarum Epiſtolarum Centuria una, ex bibliotheca Melch. Haiminsfeldii. It is alſo in manuſcript, not only in the Cottonian library, as appears by the margin, but alſo in the Royal (4), and other libraries at Oxford and Cambridge, &c. (5). The book is written in very indifferent Latin, and a declamatory ſtile: It is divided into twenty chapters. In the I. He praiſes wiſdom, and books in which it is contained. II. That books are to be preferred to riches and pleaſures. III. That they ought to be always bought. IV. How much good ariſes from books, and that they are miſuſed only by ignorant people. V. That good monks write books, but the bad ones are otherwiſe employed. VI. The praiſe of the ancient begging friers, with a reproof of the modern ones. VII. In the 7th he bewails the loſs of books, by fire and wars. VIII. He ſhows what fine opportunities he had of collecting books, whilſt he was Chancellor and Treaſurer, as well as during his embaſſies. IX. That the antients outdid the moderns in hard ſtudying. X. That learning is by degrees arrived to perfection, and that he had procured a Greek and Hebrew Grammar. XI. That the Law and Law-books are not properly learning. XII. The uſefulneſs and neceſſity of Grammar. XIII. An apology for Poetry, and the uſefulneſs of it. XIV. Who ought to love books. XV. The manifold advantages of learning. XVI. Of writing new books, and mending the old. XVII. Of uſing books well, and how to place them. XVIII. An anſwer to his calumniators. XIX. Upon what conditions books are to be lent to ſtrangers. XX. Concluſion. Beſides this Philobiblos, our author writ —— Epiſtolarum Familiarium Librum unum. Some of theſe letters are to Petrarch, with whom he kept a correſpondence, and who had deſired his opinion about the Thule of the ancients. —— He alſo compoſed —— Orationes ad Principes, in one book (6). —— Some think it was not Aungervyle, but his chaplain R. Holcot, who writ the Philobiblos (7).

[Aungervyle is ſaid to have alone poſſeſſed more books than all the Biſhops of England together. Beſides the fixed libraries which he had formed in his ſeveral palaces, the floor of his common apartment was ſo covered with books, that thoſe who entered into it could not with due reverence approach his perſon. He kept binders, illuminators, and writers in his palaces.—Petrarch calls him Virum ardentis ingenii.—He founded a library at Oxford, and it is remarkable, that in his Philobiblion (which according to Mr. T. Warton, was finiſhed in 1343), he ſhould apologize for admitting the poets into his collection. Quare non negleximus FABULAS POETARUM. But he is more complaiſant to the prejudices of his age, where he ſays, that the laity are unworthy to be admitted to any commerce with books, Laici omnium librorum communione ſunt indigni. He prefers books of the liberal arts to treatiſes of law. He laments that good literature had entirely ceaſed in the univerſity of Paris. He admits Panfletos exiguos into his library. He employed Stationarios and Librarios, not only in England, but in France, Italy, and Germany. He regrets the total ignorance of the Greek language; language; but adds, that he has provided for the ſtudents of his library both Greek and Hebrew Grammars. He calls Paris the Paradiſe of the World, and ſays, that he purchaſed there a variety of invaluable volumes in all ſciences, which yet were neglected and periſhing. While he was Chancellor and Treaſurer of England, inſtead of the uſual preſents and new-year's gifts appendant to his office, he choſe to receive thoſe perquiſites in books. By the favour of Edward III., he gained acceſs to the libraries of the moſt capital monaſteries; where he ſhook off the duſt from volumes preſerved in cheſts and preſſes which had not been opened for many ages (9).

AXTEL (DANIEL), a Colonel in the ſervice of the Long Parliament, and executed for the ſhare he had in the murder of King Charles I. The particulars of this gentleman's life, before he engaged in the ſervice of the Parliament, are ſo deeply buried in oblivion, that, notwithſtanding all the induſtry we have uſed, a very few only, and thoſe of leſs conſequence than we could wiſh, can be brought to light. He was of a good family, and had a tolerable education, that is to ſay, ſuch a one as might fit him for that courſe of life it was intended he ſhould lead, being placed by his relations as an apprentice to a Grocer in Watling-ſtreet (a). As he was of a very ſerious diſpoſition, and had been very early tinctured with thoſe principles, which were in that age ſtiled Puritanical, he became an eager follower of ſuch miniſters as diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their zealous preaching (b). His great attachment to theſe ſort of people, and the natural warmth of his own temper, were the occaſions of his quitting his own calling, and going into the army, to which he was principally determined, by keeping a day of faſting and prayer with Mr. Simeon Aſh, Mr. Love, Mr. Woodcocke, and other miniſters, in Lawrence-lane, wherein, according to his judgment, they did ſo clearly ſtate the cauſe of the Parliament, that he was fully convinced of the juſtice of their cauſe, and reſolved to venture his life for it (c). Such were the conſequences of the profeſſors of the Chriſtian religion, converting their pulpits into ſchools of politics to which it may truly be ſaid, the Civil War owed its beginning, as moſt of the diſmal conſequences with which it was attended, flowed, but too apparently, from the ſame ſource [A]. After having thus choſen his party, he behaved in the army with ſo much zeal, courage, and conduct, that he roſe by degrees to the ſeveral commands, of Captain, Major, and Lieutenant-Colonel, in a regiment of foot (d). It was in this laſt capacity, that he acted with great vehemence againſt all endeavours for a reconciliation with the King, and particularly concurred in exhibiting a charge of high-treaſon, againſt eleven members of the Houſe of Commons, for betraying the cauſe of the Parliament, endeavouring to break and deſtroy the army, with other particulars, which obliged thoſe gentlemen to withdraw, which was the firſt force put upon that Houſe of Commons, and the remembrance of the concern Colonel Axtel had therein, contributed not a little to his deſtruction (e). Upon ſeveral changes that afterwards happened, theſe members were again admitted, ſat, and voted in the Houſe, and new ſchemes were entered upon, for reſtoring the Conſtitution by reſettling the government, in order to which the Houſe of Commons, on the fifth of December, 1648, reſolved, 'That his Majeſty's conceſſions 'to the propoſitions upon the treaty of the Iſle of Wight, were ſufficient grounds for 'the Houſes to proceed upon for the ſettlement of the kingdom.' But a great party in the army who thought otherwiſe, determined to prevent the effects of this; and accordingly placed one Colonel Pride with a guard at the door of the Parliament-houſe, having in his hands a liſt of thoſe members who were to be excluded. Accordingly he prevented all of them from entering the Houſe, and ſecured ſome of them who were moſt ſuſpected, under a guard provided for that purpoſe (f); which act of his, was ſuppoſed, by ſome of the wiſeſt men in England, to diſſolve and deſtroy the repreſentative

[A] Flowed but too apparently from the ſame ſource.] It is certainly a thing worthy of obſervation, that a ſpirit of religion ill conducted, was the cauſe of all the evils with which the hiſtories of thoſe times are crowded. The firſt ill blood between King Charles and his ſubjects was occaſioned by the ſevere proceedings in the High-Commiſſion Court, and the cruel cenſures in the Star-Chamber; in both of which the Court Clergy were allowed too much power. But while they ſtudied the art of raiſing themſelves by becoming learned in Fathers, Councils, and Polemic Divinity, the other ſort of Clergy applied themſelves to a quite different method, which, however, was as well ſuited as theirs, to the purpoſes they intended it ſhould anſwer. Inſtead of the Fathers they quoted Scripture, inſtead of other people's interpretations they gave them their own; and inſtead of keeping up to the dignity of the ſubject, they took all the pains they could to make it level to the meaneſt underſtandings. By this means, the breach was widened to a monſtrous degree, and while one ſide ſtood high on their learning, the other was run away with by their enthuſiaſm. But what was moſt wonderful, each ſide ſaw the other's error, and remained blind to its own; though at the ſame time, what convinced them of the one, would, if it had been impartially applied, have demonſtrated to them the other. For the common error of both was, that they contended for things as eſſential, which at the ſame time, and in the ſame breath, they confeſſed to be indifferent. By this means it was, that ſuch as meant beſt, were drawn to do the worſt of things for want of clearly apprehending their own meaning. This will fully appear to be the caſe, if we attentively conſider the principal facts mentioned in this life. Since nothing can be plainer, than that King Charles the Firſt was murdered, for maintaining the power of the Clergy, to which he ſteadily adhered, even after he had given up his own prerogatives. On the other hand, this gentleman, Mr. Axtel, thought his cauſe, the cauſe of God, and believed to the laſt moment of his life, that he ſhed his blood to very good purpoſe, if it hindered his friends from being ever reconciled to the Surplice and Common-Prayer. Theſe are reflections that naturally ariſe from the ſubject, and which therefore we have a right to make, for certainly the great uſe of this ſort of reading is, to prevent miſtakes in our own conduct, by obſerving the fatal conſequences of them in the conduct of other men.

of the Commons of England, and to leave thoſe who remained and acted, without any legal authority [B]. Yet this remnant of the Houſe of Commons, on the thirteenth of December, revived the vote of non-addreſſes, and though they were but twenty-ſix in number, took upon them to iſſue a commiſſion for trying the King, paſſing a vote on New-year's-day, That it was treaſon in the King to levy war againſt the Parliament (g). On the ninth of January, the trial of the King was proclaimed by ſound of trumpet and beat of drum, in Weſtminſter-Hall, at the Old Exchange, and in Cheapſide, and all people were ſummoned who had any thing to ſay againſt the King, to appear and be heard (h). On the twentieth of January, when the King was brought before the High Court of Juſtice; Colonel Stubberd, and Colonel Axtel, had the command of the ſoldiers below ſtairs. The King demanded of Serjeant Bradſhaw, who was the Preſident, by what authority they brought him there, and the Preſident appealing to the charge, which was in the name of the Commons and People of England, Lady Fairfax, the General's wife, cried out, It is a lye, it is falſe, not a half, not a quarter of the people, Oliver Cromwell is a rogue and a traytor, which words were repeated by Mrs. Nelſon. Upon this Colonel Axtel cried out, Down with the whores, ſhoot them, which vehemence of his made him be taken notice of (i). The people at the time of his Majeſty's paſſing to his trial, moved by the ſadneſs of the ſight, cried out God ſave the KING; which obliged ſuch as drove on his death, to procure another cry to countenance their deſign, and therefore Colonel Axtel beat the ſoldiers till they cried Juſtice! Juſtice (k)! And on the laſt day of the trial, when the common people cried God preſerve your Majeſty, the ſoldiers were again taught, by the prevailing argument of the cane, to cry out, Execution! Execution (l)! After the ſentence was paſſed, the King was carried through the middle of King-ſtreet, in a common ſedan, by two porters, who, out of reverence to his perſon, went bare-headed, till the ſoldiers, under Colonel Axtel's command, beat them and forced them to put on their hats (m). After the murder of the King, when Cromwell was ſent into Ireland, the regiment in which Colonel Axtel ſerved, was drawn out by lot for that expedition, which occaſioned his going over into that kingdom, where he made a conſiderable figure, was much eſteemed and truſted by Cromwell, and raiſed for his fidelity, courage, and conduct, as General Ludlow tells us, to the command of a regiment, and the government of Kilkenny and the adjacent precinct, which important truſt, Ludlow farther tells us, he diſcharged with diligence and ſucceſs, and in his ſtation, ſhewed a more than ordinary zeal in puniſhing thoſe Iriſh, who had been guilty of murdering the Proteſtants (n). Other writers repreſent this in quite a different light, and charge him with ſeverities, not at all inferior in cruelty to thoſe committed by the Iriſh rebels themſelves (o) [C]. [B] To leave thoſe who remained and acted without any legal authority.] The beginning of theſe diſputes in regard to civil affairs, was zeal for the conſtitution. It was thought by many able men, that the King's prerogative had entrenched too much upon the liberty of the ſubject, which certainly implied, that there was a Conſtitution, by which both ought to be regulated; and to remedy this, it was thought requiſite to have the aſſiſtance of a Parliament, the continuance of which ſhould not depend on the will of the King; to which he aſſented, and thereby altered the Conſtitution in a very material point. When this power was taken from the King, the two Houſes aſſumed to themſelves a power of making laws, which was as great an encroachment on the liberty of the ſubject, as the King's expecting as much obedience to be paid to his Proclamations, as to acts of Parliament. By degrees things went much farther, and at laſt ſo far, that even the warmeſt friends to Liberty, and thoſe too who were believed to underſtand our Conſtitution beſt, thought it entirely loſt. Serjeant Maynard who certainly was no courtier, and who was never ſuſpected of inclining too much to the power of the Crown, made no ſcruple of declaring, when the vote of Non-Addreſſes was under conſideration, that if it paſſed, the Parliament was diſſolved. He founded his judgment upon this, that the Parliament of England was the great council of the King of England; that therefore the relation was reciprocal, and that one could not ſubſiſt without the other. A vote therefore, that they would have no farther correſpondence with the King, was a plain declaration that they would be no longer his council, and then it was very natural for a lawyer, to think they would be nothing. It is alſo very remarkable, that ſuch of the wiſeſt and ableſt men, as in the beginning of this Parliament oppoſed the Crown with the greateſt vehemence, made no difficulty afterwards of declaring, that they looked upon the Houſe of Commons as diſſolved, after the firſt force was put upon it. It was from their conceiving things in this light that Mr. Denzil Holles, afterwards Lord Holles; Mr. Anneſley, afterwards Earl of Angleſey; and Sir Orlando Bridgman, ſat as judges upon this Mr. Axtel, and the reſt of the Regicides, without departing in their opinion from their former principles, as appears clearly from their behaviour on theſe trials, in which they all of them affirmed, the force put upon the Houſe made it no Houſe, and that ſuch as endeavoured to ſcreen themſelves under the authority of the Parliament, by pleading the warrants they received from the remnant that were left ſitting, had no legal juſtification, becauſe that remainder ceaſed to be a Parliament. In their judgment therefore, the murder of the King was not only Treaſon againſt his Perſon, Crown, and Dignity, but Treaſon alſo againſt the Conſtitution; becauſe it was an act done in conſequence of the Conſtitution's being broken and diſſolved, by virtue of an uſurped power. In all which, they ſeemed to have acted very ſenſibly and with great juſtice. For if a man may be guilty of Treaſon, and be puniſhed for it by law, though he pleads the King's command for what he did, which is what no Lawyer ever denied; then, by a parity of reaſon, no man can juſtify the doing an act which is Treaſon by Law, from the authority of any other part of the Conſtitution. Of this Cromwell was ſo ſenſible, that when the act for trying the King was moved to be brought into the Houſe of Commons, he ſaid (1), That if any man moved this upon deſign, he ſhould think him the greateſt traytor in the world. But ſince Providence and neceſſity had caſt them upon it, he ſhould pray God to bleſs their counſels, though he were not provided on the ſudden to give them counſel.

[C] Committed by the Iriſh rebels themſelves.] At the end of the Earl of Clarendon's hiſtory of the Iriſh rebellion there is an Appendix, in which two pieces are contained, the firſt intitled, A Collection of the ſeveral Maſſacres and Murders committed by the Iriſh ſince the 23d of October, 1641; and the ſecond is called, a Collection of ſome of the Maſſacres

1653, had turned the Long Parliament out of the Houſe, things took another turn, and he having aſſumed the ſupreme power to himſelf, ſent over his ſon Henry to Ireland, where he commanded at firſt as Major-General, and by his endeavours to eſtabliſh the new government, ſo diſguſted all the godly, but more particularly the Anabaptiſts, that on the twenty-eighth of November, 1656, they ſent Major Jones, and one Mr. Doyley, to acquaint him, that Quarter-maſter-General Vernon, Adjutant Allen, Colonel Barrowe, and Colonel Axtel, deſired to ſpeak with him, upon which he offered to confer with them immediately (p). As ſoon as they came into his preſence, Colonel Barrowe, premiſing his and their many perſonal obligations received from the Major-General, told him, that finding themſelves of late not made uſe of, they could not with ſatisfaction to their conſciences receive pay from the public, without doing ſervice for it, and therefore came to acquaint him, that they had upon ſolemn ſeeking of God, and ſerious deliberation with themſelves, repreſented to his Highneſs and the Lord Deputy, their reſolutions to quit their commands, and had ſent their reaſons for doing it; ſignifying that they had reſerved the delivering up of their commiſſions to the Major General, as a particular mark of their reſpect for him; wherefore he did in his own, and in the name of the reſt of the officers, declare, that they were from thenceforward diſcharged from any public employment in the army; and at the ſame time they all of them tendered their commiſſions, which the Major-General however did not think fit to accept; but they having publickly declared, that they looked upon their offer as a ſufficient diſcharge, he thought fit to appoint them another meeting, the next day, in the afternoon. He told them at this meeting, that he was very ſorry to find they were ſo reſolute in what they had propoſed the day before, as to giving up their commiſſions, and that it was no pleaſant thing to him to receive them, from perſons who had ſo long ſerved the public as they had done. If they quitted indeed upon a conſcientious diſſatisfaction, he knew not well what to reply, but that he hoped, when he parted with them the day before, that they would have given him time to have reaſoned the matter with them, and not have put him upon giving ſo ſudden an anſwer. But ſince conſidering how poſitive they had been, and that they had, contrary to his expectation, and that not in ſo decent a manner as he could have wiſhed, made it the talk of the town, he thought himſelf concerned forthwith to declare his acceptance of their propoſal; and that he ſhould take care, ſince they inſiſted ſo earneſtly upon it, without any provocation of his, and contrary to his deſires, they ſhould be fairly diſcharged the army, and ſatisfied what was due to each of them; and that ſince they were reſolved to retire, he ſhould wiſh them well in their private capacities, and ſhew them all reſpect befitting the place he ſtood in there; and hoped that they would mind the promiſe they made the day before, of ſerving God, and being always ready to ſerve the public, in order thereto. Upon this they ſeemed to expreſs great thankfulneſs, and very high ſatisfaction in the choice they had made; only Colonel Axtel having firſt premiſed, that he thought himſelf now on a level with the Major General, complained in very rough and bitter language of the ill uſage he had met with, and the ſlights that had been put upon him ſince the great Revolution in England, and the power of the Parliament had been devolved upon a ſingle perſon, which Mr. Cromwell bore as patiently as he could; but it appears clearly enough from the letters he wrote to Secretary Thurloe, that he was extremely ſenſible of the uſage he had met with, and looked upon theſe people, as abſolutely diſaffected both to the government in general, and to his family in particular (q) [D]. 'One Francis Friſby, an Engliſhman and a Proteſtant, Butler to the Duke of Ormond, having had 'quarter upon the rendition of Kilkenny to Cromwell, 'was apprehended by the ſaid Colonel Axtel, and for 'not confeſſing his Lord's plate, was tortured to death 'by burning matches between his fingers, in the caſtle 'of Kilkenny.

'1651. Major Shertel, an officer of his Majeſty's 'army, having delivered the caſtle of Ballimay, upon 'quarter of life and liberty to Colonel Axtel, was 'run through the body by the ſaid Colonel, and all his 'ſoldiers, to the number of one hundred and ninety, 'were killed.

'Captain Thomas Shertel, a Captain of horſe in 'his Majeſty's army, coming to Kilkenny upon ſafe 'conduct, was hanged by the ſaid Axtel, becauſe 'he had a good eſtate within two miles of Kilkenny.

'1650. Colonel Axtel hanged fifty of the inhabi'tants near Tomaſtown living under his protection, 'for no other reaſon, but that a party of Cromwell's 'army was defeated the day before in that place, by 'ſome of the Royaliſts.

'Colonel Axtel meeting one day forty men, wo'men, and children, near the wood of Kildonan, who 'were coming for greater ſecurity to live within his 'quarters, cauſed them all to be killed.

'Some ſoldiers of the king's army, being taken in 'a village in Grace's pariſh, Colonel Axtel cauſed all 'the inhabitants of the ſaid village to be apprehended, 'hanged three of them, and ſold the reſt of them to 'the iſland of Barbadoes.

'The ſaid Axtel (as matter of recreation) com'manded his troops to gather together a great num'ber of the protected people near Kilkenny, and be'ing all in a cluſter, bid the troops ruſh through them, 'and to kill as many as happened on the left hand of 'the troop, and to ſpare the reſt. Thirty perſons 'were murdered then on that account.'

[D] And to his family in particular.] The facts contained in this remarkable letter of Major-General Henry Cromwell, the reader has above in the text, and what we are to give here, regards only Mr. Cromwell's ſentiments, and the apprehenſions he was under, from the open railing and private intrigues of the Anabaptiſts and other ſectaries, with which the

from this time was very unpleaſant. He lived in a private condition upon the eſtate he had acquired in the ſervice; but inſtead of that power and authority which he had exerciſed for ſix years together over the town and diſtrict of Kilkenny, he was now in the ſtate of a diſaffected man, and not only without truſt and without authority, but alſo ſo much ſuſpected by his ſuperiors, that he could not take the ſlighteſt journey about his private affairs, without having ſpies ſet over him, and being very frequently called to account (r). All this was occaſioned by the wild principles and reſtleſs ſpirits of the Anabaptiſts, which as they had brought about the ſubverſion, firſt of one government, and then of another, were now grown as turbulent under a third. Yet Henry Cromwell, when veſted with the character of Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, was contented to watch over them without perſecuting them; and, except the great jealouſy that he expreſſed of their motions, he kept his word with them very exactly, and treated them as well as they could expect (s). After the death of the Protector, Oliver, which happened on the third of September, 1658, things took a new turn, and his ſon Richard, who had aſſumed the title of Protector, immediately after his father's death, ſaw himſelf in the beginning of the next year, reduced to the fatal neceſſity of diſſolving, what he called a Parliament, with which ended his authority, and on the ſeventh of May, 1659 (t), the remnant of the Long Parliament, reſumed the power of which they had been deprived by Cromwell; and his ſon Henry, who commanded as Lord Lieutenant in Ireland, having ſubmitted, as well as his brother Richard, Lieutenant-General Edmund Ludlow was ſent over to take the ſupreme authority there, and one of the firſt things he did, being to new model the army, Colonel Axtel came again into play, had a regiment given him, and was one of the few perſons, in whom Ludlow chiefly confided (u). It may not be amiſs to remark, that though this gentleman changed his opinion with reſpect to Church matters, and of a Preſbyterian became an Anabaptiſt, yet as to his notions of civil government he remained ſomewhat more ſteady, and was always looked upon as a zealous friend to a commonwealth. It was this diſpoſition of his, and his clear reputation for courage and conduct, as an officer, that induced General Ludlow to make choice of him, to command one diviſion of the Iriſh Brigade, that was ſent over to maintain the Parliament in poſſeſſion of their authority, and to keep out the King, which however they were ſo far from doing, that they contributed very much to his return (w). The riſing of Sir George Booth, which happened in Auguſt the ſame year, was the occaſion of their being tranſported to England;

the army in Ireland abounded, even in a greater proportion, than the army in England, where however they were numerous enough. His words are theſe: 'Now although they pretended, ſays he, that what 'they had thus generally charged me with, was the 'ground of their diſſatisfaction; yet amongſt all the 'venom they ſpit againſt me, and in all the plain-'neſs and freedom they were pleaſed to uſe towards 'me, as looking on themſelves to be on even 'ground with me, they would neither now, nor here-'after, inſtance any one particular, whereon to bot-'tom their general calumnies, although myſelf, and 'others, have been urging them thereunto. I can-'not deny, but my actions, and the way I have 'taken for the management of things here, having 'thwarted and checked that exorbitant power, which 'they formerly exerciſed, may probably have added 'to their other diſcontents. Yet 'tis notoriouſly 'known, how theſe gentlemen did with more than 'ordinary inſolence, manifeſt their diſcontents, and 'that in as public manner as they could, againſt 'his Highneſs and the government, when his High-'neſs firſt aſſumed it; and how they have perſiſted 'and grown therein, is as well known, and that 'they have not acquieſced in their own diſſatisfactions, 'but have likewiſe endeavoured to corrupt and ſe-'duce all others, whom they thought capable of re-'ceiving the impreſſions of their factious and trou-'bleſome principle: It has been ſince obſerved by 'others, and ſince ſaid by ſome of their own party, 'that whatever they might pretend to me, as the 'grounds and cauſe of this their withdrawing; yet 'that the apprehenſions which two of them, namely 'Allen and Vernon, had of being under his High-'neſs's diſpleaſure, and the mean eſteem the other 'two had of their commands, with their general diſſa-'tisfaction to the government, was the true prin-'cipal cauſe which induced them to it; and though 'they have ſaid, that the godly are diſcouraged, I 'do yet find a general rejoicing in thoſe that are 'godly, ſober, and well affected; that theſe gen-'tlemen have thus quitted their employments, and 'none troubled but a few of their own party, who 'are more afflicted, that theſe gentlemen have thus 'befooled themſelves, in this their action, rather than 'for any danger imminent to themſelves (3).'

After this, Mr. Cromwell grew ſo uneaſy at the aſperſions thrown upon him by theſe people, that in another letter to the Secretary, he intimated a deſire to lay down his own command, in order to retire and live in peace; on which the Secretary wrote him a long letter, dated from Whitehall, December 16, 1656, in which there are ſome things, that may contribute to the reader's more clearly apprehending theſe matters, and therefore it may not be amiſs to tranſcribe a paragraph or two.

'Your Lordſhip's of the third inſtant, came to my 'hands upon Friday laſt; ſince which, viz. yeſter-'day, I received another, whereby I was ſorry to 'find your Lordſhip is under ſome indiſpoſition of 'body, but hope that your next will bring us the 'good news, that the Lord hath again reſtored you, 'as alſo the young Lady, which we heartily pray 'for. I humbly thank your Lordſhip, for the great 'pains you have taken in your's of the third in-'ſtant, to make ſo particular relation of what paſſed 'between your Lordſhip, and thoſe officers, who 'have quitted their commands, which I communi-'cated to his Highneſs, that as he had an account 'of the former part of this buſineſs, from your own 'hand, ſo he might alſo underſtand the iſſue it was 'brought to.

'I am very ſorry to ſee, that diſcontent hath ſo 'far prevailed upon the ſpirits of thoſe, who do 'profeſs to live by higher principles; and truly, I 'ſhould look upon it, as a judgment from God, 'upon me, if I ſhould deſert my place, and leave 'my ſtation, incapacitating myſelf for any public 'ſervice, becauſe all things did not ſquare juſt with 'my apprehenſions (which is the beſt of their caſe), 'or rather, as ſome ſay, becauſe I could not govern 'abſolutely excluſive of all others, this being (if is 'ſaid) the true ground of their diſcontent. Be it 'what it will, it is from themſelves, having no pro-'vocation thereunto from your Lordſhip, which I do 'much rejoice in; and I am very confident, that 'when they do ſeriouſly conſider this action, and with 'an impartial eye view what was in the bottom of 'their ſpirits, that moved them to take and act theſe 'reſolutions, they will be aſhamed of themſelves be-'fore the Lord, and ſearch their hearts, what might 'be the cauſe why the Lord ſhould leave them to 'this deluſion (4).'

but they had no ſhare in reducing him, which was performed before their arrival, by Major-General Lambert (x). Their coming, however, was eſteemed of great ſervice to the Parliament, though it proved otherwiſe; for Colonel Zanchey, who commanded them, concurred with the army in putting a new force upon that aſſembly, which laſted till Chriſtmas, and then the Rump, as it was called, was again reſtored by the terror of Monk's army, which was marching out of Scotland (y). As he at the beginning declared poſitively for the Parliament, Colonel Axtel, and the reſt of the officers of the Iriſh Brigade, kept that body of troops which were eſteemed the beſt in the kingdom, from acting againſt him, which if they had done in conjunction with Lambert, his deſign in all probability had miſcarried. But as Monk very well knew, that thoſe forces would never concur in reſtoring the King, while under the officers who then commanded them, he reſolved to try whether it might not be poſſible, to engage them firſt to change their officers, and then to fall into his meaſures, which was the moſt critical point he had to manage. They were at that time quartered in Yorkſhire, and thither he ſent Colonel Redman, who had commanded a part of thoſe troops in Ireland, under Henry Cromwell, and who was turned out by Ludlow. He carried with him ſome of his friends who had ſerved under him, and on his firſt appearance, the beſt part of the Iriſh brigade very fairly told Colonel Zanchey, and Colonel Axtel, that they might take what meaſures they thought fit, but that for themſelves, they were determined to ſerve under Colonel Redman, and their old officers (z). This revolt gave the death's wound to the Republic; for Colonel Redman, purſuant to the orders he had received from General Monk, immediately marched that body of old troops into Cheſhire, which ſo weakened Lambert's army, that was before ſuperior to Monk's, that it left him in no condition to oppoſe the march of that General to London, which Colonel Axtel perceiving, reſolved to ſhift for himſelf, and being thenceforward deprived of all command, endeavoured to ſettle his private affairs, and ſecure himſelf the beſt way he could (a). But when a freſh opportunity offered of aſſerting the Good Old Cauſe, Colonel Axtel ſhewed his affection to it, by venturing his life in a very deſperate undertaking, and that too as a private man. The occaſion was this: the Council of State had committed General Lambert to the Tower, in the beginning of the month of March; but on the ninth of April, 1660 (b), he made his eſcape from thence, and got down as far as Daventry in Northamptonſhire, where, having aſſembled a conſiderable body of horſe, he was joined by Colonel Okey, Colonel Axtel, Colonel Cobbet, Lieutenant-Colonel Young, Major Creed, Captain Timothy Clare, Captain Gregory, Captain Spinage, beſides diverſe ſoldiers that were Anabaptiſts (c). Colonel Richard Ingoldſby, and Colonel Streater, who were ſent to reduce Lambert, followed him with ſuch diligence, that on Eaſter-day, which was that year on the twenty-ſecond of April, they came up with him in a plain near Daventry, having only a brook between them. When the two bodies came near, juſt as Colonel Ingoldſby was going to charge, Streater commanded ſix files of muſqueteers to advance. One file gave fire, and hurt one or two of Lambert's horſe. His drums beat, and in good order he advanced, having given ſtrict command, that his muſqueteers ſhould not fire, till they came as near as puſh of pike. But Lambert's men held the noſes of their piſtols towards the ground, and Nelthorp's troop came off to Ingoldſby, Haſlerigg's troop having deſerted him before. For Colonel Ingoldſby ſending Captain Elſemore before him with a party, as he marched to find Lambert, met Captain Haſlerigg, and took him priſoner, but releaſed him upon his parole, to ſend his whole troop over to join Ingoldſby, which he faithfully performed, ſending it to them by his Quarter-Maſter; but he retired himſelf. Colonel Ingoldſby told Lambert he was his priſoner, whereupon Creed and the reſt earneſtly intreated him to do what he pleaſed with them, but to let Lambert eſcape, acquainting him that his life could be of no advantage to him, which Ingoldſby abſolutely refuſed, telling them, that he would not be treacherous to thoſe that had commanded him, by ſuch an ungenerous act. Lambert then turned about his horſe, and attempted to make his eſcape; but Ingoldſby purſued him ſo cloſe, that he came quickly up to him, and vowed to piſtol him if he did not immediately yield. Lambert, in great depreſſion of ſpirits, twice prayed him to let him eſcape; but when he ſaw he could not prevail, ſubmitted as all as the reſt did, except Okey, Axtel, and Cleare, who eſcaped (d). There is ſtill in being a very extraordinary letter, written by Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, giving an account of this defeat, which deſerves the reader's notice, and is therefore preſerved in the notes [E]. [E] Is therefore preſerved in the notes.] This ſingular piece was after the Earl of Sandwich's deceaſe found among his papers, and ſhews plainly the importance of this defeat, in the opinion of that ſtateſman, who was held to have the beſt head for public affairs of any man in his time. It is very ſhort indeed, but ſhort as it is, we find it very extenſive in point of ſenſe, and we may likewiſe obſerve that cant ſo univerſally prevailed at that time, that even thoſe men who moſt deſpiſed it were obliged to uſe it, and that too not only in public pieces, but in private letters to their friends.

A letter from Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, directed for General Montague, dated Monday morning, indorſed April the 23d, 1660. (5)

(5) Tranſcript from the Earl of Sandwich's MS. in the third Vol. of Mr. Smith's MS. Collection, p. 325.

'MY Lord, your Lordſhip's letter brings that 'account of the fleet, and ſo ſatisfactory as 'might be expected from it, ſince put under the 'conduct of ſuch a general ——— This morning 'the certain news of Colonel Lambert his being 'taken, came to the council. There appeared with 'him ſix troops of horſe in Daventry-Fields in Nor-'thamptonſhire.

This was the laſt ſtruggle that was made in favour of the Commonwealth; and Colonel Axtel uſed his utmoſt induſtry afterwards to conceal himſelf, as foreſeeing that it would not be long, before he might be called to an account, for the large ſhare he had taken in the trial of the King: but his care in this reſpect was to very little purpoſe, for before the cloſe of the month, he was diſcovered and committed to priſon (e). We are told by one of his friends, that he was betrayed by a Royaliſt, who having engaged him at a meeting, on pretence of treating with him for the purchaſe of ſome lands, gave notice of the time and place by which he was apprehended and committed to the Tower (f). After the King's Reſtoration, the bill of indemnity being then depending in the Houſe of Commons, they, on the fourteenth of June, 1660, reſolved, That Daniel Axtel ſhould be one of the Twenty excepted out of that bill (g). On the twelfth of July following, a warrant was ſent for his detention in the Tower, for high treaſon (h). On the twenty-ninth of Auguſt, the King paſſed the ſo long expected act, of free and general pardon, out of which only two and fifty perſons were excepted, of which Colonel Daniel Axtel was the fiftieth, as alſo the two perſons diſguiſed in frocks and vizors, who appeared upon the ſcaffold at the murder of King Charles I., which perſons were left to be proceeded againſt as traitors, according to the laws of England (i). On the tenth of October following, the grand jury for the county of Middleſex, having found bills againſt twenty-eight perſons, for their concern in the King's murder, of which Mr. Axtel was the laſt, they were brought to the ſeſſions houſe in the Old Bailey, where Colonel Axtel was the ſame day arraigned, upon an indictment for compaſſing and imagining the death of the late King; when for ſome time he refuſed to plead, alledging that what he had done was in purſuance of an Act of Parliament, and therefore he conceived no inferior court ought to judge of it, to which point he deſired he might have counſel aſſigned (k). But the Court having reaſoned with him, and told him, that in caſe of treaſon, it was the ſame thing to ſtand mute, or to confeſs the indictment, he was prevailed upon to plead Not Guilty. When he was aſked, How he would be tried? and told that the proper anſwer was, By God and his country; he ſaid that was not lawful, God not being locally preſent: however, he ſoon after made the uſual anſwer, and put himſelf upon his trial. This did not come on till the fifteenth of October, 1660, when, after challenging ten of the jury, the indictment was opened, in which the Counſel for the Crown obſerved, That the High Court erected for the trial of the late King, had all the formalities of a court, ſuch as their Preſident, their Counſel, their Chaplain, and their Guards; and as ſome of their Judges, one of their Counſel, and their Chaplain had been already tried, they had now brought this gentleman to the bar, as the Commander of the Guard, and then proceeded to call their evidence (l). Mr. Holland Simpſon proved, that Colonel Axtel had the command of the ſoldiers below ſtairs, and threatened to ſhoot Lady Fairfax for diſturbing the Court. Colonel Hercules Huncks depoſed, that on the day the King died, himſelf, Colonel Phayre, Colonel Hacker, and Cromwell, being in a room together, Cromwell deſired him to ſign a warrant for the King's execution, which he having refuſed to do, and Cromwell having given him ſome harſh language on that account, Mr. Axtel ſaid, 'Colonel Huncks, I am aſhamed of you, the ſhip is now coming into the harbour, and 'will you ſtrike ſail before we come to anchor.' Mr. Axtel poſitively denied this, and told Colonel Huncks, that himſelf was named in the warrant for execution, and that he wiſhed he did not make others a peace-offering to ſave himſelf. Sir Purbeck Temple ſwore, That Mr. Axtel beat the ſoldiers to make them cry Juſtice and Execution, that he laughed and ſcoffed with them during the trial, and that he ſuffered, and, as the witneſs believed, procured the ſoldiers to fire powder in the palms of their hands, which threw ſuch clouds of ſmoke into the King's face, that he was obliged to riſe out of his chair, and beat it off with his hand. Mr. John Jeonar, who was one of the King's domeſtic ſervants, and attended him at the trial, gave poſitive evidence, that when the Court broke up the firſt day, Colonel Axtel ordered the Guards to cry Juſtice, Juſtice; and the laſt day, Execution, Execution; and he farther depoſed, that being very near the Colonel, he heard him lead that cry, by making uſe of the ſame words himſelf (m). One Samuel Burden, who had been a ſoldier in the King's army, but at the time of the trial in Colonel Axtel's regiment, ſwore, that himſelf and others were commanded by the Colonel to give evidence againſt the King, and for that purpoſe were ſent to Mr. Cook, who managed the charge againſt the King, to have their examinations taken, which was accordingly done. This man likewiſe ſwore, that the Colonel ſent one Eliſha Axtel with a file of ſoldiers, to take boat and go down to the common hangman, who lived beyond the Tower, in order to fetch him to execute the King (n). Lieutenant Colonel Nelſon depoſed, That in private converſation at Dublin, Colonel Axtel acknowledged to him, that he was concerned in the ſecret of managing the King's execution, and being deſired by the witneſs to tell him who the perſons were that appeared upon the ſcaffold in vizors, he told him they were two Serjeants, well known both to him and to the witneſs, and that their names were Hewlet and Walker (o). Such was the evidence given to ſupport the charge in the indictment, for compaſſing and imagining the death of the King. In his defence, Colonel Axtel alledged, that he was a commiſſion officer under the Lord Fairfax, as he had been before under the Earl of Eſſex, and by his commiſſion was to obey his ſuperior officer (who commanded him that day to Weſtminſter-Hall), according to the cuſtoms of war; ſo that if he had diſobeyed his ſuperior officer, then he had died, and now muſt die for obeying him. But the Court told him he might have refuſed without any danger, as well as Colonel Huncks; and that paſſive as well as active obedience was required from every man, and that neither his nor his ſuperior's commiſſion bid him kill his father, much leſs the father of his country. As for the muſquets, mounted towards the Lady, he ſaid, that if a Lady grew uncivil to diſturb the Court, he could do no leſs than check her: That his ſtriking the ſoldiers for not crying Juſtice was a miſtake; for he ſaid he ſtruck them becauſe they did it, ſaying, I'll give you Juſtice: That his inciting them at the ſentence to cry Execution, was the Execution of Juſtice, and that could do no hurt. The Court took a great deal of pains to ſhew him the inſufficiency of theſe pretences, and how incompatible they were with the conſtitution of this kingdom, and the laws of the land (p), upon which ſubject we meet with a very curious and inſtructive paſſage, in the Reports of a very learned Judge [F]. The trial laſted, on account of the priſoner's long and large defence, for upwards of three hours, but the jury, without

But in order to judge of this point, it is neceſſary to conſider Mr. Axtel's defence more at large, eſpecially as ſome writers magnify it, as the ſtrongeſt, cleareſt, and moſt heroic piece any where extant (6). The beſt and moſt ſenſible ſpeech he made was this, wherein he puts the objection reſolved by Kelyng, and therefore let it ſerve as a ſpecimen of his eloquence:

(6) Ludlow's Memoirs, Vol. iii. p. 82—86. Oldmixon's Hiſt. of the Stuarts, Vol. i. p. 482, 483.

'My Lords, I muſt acknowledge my ignorance of 'the laws, being a thing I never ſtudied, nor have 'the knowledge of. But I have heard it is the duty 'of your Lordſhips and the Judges to be of counſel 'for the priſoner in things wherein he is ignorant in 'matter of Law, to make his juſt defence; and there'fore, my Lord, the indictment itſelf being matter 'of Law, if your Lordſhip pleaſes not to grant me 'counſel to ſpeak to matters of Law, I humbly pray 'that your Lordſhips will be pleaſed that for want 'of knowledge in formalities, punctilioes, and nice'ties of the Law, I may not undo myſelf. I have 'heard by a learned Judge, that though the Judge be 'of counſel to the King, yet by his oath he is alſo to 'be counſellor to the priſoner, and ſtands as mediator 'between the King and priſoner; and therefore, my 'Lord, I ſhall beg that humble favour, that wherein 'I ſhall fall ſhort to make the beſt improvement of 'my plea in matter of Law, that your Lordſhips 'will help me, and not take advantages againſt me, 'as to the niceties, formalities, and punctilioes of the 'Law; and my Lord, this is a reſemblance of that 'great day where Chriſt will be Judge, and will 'judge the ſecrets of all hearts, and of all words, and 'of all perſons, and by him all actions are weighed: 'he knows all our hearts, and whether there be malice, 'or how it ſtands in the frame of each heart before 'him in this place; and therefore I hope, there will 'be nothing by prejudging, or any thing by precluding to be ſo black a perſon, as is ſeemed to be ſaid 'againſt me: my Lords, I muſt ſhorten the time, and 'come to ſpeak as to the authority.

'Lord Chief Baron. As to what, Sir?

'Col. Ax. I ſpeak as to the authority by which, or 'under which, I acted; I humbly conceive, my Lord, 'under favour, that I am not within the compaſs of 'that ſtatute of 25 Edw. III.; for that, queſtionleſs, 'muſt intend private perſons, councelling, compaſſing, 'or imagining the death of the King. But you know, 'my Lords, the war was firſt ſtated by the Lords and 'Commons, the Parliament of England, and by vir'tue of their authority was forced to be raiſed; and 'they pretended by Law, that the right of the militia 'was in them, and your Lordſhips well remember, in 'ſeveral declarations and acts that were mutually ex'changed between his Majeſty and Parliament; and, 'my Lord, that was the authority, the Lords and 'Commons aſſembled in Parliament, raiſed a force, 'and made the Earl of Eſſex General, and after him 'the Earl of Mancheſter of the Eaſtern aſſociation, 'and after that, Sir Thomas Fairfax, Lord General 'of the forces; by this authority I acted, and this au'thority I humbly conceive to be legal, becauſe this 'Parliament was called by the King's writ, choſe by 'the people, and paſſed a bill they ſhould not be diſ'ſolved without their own conſents, that the Parlia'ment was in being when the trial was, and a que'ſtion whether yet legally diſſolved.

'In the fourth place, they were not only owned '(and obeyed) at home, but abroad, to be the chief 'authority of the nation, and alſo owned by foreign 'ſtates and kingdoms, who ſent Ambaſſadors for that 'purpoſe: under them did all Judges of the land 'act, who ought to be the eye of the land, and the 'very light of the people to guide them in their 'right actions, and I remember the Judges upon trial '(I have read it of high-treaſon), Judge Thorp, Ni'chols, and Jermin, have declared it publicly, that 'it was a lawful, juſtifiable thing, by the law of 'the land to obey the Parliament of England. My 'Lord, it further appears as to their authority over 'the people of this nation, petitioning them as the 'ſupreme and lawful authority; and, my Lords, as 'I have heard it hath been objected that the Houſes 'of Lords and Commons could make no act; truly, 'my Lord, if you will not admit them to be acts, 'though they entitle them ſo, call them ſo, and are 'obeyed as ſo, by the Judges, Miniſters, and Officers 'of ſtate, and by all other perſons of the nation, yet, 'I hope, they cannot be denied to be orders of Par'liament, and were they no more ſo but orders, yet 'were they ſufficient, as I humbly conceive, to bear 'out ſuch as acted thereby; and, my Lord, the Par'liament thus conſtituted, and having made their 'Generals, he, by their authority, did conſtitute and 'appoint me to be an inferior officer in the army, 'ſerving them in the quarters of the Parliament, and 'within their power, and what I have done, my 'Lord, it hath been done only as a ſoldier, deriving 'my power from the General. He had his power 'from the fountain, to wit, the Lords and Commons: 'and, my Lord, this being done, as hath been ſaid 'by ſeveral that I was there, and had command in 'Weſtminſter-hall, truly, my Lord, if the Parliament 'command the General, and the General the inferior 'officers, I am bound by my commiſſion, accord'ing to the laws and cuſtoms of war, to be where the 'regiment is; I came not thither voluntarily, but 'by command of the General, who had a commiſſion '(as I ſaid before) from the Parliament. I was no 'counſellor, no contriver, I was no Parliament-man, 'none of the Judges, none that ſentenced, ſigned, 'none that had any hand in the execution, only that 'which is charged, is, that I was an officer in the 'army; if that be ſo great a crime, I conceive I am 'no more guilty than the Earl of Eſſex, Fairfax, 'or the Lord of Mancheſter.' [Who was then ſitting 'on the bench.] Judge Mallet told him, he was not charged as an officer in the army. 'My Lords, ſaid 'he, that is the main thing they do inſiſt upon. My 'Lord, I am no more guilty, than his Excellency the without going from the bar, found him guilty. On the ſixteenth of October, he was brought up again to the Seſſions-houſe, in order to receive ſentence, at which time Mr. Axtel inſiſted, that there was no overt-act proved againſt him ſufficient to ſupport the indictment, and ſuggeſted, that he died only for words; upon which the Lord Chief Baron obſerved, that it was otherwiſe, that he was preſent in the Court, beating the ſoldiers, and ſending for an executioner, which were all of them facts, and not words. Upon this Colonel Axtel appealed to God, that he did not find himſelf guilty of conſulting, contriving, or having any hand in the death of the King; and concluded that he was innocent, and prayed God that his blood might not cry againſt them (q). Then ſilence being commanded, the Lord Chief Baron made a long ſpeech, in which he told Colonel Francis Hacker and Mr. Axtel, that they had no cauſe to hope for mercy, nor was there any room for mercy, and then pronounced that ſentence which is uſually given in caſes of high-treaſon (r). After he was carried back to Newgate, he ſhewed himſelf very full of ſpirit and courage, ſpoke to every body that was about him with great vehemence and zeal for the cauſe in which he died, as appears very fully from the account of his behaviour, printed after his death, by the care of thoſe of his party [G]. In this diſpoſition he continued, without the leaſt alteration, or ſinking of his ſpirits, which muſt be

'Lord General Monk, who acted by the ſame authority, and all the people in the three nations; and, my Lord, I humbly ſuppoſe, if the authority had only been an authority in fact, and not right, yet thoſe that acted under them ought not to be queſtioned; but if the authority commanded, whatſoever offence they committed, eſpecially that that guided me was no leſs, than the declared judgment of the Lords and Commons ſitting in Parliament; they declared that was their right as to the militia, and having explained ſeveral ſtatutes of Henry VII., wherein the King having interchanged ſeveral declarations with the Parliament, the Parliament comes to make an explanation on that ſtatute, and, my Lord, it is in folio 280, wherein they do poſitively expound it, and declare it as their allowed judgment. To clear up all ſcruples, to all that ſhould take up arms for them, ſays the Parliament, there, as to the ſtatute of the 11 of Henry VII., chap. 1. which is printed at large, comes there to explain it in general, and comes here, folio 281, and gives this judgment: it is not, ſay they, agreeable to reaſon or conſcience, that any one's duty ſhould be known, if the judgment of the High Court of Parliament be not a rule to them. In the next place, this is the next guidance, rule, and judgment of Parliament upon the expoſition of this ſtatute, and as they have ſaid in ſeveral places (was it not too much to take up your Lordſhip's time), they are the proper Judges and Expounders of the Law. The High Court of Parliament have taken upon them to expound the Law, and ſaid, that we Lawyers will give the meaning of the text, contrary to what they have expounded the meaning under their hands. In the ſame declaration, his Majeſty is pleaſed to quit that ſtatute upon which I ſtand indicted, the 25 Edward III., where they do, my Lord, expound this very ſtatute, in the declaration made in 1643, folio 722. I come to the declared judgment, wherein they did poſitively ſay, that the perſons that do act under their authority, ought not to be queſtioned as perſons guilty, folio 727; that is the expoſition that the Lords and Commons aſſembled in Parliament do make upon the ſtatute (7).'

(7) State Trials, Vol. ii. p. 373, 374. He added, that if the repreſentatives of the people were guilty, the people were guilty, and then it would be impoſſible to find a jury.

This ſpeech ſhews how capable Mr. Axtel was of defending himſelf, and pleading for his life; and at the ſame time demonſtrates how calmly, equally, and juſtly, the Court dealt with him, allowing him all the liberty requiſite for a man in his condition. But notwithſtanding all theſe plauſible arguments, the Lord Chief Juſtice before mentioned, has told us what the Law is, and what a man has to truſt to, when he comes before a Court of Juſtice, in theſe words: '(8) Memorandum, that upon the trial of one Axtel, a ſoldier, who commanded the guards at the King's trial, and at his murder; he juſtified, that all he did, was as a ſoldier, by the command of his ſuperior officer, whom he muſt obey or die. It was reſolved that was no excuſe, for his ſuperior was a traitor, and all that joined with him in that act were traitors, and did by that approve the treaſon, and where the command is traiterous, there the obedience to that command is alſo traiterous.'

(8) Kelyng's Reports, p. 13.

[G] After his death by the care of his party.] He aſſerted conſtantly, that he was a martyr for the good old cauſe; ſaid, he wiſhed the King as well as his own ſoul; but conceived that they had murdered him, and might as well have done it in the Tower, as have made all that buſtle; for they had nothing in their own Law, or in God's law, that would condemn him, but it was enough, his name was Axtel. Such was his diſpoſition, and ſuch his notion of the juſtice that was done him. But to proceed with that relation which his friends have given of him.

Having given an account to ſome perſons for their ſatisfaction, about his proceedings againſt the rebels in Ireland, he ſaid, I can ſay in humility, that God did uſe me as an inſtrument in my place, for ſuppreſſing of the bloody enemy, and when I conſidered their bloody cruelty in murdering ſo many thouſands of Proteſtants and innocent ſouls, that word was much upon my heart; give her blood to drink for ſhe is worthy; and ſometimes we neither gave nor took quarter, though ſelf-preſervation would have ſaid, give that which you may expect to have.

One coming in told him, that his fellow-priſoner died nobly and chearfully (well, ſaid he, how do they ſtand); anſwer was made, upon a ladder. Bleſſed be God, ſaid he, it is a Jacob's ladder.

The ſun ſhining in the room, he ſaid, If it be ſo glorious to behold the ſun, what will it be to behold the Son of Glory? Laying his hand upon (his fellow-priſoner) Colonel Hacker, he ſaid, Come, brother, be not ſo ſad; by this time to-morrow we ſhall be with our Father in glory; and what hurt will they do us, to bring us through the croſs to the crown? Well, our God is the God of Newgate.

Then the officer coming to carry them down into the dungeon, he took his leave of many of his friends then preſent, ſaying, Love the Lord Jeſus, love the Lord, and weep not for me, for God hath wiped away all tears; and coming to the door of the dungeon ſaid, I am now going to my bed of roſes, my laſt bed.

Many friends being with him, there was an eminent godly miniſter of the Preſbyterian way, and Colonel Axtel taking him by the hand, ſaid, I have one word to ſpeak to you, it is much upon my heart, that one great cauſe, why the Lord contends thus with his people, is for want of their love towards them that were not of their minds; to which the miniſter replied, Truly, Sir, I think ſo too; the Lord help us, that wherein we ſee we have done amiſs we may do ſo no more.

Then ſaid Colonel Axtel, I bleſs God I have not much to charge myſelf with in this matter: Colonel Hacker then ſaid, but I have much to complain of in that matter. Colonel Axtel afterwards ſitting on his bed-ſide, clapping his hands, ſaid, if I had a thouſand lives I would lay them all down for the Cauſe: whereupon another godly miniſter then preſent, aſked him what he meant by the Cauſe. Colonel Axtel replied, Sir, I tell you I mean the cauſe which we were encouraged to, and engaged in under the Parliament, which was for common right and freedom, and againſt the Surplice and Common-prayer book; and I tell you, that Surplices and Common-prayer books ſhall not ſtand long in England, for it is not of God.

be attributed to his notions of religion, that had made ſuch an impreſſion upon his mind, as entirely prevented his feeling any thing of that weakneſs and terror, which is incident to human nature, at the near approach to death, and of a violent and ſhameful death eſpecially (s). But the account beforementioned ſhews us, that he remained firm to the laſt, and ſpoke with the ſame freedom that day he died, as on any other in his whole life [H]. On Friday the nineteenth of October, about nine in the morning, Colonel Francis Hacker, and Colonel Daniel Axtel, were drawn on one hurdle from Newgate to Tyburn, where they behaved with great boldneſs and reſolution, more eſpecially the latter, who was the better ſpeaker of the two, and who did not fail to juſtify his conduct to the people, with the ſame ſort of arguments he had uſed before his Judges, as may be ſeen in a note (t) [I]. After the execution was performed, the head of Colonel Axtel was ſet up at the farther end of Weſtminſter-Hall, and his quarters were in like manner diſpoſed

And afterwards thinking he ſhould not die that day, deſired ſome retirement, but news coming that he muſt die within an hour (though it was not ſo); he quickly made himſelf ready to go, and looking upon his gloves, ſaid, Theſe are my wedding gloves, my mortal muſt marry immortality.

Some friends going to ſee him the night before he was executed, found him at ſupper very chearful, and many being preſent, he ſaid, take heed of temporiſing, &c. for that hath been the occaſion of great evil. Then ſpeaking to an officer there preſent that had continued till of late in the army, ſaid, Brother, thou haſt been greatly guilty herein, the Lord forgive thee, thou haſt a great hand in this. To which the perſon replied, I confeſs I have been ſo too much. Colonel Axtel anſwered, there is yet mercy for thee if the Lord give repentance.

Moreover, he ſaid, The Lord forgive that poor wretch, Lieutenant-Colonel Nelſon, for he hath ſworn falſely in his evidence, and now is that word made good, that brother ſhall betray brother unto death; and ſpeaking of Colonel Tomlinſon, ſaid, Ah! he hath appeared five pound lighter in twenty, than I thought him to be; and for Colonel Huncks, he was the uncivileſt of all about the late King, and yet he comes in a witneſs againſt Hacker and me.

That evening many friends being with him, he prayed with them; and in that duty, the Lord, by his Spirit, filled him with excellent expreſſions to the great refreſhing of thoſe about him, and bewailing the great diviſions amongſt God's people: he ſaid, Lord, if they will not live together in love, thou wilt make them lie together in ſufferings. Then minding their preſent condition, ſaid, Lord, death is the King of terrors to nature, but it is a believer's choice friend; it is thy high-way to lead us into glory. After prayer, taking notice of his daughter, he ſaid to her, Get an intereſt in Chriſt, and keep cloſe to him, he will be a better father to thee than I; and ſo took his leave of her (9).

(9) Speeches and prayers of ſome of the late King's Judges, 4*to*. 1660, p. 85, 86.

[H] On that day he died, as on any other in his whole life.] It is very clear from the account that has been already given, that no man could behave with greater firmneſs than Mr. Axtel did; yet was he very far from boaſting of it, or from attributing it to his natural courage: on the contrary, he checked ſome of his friends for praiſing his conſtancy, and very wiſely adviſed them, to ſay nothing of him till they ſaw him upon the uppermoſt round of the ladder: he told his daughter at the ſame time, That he had left Jeſus Chriſt an executor in truſt for her (10). This was in the evening of the day before he died, in which day, he is ſaid to have prayed ſolemnly five times, by which, very probably, he heated himſelf to ſuch a degree, as ſerved to keep up that extraordinary fervour he ſhewed to the laſt.

(10) Ibid. p. 84.

The day of their execution being come, ſeveral godly miniſters ſpent ſome time in prayer with Colonel Axtel and Colonel Hacker; and many friends coming in to pay their laſt reſpects, Colonel Axtel ſeeing one of his familiar friends and companions, ſaid, My dear brother, thou art better than I am, and yet I muſt go to Heaven before thee for all that.

He very chearfully ſaid to diverſe then with him, 'Dear friends, rejoice, I am going where ye ſhall be 'alſo; yea, where we ſhall be for ever with the Lord, 'and never part, and be without any more change. 'I beſeech you follow the Lamb wherever he goeth, 'though he may lead you in a harſh, diſmal, and 'difficult way; yet at laſt he will bring you into a 'pleaſant path, and cauſe you to lie down in pleaſant 'paſtures in the land of reſt.

'Oh! be faithful unto the death, and he will give 'you a crown of life, as he hath given to your 'ſuffering brethren. Oh! all that we have or do 'ſuffer, is but to make Chriſt and heaven more 'ſweet, dear, and glorious unto us; all the ſad ſteps 'we ſhall tread on this ladder, is but to mount us 'to heaven, for at the top are angels ready to receive 'us, as was on Jacob's ladder; ALL the things I 'meet with move me not, I bleſs my God, for I am 'ſure to fight a good fight, and finiſh my courſe with 'joy.'

Afterwards taking his leave of his ſon, embracing him in his arms, he ſaid, My dear ſon, fare thee well, I muſt leave thee, get an intereſt in Chriſt and love him, nothing elſe will ſtand thee in ſtead, but an intereſt in him. Then calling for his Bible, he hugged it, ſaying, this hath the whole cauſe in it, and I may carry this without offence; and calling to a friend, he deſired him to remember his love to the congregation where he was a member; and after took his leave of all his friends, exhorting them, with much chearfulneſs, to love the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and keep cloſe to him, and ſo with great joy addreſſed himſelf to go to his next work (11).

(11) State Trials, Vol. ii. p. 414.

[I] As may be ſeen in a Note.] When they came to the place of execution, Mr. Axtel deſired leave of the Sheriff to ſpeak freely to the people, becauſe, as he ſaid, it was the laſt time he was to ſpeak. The Sheriff told him, that he knew very well what the court forbid him to enter upon when at his trial, which therefore he ſhould avoid there, and confine himſelf to his preſent concern, and then he ſhould have free leave to deliver what he thought fit, the rather becauſe he had intimated that he would ſpeak ſomewhat for the benefit of the people. This leave thus obtained, Mr. Axtel turned towards the people with a rope about his neck; and, becauſe Colonel Hacker was no great orator, delivered the ſenſe of them both to a prodigious concourſe of people, in a ſpeech to the effect following:

I ſay, the very cauſe for which I have engaged is contained in this book of God (having the Bible in his hand), both in the civil and religious rights of it, which I leave to you (giving the book to Mr. Knowles). You ſee a dead man living, and yet I hope I ſhall live to all eternity, through the mediation of Jeſus Chriſt the Mediator of the covenant of Free Grace. I muſt truly tell you, that before the late wars it pleaſed the Lord to call me by his Grace through the work of the miniſtry; and afterwards keeping a day of humiliation in faſting and prayer, with Mr. Simeon Aſh, Mr. Love, Mr. Woodcock, and other miniſters in Laurence-Lane, they did ſo clearly ſtate the cauſe of the Parliament, that I was fully convinced in my own conſcience of the juſtneſs of the war, and thereupon engaged in the Parliament ſervice (which, as I did, and do believe) was the cauſe of the Lord; I ventured my life freely for it, and now I die for it.

Then Mr. Sheriff ſaid to this purpoſe, Sir, remember yourſelf.

Colonel Axtel proceeded: And after the work of the Lord was done in England, my lot caſt me in the ſervice of Ireland, and I thank the Lord I was ſerviceable to the Engliſh nation in that country, and have diſcharged my duty fully, according to the truſt committed to me there. As for the fact for which I now ſuffer, it is for words, only for words, and but for words, and the ſentence is already reverſed in my own conſcience; and it will be reverſed by Jeſus Chriſt, disposed of, so as to become spectacles in other public places. But the body of Mr. Hacker was, by his Majesty's great favour, given entire to his friends, and by their care was by and by; I pray God, from the very bottom of my soul, to forgive all that have had any hand in my death, both witnesses and jury, and the court that passed sentence; for considering the doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ, as he hath laid it down, Matt. v. 44. 'It hath been said of old time, love your neighbours, and hate your enemies; but I say unto you, 'love your enemies, and pray for them that hate and 'despitefully use you, that you may be the children 'of your father which is in heaven.'

I desire, according to this doctrine, from the bottom of my heart, that God would give them true repentance, and not lay their sin to their charge, nor my blood, which by God's and man's law (I think), could not justly have been brought here to suffer: but I bless God I have some comfortable assurance, that I shall be embraced in the arms of Christ, and have cause to hope that his Spirit shall carry my soul into the Father's hands. And if the glory of this sun-shine be so great (the sun then shining bright), how much more is the glory of the Son of God, who is the Sun of righteousness? I think it convenient to give you some account of my faith. I believe all things written in the Old and New Testament, as the principles and doctrine of a believer's faith: I believe the blessed ordinances of Christ, that it is our duty to hear the word preached, to seek unto God in prayer, and to perform family duties, and to walk in the communion of Saints; and, for my own part, I am a member of a congregation, which I judge to be the way of Christ (and were it for that only I were to die I would witness to it), which is a company of men born again by his grace, that walk in the ways of Christ blameless and harmless. I believe Jesus Christ died for poor sinners, of whom I am chief as the Apostle Paul saith. This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation. That Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief. And if the Apostle might say so, much more may I.

My friends and countrymen, I have reason to bewail my own unprofitable life, having been very unfruitful unto the people of the Lord. The Lord knows I have much fault upon my part, were it not for the blood of Christ that cleanseth and washeth me, according to his promise, saying, I loved you and washed away your sins in my own blood. For there is no remission of sins without the blood of Christ. I desire you all to loath and cast off sin; it were better to suffer than to sin. It is better to die than to sin, nothing could grieve our Saviour but sin, and therefore have a care of that. You and I must meet one day at the bar of Christ, and the Son of God shall be our judge, for God hath committed all judgment to the Son, that all men should honour the Son as they honour the Father. This day is a resemblance of that day, therefore be serious; I beg as much good to your immortal souls as I expect to enjoy by and by. I beseech you beg of God, that he would save your souls, and omit no opportunity through the strength of the Lord, to believe and put your trust in the Lord Jesus Christ. Be sure to labour after assurance of your interest in him, or else you will be of all men most miserable; for I of all men were most miserable, if I had not believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living.

Blessed be the Lord that brings me into this state; let the way or means be what they will, it is God's sovereignty who made these creatures so, to dispose of them how he pleaseth, and God hath ordained this death for me from all eternity. The Lord Christ often prayed, Thy will be done; this is the Lord's will. He hath numbered my days, and my times are in his hand. Many seek the ruler's favour, but every one's judgment is from the Lord. When Pilate said unto Christ, Knowest thou not, that I have a power to crucify thee? Christ answered him, Thou couldest have no power against me, except it were given thee from above. Therefore I acknowledge the righteous hand of God; he is righteous, but I am sinful. Therefore will I bear God's indignation, because I have sinned against him.

It is said of Jesus Christ, that for the joy set before him, he endured the cross, and despised the shame, and is set down at the right hand of God, where I hope to see him by and by in glory and majesty, and to see his angels and believers worshipping of him, and therefore I despise the shame; our Saviour died upon the cross without sin; I am a sinful creature, a wretched sinner, and shall I expect better than he that was my master? He who was holy, and never had a sinful thought in all his life, and died not for himself, but for us, that we might live through his death, that through his poverty we might be made rich; and Christ having done this for his people, it should not be in their eyes thought a despicable thing, that we should suffer for him, having been engaged in the work of God. But Christ must prevail in righteousness, and he will prevail. Now, Mr. Sheriff, I thank you for your civility and for this leave (12).

(12) Speeches and Prayers of the late King's Judges, p. 89, 90, 91.

Then Colonel Hacker rose up, and spoke to him in private, after which Colonel Axtel asked the Sheriff, whether they were both to die together, and being answered in the affirmative, Colonel Hacker read a paper, containing what he had particularly to say, and which was very short; he then intreated Colonel Axtel, that he would be (to use his own words) both their mouths to God. Mr. Axtel complying with this request, having first entreated the silence and attention of the people, and that they would join with him in his application to God, with a composed frame of spirit, and an audible voice, he prayed for better than half an hour, in which he prayed for the government, the magistrates, and for the executioner; he likewise prayed very heartily for the King, under the name of the Chief Magistrate of this nation, and throughout the whole did not receive the least interruption (13).

(13) Ibid. p. 91—96.

After he had ended his prayer, he gave the Sheriff thanks again for his civility, and then turning to Colonel Hacker, they saluted and embraced each other in their arms, and said, The Lord sweeten our passage, and give us a happy meeting with himself in glory. Then pulling his cap over his eyes, expecting, as is supposed, that the cart should be drawn away, with his hands lifted up, he uttered these words, with a loud and audible voice, Lord Jesus receive my spirit; but the cart staying a little longer, he lift up his hands a second time, and with the like audible and loud voice, said, Into thy hands, O Father! I recommend my spirit; and yet in regard there was no man found to put forward the horse to draw away the cart, until the common hangman came down out of the cart himself to do it: the carman, as many witnesses affirm, saying, He would lose his cart and horse, before he would have a hand in hanging such a man; by this means he had opportunity to lift up his hands and utter the like words a third time also (14).

(14) State Trials, Vol. ii. p. 416, concluding the account there.

One thing more his friends thought very remarkable, that when Colonel Axtel, and Colonel Hacker, were taken out of the sledge into the cart, the spectators being in great numbers there, behaved themselves very civilly; only two persons among them, as soon as the ropes were put about their necks, cried out very earnestly, Hang them, hang them, rogues, traitors, murderers; hang them, draw away the cart. Whereupon a man that stood by them, desired them to be civil, and said, Gentlemen, this is not civil, for the Sheriff knoweth what he has to do; and thereupon they were silent, and gave attention to Colonel Axtel's speech and prayer; but before he had done, those very persons were so affected, that they could not refrain from pouring out many tears upon the place, and went aside to a place a little more retired to weep; and that man that before desired them to be civil, went after them, and beheld them to his great admiration, as himself hath narrated (15).

(15) Speeches and Prayers of the late King's Judges, p. 96.

This behaviour fully justifies, what was said in a former note, of the force of Enthusiasm. C.

[It hath been observed to us, with regard to the stricture upon Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper's letter in the note [E], that we are not to weigh the language of other times by the balance of our own. I cannot see, says our correspondent, any thing like cant in this letter. The name of God is introduced with propriety and decency. The prayer for a happy esta-was decently interred. At the time of his death, the Colonel left behind him a widow and ſeven children, for whoſe ſubſiſtence he had made a competent proviſion in the time of his proſperity.

bliſhment is what even Sir Anthony, though not much addicted to prayer, would naturally have made at a juncture ſo critical.

Colonel Axtel's plea, that he acted only as a ſoldier, under the orders of his General, though not ſtrictly legal, or held to be admiſſible in the caſe of treaſon, has, notwithſtanding, a great deal of force. An officer, under command, cannot refuſe obedience without deſtruction to himſelf. The malignity of the crime, in putting King Charles the Firſt to death, did, without doubt, principally lie in thoſe by whoſe aſſumed authority it was done. However, Axtel was a voluntary and chearful inſtrument in all that he did at the King's trial. How great an enthuſiaſt he was, is evident from the account here given. His ſincerity cannot be called in queſtion; but his manners were fierce, and, if Lord Clarendon's relation of his conduct in Ireland be true, they were in the higheſt degree barbarous. He was a ſteady and conſiſtent Republican, in which view his oppoſition to Cromwell doth him honour.

Too much, we think, is aſcribed in the text to the Anabaptiſts, as having ſubverted the government of Ireland. They appear only to have acted in conjunction with other ſectaries. It is worthy of obſervation; that the Antipædo-Baptiſts, whoſe principles have been deemed ſo wild, and whoſe exceſſes in Germany were ſo great (though not, perhaps, wholly unprovoked), are now as peaceable and orderly a ſet of people as any which exiſts.] K.

AYLESBURY (THOMAS), the ſecond ſon of William Ayleſbury, by his wife Anne, daughter of John Poole, Eſq; was born in the city of London, ſome time in the year 1576 (a). He received his education in Weſtminſter-ſchool, from whence he went to Oxford, and in 1598, became a ſtudent of Chriſt-Church. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf there by his aſſiduous application to his ſtudies, and eſpecially affected the Mathematics. This made him known to perſons of the greateſt parts in the univerſity, and was the reaſon of his being careſſed by ſome of the greateſt quality in the kingdom (b). On the nineteenth of June, 1605, he took his degree of Maſter of Arts. After he quitted the univerſity, he became Secretary to Charles Earl of Nottingham, then Lord High-Admiral of England; in which poſt he had an opportunity of improving his mathematical knowledge, as alſo of giving many and ſhining proofs of it. On this account, when George Villiers, Duke of Bucks, ſucceeded the Earl of Nottingham as High-Admiral, Mr. Ayleſbury not only kept his employment, but was alſo, by the favour of that powerful Duke, created a Baronet, the nineteenth of April, 1627, having been before made Maſter of Requeſts, and Maſter of the Mint (c). Theſe great employments, as they furniſhed him with the means of expreſſing his regard for learned men, ſo in him they met with a perſon, who put them to their right uſe. He not only made all men of ſcience welcome at his table, and afforded them all the countenance he could, but likewiſe gave to ſuch of them as were in narrow circumſtances, regular penſions out of his pocket, and carried them with him to his houſe in Windſor-Park, where he uſually ſpent the ſummer. In this manner he treated Walter Warner, a moſt ſkilful Mathematician; and who, at his requeſt, wrote a treatiſe of coins and coinage (d). The famous Mr. Thomas Harriot, was another of his dependants, as appears by a poem addreſſed to Sir Thomas Ayleſbury, by Biſhop Corbet [A], as alſo from the grateful acknowledgment made by that learned perſon in his will, whereby he bequeathed to Robert Sidney, Viſcount Liſle, and Sir Thomas Ayleſbury, Baronet, all his writings, and all the manuſcripts he had collected (e). Nor was the aſſiſtance, which Sir Thomas afforded to men of merit, confined within the bounds of his own capacity, but extended to the recommendation of them to ſuch noble and generous patrons, as he had an intereſt in. Thus he recommended Mr. Thomas Allen of Oxford, to his maſter the Duke of Bucks, and to other noble perſons, who honoured him with their friendſhip and protection. This very learned perſon confided his manuſcripts, for he would never publiſh any thing, to Sir Thomas, who was in theſe matters the moſt knowing and moſt candid critic

[A] By Biſhop Corbet.] This Poem was written on the appearance of the Comet on the 9th of December 1618, and is, conſidering the ſtyle of that age, a good performance. From the following lines the point mentioned in the text is ſufficiently eſtabliſhed:

Now for the peace of God and men adviſe

Thine own rich ſtudies and deep HARRIOT's mine,
In which there is no droſs, but all refine, &c. (1)

The ſtudy of the Mathematics was at this time much encouraged, and had been ſo for many years. The Earl of Leiceſter, Queen Elizabeth's favourite, had ſome ſkill in this ſcience, and a great eſteem for ſuch as were learned therein. His ſon, Sir Robert Dudley, was alſo a patron of Mathematicians, and ſo was Henry Earl of Northumberland, who being confined many years in the Tower of London, diverted himſelf with the converſation of eminent ſcholars in this kind of knowledge, among whom our Sir Thomas Ayleſbury often obtained a ſeat. His collections of ſcarce and valuable books, learned and curious MSS. which he acquired, not only by his own induſtry, and at great expence, but alſo as in the text mentioned, by the gifts of his obliged friends, were either loſt in our troubles at home, or were diſpoſed of in the time of his diſtreſs abroad. Among theſe were ſeveral of Mr. Harriot's pieces, and thoſe bequeathed to him by Mr. Warner, ſome of which well deſerved to have been made public. As to thoſe which were given him by Mr. Allen, they related moſtly to Aſtrology; and among them were the ſecond and third books of the famous Ptolemy the Geographer, de Aſtrorum judiciis cum expoſitione Thomæ Allen (2). Theſe were in thoſe days, when Aſtrology paſſed for a ſcience, held to be invaluable treatiſes, and therefore ſome copies were procured, one of which was in the hands of William Lilly, the Almanack-maker, who preſented his tranſcript to Elias Aſhmole, Eſq; (3). It does not appear, that Sir Thomas Ayleſbury ever wrote any thing himſelf, but inaſmuch as he bountifully aſſiſted ſuch men of parts as ſtood in need of his favour, we cannot think the compliment we have paid more than he deſerved.

of his time (f). In 1642, adhering ſteadily to the King, he was of conſequence ſtripped of his places, and plundered of his eſtate. However, he bore up chearfully under his misfortunes till 1649, when having ſeen the bloody murder of his Sovereign, he grew ſick of his country, and retiring with his family into Flanders, lived for ſome time at Bruſſels. In 1652, he removed to Breda, where he led a very private life, his loyalty having left him very little to live on; and in 1657, being then eighty-one years of age, he ended his days with honour, and was interred in the great church, through the care of his illuſtrious ſon in-law. He left a ſon, William, of whom in the next article, and a daughter, Frances, who married Edward Hyde of Perton, in the county of Wilts, afterwards the juſtly famous Earl of Clarendon (g). C.

AYLESBURY (William), ſon of the beforementioned Sir Thomas Ayleſbury, Baronet, became very early a gentleman commoner of Chriſt-Church, and took a degree in Arts at ſixteen years of age (a). Though he had at that time the proſpect of a very plentiful fortune, yet he purſued his ſtudies with ſuch diligence, and behaved with ſo much modeſty and prudence, that King Charles I. made choice of him to be Governor to George Villiers, Duke of Bucks, and his brother Lord Francis, with whom he went to travel (b). He met in Italy with a very extraordinary misfortune. Walking one evening in the garden of the houſe where they lodged, he was ſhot, through a hole in the wall, and a couple of bullets lodged in his thigh: thoſe who did it leaped over the wall, came up, and looked upon him, begged his pardon, told him they were miſtaken, and that they intended to have ſhot another perſon, which was all the ſatisfaction he ever received (c). He returned into England with his pupils a little after the Civil War commenced, and carried them with him to Oxford, where he preſented them to the King. His Majeſty expreſſed his great ſatisfaction in regard to Mr. Ayleſbury's conduct (d), and promiſed on the firſt vacancy, to make him groom of his Bed-chamber; which promiſe, however, he lived not to perform. His Majeſty likewiſe recommended it to Mr. Ayleſbury, to tranſlate into Engliſh the Hiſtory of the Civil Wars in France, by Davila. How far he complied, the reader will ſee in the note [A]. After the King's murder, he retired with his father to Antwerp, and dwelt there as long as his circumſtances would afford it; but at length, through very want, returned into England in the year 1650; ſpending his time here, as moſt of the Royaliſts did, in ſeeking ſhelter and a meal of meat where it was to be had. Living ſometimes in one place, ſometimes in another, chiefly at Oxford, which was always loyal, till the year 1657, when the Protector fitted out a fleet to go on ſome expedition to the Weſt Indies, as alſo to carry a ſupply to the iſland of Jamaica, our author, from pure neceſſity, engaged himſelf as Secretary to the Governor; which poſt he enjoyed not long, death removing him when he had been but a ſhort time in the iſland (e).

[A] The reader will ſee in the note.] The reaſon why his Majeſty made choice of Mr. Ayleſbury to tranſlate this book was, becauſe he was a perfect maſter of the Italian language. It ſhould ſeem, however, that our author was a little indolent, ſince even with the aſſiſtance of his friend Sir Charles Cotterel, it was not fitted for the preſs till ſome years afterwards, when it appeared under the following title, The Hiſtory of the Civil wars of France. Written in Italian by Henry Canterino d'Avila, London, 1647, folio. There was a ſecond edition of this work in 1678, and in the Epiſtle prefixed thereto, it is ſaid, that the whole was tranſlated by Sir Charles Cotterel, except here and there a paſſage in the four firſt books (1). This ſhews how dangerous a thing it is to write in partnerſhip; for Mr. Ayleſbury had been then many years dead, and could not therefore poſſibly anſwer for himſelf. Before I cloſe this note, I muſt crave leave to obſerve, that there is ſomething very remarkable in King Charles I., commanding this book to be tranſlated, ſince it is certain, that thoſe dreadful ſcenes of blood and ſlaughter, of private calamities and public confuſion, which were ſo admirably depicted in that work, came afterwards to be acted on the Theatre of Britain, and therefore a better caveat could not have been thought of for preventing thoſe miſchiefs, than the timely publication of this book. As to our author Ayleſbury, and his friend Sir Charles Cotterel, they for ſome time lived together in the houſe of Mr. Ayleſbury, at Breda, where Doctor Morley, afterwards Biſhop of Wincheſter, officiated as their chaplain, till Mr. Ayleſbury's misfortunes came upon him (2). By the immature death of our author in Jamaica, the male line of this family was extinguiſhed, and his ſurviving ſiſter Frances, Counteſs of Clarendon, became heireſs of what could be recovered of her father's, Sir Thomas Ayleſbury's, eſtate (3). AYLMER, or rather as himſelf wrote it, ÆLMER (John), was deſcended from a very ancient [A] and honourable family, ſeated at Aylmer-Hall, in the county of Norfolk (a). He was born ſome time in the year 1521 (b), and being a younger brother

[A Deſcended from a very ancient family.] There is no doubt of our author's being of a very ancient and genteel family, ſince his elder brother was Sir Robert Aylmer, of Aylmer-hall, in the county of Norfolk and their anceſtor Sheriff of this county, in the reign of Edward II. (1) But it muſt be allowed, that Mr. Strype, in his Life of this Prelate, confounds himſelf and his reader on this head, and by endeavouring to make the thing exceſſively plain, hath rendered it ſcarcely intelligible (2). That the Biſhop really wrote his name Ælmer, at leaſt ſometimes, is certain, and that this might proceed from ſome affectation of deſcending from a Saxon family, is not improbable, ſince it is as certain, that the Aylmers of Norfolk did not uſe this manner of writing, nor is the name of a Sheriff of London, A. D. 1501, ſo written, but plainly Aylmer, as in the text (3). The foregoing articles will ſhew, that there really was ſuch a name as this in uſe in thoſe times; but then it was a Chriſtian name, and Mr. Strype does not pretend to account for its becoming a ſurname, which however we ſhall endeavour to do. Fuller had informed him, that Aylmer-hall ſtood in the pariſh of Tilſley (4), which pariſh not being to be found, Mr.

brother, was either recommended by his relations, or recommended himſelf by his pregnant parts, even in his nonage, to the then Marquis of Dorſet (Henry Grey), afterwards Duke of Suffolk, who was pleaſed to honour him with the title of his Scholar, and gave him an exhibition at the univerſity of Cambridge (c). When he had there attained a competent proviſion of univerſity learning, the Marquis recalled him from thence, and took him into his own houſe, where he became tutor to his children, amongſt whom was the Lady Jane, who, for ſome days, was ſtiled Queen (d). This excellent Lady, under Mr. Aylmer's tuition [B], became wonderfully learned in the Latin and Greek tongues, reading in the latter with great eaſe and pleaſure, the moſt ſublime and difficult authors, and even writing in that language with great elegancy, as well as ſtrength of ſentiment (e). By the care of Mr. Aylmer, ſhe received right principles of religion. For he went early into the opinions of the primitive Reformers; and having for his patrons the Duke of Suffolk and the Earl of Huntingdon, in the reign of Edward VI., he was for ſome time the only preacher in Leiceſterſhire; where he ſo effectually fixed the Proteſtant religion in the minds of the people, that neither force nor fraud could blot it out (f). The firſt preferment beſtowed upon him, was the Archdeaconry of Stow, in the diocese of Lincoln (g), which giving him a ſeat in the Convocation [C], held in the firſt year of Queen Mary, he boldly oppoſed that return to Popery, to which the body of the Clergy ſeemed generally inclined. He was one of ſix, who, in the midſt of all the violences committed in that aſſembly, offered to diſpute all the controverted points in religion, againſt the moſt learned and famous champions of the Papiſts. But when the ſupreme power began to argue, not by words but by force, Archdeacon Aylmer withdrew, and if we may credit one of our eccleſiaſtical hiſtorians, eſcaped in almoſt a miraculous manner [D], beyond the ſeas (b); where he reſided firſt at Straſbourg, afterwards at Zurick in Switzerland, and there in peace followed his ſtudies, employing all

Mr. Strype ſuppoſes that it muſt be in Tilney pariſh, which lies in Merſhland, or Marſhland, where a later writer confidently places it (5), though I find no direct teſtimony that in this pariſh it really ſtands. But this part of the country appears ſo evidently gained from the ſea, and was formerly with ſuch difficulty kept from its old maſter, that it is not very likely any Saxon family ſhould remain here. But in North Erpingham Hundred, in the ſame county, there is a conſiderable village, called Ailmerton, or Elmerton (6), which is truly a Saxon name, and ſignifies a place ſeated on the Old Marſh; and there ſeems to be no reaſon to doubt, that after ſurnames became faſhionable, the poſſeſſor of this manor took that of Aylmer, or Elmer, a thing uſual in other places (7).

[B] Under Mr. Aylmer's tuition.] It is not a little ſtrange, that Mr. Strype, with all his induſtry, ſhould not be able to diſcover at what college in Cambridge our author had his education (8). As to his conjectures that it might be here, or it might be there, they may ſerve to miſlead, but not inſtruct us; and therefore it is ſufficient to note, that Fuller affirms he was bred there, and that Anthony Wood ſuggeſts he took his degrees in Arts at that univerſity (9). In Strype's Life, there is not one date between his birth and firſt preferment, though there are ſeveral circumſtances mentioned, the time of which might have been eaſily fixed. Mr. Aſcham viſited the Lady Jane Grey, in the month of Auguſt, 1550 (10), and found her under the tuition of Mr. Elmer, who was then in the 30th year of his age. The place at which ſhe then reſided, was her father's ſeat at Broadgate, in Leiceſterſhire; the family were hunting; and Mr. Aſcham going to wait on the young Lady, ſurpriſed her reading the Phædon of Plato. This naturally led him to inquire, how a Lady of her age, for ſhe could not be then above fourteen, arrived at ſuch a perfection both in Philoſophy and the Greek tongue? To which ſhe anſwered thus, as Mr. Aſcham himſelf informs us; 'I will tell you, 'quoth ſhe, and tell you truth, which, perchance, 'you will marvel at. One of the greateſt benefits 'which ever God gave me, is that he ſent ſo ſharp 'and ſevere parents, and ſo gentle a ſchoolmaſter. 'For when I am in preſence either of father or 'mother, whether I ſpeak, keep ſilence, ſit, ſtand, 'or go; eat, drink, be merry or ſad; be ſewing, 'playing, dancing, or doing any thing elſe, I muſt 'do it, as it were, in ſuch weight, meaſure, and 'number, and even ſo perfectly, as God made the 'world, or elſe, I am ſo ſharply taunted, ſo cruelly 'threatened, yea, preſently ſometimes with pinches, 'nips, and bobs (or other ways, which I will not 'name, for the honour I bear them), ſo without 'meaſure miſordered, that I think myſelf in Hell, 'till time come that I muſt go to Mr. Elmer, who 'teacheth me ſo gently, ſo pleaſantly, with fair 'allurements to learning, that I think all the time 'nothing while I am with him; and when I am 'called from him, I fall a weeping, becauſe whatſoever I do elſe but learning, is full of grief, 'trouble, fear, and wholly miſliking unto me; and 'this my book hath been ſo much my pleaſure, 'and bringeth daily to me more pleaſure, and more 'yet, in reſpect to it, all other pleaſures, in very deed, 'be but trifles and troubles unto me (11).' So much was Mr. Aſcham affected with this interview, that in a letter to Lady Jane, dated the eighteenth of January, 1551, he ſpeaks of it in rapture, and by a beautiful apoſtrophe, addreſſing himſelf to Mr. Aylmer, felicitates him on his having ſo ingenious a ſcholar, in a ſtrain of compliment, which he ſays the great Sturmius made uſe of to him, ſpeaking of his happineſs, in having the Lady Elizabeth for his pupil. In this letter it is, that he deſires Mr. Aylmer, to whom he foreſaw it would be ſhewn, to engage the Lady Jane, to write a letter in Greek to himſelf, and another to Sturmius, and alſo deſires they might continue to live in the ſame learned friendſhip and intercourſe, which they had hitherto done (12).

[C] A ſeat in the Convocation.] In the beginning of the year 1553, Mr. Aylmer ſucceeded Chriſtopher Maſſingberd, who deceaſed the 8th of March, in the ſame year, in the Archdeaconry of Stow, in the dioceſe of Lincoln, if Wood may be believed (13); but Mr. Strype ſays, that he ſucceeded Dr. Dedicot (14). However it was, he ſat in the Convocation, which met the 16th of October, in the ſame year at London: The firſt day he ſaid little; but the next he diſputed boldly againſt the Real Preſence, and with great learning, reading ſeveral quotations from the Fathers, which he had collected, from his note book. But the hiſtory of this diſpute is much too long for a note, and therefore we ſhall content ourſelves with referring the reader to a book, where it may ſtill be read at large (15). This conduct, though it gained him great reputation, loſt him his Archdeaconry; into which came John Harriſon, in the year 1554, being no doubt a zealous Papiſt (16).

[D] Almoſt miraculous manner.] Mr. Fuller takes notice, that the ſhip on board which Mr. Aylmer embarked, was ſo unlucky as to be ſearched and yet he eſcaped, partly through the friendſhip of the captain, and partly through his own lowneſs of ſtature. For there being in the hold a very large wine veſſel, with a partition in the middle, Mr. Aylmer

all his time [E] in acquiring knowledge, or in providing that others ſhould acquire it (i). During the time of his exile, he improved himſelf likewiſe by travel; and towards the end of it, gave a ſignal proof of his learning, moderation, and love to his native country, by penning a ſober anſwer to an outrageous book, written by John Knox, againſt the government of women [F]. After the acceſſion of Queen Elizabeth to the Engliſh throne, Aylmer returned home, and was one of the eight Divines, appointed to diſpute with as many Popiſh Biſhops at Weſtminſter, in the preſence of a great aſſembly (k). A. D. 1562, he obtained the Archdeaconry of Lincoln, by the favour of Mr. Secretary Cecil (l). In right of this dignity, he ſat in the famous Synod held the ſame year, wherein the doctrine and diſcipline of the Church, and its Reformation, from the abuſes of Popery, were carefully examined and ſettled (m). In this ſituation he continued for many years [G], and diſcharged the duty of a good ſubject to the government under which he lived, in Church and State; being one of the Queen's Juſtices

Aylmer ſat in the one end of it, while the ſearchers drank wine drawn out of the other (17). No queſtion, but many ſuch contrivances there were in the days of Queen Mary, when the confuſions in Church and State, made numbers of all ranks prefer ſafety in foreign climates, to that affection which nature taught them for their own.

[E] Employing all his time.] His thoughts, though in a diſtant country, were continually employed in the ſervice of England, and of Engliſhmen. He publiſhed (as Mr. Strype ſuppoſes) Lady Jane Grey's letter to Harding, who had been her father's chaplain, and who apoſtatized. He aſſiſted the famous Fox, in tranſlating the Hiſtory of Engliſh Martyrs into Latin, as alſo in the verſion of Archbiſhop Cranmer's Vindication of the Book on the Sacrament, againſt Gardiner, Biſhop of Wincheſter. which verſion however was never printed or publiſhed. When his ſtudies and the care he took of his fellow-exiles allowed him leiſure, he viſited moſt of the univerſities of Italy and Germany, and had an offer from the Duke of Saxony, of the Hebrew Profeſſorſhip of Jena, which he refuſed, on a proſpect of ſpeedily returning home (18).

(18) Strype's Life of Aylmer, p. 16.

[F] Againſt the government of women.] As this was the only work of conſequence, which our author Aylmer ever publiſhed; as it was the groundwork of his future fortunes, and at the ſame time, the ſource of thoſe calumnies, which were thrown upon him, it is requiſite that we ſhould give here a full and diſtinct account of the occaſion, and the manner in which it was written. In 1556, John Knox printed, at Geneva, a treatiſe under this title: The firſt Blaſt againſt the monſtrous Regiment and empire of Women. The drift of the author was to ſhew, that by the laws of God, women could not exerciſe Sovereign authority (19). The reaſon of his writing of it, was his ſpite againſt two Queens; Mary of Lorrain, then Regent of Scotland, and Mary Queen of England. It was like the reſt of that Divine's pieces, a vehement performance, full of ſtrange opinions, ſupported by a warm flow of enthuſiaſtic rhetorick, which ſufficiently recommended it to all perſons of the ſame complection. He intended a ſecond, and a third part; but the times altering, he did not rend the ears of the public with any more Blaſts. However, this firſt did a great deal of miſchief, and prejudiced the Proteſtant religion exceedingly in the minds of Princes, and thoſe in authority under them. Mr. Aylmer perceiving this, and apprehending alſo the conſequences which might attend the leaving this book unanſwered, reſolved to employ his pen in the performance of a duty incumbent upon him, as a Chriſtian Divine, and a good ſubject. His piece was intitled, An Harborowe for faithfull and trewe Subjects, againſt the late blowne Blaſte, concerning the Government of Women. Wherein bee confuted al ſuch Reaſons as a Straunger of late made in that Behalfe. With a briefe Exhortation to Obedience. It was printed at Straſbourg, anno 1559, and was dedicated to the Earl of Bedford, and Lord Robert Duddely (afterwards Earl of Leiceſter, then) Maſter of the Queen's Horſes. This book is written with great vivacity, and at the ſame time diſcovers its author's deep and general learning. At the opening of this work, there are ſome curious remarks on Mr. Knox's want of ſkill in politics, and the Law of Nations: the author then proceeds to a logical refutation of his arguments, and in doing this, he enters into a compariſon of the Civil, or Roman Law, with that of this land. In his exhortation to obedience, he pays great compliments to the new Queen Elizabeth, giving however this reaſon for his not ſetting his name to his book, that he might write with greater liberty, and be the leſs ſuſpected of flattery. A ſeaſonable and well-judged antidote this was to Knox's furious poiſon, and well calculated to ſoften Queen Elizabeth's reſentment, which had begun to diſcover itſelf againſt the exiles (20). Yet with all this moderation, it ſo happened, that our author retaining in his mind, too quick a ſenſation of the ſeverities exerciſed by Queen Mary's Popiſh Biſhops, let fall ſome odd expreſſions, and amongſt them theſe; 'Come off, ye Biſhops, away 'with your ſuperfluities, yield up your thouſands, 'be content with hundreds; as they be in other 'reformed Churches, where be as great learned men 'as you are. Let your portion be Prieſt-like, not 'Prince-like. Let the Queen have the reſt of your 'temporalities, and other lands, to maintain theſe 'wars, which you procured, and your miſtreſs left 'her embroiled in; and with the reſt to build and 'found ſchools throughout the realm. That every 'pariſh-church may have his preacher, every city 'his ſuperintendant, to live honeſtly, and not 'pompouſly, which will never be, unleſs your 'lands be diſperſed, and beſtowed upon many, which 'now feed and fat but one.' Other paſſages there are to the ſame purport, which Mr. Strype tells us very confidently, were intended of the Popiſh Biſhops; which, with his leave, is a viſible abſurdity, as appears from the words above cited; other reformed Churches. Not but that the Popiſh Biſhops are alſo ſtruck at by what follows; but the ſcope of the words take in the whole order, and in this ſenſe they were underſtood. Aylmer himſelf, when this paſſage was afterwards objected to him, diſdained ſuch trifling, and anſwered like a man of ſenſe; When I was a child, I ſpoke like a child, and thought like a child, &c. (21) His inclining to what was afterwards called Puritaniſm, in thoſe days, appears farther by his choice of his Patrons, the Earl of Bedford, and Lord Dudley. This was a topic his enemies would never part with, when he came afterwards to change his opinions, and to act with the ſame quickneſs and vehemency in defence of Prelacy, which he had before diſcovered in this work, in writing againſt it. While we are upon this ſubject, it may not be amiſs to note, that the reflection this piece drew upon him, did probably deter Mr. Aylmer from meddling with the Preſs again; to which he retained an irreconcileable averſion, except in caſes of neceſſity, to the very end of his life.

[G] Continued for many years.] In this note we ſhall lay before the reader, ſome particulars worthy his notice, which happened to Mr. Aylmer, between his return to England and his promotion to the Biſhopric of London. He was about forty years old when he firſt became known at court, having for his faſt friend, Parker, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and for his Patron, Secretary Cecil. Before the eccleſiaſtical preferments were ſettled, Cecil made liſts of Divines, proper to be recommended to Biſhopricks. In one of theſe, conſiſting of nineteen names, ſtood Aylmer, but though twelve of that number were honoured with mitres, he was paſſed by (22). However, he had no great reaſon to complain, his Archdeaconry being a very profitable preferment. In the roll of the ſubſcriptions to the thirty-nine articles in the Synod, mentioned in the text, which ſubſcriptions were Juſtices of the Peace, as alſo an Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioner, which gave him a great inſight into affairs, and rendered him fitly qualified for the epiſcopal function (n). October the tenth, 1573, he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity, in the univerſity of Oxford (o). The next year the Archbiſhop of Canterbury made choice of him, to anſwer a book written in Latin againſt the government of the Church of England; but after thoroughly conſidering it, Dr. Aylmer declined the taſk (p), which ſome in thoſe days (perhaps unjuſtly) attributed to diſcontent, becauſe he was not made a Biſhop. To this dignity he had been often named by that excellent man, Matthew Parker, then Archbiſhop of Canterbury, but always ſet aſide, either through the intereſt of the Archbiſhop's enemies, or his own (q). For there were of both, and the latter failed not to ſuggeſt, that in the ſame book where Aylmer had made his court to the Queen, he had alſo ſhewn his ſpleen againſt Epiſcopacy (r). At laſt, in the year 1576, on Dr. Edwin Sandys being promoted to the Archbiſhoprick of York, Dr. Aylmer was made Biſhop of London (s), not without the furtherance of his predeceſſor, who was his intimate friend, and had been his fellow-exile. Yet, immediately after his promotion, Biſhop Aylmer found, or thought he found, cauſe to complain of the Archbiſhop [H]. However his Grace aſſiſted at his conſecration, on the twenty-fourth of March 1576. But this did not hinder Biſhop Aylmer from ſuing Sandys for were made on the 15th of February 1562, he ſubſcribed thus; Johannes Ælmerus, Archid. Lincoln. (23). He did not ſtir much in this aſſembly, and when the great debate was on the ſix points, relating to feaſt-days, ceremonies, organs, &c. he was abſent, and ſo were many more, to the number of twenty-ſeven (24). It was doubtleſs by the Archbiſhop's intereſt, Mr. Aylmer was made a Juſtice of Peace, and put into the high commiſſion; and Mr. Wood aſſures us, that his being in theſe poſts, is taken notice of in the Oxford regiſter in the entry of his degrees (25). He was very active in all his ſeveral employments: however, his book was ſtill harped upon, by ſuch as had no kindneſs for his perſon. Amongſt the reſt, one Mr. Norton, a Miniſter, writing to Dr. Whitgift, to diſſuade him from anſwering Mr. Cartwright, the Puritan's book, remarked, that Mr. Aylmer's unſeaſonable paradox to truth, had hurt the Church, and yet not advanced his preferment ſo much as he hoped. But Dr. Whitgift in his anſwer, ſupported Mr. Aylmer's doctrine, and vindicated him from the charge of writing for preferment (26). Many of theſe reports, no doubt, had reached our Archdeacon's ears; and therefore we need not wonder that he declined the Archbiſhop's motion of writing an anſwer to the treatiſe, de Diſciplina, which would certainly have created him new enemies, and have contributed nothing towards pacifying the old. It was not only Parker, our author's friend and countryman, that thought him the propereſt perſon to be employed in ſuch a work: Grindal then lately preferred from London to York, thought ſo too; but was apprehenſive that Aylmer would not take the pains (27). Indeed it was not reaſonable to expect he ſhould. He had already a great deal upon him, and it is admitted on all hands, that he left nothing unexecuted which depended upon him; inſomuch that many years after, it was acknowledged, that the dioceſe of Lincoln felt the good effects of his adminiſtration. The Archdeacon's diligence was ſomewhat impeded by a diſpute he had with the Biſhop, which induced a law-ſuit: but at length the parties, to avoid ſcandal, ſubmitted the matter in debate to Matthew, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Robert, Biſhop of Wincheſter, by whom it was finally determined in 1572 (28). When Grindal was made Archbiſhop of York, Aylmer was talked of for his ſucceſſor in the See of London, and Parker recommended him warmly to Secretary Cecil. The Earl of Leiceſter, our author's firſt Patron, ſtarted an objection, though he ſeemed to eſpouſe his intereſt; which objection was, that it would ſeem ſtrange to raiſe an Archdeacon at once, to ſo conſiderable a See: after all, Sandys was preferred for that time (29). It is pretty evident, that neither of the parties which were then in the Church, had any liking to our Archdeacon. Thoſe who were warm for Uniformity, remembered his declamation againſt Biſhops, and the other party again, hated him alſo on account of his book; for though none durſt openly own it, yet Knox's doctrine had many followers. Beſides, Aylmer's conduct as an Archdeacon, and an eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioner, ſeemed to ſpeak an alteration in his ſentiments; and thus, though no objection could be made to his parts, learning, or application to buſineſs; yet doubts and jealouſies, retarded his preferment for nearly fifteen years, notwithſtanding his own merit, and the warm ſolicitation of powerful friends.

[H] Cauſe to complain of the Archbiſhop.] The diſpute between our Biſhop Aylmer, and his predeceſſor, Archbiſhop Sandys, is a point not to be ſlipt over haſtily, or treated with any partiality. We ſhall endeavour to ſtate it fairly, truly, and from proper authorities. Sandys was Aylmer's particular friend, had been his fellow-exile, and recommended him warmly for his ſucceſſor in the See of London (30). In his farewel ſermon preached at Paul's Croſs, he was pleaſed to give this character of him, then, appointed to ſupply his place. 'My hope is that the Lord 'hath provided one of choice, to be placed over 'you a man to undertake this great charge, for 'ſtrength, courage, great wiſdom, ſkill in govern-'ment, knowledge, as in many other things; ſo 'eſpecially in the Heavenly myſteries of God, that 'I doubt not, but my departure ſhall turn very much 'to your advantage (31).' When Dr. Aylmer came to town on this occaſion, the Archbiſhop courteouſly entertained him at his houſe. When he departed for York, he left ſeveral things in the houſes belonging to his Biſhoprick, for his uſe and benefit, all which ſo obliged the new Biſhop of London, that a little before his conſecration, he ſaid, he would demand nothing for dilapidations; and a little after, promiſed to be contented with an hundred pounds, as the Archbiſhop offered to juſtify on his oath, in a paper under his hand (32). When Sandys was gone to York, our Biſhop, or, as Strype ſays, ſome buſy lawyer for him, ſet up many demands; requiring firſt the rent to Lady-day, and ſome time after ſtept back to Michaelmas (33). To this Sandys objected, that till Candlemas, he was Biſhop of London, and had ſpent in hoſpitality there, five hundred and fifty pounds more than he had received ſince Michaelmas: that neither Biſhop Young, nor the late Archbiſhop Grindal, had been ſo dealt withal, but enjoyed all they received. This anſwer, which was addreſſed to the Treaſurer, ended with theſe words; 'He is able, 'and I am a beggar; I have in that ſpace been at 'all the coſts, and taken all the pains, he none; ſo 'that if the reſtitution-day be found on the Purifi-'cation of our Lady, it will look farther back 'than I thought (34).' Biſhop Aylmer, it ſeems, in order to demonſtrate the ability of his Grace to anſwer his demands, ſent to the Lord Treaſurer, a note of what accrued to the Archbiſhop in his new dioceſe. His Lady-day's rents 500 l. demeſnes 400 l. benevolence of his Clergy 800 l. in wood 3000 l. (35) The Treaſurer fairly ſent a copy of this note to the Archbiſhop, who in his anſwer to his Lordſhip's letter ſays, I have ſet a brief and true comment on this 'falſe text, as by the billet incloſed to your Lord-'ſhip you may perceive.' That billet ran thus: The Lady-day rents are unwue by a great ſum, and perhaps part of the tenths will be required of me; the demeſnes not 5ths, the Clergy's benevolence in two years to come; ar for dilapidations, which after ſome years proſecution he recovered (t). December the fifteenth, 1577, our Biſhop began his firſt viſitation, wherein he urged ſubſcriptions, which ſome miniſters refuſed, and not contented therewith, reviled ſuch as ſaw no reaſon to hinder them from ſubſcribing, calling them diſſemblers, and comparing them to Arians and Anabaptiſts (u). He was alſo extremely aſſiduous in public preaching, took much pains in examining ſuch as came to him for ordination, and kept a ſtrict eye over all the Diſſenters in thoſe times, as well Papiſts as Puritans; in which he acted ſo far as his epiſcopal authority would permit, and where he found that not ſufficient, he wrote freely to the Treaſurer Burleigh [I], as to what he thought farther neceſſary (w). When the plague raged in London, in the year 1578, our Biſhop ſhewed a paternal care of his clergy and people. For, as on the one hand, he would not expoſe the former to needleſs perils, ſo on the other he provided, that theſe laſt ſhould not be without ſpiritual comforts (x). In 1581 came out Campion's book, ſhewing the reaſons why he had deſerted the Reformed, and returned to the Popiſh communion. It was written in very elegant Latin, and dedicated to the ſcholars of both the univerſities; for which reaſon the Treaſurer Burleigh, thought it very proper that it ſhould be anſwered, and referred the care thereof to our Biſhop, who though he gave his opinion freely upon the ſubject, and promiſed his aſſiſtance, if the anſwering it was put into a method which he propoſed, yet he declined the undertaking ſingly [K], on account of the great buſineſs he had upon his hands (y). He was indeed no great friend to controverſy, which he thought turned the minds of the people too much from the eſſence of religion, made them quarrelſome and captious, indifferent ſubjects, and not very good Chriſtians. On this account, he held a ſtreighter rein over the Puritans than over the Papiſts, impriſoning one Woodcock, a

as to the wood, he might as well have rated the houſes to pull down and ſell; he hath as much wood at London. At the end of the Archbiſhop's letter are theſe remarkable words; 'Coloured covetouſneſs, an 'envious heart, covered with the coat of diſſimu-'lation, will, when opportunity ſerve, ſhew itſelf; 'my Lord, I am ſore dealt withal, and moſt ſhame-'fully wronged on every ſide; my only comfort is, 'that a clear conſcience will anſwer for me before 'God, and that when I ſhall be tried, veritas li-'berabit me.' In another letter to the Treaſurer, the Archbiſhop inſinuates, that this note was ſent to the Treaſurer, rather to bring difficulties upon him, than from any hopes the Biſhop had of getting by it himſelf. 'For how, continues his Grace, came 'he to look for this, that the Biſhop of York would 'give his revenues to ſo unthankful a man, that ſo 'ſoon as he had holpen him on with his rochet, was 'transformed, and ſhewed himſelf in his own na-'ture (36).' It does not appear how this matter was ended; but Mr. Strype tells us, that Biſhop Aylmer commenced another ſuit againſt his predeceſſor for dilapidations, computing them at upwards of twelve hundred pounds (37), which demand was afterwards carried much higher, as the reader will ſee in the text.

[I] To the Treaſurer Burleigh.] By a letter of the Biſhop's, dated the 30th of December 1579, it appears, that he kept a very ſtrict eye over the Papiſts. That letter is directed to the Treaſurer, and it relates to one Carter, a Printer, whom, together with his Preſs, the Biſhop ſeized, and ſent the man to the Gatehouſe. In his cuſtody the Biſhop found a French treatiſe, intitled, The Innocency of the Scottiſh Queen, which his Lordſhip calls a very dangerous book, becauſe the ſaid Queen, is there ſtiled heir apparent of this crown; he alſo intimates, that the man was an old offender, out of whom there was nothing to be ſifted (38). What influence the Biſhop's letter had on the Treaſurer at this time appears not, but ſomething may be gueſſed, from the following paſſage out of Stowe. 'On the 10th of January 1584, at 'a Seſſion holden in the Juſtice-Hall of the Old Baily, 'London, William Carter, of the city of London, 'was there indicted, arraigned, and condemned of 'high-treaſon, for printing a ſeditious and traite-'rous book in Engliſh; intitled, A Treatiſe of 'Schiſm; and was for the ſame, according to the 'ſentence pronounced againſt him, on the next mor-'row, drawn from Newgate to Tyburn, and there 'hanged, bowelled, and quartered (39).' On all other occaſions, the Biſhop bore hard upon the Papiſts, and upon all the favourers of the title of the Queen of Scots. Another particular inſtance of this, we have in the caſe of one Mr. Thomas Pond, formerly a perſon of ſome diſtinction, now a priſoner in the Marſhalſea. Two Miniſters, it ſeems, went to confer with him upon religious ſubjects, but they found him ſo knotty a diſputant, that they could by no means manage him; which when they had reported to the Biſhop, he inſtantly gave directions for his being removed to his caſtle of Biſhops-Stortford. where, as the Papiſts ſay, he was confined in a very dark melancholy dungeon (40). The truth ſeems to be, that the Biſhop thought that men of this diſpoſition, in the neighbourhood of London, might do a great deal of miſchief, by perverting weak people to their religion, as we may gather by ſeveral letters of his to the Treaſurer on this ſubject. In all of them, he writes very pathetically, and expoſtulates with his Lordſhip, for not being ſo warm in this matter as himſelf was; intimating that rebellion was a thing neceſſarily connected with their religion, wherefore Stateſmen, as well as Churchmen, were bound to look ſtrictly after all favourers of Popery (41).

[K] Declined the undertaking ſingly.] This book of Campion's which was publiſhed in 1581, gave the Adminiſtration no ſmall uneaſineſs. It was written in very elegant Latin, in a quick and taking ſtile, dedicated to the ſcholars in both univerſities, among whom it was ſecretly diſperſed. One of the principal points inſiſted on therein, was the ſtrange and contradictory doctrines taught by ſome of the firſt Reformers, on which ſubject he had a whole chapter intitled Paradoxa (42). The Treaſurer was very deſirous that this book ſhould be anſwered, and anſwered effectually, for which reaſon, he applied himſelf to the Biſhop of London; but it ſo happened, that his Lordſhip was then but juſt recovered of an ague, which at going off left him a ſore leg. Beſides, he could not with all his induſtry, procure the book; however, he wrote his opinion to the Treaſurer freely, and that opinion was this. He thought ſome of the Deans, Archdeacons, and Clergy who had preferments without cures of ſouls, ſhould be employed in collecting materials for ſuch an anſwer, and that others ſhould be appointed to put them in order: He even drew up a liſt of theſe, and no doubt his Lordſhip's deſign was to have gone to the bottom of things; and to have juſtified the Reformation thoroughly. He ſuggeſted however to his Lordſhip, that though himſelf had been well acquainted with many of theſe great men (the chief reaſon of the Treaſurer's applying to him) and had a profound veneration for their virtues; yet that he well knew, even theſe great men were not free from blame, or their writings from faults; wherefore he was for ſupporting the Reformation, rather than the Reformers (43). He continued in this ſentiment after Lord Burleigh ſent him the book, which he was far from thinking ſo extraordinary a performance as many held it to be (44). The Treaſurer thought ſuch an anſwer as the Biſhop deſired, too great an honour done him; and ſo Dr. Whitaker was employed to confute it, which he did in a learned piece written alſo in the Latin tongue (45).

ſtationer or bookſeller, for vending a treatiſe, intitled, An Admonition to Parliament, which tended to ſubvert the Church as it was then conſtituted (z). He had likewiſe ſome diſputes with one Mr. Welden, a perſon of a good eſtate and intereſt, in Berkſhire, whom he procured to be committed by the eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners (a). Theſe proceedings rouſed the Puritans, who treated him as a perſecutor, and an enemy to true religion [L]. However, this did not diſcourage the Biſhop: he was a warm and a ſteady man, thought the peace of the Church was to be ſecured by the authority of its Fathers, and therefore he executed his epiſcopal power, as far and as often as it was neceſſary (b). Thus he ſuddenly ſummoned the Clergy of London to his palace, on Sunday the twenty ſeventh of September, 1579, at one of the clock. On this ſummons forty appeared; and the Dean being likewiſe preſent, the Biſhop cautioned them of two things, one was, not to meddle with the Ubiquitarian controverſy; the other, to avoid meddling with the points treated in Stubb's book, intitled, The Diſcovery of a gaping Gulph, &c. written againſt the Queen's marriage, with Monſieur, the French King's brother, and wherein it was ſuggeſted, that the Queen wavered in her religion (c). This method being found very effectual, he ſummoned his Clergy often, and made ſuch ſtrict inquiries into their conduct, as gained him great reputation with ſome, though it expoſed him to the cenſures and ill-will of others (d). This diſpoſition perhaps might occaſion, in ſome meaſure, that violence with which he was proſecuted before the Council, in May 1579, for cutting down his woods, in reſpect to which he was ſeverely checked by the Lord Treaſurer, a circumſtance which much raiſed the Biſhop's choler. However, notwithſtanding his angry letters to that great nobleman, and his long and laboured defence of himſelf, he was, at length, by the Queen's command, forbidden to fell any more [M]. He had notwithſtanding better ſucceſs againſt the Archbiſhop of York, his predeceſſor. For inſtead of his firſt demand of twelve hundred pounds for dilapidations, upon a view in 1580 (e), they were eſtimated to be one thouſand, ſix hundred, and two pounds; and though the cauſe then had not a final hearing, yet the Archbiſhop of York, only endeavoured to obtain a mitigation of damages, and that a part of the burthen ſhould fall on the executors of Archbiſhop Grindal, who had been his predeceſſor in the dioceſe of London (f). On the ſixth of April in the ſame year, there was a dreadful earthquake; and in the dead of [L] An enemy to true religion.] The opinion the Puritans entertained of our Biſhop, will beſt appear from what is ſaid of him by Mr. Peirce in his Vindication of the Diſſenters; for as he is a very accurate author, and never ſpeaks but from authority, whatever he delivers may be conſidered as the judgment of his party in the times of which he ſpeaks, 'Dr. John Aylmer, 'ſays he, Biſhop of London, was a man of a moſt 'intemperate heat, who perſecuted the Puritans with 'the utmoſt rage, and treated Miniſters with ſuch 'virulent and abuſive language, as a man of ſenſe, 'and indifferent temper, would ſcorn to uſe towards 'porters and coblers (46).' As an inſtance of this he gives us the examination of one Merbury, a Miniſter, which is too long to be tranſcribed here: there are in it abundance of hard names, which are ſaid to have fallen from the Biſhop; but then it muſt be owned, that there is a great deal of impertinency in the Miniſter's diſcourſe (47). As to the particular inſtances of his ſeverity mentioned in the text. Thomas Woodcock was a young Stationer, who ſuppoſing that the book called an Admonition to the Parliament, might be ſold to good profit, becauſe it was prohibited, got a conſiderable number of them into his hands, which he vended freely, though with as much ſecrecy as he could (48). For this, Biſhop Aylmer committed him to Newgate, and though he was ſtrongly ſolicited by eminent perſons for his releaſe, yet he abſolutely refuſed it, whereupon the Maſter, Wardens, and principal perſons of the Stationer's Company, addreſſed themſelves to the Lord Treaſurer for the man's releaſe, but with what ſucceſs does not appear (49). The affair of Mr. Welden gave his Lordſhip more trouble. In the year 1597, the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion ſuſpended the Miniſter of Cookham in Berkſhire: Biſhop Aylmer ſent down one Keltridge, to ſupply the Miniſter's place; but Mr. Welden, who was a conſiderable man in the pariſh, oppoſed him, and ſpoke very diſreſpectfully of the Biſhop. Upon this, his Lordſhip granted an attachment againſt him, which the defendant held to be illegal, and did not ſubmit to; which occaſioned the Biſhop's ſending a Purſuivant with a letter. Mr. Welden ſubmitted to this, ſaying, 'That now the Biſhop of London had 'learnt good manners; adding afterwards, what is 'he but a private man, yet it muſt be, An't pleaſe 'your Lordſhip, at every word: there never was a 'Biſhop ſo vilely eſteemed as he, I believe he is as 'ill thought of as ever was Bonner.' Theſe words being proved by depoſition, Mr. Welden, for ſpeaking them, and for refuſing to anſwer, was committed by the Eccleſiaſtical Court, in the abſence of the Biſhop, becauſe it was his own cauſe (50). However, his Lordſhip wrote a warm letter to the Treaſurer upon this ſubject, beſeeching him to ſupport the Commiſſioners in their proceedings againſt this man, for that otherwiſe the Queen's ſervice muſt ſuffer (51).

[M] Forbidden to fell any more.] One of the greateſt troubles this Prelate ever met with, was an information exhibited againſt him to the Council, for cutting down his woods, and thereby prejudicing his ſucceſſors in the See of London. The Biſhop juſtified himſelf, and gave in a long anſwer to all the objections, which anſwer is ſtill extant. The whole amount of the ſales, as thoſe who accuſed him ſet it forth, was a thouſand pounds: the Biſhop, in the cloſe of his anſwer, ſays very cautiouſly, that in three years, he thinks they may amount to ſix hundred pounds (52). The Treaſurer ſpoke to him warmly at the Council-table, and went even ſo far as to tell him, that a Biſhop had been deprived for ſuch doings (53). This matter hung a long while before the Council; but in the end, her Majeſty thought fit to direct, that he ſhould cut down no more of his wood. After ſome time this matter broke out again. One Litchfield, a Court Muſician, informed againſt him, that he cut down the elms at Fulham, an accuſation, which, very luckily for the Biſhop, the Queen knew to be falſe; for ſhe had lodged at Fulham, after the time the elms were ſaid to be cut down, and had complained that the proſpect from her lodgings had been ſpoiled by the over thickneſs of the trees (54). The Biſhop's enemies, and eſpecially the Puritans, did not fail to magnify theſe little imputations, inſomuch as to alledge that the Biſhop's name ought to be tranſpoſed; and that inſtead of Elmar, he ſhould be called Mar-Elm (55). Strype vindicates the Biſhop very warmly in his Life; but certain it is, that Biſhop Bancroft, amongſt other things which he charged upon our Prelate, inſiſted ſtrenuouſly on this, that he had ſpoiled the woods of his See, and left them in ſuch a condition, that they would ſcarce ſerve his ſucceſſor with firewood (56); and indeed, if the reader reflects on the note he gave in to the Archbiſhop of York, he cannot but diſcern what right the Biſhop had, in his own opinion, to the cutting down of timber (57).

the night of the firſt of May, it was felt again, which as it exceedingly terrified the people, ſo the Biſhop, that he might turn their concern to a proper object, and at the ſame time exhibit to them reaſonable grounds of comfort, compoſed certain prayers to be made uſe of in the public ſervice (g). In 1581, the Biſhop had a pretty rough ſtruggle with the Lord Rich, who kept one Wright a Puritan Miniſter in his houſe, and would have compelled the Biſhop to licenſe him to preach in his dioceſe. In the end however the Biſhop had the better; for on a hearing before the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners, Wright was committed to the Fleet, and ſome others who had been buſy in this affair, to other priſons (h). This increaſed the number of his enemies, of whom he had not a few before, who daily ſuggeſted that he was a violent man, and ſought to veſt too great a power in Churchmen. Theſe repreſentations had ſuch effect, that ſometimes meſſages were ſent to him, to abate ſomewhat of the rigour of his proceedings (i). His Lordſhip, however, ſtill ſupported the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion, by his preſence and authority; and though a milder courſe might have made him more eaſy, yet he thought it better to ſuffer himſelf, than that the Church ſhould (k). As he had formerly, ſo now he had many doubts concerning the Treaſurer, from whoſe hands uſually came his reproofs: but upon the winding up of his cauſe, before the Council about felling of woods, he ſaw clearly, that he had no friend equal to the Treaſurer, who, though he endeavoured by his admonitions to prevent his falling into ſuch difficulties, yet generouſly exerted his utmoſt power to help him out of them, ſo far as was conſiſtent with equity, and the good of the common weal (l). From this time forward, therefore, the Biſhop applied chiefly to the Treaſurer, for any favours he expected from Court, particularly with regard to the buſineſs of his tranſlation; for what with one thing or other, he was exceedingly ſolicitous to be removed from London, either to Winchester or Ely; but with reſpect to this, though he had many fair promiſes, all his intereſt could not procure a performance (m). New informations, ſome with little, many with no cauſe at all, were exhibited againſt him, and the trouble theſe gave him was not a little, notwithſtanding that on a thorough examination, his conduct conſtantly eſcaped cenſure (n). In 1583 he performed his triennial viſitation, and having therein diſcovered many ſcandalous corruptions in the eccleſiaſtical courts, eſpecially in the buſineſs of commuting penances, he wiſely and honeſtly repreſented what came to his knowledge to the Privy-Council, which was all he could do. About this time alſo he ſuſpended certain Miniſters, who were accuſed of Nonconformity; and it appears, that upon a thorough examination of the matter, his Lordſhip did impartial juſtice, in reſtoring one Mr. Giffard, whom he had twice ſuſpended, when thoſe who had charged him were able to make nothing out (o). In 1584, he obtained judgment againſt Archbiſhop Sandys for a thouſand pounds. In this year alſo he committed Mr. Thomas Cartwright, a famous Puritan Miniſter, who had written warmly againſt the Hierarchy, and was a very ſtirring man in that cauſe, which the Biſhop underſtood to be the diſturbance of the public peace (p). Yet for this his Lordſhip incurred the Queen's diſpleaſure; and a little after his Lordſhip was given to underſtand, that he ſtood accuſed to her Majeſty, for impairing the revenues of his biſhopric, of which he purged himſelf, by exhibiting a ſtate of the biſhopric as it then ſtood, compared with the condition it was in when he became Biſhop (q). Other difficulties he met with, on account of the ſhare he had in executing her Majeſty's eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion, from which there were continual appeals to the Privy Council, where the Lords who favoured the Puritans, did not fail to object to the Biſhop's conduct, which, conſidering his warm temper, afflicted him not a little (r). In 1585 he compoſed a prayer to be uſed on account of the rainy unſeaſonable weather, which he recommended to private families, as well as directed to be read with the public prayers. He alſo uſed his intereſt to quiet the murmurs of the common people in London, againſt the crowds of ſtrangers who fled hither, to avoid the perſecutions raiſed againſt them, for embracing the Proteſtant religion (s). In the ſummer of the year 1586, the Biſhop went his next triennial viſitation, and at Malden in Eſſex, his Lordſhip narrowly eſcaped an outrageous inſult, intended againſt him by ſome diſaffected perſons [N]. His ſon Dr. Theophilus Aylmer, whom he had made Archdeacon of London, did this year alſo call the Clergy before [N] By ſome diſaffected perſons.] The common people in Eſſex were extremely averſe to our Biſhop, and at Malden eſpecially his enemies were not a few. In order to expreſs their reſentments, when he came thither in the courſe of his viſitation, certain tradeſmen in the town, hired a fellow to come into the church in the guiſe of an idiot, to whip off the Biſhop's cap, and to toſs it amongſt them, who under pretence of reſtoring it, were to throw it about the church: this goodly contrivance the Biſhop diſcovered, before it was carried into execution, and prevented it. This he looked upon as a very fortunate thing, becauſe propably, it might otherwiſe have been attended with great tumult, and perhaps have produced bloodſhed. He inquired narrowly after the authors of this ſcandalous machination, and having diſcovered, committed them, which not a little terrified the magiſtrates of this place, and abated the ſpirits of the Biſhop's enemies. He wrote alſo to the Council with great earneſtneſs upon this ſubject; but after all, it ſeems he did not think fit to proceed farther that way in his viſitation (58). He purchaſed the Manor of Much-Hadham in Hertfordſhire, and reſided frequently at the houſe belonging thereto, whereby he brought this part of his dioceſe into better order than it had been before. His ſon Theophilus he made Rector of this place, and uſed his aſſiſtance in the diſcharge of a burthen, which was now grown too heavy for him. This, as it was a great eaſe to the Biſhop, ſo it was of great benefit to the dioceſe, for Dr. Theophilus Aylmer was a moſt excellent man; and indefatigable in his duty, as appears by the articles drawn up by him, and delivered to his Clergy, which are mentioned in the text.

before him, and gave them many excellent inſtructions, being himſelf a very pious and primitive divine (t). In 1587, the Biſhop entered into a new ſcene of trouble, on account of one Mr. Robert Cawdry, ſchoolmaſter, whom the Lord Burleigh had preſented to the living of South Luffenham in Rutlandſhire, where after preaching ſixteen years, he was convened before the eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion, and at length, the Biſhop ſitting as Judge, deprived (u). Cawdry would not ſubmit to the ſentence; upon which the matter was re-examined by the eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion, at Lambeth, where to deprivation, degradation was added. However, the thing did not end ſo; for Cawdry ſtill refuſing to ſubmit, made new and warm repreſentations to the Lord Burleigh, who favoured him as much as with juſtice he could: but after near five years conteſt, nothing could be obtained, the Biſhop's and Archbiſhop's ſentences being ſtrongly ſupported, both by the Civil and Common lawyers (w). In 1588, his Lordſhip reſtored one Mr. Henry Smith, a very eloquent and much admired preacher, whom he had ſuſpended for contemptuous expreſſions againſt the Book of Common-Prayer, which however Smith denied (x). In 1589, his Lordſhip expreſſed, in pretty ſtrong terms, his diſlike of certain libels againſt the King of Spain, giving it as his reaſon, that on ſo glorious a victory, it was better to thank God, than inſult men, eſpecially Princes (y). That year alſo he viſited his dioceſe, though he was grown old and very infirm, and ſuſpended one Dyke at St. Alban's, though he had been recommended by the Lord Treaſurer (z). In 1591 he cauſed the famous Mr. Cartwright to be brought before him out of the Fleet, and expoſtulated with him roundly, on the diſturbance he had given the Church (a). In 1592, he ſtrongly ſolicited in favour of Dr. Bullingham, and Dr. Cole, that they might be preferred to biſhopricks, but without ſucceſs, which his Lordſhip foreſaw. For he obſerved when he applied for them, that he was not ſo happy as to do much good for his friends; yet he added, he would never be wanting in ſhewing his good will, both to them and to the Church (b). About this time, caſting his eye on Dr. Bancroft, a riſing and very active man, he warmly endeavoured to obtain leave to reſign his biſhoprick to him, as a man every way fit for ſuch a charge; but in this alſo he was diſappointed, which it ſeems lay heavy at his heart; for even on his death-bed, he expreſſed his earneſt deſire that Bancroft might ſucceed him (c). So indeed he did, but not immediately, and dealt as ſharply with our Biſhop's children, as he had done with his predeceſſor Sandys; and on the ſame head, that is, of dilapidations (d). In 1592, the Biſhop aſſiſted at his ſon's viſitation, as Archdeacon of London; and it is remarkable, that at this viſitation, the Biſhop exerted himſelf with as much zeal and ſpirit as he had ever ſhewn in his life (e). His great age, and great labours, however, weighed him down by degrees, ſo that on the third of June 1594, he yielded to fate, being ſeventy-three, and his body being brought from his palace at Fulham, was interred in his own cathedral church of St. Paul, before St. George's chapel, under a fair ſtone of grey marble, with an inſcription which is ſtill preſerved, as the reader will find in a note, though the ſtone on which it was engraven, together with many others, was demoliſhed by the ſaints, when St. Paul's church was converted to another uſe than its founders deſigned (f). Biſhop Aylmer married Judith Bures, or Buers, of a very good family in Suffolk, by whom he had a very numerous offspring, viz. ſeven ſons, and two or three daughters, of whom in their proper place. As to the perſonal qualities of the Biſhop, they were, as thoſe of moſt men are, good and bad, the former perhaps too much magnified by his friends, as the latter were by his enemies. We will ſpeak briefly and candidly, firſt of the one and then of the other. He was ſolidly and extenſively learned in all things, that became either a great churchman, or a polite man to know. He was very well verſed in the three learned languages, had read much hiſtory, was a good logician, and very well ſkilled in the Civil Law. As a Divine, he wanted no accompliſhments; for he had ſtudied, and underſtood the Scripture thoroughly; could preach, not only rhetorically but pathetically; and in the courſe of his life-time, never buryed his talent [O]. He was in his heart, from the conviction of his head, a Proteſtant, and oppoſed Popery warmly, not from a fanatical peeviſhneſs, but from

All, however, could not ſtill the clamours of thoſe who were offended at our Prelate's activity; and who took pains ſo to miſinterpret all his actions, that perhaps, never any Biſhop ſince the Reformation, was pictured in a worſe light, than he hath been (59).

[O] Never buried his talent.] We have already, in the courſe of theſe notes, as well as of the text, entered ſo often into the Biſhop's character, as a ſcholar and a divine, that we have not much to ſay here. Some particulars, however, which others have thought remarkable, we muſt not omit, and others that have occurred in the peruſal of the hiſtory of theſe times deſerve a place; of both we ſhall treat as ſuccinctly as poſſible. The Biſhop was not only well verſed in Hebrew literature himſelf, but alſo a great friend of all ſuch as applied themſelves to the ſtudy of that tongue. Amongſt others, he was remarkably kind to the celebrated Mr. Broughton, and warmly eſpouſed his interpretation of that article in the Creed, which reſpect's Chriſt's deſcent into Hell, a point in thoſe days very warmly diſputed. Broughton's interpretation, to which the Biſhop adhered was this: That the deſcent ſpoken of, was not a local deſcent into the priſon of the damned; but Chriſt's paſſing into Paradiſe, agreeable to the Greek word Hades, and the Hebrew Scheol; which are often rendered into Engliſh by the Grave, and do not ſtrictly, or properly ſignify Hell (60). When he obſerved the thoughts of the congregation to wander while he was preaching, he would take a Hebrew Bible out of his breaſt, and read a chapter out of it, as which, when the people naturally gaped and looked aſtoniſhed, he putting it up again, ſhewed them the folly of liſtening greedily to new and ſtrange things, and giving ſmall attention to matters regarding themſelves, and of the utmoſt importance (61). The ſpirit and eloquence of his diſcourſes recommended him as a popular preacher; and it was obſerved, that in all times from a juſt ſenſe of its errors, which he had the courage to combat openly in the days of Queen Mary, and the honeſty to ſuppreſs, as it was his duty, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. With all this, and indeed with a temper not a little haſty, he was a good-natured, facetious man, one extremely diligent and painful in the ſeveral employments he went through; of too generous a temper to be corrupted, and of much too ſtout a one to be brow-beaten. He was a magnificent man in his houſe, as appears by his houſehold, which conſiſted of fourſcore perſons, to whom he was a good maſter; that is, both a father and a friend. After his fatigues he was wont to refreſh himſelf, either with converſation or at bowls. As to his failings, his temper was without doubt a little too warm, his expreſſions ſometimes a little too blunt, and his zeal, it may be, ſomewhat above the true ſtandard. His enemies charged him with an exorbitant love of power, which diſplayed itſelf in various extraordinary acts of ſeverity, of which the reader will find an account in the notes; with covetouſneſs, which prompted him to ſpoil his See, and injure a private man; with intemperate heat againſt Puritans, with a ſlight regard of the Lord's day, and with indecencies in ordinary ſpeech; all which are likewiſe in the notes examined [P]. On the whole, we may juſtly affirm, that the times he lived in conſidered, he might be ſtiled a perſon of extraordinary wiſdom [Q], a worthy Prelate, and a bleſſing to the Church. At the time of his deceaſe he left ſeven ſons, and either two or three daughters times of difficulty or danger, Biſhop Aylmer was called to preach at court, which he did willingly, and with ſuch chearfulneſs as raiſed the minds of his audience, and had very happy effects (62). His zeal for the Church was unfeigned, as appeared eſpecially in the latter part of his life, when it bred him nothing but diſcontent and diſquiet: yet he never abated it, never departed from what he thought right on account of any ſolicitations, or omitted giving advice, and ſuch advice too as he judged moſt proper, though he knew it would neither be well liked or at all followed. In the courſe of his life he had ſeen adverſity as well as proſperity; and as in the former he had never betrayed any timidity, ſo he would never forſake or diſſemble his principles for the fear of loſing the latter.

(62) Fuller, ubi ſupra.

[P] Examined in the notes.] The pains taken by the Biſhop's adverſaries to draw together whatever might hurt his character cannot be well magnified; nor can it be denied, that in many inſtances his temper and actions are much miſrepreſented. In a celebrated work, publiſhed on purpoſe to ſet certain Prelates in an indifferent light, our Biſhop is very roughly handled. Among leſſer matters, he is charged with detaining ſtolen goods. It ſeems certain thieves, after ſtealing a parcel of cloth belonging to ſome Dyers at the Old Swan in Thames-ſtreet, left it in his manor of Fulham. The Dyers claimed it, but the Biſhop ſaid it was his own, becauſe taken in his Lordſhip. On which the remarker paſſes this ſentence, That it being part blue, part green; the former might well ſerve for the Biſhop's liveries, and the latter for covering his cuſhions and tables. One George Allen, a Grocer, dying, and by his will appointing Thomas Allen, and Richard Alworth of London, Merchants, his executors, they finding an entry of fourteen pounds in the deceaſed's books, as due from the Biſhop of London, went on an Eaſter-Wedneſday to demand it: the Biſhop anſwered he owed them nothing; or if he did, they might go ſue him. Upon this they expoſtulated with him, to which if they were to be believed, he returned, Away citizens! you are raſcals! you are worſe than wicked Mammon! then lifting up his hands, and letting them fall again, You are thieves, you are coſeners, take that for a Biſhop's bleſſing, and ſo get you hence! And ſo he cauſed them to be thruſt out of doors. It is ſaid, that he kept one Beniſon, a poor man, a long time in the Clink priſon, without any great cauſe (63). The ordaining of his porter, and making him Miniſter at Paddington, and continuing him there a long time after he was blind, hath afforded much matter of complaint. That matter, however, which we find oftenеſt objected to the Biſhop, is his playing at bowls on the Sabbath-day; and to place this in the ſtrongeſt light, it is alledged, that he would ſometimes loſe his temper thereat; or, to expreſs it in the words of our author, following his bowl, he would cry rub, rub, adding when it went too far, the Devil go with it, and then ſays the relator, he would follow it himſelf (64). To moſt of theſe charges anſwers have been given, which it is our duty to report. As to the cloth it was thrown in a dry ditch, where the Biſhop cauſed it to be watched for two nights, in hopes of detecting the thieves, afterwards he directed it to be brought into his own houſe, where it was kept till the Dyers claimed it; who yet did not make proof that it was their cloth, or that the thieves were executed for ſtealing it; and, on the other hand, the Biſhop was informed by his lawyers, that this cloth being waived in his manor, the property was altered, and transferred to the liberties. The debt due to the Grocer was, it ſeems, contracted without the Biſhop's knowledge, it being his conſtant direction to all with whom he dealt, to ſuffer none of his family to have any thing without ready money; yet it was paid. As to Beniſon, he was a very refractory ſtubborn man. However, the Biſhop overſhot himſelf in committing him, ſince he was cenſured for it by the Council; and had it recommended to him to make him ſome ſort of ſatisfaction, As to the ordaining of his Porter, Mr. Strype endeavours to defend it, by urging that there was but a ſmall congregation at Paddington, where commonly for the meanneſs of the ſtipend, no Preacher could be had. An odd excuſe, if Mr. Strype knew, as he might have eaſily done, that this depended altogether on the Biſhop of London; for which reaſon, when Dr. Sheldon leaſed the manor to his family, he took away this reproach, by obliging them to make a handſome allowance to the Miniſter. In reſpect to bowling, it is alledged, that the Biſhop learned this cuſtom at Geneva, where, though the people were very ſtrict, it was never held unlawful, even on the Sabbath, after divine ſervice was over. The Biſhop himſelf uſed to ſay on this head, that he never withdrew himſelf from ſervice or ſermon: That Chriſt was the beſt judge of the Sabbath, and he had ſaid, that it was made for man, and not man for it, and that as to any haſty expreſſions that eſcaped him, he intended no evil, and that they ought to be looked on in the light of human frailties (66).

[Q] A perſon of extraordinary wiſdom.] Our Prelate in his perſon had nothing extraordinary, being of a mean ſtature, and remarkable for wearing of a very long beard: in his private life he was a man of œconomy, but withal, loved magnificence, which induced him to keep ſo large a family as he did. In his youth, he gave pregnant marks of his courage, which did not deſert him in his old age; for it is reported, that when he conceived himſelf very ill treated, by his ſon-in-law, Squire, who by a baſe contrivance would have tarniſhed the reputation of his wife, the Biſhop's daughter; the old man took him into a private room, and having reproached him for his wickedneſs and ingratitude, afterwards diſciplined him ſtoutly with a cudgel (67). Another inſtance of his courage, Mr. Strype gives us a long account of; which, in few words, amounts to this. Queen Elizabeth was once grievouſly tormented with the tooth-ach, and though it was abſolutely neceſſary, was yet afraid to have her tooth drawn; Biſhop Aylmer being by, to encourage her Majeſty, ſat down in a chair, and calling the tooth-drawer. Come, ſaid he, ters (g). His ſons were, firſt, Samuel, who was bred to the Law, in which he became very knowing. He was ſtiled, of Claydon-Hall in the county of Suffolk, and was High-Sheriff of that county in the reign of King Charles I., and by two wives left a numerous poſterity (h). His ſecond, Theophilus, a moſt worthy Divine, Archdeacon of London, Rector of Much-Hadham in Hertfordſhire, and Doctor of Divinity. He was Chaplain to King James, an able and zealous preacher, apt to be a little too warm againſt the Puritans; charitable to ſo extenſive a degree, that he left his own family in but indifferent circumſtances. He lived a true pattern of Chriſtian piety, and died heroically, cloſing his own eye-lids, and with theſe words in his mouth, Let my people know that their Paſtor died undaunted, and not afraid of death: I bleſs my God, I have no fear, no doubt, no reluctancy, but a ſure confidence in the ſin overcoming merits of Jeſus Chriſt. This happened January 1625. He was buried in his own pariſh-church, and the excellent Primate Uſher preached his funeral ſermon (i). His third, John, who for ſome eminent ſervice was knighted, and ſtyled Sir John Aylmer, of Rigby, in the county of Lincoln, Knt (k). Fourth, fifth, and ſixth, Zachary, Nathaniel, and Edmund, of whom we know nothing particularly, except that Zachary and Edmund, were the warmeſt friends that age produced. When Edmund lay ſick, Zachary continued with him night and day till his death, and when a perſon came to meaſure the body, in order to make a coffin, Zachary would be meaſured alſo, and in a very ſhort ſpace, took poſſeſſion of the coffin made for him, at the ſame time with that of his deceaſed brother (l). Theſe gentlemen ſeem to have been Divines. His ſeventh, Tobel, i. e. God is good. Archbiſhop Whitgift was his godfather, and the reaſon he was thus named, was his mother's being overturned in a coach, without receiving any hurt, when ſhe was big with child. He wrote himſelf, Tobel Aylmer, of Writtle, in the county of Eſſex, Gentleman. He married a gentleman's daughter in that county, and had by her ſeveral children (m). As to the Biſhop's daughters, Judith, the eldeſt, married William Lynch, of the county of Kent, Eſq; The ſecond, Elizabeth, married Sir John Foliot of Perton, in the county of Worceſter, Knt. Either a third daughter, or elſe Lady Foliot, took for her ſecond huſband, Mr. Squire, a clergyman, a man of wit but very debauched, and a great ſpendthrift, though he had large preferments. He made a very unkind huſband to his wife, which her father, the Biſhop, ſo much reſented, that as Martin Mar-Prelate phraſes it, He went to buffets with his ſon-in-law, for a bloody noſe. This Squire died poor, leaving a ſon named John, who was well educated, and provided for as a Clergyman, at the expence, and by the procurement of his uncle, Dr. Theophilus Aylmer, which he repaid with the utmoſt gratitude (n). To all his children, our Biſhop, by his will, bearing date the twenty ſecond of April, 1594, bequeathed large legacies, as alſo ſome to his grand-children, appointing his two ſons Samuel and Theophilus his executors, with Dr. Richard Vaughan, who was alſo his relation. [In the preceding article, the character of Biſhop Aylmer is repreſented in too favourable a light. He certainly perſecuted thoſe, whoſe religious ſentiments were different from his own, with a degree of rigour and ſeverity, which no zeal for any opinions can juſtify. Whether his conduct, in the exerciſe of his epiſcopal juriſdiction, was ſuch as can reaſonably be attributed to extraordinary wiſdom, may very juſtly be queſtioned. More moderation towards thoſe who had not arrived to the ſame pitch of orthodoxy with himſelf, and a more gentle exerciſe of that eccleſiaſtical power with which Government had inveſted him, would undoubtedly have been no diſcredit to his character. He appears to have been far from an amiable man [R]: his conduct in the caſe of Beni-

he, though I am an old man, and have but few teeth to ſpare, draw me this; which was accordingly done, and the Queen, ſeeing him make ſo ſlight a matter of it, ſat down, and had her's drawn alſo (68). He was very regular in his private devotions, hearing prayers conſtantly twice a day with his family, and breeding up his children very ſtrictly: he was a wiſe and careful man, with reſpect to his temporal affairs; and as he came to his biſhoprick in good circumſtances, ſo he died very rich, having laid out a little before, ſixteen thouſand pounds in one purchaſe (69). But as he had proſecuted his predeceſſor, Sandys, very ſeverely for dilapidations; ſo his ſucceſſor Bancroft, was no leſs troubleſome to his eldeſt ſon, on the ſame account. Mr. Aylmer, who had ſtudied the Law, alledged that his father's perſonal eſtate only was liable on this account, and as the greateſt part of that was expended on his funeral, he thought himſelf ſafe. But Biſhop Bancroft, alledging, that lands being purchaſed with the money, which ſhould have repaired the houſes belonging to the biſhoprick, thoſe lands ought in reaſon to be liable; he prevailed, and ſo at laſt a part of the eſtate was ſold, in order to make him ſatisfaction (70). The inſcription mentioned in the text is ſtill preſerved in Stowe's Survey of London, and ran thus.

on [S], as well as in other inſtances, was extremely cenſurable. His behaviour to Archbiſhop Sandys was very ungrateful; and the charge of covetouſneſs, which was brought againſt him, ſeems to have been well-grounded. One or two curious paſſages in his book againſt Knox, as ſelected by Mr. Strype, will be found in the notes [T].]

[S] His conduct in the caſe of Beniſon, &c. was extremely cenſurable.] This perſon, whoſe name was Barnaby Beniſon, and who is ſaid to have been a city divine of good learning, was ſuſpended and impriſoned ſeveral years by Biſhop Aylmer, on pretence of ſome irregularity in his marriage. The Biſhop charged him with being married in an afternoon, and in the preſence of two or three hundred people, by Mr. Field, a Non-conformiſt; for which he committed him to the Gate-houſe, where he lay from the year 1579 to the year 1584. Mr. Beniſon being thus cruelly treated, on ſo trifling a pretence, found means to get the affair laid before the council; and in his repreſentation of his caſe he declared, that he had invited but forty perſons to his wedding, of which there were only twenty preſent; that he was married in the morning, and according to law; that when the Biſhop ſent for him, and charged him with ſedition, he cleared himſelf to his ſatisfaction; but that after he was gone home, he gave private orders under his own hand, for his being apprehended and ſent to the Gate-houſe; that he was ſhut up there in a dungeon eight days, without knowing the cauſe of his impriſonment, though Dr. Hammond, and Mr. Fox, the martyrologiſt, who were both at the wedding, and ſaw the whole proceeding, went to the Biſhop, and aſſured him, that he was not guilty of the fault with which he was charged; but the Prelate would not releaſe him, without ſuch ſecurity for his good behaviour and appearance as he was unable to procure. 'Thus I continue ſeparated from my wife, 'ſays Beniſon, in his petition to the council) before 'I had been married to her two weeks, to the great 'trouble of her friends and relations, and to the 'ſtaggering of the patient obedience of my wife; for 'ſince my impriſonment, his lordſhip has been en'deavouring to ſeparate us, whom God has joined 'together in the open preſence of his people. Where'fore I moſt humbly beſeech your godly honours, for 'the everlaſting love of God, and for the pity you 'take upon God's true Proteſtants, and his poor 'people, to be a means that my pitiful cry may be 'heard, and my juſt cauſe with ſome credit be 'cleared, to God's honour and her majeſty's, whoſe 'favour I eſteem more than all the biſhop's bleſſings, 'or bitter curſings; and that I now being half dead, 'may recover again to get a poor living with the 'little learning that God has ſent me, to his glory, 'to the diſcharging ſome part of my duty, and to 'the profit of the land.'

The council were ſo well convinced of the hardſhip of Mr. Beniſon's caſe, and of the injuſtice with which he had been treated by Biſhop Aylmer, that they ſent to his lordſhip the following letter: 'Whereas Bar'naby Beniſon, miniſter, has given us to underſtand, 'the great hindrance he has received by your hard 'dealing with him, and his long impriſonment, for 'which if he ſhould bring his action of falſe impri'ſonment he ſhould recover damages, which would 'touch your lordſhip's credit; we therefore have 'thought fit to require your lordſhip, to uſe ſome 'conſideration towards him, in giving him ſome ſum 'of money to repay the wrong you have done him, 'and in reſpect of the hindrance he hath incurred by 'your hard dealing towards him. —— Therefore 'praying your lordſhip to deal with the poor man, 'that he may have occaſion to turn his complaint 'into giving us a good report of your charitable 'dealing, we bid you heartily farewell.

To this letter of the council in Beniſon's behalf, Biſhop Aylmer returned an anſwer in the following terms: 'I beſeech your lordſhips to conſider, that it 'is a rare example thus to preſs a biſhop for his zea'lous ſervice to the queen and the peace of the church, 'eſpecially the man being found worthy to be com'mitted for non-conformity, to ſay nothing of his 'contemptuous uſing of me; nevertheleſs, ſince it 'pleaſeth your lordſhips to require ſome reaſonable 'ſum of money, I pray you to conſider my poor eſtate 'and great charges otherwiſe, together with the great 'vaunt the man will make of his conqueſt over a biſhop. 'I hope therefore your lordſhips will be favourable 'to me, and refer it to myſelf, either to beſtow upon 'him ſome ſmall benefice, or otherwiſe to help him, as 'opportunity offers. Or if this ſhall not ſatisfy the 'man, or content your lordſhips, leave him to the 'trial of the law, which I hope will not be ſo plain 'for him as he taketh it. Surely, my lords, this 'and the like muſt greatly diſcourage me in this poor 'ſervice of mine in the commiſſion (74).' The manner in which the biſhop anſwered the accuſation againſt him, is a ſufficient evidence that his conduct could not be defended. What reparation Beniſon obtained for the injurious treatment he had received, or whether any, does not appear.

[T] One or two curious paſſages in his book againſt Knox, &c.] One of theſe relates to the conſtitution of the Engliſh government. 'The regiment of Eng'land,' ſays our Prelate, 'is not a mere Monarchy, 'as ſome for lack of conſideration think; nor a mere 'Oligarchy, nor Democracy; but a mixed rule of all 'theſe. Wherein each one of theſe have, or ſhould 'have, like authority. The image whereof, and 'not the image, but the thing indeed, is to be ſeen 'in the Parliament-houſe; wherein you ſhall find 'theſe three eſtates, the King or Queen, which re'preſenteth the Monarchy; the noblemen, which be 'the Ariſtocracy; and the burgeſſes and knights, the 'Democracy. The very ſame had Lacedæmonia, the 'nobleſt and beſt governed city that ever was. They 'had their King, their Senate, and Hippagretes, 'which were for the people. As in Lacedæmonia 'none of theſe could make or break laws, orders for 'war or peace, or do any thing without the other; 'the King nothing without the Senate and Com'mons, nor either of them or both without the King; 'albeit the Senate and Ephori had greater authority 'than the King had. In like manner, if the par'liament uſe their privileges, the King can ordain 'nothing without them: if he do, it is his fault in 'uſurping it, and their folly in permitting it. 'Wherefore, in my judgment, thoſe that in King 'Henry's days would not grant him, that proclama'tions ſhould have the force of a ſtatute, were good 'fathers of the country, and worthy commendation 'in defending their liberty (75).' This paſſage has been urged in oppoſition to Mr. Hume, in order to ſhew, that much juſter ideas of the conſtitution of the Engliſh government, were entertained in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, than is admitted by that hiſtorian (76).

Though Biſhop Aylmer, in his piece written againſt Knox, was an advocate for the propriety of inveſting women with the government of ſtates and kingdoms, yet he appears not to have been a very partial friend to the ladies in general. 'Women,' ſays he, 'are of two ſorts. Some of them are wiſer, 'better learned, diſcreeter, and more conſtant, than 'a number of men. But another, and a worſe ſort 'of them, and the moſt part, are fond, fooliſh, wan'ton, flibbergibs, tattlers, triflers, wavering, wit'leſs, without counſel, feeble, careleſs, raſh, proud, 'dainty, nice, tale-bearers, eves-droppers, rumour'raiſers, evil-tongued, worſe-minded, and in every 'reſpect doltified with the dregs of the Devil's dung'hill (77).'

Of the French nation, our Prelate expreſſed his ſentiments in the following words: 'They are the 'proudeſt, the untrueſt, and the moſt tyrannical 'nation under the ſun. I except not the Spaniards; 'whoſe dominion the Italians in Milan, Naples, 'Sicily, and elſewhere, can much better brook and 'abide, than the light and inconſtant French, as 'Cæſar called them (78).'] T.

AYRMIN or AYERMIN (WILLIAM), Biſhop of Norwich in the reigns of Edward II. and III., was deſcended of an ancient and wealthy family, ſeated at Oſgodby in Lincolnſhire (a). He was a Canon in the cathedral church of York, and afterwards in that of Wells; and was for ſome time Keeper of the Seal, and Vice-Chancellor to King Edward II, under the Chancellor John Biſhop of Norwich, who could not diſcharge his office by reaſon of ſickneſs (b). About this time, an. 1319, a war having broken out between England and Scotland, Ayrmin had the misfortune to be taken priſoner, in a battle between the Scotch and the Yorkiſts [A]. Afterwards recovering his liberty, he was made Chancellor of England under King Edward III., and afterwards Treaſurer (c). Being ſent Ambaſſador to the court of Rome, he is ſaid to have neglected the buſineſs of his embaſſy, and to have employed his time and intereſt in obtaining the biſhopric of Norwich, which was then vacant. In which application meeting with ſucceſs, he returned to take poſſeſſion of that See: which the King hearing, and being diſguſted at his proceedings, ſent ſoldiers to Norwich to apprehend him; but Ayrmin lay hid in the cathedral church, till, by the interpoſition of friends, the King was reconciled to him, and conſented to his conſecration (d) [B]. This Prelate gave two hundred pounds to buy lands for the maintenance of two Prieſts to ſay maſs for his ſoul for ever (e). Fuller (f) tells us, he was credibly informed, that Biſhop Ayrmin purchaſed the manor of Silk-Willoughby, in Lincolnſhire, which, with other fair eſtates, continued ſtill in the poſſeſſion of his deſcendants. He died March the 28th, 1337, after having ſat eleven years (g).

AYSCUE, AYSCOUGH, or ASKEW (Sir GEORGE), an eminent Engliſh Admiral in the laſt century. He was deſcended from a very good family in Lincolnſhire, and entered early into the ſea ſervice, where he obtained the character of an able and experienced officer, and the honour of knighthood from King Charles I (a). This, however, did not hinder him from adhering to the Parliament, when by a very ſingular intrigue they got poſſeſſion of the fleet, and ſo zealous he was in the ſervice of his maſters, that when in 1648, the greateſt part of the navy went over to the Prince of Wales, he, who then commanded the Lion, ſecured that ſhip for the Parliament, which was by them eſteemed both an acceptable ſervice, and an action of great importance (b) [A]. As this was [A] An acceptable ſervice, and an action of great importance.] This revolt of the fleet was among thoſe extraordinary things, which it was impoſſible either to foreſee or to prevent. It was owing entirely to the diſpoſition of the common ſeamen, for ſcarcely any officer was at all concerned in it and at a time too, when the Parliament was every where victorious, ſo that it is not eaſy to conceive the cauſes of ſo great a change. In order to underſtand this matter, it muſt be remembered, that the Parliament had, in the beginning of the war, drawn off the fleet from the King's ſervice, partly by working upon the minds of the ſeamen, and partly by the turning upon him his own commiſſion of Admiral, which he had granted to the Earl of Northumberland, but with a proviſo in that commiſſion, to hold this office no longer than till the Duke of York was of age to execute it, as the King his father intended he ſhould (1). It was of this very clauſe, which had ſerved them in the beginning, that the Parliament began now to be afraid, and it was their fear that produced the very thing which it apprehended. The Earl of Warwick, and his Preſbyterian officers, who had brought off the navy from the King, were not likely to go all the lengths that were then expected from them. The Parliament, therefore thought fit to bring in new officers, and accordingly appointed one Colonel Rainſborough, Vice-Admiral, and ſent him into the Downs, to take upon him the command of the fleet with that title (2). But when he came thither, the ſailors had been for ſome time politicians, and having probably catched up ſome words that fell from their officers, had after mature deliberation, ſettled theſe three points among themſelves. The firſt was, that the Parliament muſt be either doing or contriving ſomething very bad, becauſe in Scotland, Eſſex, Lancaſhire, Kent, and eſpecially at London, people were generally diſcontented, and alſo becauſe they could not truſt thoſe good old officers, who had ſo faithfully ſerved them at ſea, but were putting others into the fleet, in whom, though they might, the ſeamen could not at all confide. They were likewiſe very clear, that as the King's cauſe declined from the moment the fleet left him, ſo without doubt it would recover, when the fleet returned to his ſervice, was a ſufficient proof of his fidelity, he had the command given him in a ſquadron, that was employed to watch the motions of the Prince of Wales; and accordingly ſailed therewith to the coaſt of Ireland, where, by his vigilance, he prevented his Highneſs from doing what he would otherwiſe have done, and by his great intereſt with the ſeamen he drew many of them back to that ſervice from which they had deſerted (c). This recommended him ſtrongly to the Parliament, who, the next year, ſent him with a conſiderable number of ſhips, and the honourable title of Admiral in thoſe ſeas, to the coaſt of Ireland, which commiſſion he diſcharged with equal vigour and vigilance, ſupplying Dublin with proviſions, attending the army upon all emergencies, and contributing in every reſpect ſo effectually to the reduction of Ireland, that the Parliament not only thought fit to continue him in his command for another year, but likewiſe ordered an immediate proviſion to be made for the payment of his arrears, and preſented him with one hundred pounds, as a ſpecial mark of their favour, and the juſt reward of his ſervices (d) [B]. After the war was finiſhed in Ireland, and the Parliament had thereby time and opportunity, to think of the proper means of ſubduing the reſt of the dominions of the crown of England to their obedience, Sir George Ayſcue had orders to ſail with a ſmall ſquadron, to reduce the iſland of Barbadoes, but before he was in any readineſs to ſail, his orders were countermanded. The reaſon of this was, that the Parliament had received information, that the Dutch were treating with Sir John Greenville, in order to have the iſles of Scilly put into their hands, and therefore it was thought neceſſary to reduce theſe iſlands firſt. Blake and Ayſcue were employed in this expedition (e), in the ſpring of the year 1651, and performed it with honour and ſucceſs. They had but a ſmall body of troops on board, and Sir John Greenville had a conſiderable force in the iſland of St. Mary, commanded by ſome of the beſt officers in the late King's army; ſo that if thoſe diſputes had been decided by the ſword, the engagement muſt have been both bloody and doubtful. Sir John eaſily perceived that this muſt end fatally in reſpect to him, and the remains of the King's forces under his command; and therefore entered into a treaty with General Blake, and Admiral Ayſcue, who uſed him very honourably, and gave him fair conditions, after which Blake returned to England, and Ayſcue proceeded on his voyage to Barbadoes (f). The Parliament, when they firſt heard of the reduction of Scilly, were extremely well pleaſed, as indeed they had reaſon, ſince privateers from thence did ſo much miſchief, that ſcarcely any trade could be carried on with tolerable ſecurity. But when the conditions were known, ſome great men changed their opinions, and gave Blake to underſtand, that he and his colleague had been too forward, ſo that it was doubtful whether the Parliament would ratify this agreement. Blake ſaid, that if they had given Sir John Greenville good conditions, they had done it with good reaſon; that in the firſt place, it ſaved the effuſion of Engliſh blood; and next, that there was a ſtrong ſquadron of Dutch ſhips at no great diſtance, the commander of which had offered Sir John no leſs than 100,000 pounds, to put theſe iſlands into his hands;

ſervice, which was a point ſo clear in marine politics, that it was never once controverted. Thirdly, the Duke of York was now become a fine young Prince, had juſt made his eſcape to Holland, and was very capable of making them a good Admiral (3). When Rainſborough, therefore, came on board in the Downs, they aſked him in very plain terms, Whether he would go with them, and ſeek their Admiral the Duke of York? which he reſenting, and beginning to talk in high terms, they very fairly ſent him and a boat-full of his new Captains on ſhore, and hoiſted ſail, and bore away for the Dutch coaſt (4). This was in the month of July 1648, and the ſhips that thus quitted the Parliament's ſervice, were twenty men of war, moſt of them of the firſt and ſecond rates, well manned and furniſhed, and theſe ſoon after appeared at the mouth of the river Thames, by which the commerce of the city of London ſuffered ſeverely (5). We need not wonder therefore, that Sir George Ayſcue's preſerving, in ſuch a juncture, his ſhip for the Parliament, gained him a great degree of credit, and confidence, with his maſters.

[B] A ſpecial mark of their favour, and the juſt reward of his ſervices.] In the very beginning of this affair, the Parliament treated Sir George very reſpectfully; for they deſired that he would go over in the expedition to Holland, to look after the ſhips that had deſerted (6). But when their authority was a little better eſtabliſhed, they took more upon them; for they did not grant him a commiſſion, and thereby give him the rank of Admiral, but they paſſed a vote that he ſhould command in thoſe ſeas as Admiral (7). Yet Sir George was far from regarding theſe points of ceremony, but did his duty ſo effectually, that he entirely changed the face of affairs in Ireland, and this with a very ſmall force; for, whereas the garriſon of Dublin was in danger of ſtarving, he took care to ſupply them from time to time with proviſions, and thereby preſerved that city. He ſo carefully watched the revolted fleet, under the command of Prince Rupert, that he put it entirely out of his power to execute any thing of importance, and at laſt blocked him up in the harbour of Kinſale. It was he alſo, who eſcorted and ſecured the landing of Cromwell's army, ſo that to this gentleman might be juſtly attributed, the Parliament's recovering themſelves, and ſecuring that kingdom after the King's murder, when they had very little hopes of it (8). They might very well thank their Generals at ſea, paſs congratulatory votes in their favour, order the miniſters who preached before them, to take particular notice in their ſermons, of their diligence and ſucceſs, and endeavour to ſecure ſuch neceſſary inſtruments to their ſervice, by providing for the due payment of their arrears (9). All theſe ſteps were equally juſt and natural on both ſides, and it was this conduct, that on the one hand, raiſed the reputation of the Parliament ſo high, for wiſdom, policy, and juſtice, and, on the other, ſecured them ſuch an uninterrupted ſeries of good fortune in all their deſigns. This we find very juſtly remarked by Ludlow, Hollis, and Whitlock, nay, and in ſome meaſure, by the great Lord Clarendon himſelf, who, as he had it not in his power to deny the fact, ſo he was by no means unwilling to own it; and indeed all the writers of thoſe times agree, that however the Parliament came by their power, they managed it with dignity, decency, and diſcretion. The obſervation I would make upon all this, and I hope the reader will agree with me, that it is an obſervation worth making, is, That Sir George Ayſcue, and the reſt of the officers at ſea, as they behaved well, were encouraged and rewarded by their maſters, who kept ſo ſtrict an eye over all the ſervants of the public, that it was impoſſible for men of no merit to riſe, or for ſuch as really poſſeſſed it to paſs unregarded.

that if the Parliament did not approve of his conduct, he ſhould be ſorry for it, and would take care to prevent a miſtake of that ſort for the future, by laying down his commiſſion, as he was confident Sir George Ayſcue would likewiſe do (g). Upon this there was no more ſaid of the articles, which were honourably complyed with, and Sir George received orders to ſail immediately to the Weſt-Indies, which he obeyed, never expecting to hear any more of theſe articles, which as they were made with good reaſon, ſo he thought they would have met with a good reception; but he had afterwards cauſe given him to apprehend, that whatever benefit the Parliament might receive from the ſervice itſelf, they were far enough from being ſatisfied with the manner in which it was done [C]. Sir George continued his voyage, without meeting with any croſs accident, till his arrival at Barbadoes; which was on the twenty-ſixth of October, 1651. He then found his enterprize would be attended with great difficulties, and ſuch as had not been foreſeen at home. The Lord Willoughby, of Parham, commanded there for the King, and had aſſembled a body of five thouſand men for the defence of the iſland. He was a nobleman of great parts and greater probity, one who had been extremely reverenced by the Parliament, before he quitted their party, and whoſe worth had ſo ſtrongly recommended him, both to the eſteem and affection of the inhabitants, that he had as abſolute a diſpoſal of their perſons and properties, as it was neceſſary for a Governor to have, who was in ſuch a ſituation; and the uſe he made of his power and influence, was as perfectly right in itſelf, as the critical circumſtances of thoſe times required (h). Sir George, though he fully apprehended how many and how great obſtacles lay in his way, yet ſhewed no ſigns of concern, but boldly forced his paſſage into the harbour, and made himſelf maſter of twelve ſail of Dutch merchantmen that lay there, hoping that this might raiſe an inſurrection in the iſland, in which however he was miſtaken. The next morning he ſent a ſummons to the Lord Willoughby, requiring him to ſubmit to the authority of the Parliament of England, to which his Lordſhip anſwered, that he knew no ſuch authority, that he had a commiſſion from King Charles II., to be Governor of that iſland, and that he would keep it for his Majeſty's ſervice at the hazard of his life. That he might be able to make good his word, he put the iſland and its inhabitants into the beſt poſture of defence poſſible, and being much ſuperior in ſtrength, Sir George thought it not prudent to land the few troops he had, and thereby diſcover his weakneſs to ſo cautious an enemy (i). In the mean time, he received a letter by an advice-boat from England, with the news of the King's being defeated at Worceſter, with one intercepted from Lady Willoughby, containing a very particular account of that unhappy affair. Upon this he ſummoned Lord Willoughby a ſecond time, and accompanied his ſummons with Lady Willoughby's letter, which however made no impreſſion upon his Lordſhip, who continued firm in his reſolution, of holding out the iſland as long as he could (k). All this time, Sir George anchored in Speights bay, and ſtayed there till December, when the Virginia Merchant fleet arriving, he reſolved to take that opportunity to land with the greater advantage; for he made as if they were a reinforcement that had been ſent him, and he had only waited for them till then; whereas, the truth was, he had not above two thouſand men, and the ſight of the little army on ſhore, made him cautious of venturing his men, till he thought the inhabitants had conceived a greater idea of his ſtrength, than they had done before (l). The Virginia ſhips were welcomed at their coming in, as a ſupply of men of [C] They were far enough from being ſatisfied with the manner in which it was done.] It is the misfortune of all governments, that have a diſtruſt of their own titles, to be jealous and ſuſpicious to a very unreaſonable degree; and this was one of the very few foibles, to which our Long Parliament was ſubject, and which proved in the end the ruin of their power. For Oliver Cromwell, and the people he truſted, knowing that there was no means of ſubverting that Senate, but by dividing them, and thereby rendering their bottom narrower; they took great pains to infuſe into honeſter mens heads than their own, that ſuch as were mere acts of generoſity and virtue, flowed from a ſecret regard to the Royal Cauſe. And thus they brought both Blake and Ayſcue to be conſidered, after all their ſervices, as men not fit to be truſted. There were ſome pains likewiſe taken, to infuſe into the minds of Blake and Ayſcue, a deep reſentment of this undeſerved uſage; and that this was not altogether without effect, appears clearly, from the warmth expreſſed by Blake about it (10). Yet after all, there are ſome paſſages relating to the reduction of theſe iſlands, which deſerve the reader's attention, and which will clear up many difficulties, even in the beſt hiſtories we have of thoſe times. In the firſt place it is certain, that the leſſer iſlands were actually taken by the Parliament's forces; that Sir John Greenville was blocked up by land and ſea in the iſland of St. Mary, which he had fortified indeed, and had a competent number of men to defend; but then, there were two things againſt him: The firſt, that the King his maſter could afford him no ſuccours; the ſecond, that though the Dutch would have bought the iſland of him, yet he had no reaſon to hope, they would take him or his troops on board, in caſe they were diſtreſſed by the Parliament forces. Theſe were certainly very good reaſons, for that brave man's endeavouring to make the beſt terms for himſelf he could (11). Yet the Parliament had no juſt cauſe to blame their generals for what they did in this buſineſs, ſince theſe iſlands were ſo ſituated, that, in the hands of an enemy, neither England nor Ireland could have been ſafe; and if reaſonable terms had not been granted to Sir John Greenville, he muſt have been obliged to have accepted the terms offered him by the Dutch, who both could and would have yielded him that protection, which it was not in the power of his maſter to afford (12). Yet after all, Sir George Ayſcue had no ſhare in actually granting him theſe conditions; ſince it manifeſtly appears, that he not only wrote for, and had the Parliaments orders to continue his voyage to Barbadoes, but was actually ſailed before the articles were ſigned, which was on the 23d of May 1651 (13). The account given by the Earl of Clarendon of this matter, is very ſhort, and is wrong placed; for he brings it in after the Dutch war was begun, and at the cloſe of his account of the reduction of Barbadoes and Virginia (14); which ſhews, how neceſſary a thing it is for the true underſtanding of Engliſh hiſtory, to have the lives of particular perſons drawn up in this manner, with a cautious regard to facts and dates, and a clear diſtinction of what was and what was not done by them (15), which the authors of our general hiſtories have not attended to, ſo much as they ought.

war, and he preſently ordered his men on ſhore: 150 Scotch ſervants aboard that fleet, were added to a regiment of 700 men, and ſome ſeamen, to make their number look more formidable. Sir George had on board his fleet one Colonel Allen, a gentleman of Barbadoes, who came from thence into England, to ſolicit from the Parliament, a force ſufficient for the reduction of the iſland, and therefore he was thought the propereſt man to command the forces on ſhore (m). He accordingly landed with them on the ſeventeenth of December, and found Lord Willoughby's forces well entrenched, near a fort they had upon the ſea-coaſt. They attacked him, however, and, in a ſharp diſpute, wherein about ſixty men were killed on both ſides, had ſo much the advantage, that they drove them to the fort, notwithſtanding that Colonel Allen, their Commander, was killed by a muſket ſhot, as he attempted to land. The ſoldiers and ſeamen however puſhed on, and made themſelves maſters of the fort, and four pieces of cannon that were in it. After this, the ſailors returned to their ſhips, which cruized up and down, to prevent any ſuccours coming to the iſlanders, or any merchants trading with them. The ſoldiers poſted themſelves in the fort, and from thence made incurſions into the country, upon which the chief of the inhabitants grew weary of the war, which Sir George underſtanding, by the correſpondence he had in the iſland, he by the ſame means procured Colonel Moddiford, who was one of the moſt leading men on the place, to enter into a treaty with him, and this negociation ſucceeded ſo well, that Moddiford declared publickly for a peace, and joined with Sir George to bring Lord Willoughby, the Governor, to reaſon as they phraſed it (n). Sir George's men were now all on ſhore, and made up a body of two thouſand foot, and an hundred horſe, for many deſerters had come over to him. If Colonel Moddiford had joined him with his party in attacking them, there was no hope of the Governor's eſcaping, who having before deſerted the Parliament, could expect no mercy from them, if he was taken without a treaty (o). But perhaps all theſe conſiderations would ſcarcely have prevailed with that generous nobleman to have given up the iſland, if an accident had not happened, which put moſt of the gentlemen about him into ſuch confuſion, that he could no longer depend upon their advice or aſſiſtance. The thing happened thus: his Lordſhip perceiving his ſuperiority lay chiefly in horſe, reſolved to make a briſk puſh with the body under his immediate command; and having, previous to the execution of his deſign, called together his officers, while they were ſitting in council, a cannon-ball beat open the door of the room, and took off the head of the centinel poſted before it, which ſo frighted all the gentlemen of the iſland, that they not only compelled their Governor to lay aſide his former deſign, but to retire to a place two miles farther from the harbour (p). Sir George Ayſcue, taking advantage of this unexpected good fortune, immediately ordered all his forces on ſhore, which conſiſted, as was ſaid, of two thouſand foot, and one hundred horſe, to advance under the command of Captain Morrice, as if he intended to have attacked them in their entrenchments, which ſtruck ſuch a terror into ſome of the principal perſons about the Governor, that, after mature deliberation on his own circumſtances, and their diſpoſition, he began to alter his mind, and thereupon to avoid the effuſion of Chriſtian and Engliſh blood, both parties appointed commiſſaries to treat (q). Sir George named Captain Peck, Mr. Searl, Colonel Thomas Moddiford, and James Colliton, Eſq; the Lord Willoughby, Sir Richard Peers, Charles Pim, Eſq; Colonel Ellice, and Major Byham, who on the ſeventeenth of January agreed on articles of rendition, which were alike comprehenſive and honourable. The Lord Willoughby had what he moſt deſired, indemnity, and freedom of eſtate and perſon, upon which, ſoon after, he returned to England (r). The iſlands of Nevis, Antigua, and St. Chriſtopher, were, by the ſame capitulation, ſurrendered to the Parliament, with a proviſo, that Lord Willoughby, Colonel Walrond, and ſome other perſons mentioned in that treaty, were reſtored to their eſtates, and the inhabitants were promiſed, not only indemnity but protection, in the quiet enjoyment of their plantations, upon condition that they did nothing to the prejudice of the commonwealth (s). This treaty being ſigned, Mr. Searl was appointed Governor of Barbadoes, and Mr. Rynell, of Antigua and the Leeward Iſlands (t), in virtue of a commiſſion, granted to Sir George Ayſcue for this purpoſe. The news of the reduction of theſe iſlands, made ſuch a noiſe in that part of the world, that Captain Dennis who was detached with a few ſhips to Virginia, reduced it without much trouble (u); after which, Sir George conſidering that he had fully executed his commiſſion, and that his preſence was no farther neceſſary in America, reſolved to return with the ſquadron under his command to England, which he accordingly did, and arriving at Plymouth on the twenty-fifth of May, 1652 (w), was received with all imaginable teſtimonies of joy and ſatisfaction by the people there, to whom he was well known before, as his late ſucceſs alſo ſerved not a little to raiſe and heighten his reputation [D]. It was not long after his arrival, before he

[D] Served not a little to raiſe and heighten his reputation.] The reduction of Barbadoes was firſt attempted, becauſe it was thought of greater conſequence than any of our plantations, and the people leaſt affected to the new government. We have an excellent, though conciſe, account of this from the pen of Lord Clarendon (16). 'Barbadoes, ſays he, which was 'much the richeſt plantation, was principally inhabited 'by men that had retired thither only to be quiet, and 'to be free from the noiſe and oppreſſions in England, 'and without any ill thoughts towards the King, many 'of them having ſerved him with fidelity and courage 'during the war, and that being ended, made that 'iſland their refuge from farther proſecutions; but having now gotten good eſtates there (as it is incredible 'to what fortunes men raiſed themſelves in few years in 'that plantation), they were more willing to live in 'ſubjection under that government at that diſtance, 'than he found himſelf again obliged to enter upon action; for the Dutch war which broke out in his abſence, was then become extremely warm, and he was forced to take a ſhare in it, though his ſhips were ſo extremely foul, that they were much fitter to be laid up, than to be employed in any farther ſervice. On the twenty-firſt of June, 1652, Sir George Ayſcue, in obedience to the orders he had received from London, came to Dover, with his ſquadron of eleven ſail, and there joined his old friend Admiral Blake, on board whoſe ſhip he dined, and was received with all imaginable marks of reſpect and kindneſs, by that famous commander (x). In the beginning of the next month, Blake having received orders to ſail northward, and deſtroy the Dutch herring fiſhery, Sir George Ayſcue was left to command the fleet in the Downs. Within a few days after Blake's departure he took five ſail of Dutch merchantmen (y), and had ſcarcely brought them in, before he received advice, that a fleet of forty ſail had been ſeen not far from the coaſt, upon which he gave chace, fell in amongſt them, took ſeven, ſunk four, and ran twenty-four upon the French ſhore, all the reſt being ſeparated from their convoy, which, conſidering that Sir George had with him only the ſquadron he brought from Barbadoes, was very gallantly performed, as Whitelock judiciouſly informs us (z). In the account that Sir George gave of this action to the Parliament, he obſerved, that running Dutch ſhips upon the French ſhore, was the ſame thing as ſinking or burning them, for though the French defended them vigorouſly from the Engliſh ſhips that purſued them, yet they afterwards went aboard the Dutch, and plundered them without mercy (a). The Dutch Admiral, Van Tromp, who was at ſea with a great fleet, having information of the ſituation that Sir George Ayſcue was in, reſolved to take advantage of him, and with no leſs than one hundred ſail, clapped in between him and the river, and reſolved to ſurprize ſuch ſhips as ſhould attempt to go out; or, if that deſign failed, to go in and ſink Sir George and his ſquadron (b). The Engliſh Admiral ſoon diſcovered their intention, and cauſing a ſignal to be made from Dover caſtle, for all ſhips to keep to ſea, he thereby defeated the firſt part of their project. However, Van Tromp attempted the ſecond part of his ſcheme, in hopes of better ſucceſs, and on the eighth of July when it was ebb, he began to ſail towards the Engliſh Fleet; but the wind dying away, he was obliged to come to an anchor about a league off, in order to expect the next ebb. Sir George, in the mean time, cauſed a ſtrong platform to be raiſed between Deal and Sandown caſtles, well furniſhed with artillery, ſo pointed, as to bear directly upon the Dutch as they came in. The militia of the county of Kent were alſo ordered down to the ſea-ſhore, to entertain the enemy with their ſmall ſhot; notwithſtanding which preparation,

'than to return into England, and be liable to the penalties of their former tranſgreſſions, which upon the articles of ſurrender they were indemnified from. Nor was there any other alteration there, than the removing the Lord Willoughby of Parham (who was upon many accounts odious to the Parliament, as well as by being Governor there by the King's commiſſion) and putting an inferior mean man in his place.' It is not an eaſy matter to give a very clear and diſtinct detail of tranſactions within this period of time, becauſe there are viſible contradictions in moſt of the accounts hitherto publiſhed, ariſing from cauſes which it would take up too much time to mention here. We are informed by Whitelock, that the Parliament received an account of the reduction of Barbadoes on the 23d of April 1652, and that after the articles were read, the houſe ordered the meſſenger one hundred pounds: He farther ſays, that Lord Willoughby was forced to this ſurrender, by his men's deſerting him, and going over to Colonel Moddiford, and that he had good terms granted him, becauſe his force was ſtill the greater, and to avoid the deſtruction of that goodly iſland which was already much waſted (17). It ſeems that our Sir George Ayſcue was much in the good graces of William Lilly, the famous almanack-maker, who particularly honoured him, by preſerving in his obſervations the dates of his greateſt exploits, which is what I do not find he ever did for any other perſon of what rank ſoever, and which makes it ſtill more extraordinary, he did this after Sir George was laid aſide. Thus, in his aſtrological predictions for the year 1653, in the month of January, he ſets down this memorandum. 'Barbadoes ſurrendered unto Sir George Ayſcue for the uſe of the parliament the 11th of January 1651, who alſo, by his prudence and ſweet diſpoſition, reduced all our weſtern plantations, to his great honour, and extream benefit of this commonwealth.' Again, in the month of May, the ſame year, he ſets down the following obſervation: 'May the 25th, 1652, Sir George Ayſcue, Knt. returned ſafe from the weſtern iſlands to Plymouth, to the great joy of the people, he having reduced all the weſtern iſlands, and taken from the Dutch about forty ſail of ſhips.' It is viſible enough from hence, that Sir George was in great credit with the people, and one may reaſonably ſuſpect, that beſides the regard this man might have for our admiral, he might intend the rendering the Parliament odious to the populace, by expoſing their ingratitude to ſo worthy a commander; and there is the greater cauſe to believe this, if we reflect upon theſe two points: Firſt, That Lilly's predictions and obſervations governed at that time all the common people, and therefore he was uſed as a ſtate-engine upon every great revolution. Secondly, That he was a ſhrewd enemy to the Parliament at this time, appears plainly, by his poſtſcript to his predictions for the next year 1654, the beginning of which, becauſe his pieces are very ſcarce, I will tranſcribe for the benefit of the reader. 'Wearied to behold the giddineſs of the Engliſh nation, who neither love the Lord General Cromwell, or army, our preſervers; and as ſorrowful to hear the woeful complaints of many ſad diſtreſſed people, whoſe lamentable petitions ſeveral years had made fruitleſs addreſſes to the late diſſolved parliament; I was reſolved ever hereafter to have been a ſilent ſpectator, and not a forward actor as ſometimes I had been, having ſmarted for preſuming to tell theſe late Demi-Gods, of that change they are now ſenſible of: Seriouſly, it grieved my ſoul to hear the complaints of the country people, when they told me how tyrannous, how imperious, how like prerogative-men, many of the late Parliament carried themſelves in their ſeveral counties. There could not be a beneficial office either by ſea or land, but a ſon, kinſman, nephew, or friend of theirs, muſt have it; whilſt the maimed ſoldiers, or well-affected Chriſtians, who had loſt all his or their eſtates for their ſervices, were ready to ſtarve; nay, many ſuch did ſtarve and die for pure hunger, ſlighted, ſcorned, and unpitied, by ſome of thoſe unmerciful Preſbyterians.' He goes on at large to juſtify the turning out the Parliament, and all that was afterwards done, in order to get the government entirely into his own hands by Cromwell, chiefly from theſe topics, that the Parliament were reſolved to ſit for ever, that they were exceſſively ungrateful to ſuch as had ſerved with the utmoſt fidelity, and that they gave every thing to their own creatures or to their relations.

the Dutch Admiral did not recede from his point, but at the next ebb weighed anchor, and would have ſtood into the port; but the wind coming about ſouth-weſt, and blowing directly in his teeth, conſtrained him to keep out, and being ſtreightened for time, he was obliged to ſail away, and leave Sir George ſafe in the harbour, with the ſmall ſquadron he commanded (c). He was ſoon after ordered to Plymouth, to bring in under his convoy five Eaſt-India ſhips, which he did in the latter end of July; and in the firſt week of Auguſt, brought in four French and Dutch prizes, for which activity and vigilance in his command, he was univerſally commended (d) [E]. In a few days after this, intelligence was received, that Van Tromp's fleet was ſeen off the back of the Iſle of Wight, and it was thereupon reſolved, that Sir George with his fleet of forty men of war, moſt of them hired merchantmen, except flag-ſhips, ſhould ſtretch over to the coaſt of France to meet them. Accordingly on the ſixteenth of Auguſt, between one and two of the clock at noon, they got ſight of the enemy, who quitted their merchantmen, being fifty in number. About four the fight began; the Engliſh Admiral with nine others charging through their fleet, his ſhips received moſt damage in the ſhrouds, maſts, ſails, and rigging, which was repaid the Dutch in their hulls. Sir George having thus paſſed through them, got the weather-gage, and charged them again, but all his fleet not coming up, and the night already entered, they parted with a drawn battle (e). Captain Peck, the Rear-Admiral, loſt his leg, of which, ſoon after, he died. Several Captains were wounded, but no ſhip loſt, only ſome ſhattered and torn. Of the Dutch, not one was ſaid to be loſt, though many were ſhot through and through, but ſo that they were able to proceed on their voyage, and anchored the next day after, being followed by the Engliſh to the Iſle of Baſſa; but no farther attempt was made by our fleet, by reaſon, as it was pretended, of the danger of the French coaſts, from whence they returned to Plymouth-Sound, to mend and repair their rigging (f). The truth of the matter was, ſome of Sir George's Captains were a little baſhful in this affair, and the fleet was in ſo indifferent a condition, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to refit, before they proceeded again to action (g) [F]. [E] For which activity and vigilance in his command he was univerſally commended.] Theſe were ſearching times for men to live in, who were charged with public employments; for every man thought himſelf at liberty to enquire into their conduct, and to publiſh all he knew. We muſt not imagine however, that this extenſive liberty of the preſs, was owing to the ſuperior virtue of thoſe times; ſince, in reality, it was not; but rather to the weakneſs of new eſtabliſhed governments, which having raiſed and wrought themſelves into power by the help of the preſs, were aſhamed to uſe their authority immediately againſt what had procured it. The news of the Dutch war met Sir George Ayſcue at Plymouth, who inſtantly attacked and took all the veſſels of that nation he could meet with, for which we find him particularly taken notice of in all the hiſtorical collections of thoſe times, though from their haſtineſs in ſetting down his exploits from ſuch accounts as came firſt to hand, they do not agree extremely well with each other in their relations. William Lilly, in his almanack for 1653 beforementioned, ſets down the following particulars: 'In July '1652 near Calais, Sir George Ayſcue took, ſunk, 'and diſperſed thirty-ſix ſhips of the Dutch; for you 'muſt underſtand, this gallant man doth all his actions in good and hearty earneſt for this common-'wealth. I hope he will prove worſe terror to the 'Dutch than Drake to the Spaniard.' To the ſame purpoſe other writers expreſs themſelves, more eſpecially Whitelock, who ſeems to have had a very ſtrict intercourſe with, and a great friendſhip for, our Admiral, as appears by his ſetting down every tranſaction in which he was concerned, during the time he continued at the head of the fleet, and ſometimes with very ſingular marks of commendation and applauſe (18).

[F] It was abſolutely neceſſary to refit before they proceeded again to action.] In the text, the account is taken verbatim from Heath, who ſeems to have conſtantly copied the advices publiſhed by the State; ſo that I look upon him as one of the beſt writers we have in matters of this nature. It is however certain, that there were various reports concerning this engagement, ſome of which reflected on the commander, and ſome on thoſe who ſerved under him. Whitelock, who wrote preciſely as things came to hand, and neither more nor leſs than his advices contained, tells us, (19) 'On the '18th of Auguſt, that Sir George Ayſcue and the 'Dutch fleet was engaged about Plymouth, and that 'there had paſſed two or three thouſand ſhot between 'them.' On the 24th he had received clearer accounts, from whence he writes thus: 'Letters, that 'Sir George Ayſcue, by advice of his council of war, 'went after the Dutch fleet to the coaſt of France, 'and there engaged them, who were ninety ſail of 'ſhips, thirty of them merchantmen, who left their 'fleet upon the beginning of the engagement.

'That Sir George had but thirty-eight ſail and 'four fireſhips, and four ſcouts; that he and four 'others charged through the whole body of the enemies 'fleet, and received many ſhots in their hulls, maſts, 'and rigging, the enemies deſign being to ſpoil them. 'But Sir George tacked about and weathered them, 'and charged them all again, and ſo continued engaged till dark night.

'That he loſt but one fire-ſhip, which ſet herſelf 'on fire, being ready to ſink, and ſaved her men, and 'turned her among the enemy. That the Dutch Admiral was ſunk. That the next day the Engliſh 'fleet kept fight of the Dutch fleet, but would not 'engage upon the French coaſt, but went to the 'northward to repair their ſhips.' The account given by Lord Clarendon, differs ſomething from this: 'Sir 'George Ayſcue ſtanding weſtward, ſays he, engaged 'with thirty ſail of men of war, the whole Dutch 'fleet conſiſting of ſixty ſhips of war and thirty merchants. It was near four of the clock in the afternoon when both fleets begun to engage, ſo that the 'night quickly parted them; yet not before two of the 'Holland ſhips of war were ſunk, and moſt of the men 'loſt. The Dutch in that action, applying themſelves 'moſt to ſpoil the tackling and ſails of the Engliſh, in 'which they had ſo good ſucceſs, that on the next 'morning they were not able to give them farther 'chace, till their ſails and rigging could be repaired (20).' The Dutch writers give a very different account of this affair; they aſſert, that their own fleet was ſo far from being ſuperior, that it was ſcarcely equal to that of the Engliſh (21); which however is no better than a fallacy, ſince though Admiral de Ruyter had no more than thirty-eight men of war under his command, yet he had ſixty merchantmen under his convoy; and out of theſe he took twenty of the ſtouteſt and beſt manned into the line, and as they acted in every reſpect as well as men of war could have done, there is no great wonder that they were taken for men of war by the Engliſh ſailors who engaged them, and that from their report this miſtake is crept into hiſtory. We have ſeen that Lord Clarendon, in his account of this battle, ſays, that the Dutch fired chiefly at the Engliſh rigging, which at firſt ſight looks, as if they had had a mind to retire from them. Yet when one conſiders that the author of de Ruyter's life gives us a long ſpeech made by that Admiral, reflecting on the baſe behaviour of the Engliſh, and encouraging his officers to purſue and attack them even in their own harbour of Plymouth (22); I ſay, when one conſiders this, and that

He proceeded next to join Blake in the Northern Seas, where he continued during the beſt part of the month of September, and took ſeveral prizes; and towards the latter end of that month, Sir George returned with General Blake into the Downs, with one hundred and twenty ſail of men of war (b). On the twenty-ſeventh of that month a great Dutch fleet appeared, after which, Blake with his fleet ſailed, and Sir George Ayſcue, purſuant to the orders he had received, returned to Chatham with his own ſhip, and ſent the reſt of his ſquadron into ſeveral ports to be careened (i). It does not appear that the Parliament openly expreſſed any diſlike, or diſtaſte at Sir George's behaviour, upon his coming home, but, on the contrary, ſhewed him all the regard and reſpect imaginable, though he had ſome friends who informed him, that this was in appearance only; ſince they could not help expreſſing a diſlike to the terms he had granted to the Lord Willoughby at Barbadoes, which they conſidered as the ſecond part of Sir John Greenville's buſineſs, for which they had been ſo angry both with him and Blake. All this, however, Sir George bore without any viſible ſigns of diſcontent, profeſſing that he had done what he took to be his duty, and would continue ſo to do, as long as he commanded in the Engliſh fleet, without troubling himſelf about the humours of particular men, whom, after all his endeavours, he might find it impoſſible to pleaſe. But while theſe jealouſies and heart-burnings ſubſiſted on both ſides, an occaſion offered which enabled all parties to ſatisfy themſelves. It ſo fell out, that towards the end of November, 1652, the famous General Blake lying at the mouth of our river, began to think that the ſeaſon of the year left no room to expect farther action, for which reaſon he detached twenty of his ſhips to bring up a fleet of colliers from Newcaſtle, twelve more he had ſent to Plymouth, and our Admiral, as is before obſerved, with fifteen ſail, had proceeded up the river in order to their being careened. Such was the ſituation of things, when Van Tromp appeared with a fleet of eighty-five ſail (k). Upon this Blake ſent for the moſt experienced officers on board his own ſhip, where, after a long conſultation, it was agreed, that he ſhould wait for, and fight the enemy, though he had but thirty-ſeven ſail of men of war, and a few ſmall ſhips (l). Accordingly, on the twenty-ninth of November a general engagement enſued, which laſted with great fury from one in the afternoon till it was dark. Blake in the Triumph, with his ſeconds the Victory and the Vanguard, engaged for a conſiderable time near twenty-ſail of Dutch men of war, and they were in the utmoſt danger of being oppreſſed and deſtroyed by ſo unequal a force (m). This, however, did not hinder Blake from forcing his way into a throng of enemies, to relieve the Garland and Bonadventure, in doing which he was attacked by many of their ſtouteſt ſhips, which likewiſe boarded him, but after ſeveral times beating them off, he at laſt found an opportunity to rejoin his fleet (n). The loſs ſuſtained by the Engliſh conſiſted in five ſhips, either taken or ſunk, and ſeveral others diſabled. The Dutch confeſs, that one of their men of war was burnt towards the end of the fight, and the Captain and moſt of his men drowned, and alſo that the ſhips of Tromp and Evertſon were much diſabled (o). At laſt, night having parted the two fleets, Blake ſuppoſing he had ſufficiently ſecured the nation's honour and his own, by waiting the attack of an enemy, ſo much ſuperior, and ſeeing no proſpect of advantage by renewing the fight, retired up the river: but Sir George Ayſcue, who inclined to the bolder but leſs prudent counſel, was ſo diſguſted at this retreat, that he laid down his commiſſion (p) [G]. that the moſt impartial and Engliſh hiſtorians own, that de Ruyter offered Sir George Ayſcue battle afterwards, who refuſed it (23); this muſt appear in a very different light. It was ſome time before I could penetrate this myſtery: for though Mr. Colliber, a very induſtrious writer, and one whoſe perfect knowledge in the Dutch hiſtory, enabled him to ſet many things in a better light, than any of our writers of naval hiſtory, denies the fact, and treats de Ruyter's ſpeech as a mere fiction (24); yet I could not ſubſcribe in that to his opinion, becauſe, as I have obſerved, the Engliſh writers of thoſe times confirmed what the Dutch ſay, and acknowledge, that Sir George Ayſcue declined fighting (25), but thought there muſt be ſomething more in it, and upon ſifting the matter thoroughly, I found the truth to be this: Sir George Ayſcue had a fleet of thirty-eight ſail, but the greateſt part of them neither did not would fight; ſo that the whole fire of the Dutch fleet fell upon nine or ten ſail that did their duty; and the reaſon that the Dutch fired at their rigging, was in hopes of diſabling them from making a retreat, that the next day they might be able either to ſink or take them. This accounts clearly for all the dark and contradictory paſſages that we have met with. It ſhews us, why Sir George Ayſcue retired to his own ports to refit, it explains and juſtifies de Ruyter's ſpeech, and it manifeſts the true reaſon why Sir George afterwards refuſed to fight when de Ruyter challenged and provoked him. This I ſay is the myſtery hitherto never explained by any of our writers, and which therefore I take to be a very curious and valuable diſcovery. But the reader may perhaps imagine that this is all conjecture; and if it were ſo, I ſhould have no reaſon to be aſhamed of it. But William Lilly has ſet down the very fact, and it is from his account that I have made this diſcovery. His words are theſe: 'Auguſt 16, 1652, Sir George Ayſcue, near Plymouth, 'with fourteen or fifteen ſhips only, fought threeſcore 'ſail of Dutch men of war, had thirty ſhot in the 'hull of his own ſhip, twenty merchant ſhips (I ſuppoſe 'merchantmen converted into men of war) never came 'in to aſſiſt him, yet he made the Dutch give way. 'Why our State ſhall pay thoſe ſhips that fought not, 'we of the people know not. This is he that is a 'gentleman, lives like a gentleman, and acts the part 'of a generous commander in all his actions.' There cannot, I think, be any clearer account or better authority than this, either expected or demanded, ſince thereby all the different relations of this engagement, which have appeared hitherto ſo unintelligible, and in many reſpects ſo contradictory, are fully explained and perfectly reconciled.

[G] Was ſo diſguſted at this retreat, that he laid down his commiſſion.] We have this circumſtance in the author cited in the text, who took it from the Dutch accounts; for the Engliſh ſay not one word of Sir George Ayſcue's being in the engagement; but they acknowledge that Blake retreated, as being ſenſible both of the great loſs he had ſuſtained, and of the too great ſuperiority of the enemy. The next day which was the thirtieth, Tromp ſent into Harwich and Yarmouth to ſee if the Engliſh fleet was there; but they had retired firſt to Dover, and then up the river, where they were ſafe. In the mean time, the Dutch great man had rendered his country, were none of them more acceptable to the Parliament, than this act of laying down his command. They had long wiſhed and waited for an opportunity of diſmiſſing him from their ſervice, and were therefore extremely pleaſed that he had ſaved them this trouble: however, to ſhew their gratitude for paſt ſervices, and to prevent his falling into abſolute diſcontent, they voted him a preſent of three hundred pounds in money, and likewiſe beſtowed upon him three hundred pounds per annum in Ireland (q). There is good reaſon to believe, that Cromwell and his faction were as well pleaſed with this gentleman's quitting the ſea-ſervice: for as they were then meditating, what they ſoon afterwards put in execution, the turning the Parliament out of doors, it could not but be agreeable to them, to ſee an officer who had ſo great credit in the navy, and who was ſo generally eſteemed by the nation, laid aſide in ſuch a manner, both as it gave them an opportunity of inſinuating the ingratitude of that aſſembly to ſo worthy a perſon, and as it freed them from the apprehenſion of his diſturbing their meaſures, in caſe he had continued in the fleet; which it is highly probable might have come to paſs, conſidering that Blake was far enough from being of their party, and only ſubmitted to ſerve the Protector, becauſe he ſaw no other way left to ſerve his country, and did not think he had intereſt enough to preſerve the fleet, after the defection of the army, which perhaps might not have been the caſe, if Sir George Ayſcue had continued in his command (r). This is ſo much the more probable, as it is very certain that he never entered into the Protector's ſervice, or ſhewed himſelf at all willing to concur in his meaſures; though there is no doubt that Cromwell would have been extremely glad of ſo experienced an officer in his Spaniſh war. He retired after this to his country-ſeat in the county of Surrey, and lived there in great honour and ſplendour, viſiting, and being viſited by perſons of the greateſt diſtinction, both natives and foreigners, and paſſing in the general opinion of both, for one of the ableſt ſea-captains of that age (s). Yet there is ſome reaſon to believe that he had a particular correſpondence with the Protector's ſecond ſon, Henry; ſince there is ſtill a letter in being from him to Secretary Thurloe, which ſhews that he had very juſt notions of the worth of this gentleman, and of the expediency of conſulting him in all ſuch matters as had a relation to maritime power; which letter, as it is equally curious and ſhort, the reader will find in the notes (t) [H]. The Protector, towards the latter end of his life, began to grow

Admiral kept plying between Calais and Dungenneſs, ſo much elated with his laſt ſucceſs, that he ſailed with a birch broom in his main-top, to ſignify that he had ſwept the ſeas of the Engliſh (26). This was what Ayſcue foreſaw; and the very apprehenſion of which, made him reſolve to quit the ſervice: for, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, he was a man of ſuch undaunted courage, that he knew not how to ſubmit to fortune; and was much more inclined to embrace a voluntary death, than to expoſe his country to the loſs of any credit by his miſcarriage; which, notwithſtanding, came to be his fate, in ſpite of all the care he took to avoid it. There was one reaſon which, at this juncture, inclined the Parliament to part the more readily with this excellent officer, which deſerves to be conſidered. It is this: they began to diſcern Cromwell's intention to overturn them, and to ſet up a new form of government by the power of the army, which they ſaw he had gained, by putting in creatures of his own. In order therefore to get the better of this deſign, they formed a very extraordinary project; which was to new model the army, by ſending ſuch of the regiments as they ſuſpected moſt to ſerve on board the fleet; and to make this ſcheme anſwer their purpoſe the better, they thruſt in abundance of land-officers to command their fleet, and it was to make way for theſe that they ſuffered Sir George Ayſcue and ſome other officers to quit that ſervice (27). But in this they ſtrangely over-reached themſelves: for Cromwell ſeeing there was no time to be loſt, and that by this ſtep they had for the preſent equally diſobliged the ſeamen and alarmed the army, puſhed on his deſign with greater vehemence, and by craftily managing two parties, who though they wiſhed equally ill to the Parliament, leaſt of all intended the ſetting him up, deceived and got the better of them all; while the officers of the fleet having their hands full of the Dutch war, thought themſelves obliged to ſerve their country the beſt they could, notwithſtanding this change of government, which though they did not reliſh they could not remedy. Before this great change was brought about, which was in the month of April, 1653, Sir George Ayſcue was retired to his country-ſeat in Surrey, with a ſettled reſolution to live in an honourable privacy, and never concern himſelf farther with public affairs; which is the reaſon that we never meet with him in the councils of ſtate, or any other of the new ſchemes of government that were ſet up in ſucceeding times. How far this conduct of his may on the ſtrict principles of patriotiſm be juſtified, I ſhall not take upon me to determine: but this is certain, that ſome of the wiſeſt and ableſt men in the kingdom thought in the ſame way, and acted in the ſame manner, till they had an opportunity afterwards of entering again into the public ſervice, when the government was better eſtabliſhed, and ſtood once more upon a legal baſis. There might alſo be a particular reaſon that might determine Sir George Ayſcue to act as he did, which was this, that he had never interfered in any of thoſe dark deſigns by which the government was overturned, or been made uſe of as an inſtrument in any of the violent meaſures practiſed for overturning it; ſo that in his ſtate of rural retirement, he had very little to apprehend from new changes, but might be truly ſaid to have all things to hope, and little or nothing to fear.

[H] As it is equally curious and ſhort, the reader will find it in the notes.] It does not appear from the letters that go before, or that follow after this, what the buſineſs was that Sir George Ayſcue was to be conſulted upon: but in all probability it might be with regard to the ſettlement at Jamaica, which was then a point under conſideration, about which Mr. Cromwell took a great deal of pains; and therefore it is not at all improbable that he might wiſh Mr. Secretary Thurloe would inquire the ſentiments of ſo able an officer as Sir George Ayſcue, and one whoſe experience, in regard to that ſubject, muſt render him as fit a man to be conſulted thereupon, as any in the kingdom. But this is a conjecture only, and as ſuch is left to the reader's judgment. The letter follows:

diſſatisfied with the Dutch, the rather, becauſe of the ſhare they had taken in the affairs of the North, where they had eſpouſed the cauſe of the King of Denmark to a degree of partiality, and were projecting the total ſuppreſſion of the Swediſh power. This did not by any means agree with the Protector's plan in regard to foreign affairs, and as it was not in his nature to bear with any diſappointment in his views, ſo he reſolved to deſtroy this ſyſtem of the Dutch, and yet without entering immediately into a war with them. It was with this view, that he encouraged the Swedes to cultivate, with the utmoſt diligence, a maritime force, promiſing in due time to aſſiſt them with a ſufficient number of able and experienced officers, and with an Admiral to command them, who, in point of reputation, was not inferior to any then living (u). It was upon this occaſion, and for this ſervice, that he caſt his eyes upon Sir George Ayſcue; but not caring to deal directly with a man who had declined acting under his government, and had never frequented his court, he reſolved that the propoſition ſhould be made him by the Swediſh Ambaſſador, and ſent the Lord Keeper Whitelock to introduce him to the Admiral at his country-ſeat (w). We have a large and very curious account of this conference, and of that part of the converſation which was fit for the public view, preſerved by Whitelock himſelf, and which the reader, no doubt, will be very well pleaſed to ſee in his own words [I]. This interview had its effect: Sir George Ayſcue from that time began to entertain favourable thoughts of the deſign, and brought himſelf by degrees to approve of the propoſition that was made him, ſo far as to think at leaſt, not only of quitting the retreat he had choſen, but even of accepting the offer made him, and of going over for that purpoſe to Sweden (x). But as great undertakings move ſlowly, and there is much time neceſſary for ripening ſuch vaſt projects into execution; ſo we find that Sir George Ayſcue had not brought himſelf to an abſolute compliance in reference to this deſign, before the death of the Protector (y). Yet that did not hinder his cloſing at laſt with the propoſals made him from Sweden, and putting every thing in order for his journey, towards the

[I] The reader will no doubt be very well pleaſed to ſee it in his own words.] It appears clearly from Mr. Whitelock's own authority, that a treaty was concluded with the Swediſh Miniſter, Mr. Coyett, whom the Protector had knighted, and who was therefore called Sir Peter Coyett, on the ſeventeenth of the preceding month; for the concluding of which treaty, Whitelock himſelf was a Commiſſioner, the rather becauſe he had been Ambaſſador from the Parliament of England in Sweden, where he had been very well received; and this probably created in him an extraordinary reſpect for that nation, as a ſignal proof of which, he undertook, before the Ambaſſador's departure, to carry him to dine with Sir George Ayſcue, of which interview he wrote thus (29):

(29) Whitelock's Memorial, p. 649, 650.

'Auguſt the 13th, 1656, the Ambaſſador of Swe'den dined at Sir George Ayſcough's houſe in Sur'rey, where they had a very noble entertainment.
'The houſe ſtands environed with ponds, motes, and 'water, like a ſhip at ſea; a fancy fitter for the ma-
'ſter's humour, who is himſelf ſo great a ſeaman.
'There he ſaid he had caſt anchor, and intend'ed to ſpend the reſt of his life in a private retire'ment.

'The Ambaſſador underſtanding the abilities of Sir
'George in ſea affairs, did (according to his cuſtom)
'endeavour to improve his own knowledge, by his diſ-'courſes and queſtions to the company, according to 'their ſeveral capacities and abilities. He therefore 'found many queſtions to demand of Sir George, and 'had much diſcourſe with him about ſea-matters, and 'particularly concerning our Engliſh frigates; he was 'very inquiſitive to know of Sir George, Whether he
'eſteemed them the beſt of any ſort of ſhips for fight.'
Sir George anſwered freely, 'That he did not eſteem
'them the beſt ſhips for fight, but held, that the old
'faſhioned Engliſh ſhips, of the biggeſt rate, beſt for
'fight;' and being aſked his reaſon, ſaid, 'becauſe
'they were ſtronger than the frigates, would endure
'the ſhaking of their own guns, and the blows of the 'enemy, better than the frigates could, and were firm,
'and like caſtles in the ſea, and not ſo eaſy to be boarded
'as the frigates, being higher built.'

The Ambaſſador replied, 'That they themſelves
'could not ſo eaſily board another ſhip being ſo high
'built.' Sir George anſwered, 'That when they came 'to boarding, they that aſſailed, had not ſo great a 'trouble of going down their own ſhip as the going up
'their enemies; and the high building was no hindrance
'to their boarding of another, but was the better de- 'fence for themſelves.' The Ambaſſador alſo objected, 'That they could not ſo eaſily come about and fetch up
'another ſhip as the frigates could.' Sir George anſwered, 'That they could eaſily enough tack about upon 'any occaſion in fight, but confeſſed that they could not 'ſo ſoon fetch up another ſhip, nor take, or leave, as
'the frigates could, which he ſaid was rather an in- 'ducement to cowardice than courage; and ſome Cap- 'tains, when they knew they could leave an enemy
'as they pleaſed, would engage in the fewer blows;
'whereas the old built ſhips muſt ſtand to it, and the 'men knowing that there was no running away, would 'have the better mettle to fight it out.' The Ambaſſador aſked, 'Which would laſt longeſt, the ſhips built
'after the old faſhion or the frigates.' Sir George anſwered, 'That the old buildings were more ſtrong and
'ſubſtantial than the building of the frigates, which 'was made long and light for ſailing, and therefore 'could not laſt ſo long as the other; and they carrying
'many guns, and being thus made, their own guns did 'much ſhake and wear them, more than the guns of the 'other did.' They had much diſcourſe of this nature, which added much to the entertainment.

It appears clearly from hence, that Sir George Ayſcue was exactly of the ſame opinion with the ableſt ſeamen of our times, in reſpect to the building of ſhips of war. He judged, that the capacity, firmneſs, and ſtrength of our men of war, gave us great advantages, that the end and deſign of ſhips ſhould be chiefly conſidered in building them, and therefore that ſhips of war ſhould rather be diſtinguiſhed by their ſtrength and conveniency for fighting, than by the neatneſs of their form, or their being extraordinary good ſailors. Sir William Monſon, the ableſt of our writers upon maritime affairs, thought the ſame way; and it is very remarkable, that long before the Dutch wars began, he foretold, that if ever that ſtate differed with us, they would make their utmoſt efforts to gain the firſt battle at ſea, for which he gives ſeveral reaſons (30); and it is no leſs remarkable that they really attempted this, and that their famous Admiral Tromp attacked Blake in the firſt battle in the Downs, with a force vaſtly ſuperior, and that Blake eſcaped by nothing but the ſize and ſtrength of his ſhips, which enabled him with four or five to bear the fire of almoſt the whole Dutch fleet, till ſuch time as the reſt of his own ſhips were able to come in to his relief, and then the matter was ſpeedily determined, and contrary to the hopes and expectation of the Dutch, who thought they ſhould have gained an eaſy and complete victory by ſurprize, which would have forced the Engliſh Common-wealth to make peace upon their terms (31). In like manner, through the whole courſe of that war, it was the large ſize and firmneſs of our ſhips, which gave us ſuch great advantages, not only in the opinion of our own commanders, but of the Dutch themſelves, as might be ſhewn at large if this were a proper place.

latter end of the year 1658. But as ſuch a deſign as this was could not be put in execution, without making ſome ſtir, and thereby raiſing public diſcourſe about it; ſo this had ſuch an effect upon the Daniſh Miniſter then reſiding here, that he could not forbear writing to Mr. Secretary Thurloe, in pretty ſtrong terms upon the occaſion, inſinuating, at the ſame time, ſome general reflections on the character of Sir George Ayſcue (z) [K]. This, however, had no effect, either in procuring an interpoſition from the State, to prevent Sir George from proſecuting his deſign, or in obliging him to alter his reſolution. On the contrary, as ſoon as he had ſeen the officers embarked, and had diſpatched ſome private buſineſs of his own, he proſecuted his voyage, though in the very depth of winter. This expoſed him to great hardſhips, which, however, he endured with much conſtancy; and on his arrival in Sweden, he was received with all imaginable demonſtrations of civility and reſpect by the King, who was extremely well pleaſed with his coming, and might very probably have made good his promiſe, of promoting him to the rank of High-Admiral of Sweden, if he had not been taken off by an unexpected death (a) [L]. This put an

[K] General reflections on the character of Sir George Ayſcue.] It is remarkable, that the Daniſh Miniſter, though he appears to have been ſenſible of the deſign, did not think proper to complain during the life-time of Oliver: but when he ſaw Richard inveſted with his title only, and not his power, he addreſſed himſelf to the Secretary in the following epiſtle, which is very ſingular in its kind, ſince it ſhews at once, how little kindneſs its author had for Sir George Ayſcue, and how much he ſtood in fear of him (32).

Covent-Garden, 27 Sept. 1658. 'SIMON PETKUM.'

[L] If he had not been taken off by an unexpected death.] This Swediſh monarch, who invited Sir George into his dominions, and who was always firmly attached to England, was Charles Guſtavus, who came to the throne by the voluntary reſignation of Queen Chriſtina, daughter to the famous Guſtavus Adolphus, in the year 1654, and ſoon after engaged in a war with Poland, becauſe the monarch, who then governed, had oppoſed his acceſſion, on the ſcore of his hereditary right to the crown of Sweden; and in a very ſhort ſpace of time, King Charles over-ran the greateſt part of Poland, forcing the King to take ſhelter in Sileſia. This war, which laſted as long as the Swediſh monarch lived, and was the ſole buſineſs of his reign, ended in a manner very far different from that in which it began: for the Poles, foreſeeing that the conqueſt of their country would raiſe his Swediſh Majeſty abundance of enemies, abſolutely refuſed to make peace with him upon any terms, though he was maſter of both their capitals, Cracow and Warſaw, and of the greateſt part of the kingdom, and themſelves conſtantly beaten in every engagement. In this they judged right; for though at the beginning King Charles was at peace with all his neighbours, yet his rapid conqueſt of Poland, ſtirred him up many enemies: for, firſt, the Emperor dreading this acceſſion of power to a Swediſh Prince, granted ſuccours to King Caſimir of Poland; then the Muſcovites invaded Livonia; the Danes broke with him next, in hopes of recovering what they loſt to his predeceſſors; and though, in the beginning, he had the Elector of Brandenburgh for his ally, he afterwards deſerted him, and joined his enemies; and Prince Ragotſki of Tranſilvania, who invaded Poland likewiſe at his inſtance, was called home by the Turks entering his own dominions; and in the firſt battle he fought againſt them, was killed upon the ſpot (33). The King of Sweden, notwithſtanding this change of affairs, continued the war, and, which is more ſurpriſing, continued it with ſucceſs, more eſpecially againſt the Danes, which drew the Dutch into the quarrel, under pretence of their alliance with Denmark. But in reality, out of regard to their own intereſt; for they were perſuaded, that if this monarch ſucceeded in his deſigns, he would exclude them from the trade of the Baltick: and it was to prevent this, that they ſent a ſtrong fleet to the aſſiſtance of the Danes. This meaſure of theirs greatly offended the Protector Oliver, who had always kept up a ſtrict friendſhip with Sweden, which he would willingly have aſſiſted with a powerful fleet, if it could have been done without breaking with the Dutch, for which his affairs were not then ripe (34). This put him upon ſending twenty experienced officers, to command the Swediſh ſhips, and to encourage Sir George Ayſcue to enter into the ſame ſervice, upon a propoſal the King had made of declaring him Admiral; and if this ſcheme had anſwered in his life-time, there is no doubt, he would have ſent a ſtout Engliſh fleet to have ſupported them. His ſon Richard might, probably, intend to have purſued his father's meaſures, and it is very likely, that with this view he ordered Admiral Montague, with a numerous ſquadron of men of war, to ſail for the Sound; but the Long Parliament reſuming the ſupreme authority, ſent inſtructions to that Admiral to join the Dutch (35). But while theſe things were tranſacting, King Charles had puſhed on the war with ſuch vigour, that he was actually become maſter of moſt part of the Daniſh territories, and had even laid ſiege to Copenhagen, which he would infallibly have taken, if the Dutch had not relieved it by beating his fleet; which conſtrained him to turn the ſiege into a blockade, which he continued in ſpite of the Dutch. It was at this juncture that Sir George Ayſcue arrived, who at firſt put him in hopes of ſome aſſiſtance from England; but this quickly vaniſhed in conſequence of the Revolution before mentioned, notwithſtanding which, Sir George Ayſcue continued in great credit with his Majeſty, and attended him to Gottenburg, where he had ſummoned an aſſembly of the States, becauſe of its lying upon the coaſt, which gave an end to his hopes in that country, and diſpoſed Sir George Ayſcue to return home, where a great change had been working in his abſence, which was that of reſtoring King Charles II. It does not at all appear, that Sir George had any concern in this great affair; but the contrary may be rather preſumed, from his former attachment to the Parliament, and his making it his choice to have remained in Sweden, if the death of the Monarch, who invited him thither, had not prevented him. On his return, however, he not only ſubmitted to the government then eſtabliſhed, but gave the ſtrongeſt aſſurances to the adminiſtration, that he ſhould be at all times ready to ſerve the public, if ever there ſhould be occaſion, which was very kindly taken, and Sir George Ayſcue had the honour to be introduced to his Majeſty, and to kiſs his hand (b). It was not long before he was called to the performance of his promiſe; for the Dutch war breaking out in 1664, he was immediately put into commiſſion by the direction of the Duke of York, who then commanded the Engliſh fleet. In the ſpring of the year 1665, Sir George Ayſcue hoiſted his flag as Rear-Admiral of the Blue, under the Right Honourable the Earl of Sandwich, and in the great battle that was fought the third of June in the ſame year, that ſquadron had the honour to break through the centre of the Dutch fleet, and thereby made way for one of the moſt glorious victories ever obtained by this nation at ſea (c). For in this battle, the Dutch had ten of their largeſt ſhips ſunk or burned, beſides their Admiral Opdam's, that blew up in the midſt of the engagement, by which the Admiral himſelf, and upwards of five hundred men periſhed. Eighteen men of war were taken, four fire-ſhips deſtroyed, thirteen Captains, and two thouſand and fifty private men made priſoners; and this with ſo inconſiderable loſs, as that of one ſhip only, and three hundred private men (d). As there was ſome time requiſite, for refitting and repairing the Engliſh navy, after ſo warm an action, the Duke of York, who commanded the fleet in that engagement, returned to London; but not till the King had viſited the navy, where, going on board the Royal Charles, at the Buoy of the Nore, he knighted ſeveral of the officers who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the late battle, and made a grand naval promotion. The fleet being again in a condition to put to ſea, was ordered to rendezvous in Southwold-Bay, from whence, to the number of ſixty ſail, they weighed on the fifth of July, and ſtood over for the coaſt of Holland. The ſtandard was borne by the gallant Earl of Sandwich, to whom was Vice-Admiral Sir George Ayſcue, and Sir Thomas Tyddiman Rear-Admiral, Sir William Penn was Admiral of the White, Sir William Berkley Vice-Admiral, and Sir Joſeph Jordan Rear-Admiral. The Blue flag was carried by Sir Thomas Allen, whoſe Vice and Rear, were Sir Chriſtopher Mimms, and Sir John Harman (e). The deſign they went on was, to intercept de Ruyter in his return, or, at leaſt, to take and burn the Turkey and Eaſt-India fleets, of which they had certain intelligence. They ſucceeded in neither of theſe ſchemes; de Ruyter returned unexpectedly by the north of Scotland, and arrived ſafely in Holland, where he was immediately promoted to the chief command of the fleet. The Turkey and India fleets, conſiſting of twenty ſail, under the command of Commodore Bitter, choſe to take the ſame northern route, in hopes of avoiding the Engliſh navy; but having intelligence at ſea, that this would prove very difficult, if not impoſſible, they took ſhelter in the port of Bergen in Norway (f). The Earl of Sandwich having detached Sir Thomas Tyddiman to attack them there, returned home, and in his paſſage had the good luck to take eight Dutch men of war, which ſerved as convoys to their Eaſt and Weſt India fleets, and ſeveral merchant-men richly laden, which finiſhed the triumphs of that year (g). The plain ſuperiority of the Engliſh over the Dutch at ſea, engaged the French, in order to keep up the war between the maritime powers, and make them do their buſineſs by deſtroying each other, to declare on the ſide of the weakeſt, as did the King of Denmark alſo, which, nevertheleſs, had no effect upon the Engliſh, who determined to carry on the war againſt the allies, with the ſame ſpirit they had done againſt the Dutch alone (h). In the ſpring, therefore, of the year 1666, the fleet was very early at ſea, under the command of the joint Admirals; for a reſolution having been taken at Court, not to expoſe the perſon of the Duke of York any more, and the Earl of Sandwich being then in Spain, with the character of Ambaſſador-Extraordinary, Prince Rupert, and old General Monk, now Duke of Albemarle, were appointed to command the fleet; having under them as gallant and prudent officers as ever diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the Engliſh navy, and, amongſt theſe, Sir William Berkley commanded the Blue, and Sir George Ayſcue the White ſquadron (i). Prince Rupert, and the Duke of Albemarle, went on board the fleet, the twenty-third of April, 1666, and ſailed in the beginning of May. Towards the latter end of that month, the Court was informed, that the French fleet, under the command of the Duke of Beaufort, were coming out to the aſſiſtance of the Dutch. This rumour of their joining the Dutch was ſpread by France, gave him an opportunity of minding the affairs of his kingdom, and of the war at the ſame time. But it falling out unluckily, that a malignant fever reigned there at that time, the King was ſeized thereby, and after an illneſs of a few days, died on the 13th of February, 1660, in the ſixth year of his reign (36), which, as we have obſerved in the text, determined Sir George Ayſcue to return home. Thus the reader has ſeen, in as narrow a compaſs as poſſible, the grounds of this expedition, which I judged would be more ſatisfactory, than referring him to various other books, in order to clear up the meaning of what the ſubject led me to deliver in this.

in order to deceive us, and diſtreſs the Dutch; themſelves, in reality, having no ſuch intention (k). Upon the receiving this news, the Court ſent orders to Prince Rupert to ſail with the White ſquadron, the Admirals excepted, to look out and fight the French, which command that brave Prince obeyed, but found it what many wiſe people thought, a mere groundleſs bravado, intended to raiſe the courage of their new allies, and thereby bring them into the greater danger. At the ſame time Prince Rupert ſailed from the Downs, the Dutch put out to ſea, the wind at north-eaſt, and a freſh gale. This brought the Dutch fleet on the coaſt of Dunkirk, and carried his Highneſs towards the Iſle of Wight; but the wind ſuddenly ſhifting to the ſouth-weſt, and blowing hard, brought both the Dutch and the Duke to an anchor (l). Captain Bacon, in the Briſtol, firſt diſcovered the enemy, and by firing his guns, gave notice of it to the Engliſh fleet. Upon this a council of war was called, wherein it was reſolved to fight the enemy, notwithſtanding their great ſuperiority. After the departure of Prince Rupert, the Duke had with him only the Red and Blue ſquadrons, making about ſixty ſail, whereas the Dutch fleet conſiſted of ninety-one men of war, carrying 4716 guns, and 22,460 men. It was the firſt of June when they were diſcerned, and the Duke was ſo warm for engaging, that he attacked the enemy before they had time to weigh anchor, and, as de Ruyter himſelf ſays in his letter, they were obliged to cut their cables; and in the ſame letter he owns, that to the laſt the Engliſh were the aggreſſors, notwithſtanding their inferiority and other diſadvantages (m). This day's fight was very fierce and bloody; for the Dutch, confiding in their numbers, preſſed furiouſly upon the Engliſh fleet, while the Engliſh officers, being men of determined reſolution, fought with ſuch courage and conſtancy, that they not only repulſed the Dutch, but renewed the attack, and forced the enemy to maintain the fight longer than they were inclined to do, ſo that it was ten in the evening before their cannon were ſilent (n). The following night was ſpent in repairing the damages ſuffered on both ſides, and next morning the fight was renewed by the Engliſh with freſh vigour. Admiral Van Tromp, with Vice-Admiral Vander Hulſt, being on board one ſhip, raſhly engaged among the Engliſh, and were in the utmoſt danger, either of being taken or burnt. The Dutch affairs, according to their own account, were now in a deſperate condition; but Admiral de Ruyter at laſt diſengaged them, though not till his ſhip was diſabled, and Vice-Admiral Vander Hulſt killed (o). This only changed the ſcene; for de Ruyter was now as hard puſhed as Tromp had been before; however, a reinforcement arriving, preſerved him alſo, and ſo the ſecond day's fight ended earlier than the firſt. The Duke finding that the Dutch had received a reinforcement, and that his ſmall fleet, on the contrary, was much weakened, through the damages ſuſtained by ſome, and the loſs and abſence of others of his ſhips, took, towards the evening, the reſolution to retire, and endeavour to join Prince Rupert, who was coming to his aſſiſtance (p). The retreat was performed in good order, twenty-ſix or twenty-eight men of war that had ſuffered leaſt, brought up the rear, interpoſing between the enemy and the diſabled ſhips, three of which, being very much ſhattered, were burnt by the Engliſh themſelves, and the men taken on board the other ſhips. The Dutch fleet followed, but at a diſtance. As they thus ſailed on, it happened on the third day that Sir George Ayſcue, Admiral of the White, who commanded the Royal Prince (being the largeſt and heavieſt ſhip of the whole fleet) unfortunately ſtruck upon the ſand called the Galloper, where being threatened by the enemy's fire-ſhips, and hopeleſs of aſſiſtance from his friends (whoſe timely return, the near approach of the enemy, and the contrary tide, had abſolutely rendered impoſſible), he was forced to ſurrender (q). This was that famous engagement, which did equal honour to both the maritime powers, and in which both their officers and ſeamen are allowed to have performed as great things as were ever attempted on the watery element. Yet our hiſtorians have given but very imperfect accounts of it, even thoſe who ought to have made it their buſineſs to be more particularly acquainted with this tranſaction; ſo that if we would learn any particulars relating to it, we muſt look for them in the works of ſtrangers, and even of enemies, who, in this reſpect, have been both juſter and kinder, than the authors either of our General or Naval hiſtories (r) [M]. The Dutch Admiral de Ruyter, in his letter to the States-General, ſays, in few words, That Sir George Ayſcue, Admiral

[M] The authors of our General and Naval hiſtories.] It is certainly a very great fault in men, who undertake to record the tranſactions of paſt ages, that they do not take care to provide themſelves with ſuch authentic papers, in regard to the times of which they write, as are neceſſary to ſet things forth clearly, and to afford ſufficient authority, to ſupport whatever is thus ſet forth. It is by this kind of negligence, that our hiſtories labour under the reproach of being leſs uniform and correct, than thoſe of other nations. In the preſent inſtance it is obſervable, that in the continuation of Heath's Chronicle by Philips, it is only ſaid, That there was none burnt of the Engliſh fleet, but the Prince, which had the misfortune to run a-ground upon the Galloper, by means of which, Sir George Ayſcue, the commander, became a priſoner (38). This is very lame and incorrect; for without a competent knowledge of our naval hiſtory, a man might be eaſily led to believe, that Sir George Ayſcue was only Captain of the Prince, whereas he was Admiral of the White ſquadron in this engagement. In the Complete Hiſtory of England, as it is called, there is only an extract of Sir John Harman's account of this battle, in which this circumſtance is mentioned, in as few words as it is poſſible (39). The Reverend Mr. Echard tells us, the Engliſh had nine men of war taken or burnt, of which the chief was the Prince, a firſt rate ſhip, commanded by Sir George Ayſcough, which being unfortunately ſtranded, Sir George Ayſcough was taken priſoner, miral of the White, having run upon a ſand-bank, fell into their hands, and that after taking out the commanders, and the men that were left, they ſet the ſhip on fire (s). But the large relation, collected by order of the States out of all the letters written to them upon that occaſion, informs us, That Sir George Ayſcue, in the Royal Prince, ran upon the Galloper, an unhappy accident, ſays that relation, for an officer who had behaved very gallantly during the whole engagement, and who only retired in obedience to his Admiral's orders. The unfortunate Admiral made ſignals for aſſiſtance; but the Engliſh fleet continued their route; ſo that he was left quite alone, and without hope of ſuccour; in which ſituation he was attacked by two Dutch fire-ſhips, by which, without doubt, he had been burnt, if Lieutenant-Admiral Tromp, who was on board the ſhip of Rear-Admiral Sweers, had not made a ſignal to call off the fire-ſhips, perceiving that his flag was already ſtruck, and a ſignal made for quarter, upon which Rear-Admiral Sweers, by order of Tromp, went on board the Engliſh ſhip, and brought off Sir George Ayſcue, his officers, and ſome of his men, on board his own veſſel, and the next morning Sir George was ſent to the Dutch coaſt, in order to go to the Hague in a galliot, by order priſoner, and the ſhip burnt (40). The Continuation of Baker's Chronicle omits this circumſtance entirely, though, in other reſpects, there is a pretty good account of this memorable engagement (41). In Mr. Burchett's Naval Hiſtory, the whole account of this battle takes up but ſixteen lines, in which, therefore, we cannot expect many circumſtances; but there is one very aſtoniſhing, which is, that he makes this fight to have laſted only three days, affirming, That Prince Rupert coming in on the third, obtained for the Engliſh a complete victory (42). The truth, however, certainly is, That the Duke of Albemarle fought the Dutch fleet on the firſt, ſecond, and third of June, that in the evening of the laſt day, he was joined by Prince Rupert, with the ſquadron under his command, and that on the fourth of June he engaged the Dutch again, in conjunction with Prince Rupert, and after an obſtinate diſpute, forced the enemy to retire towards their own coaſts. Mr. Colliber had reaſon, therefore, to ſay, That Mr. Burchett's accounts of the Dutch wars were ſo ſhort, that they were more apt to raiſe the reader's curioſity, than to ſatisfy it (43). But, after all, Mr. Burchett is a very good writer in other reſpects, and his hiſtory of the French wars, in King William and Queen Anne's reigns, are very copious, circumſtantial, and well digeſted. As for Mr. Colliber himſelf, he took a great deal of pains in peruſing the Dutch hiſtorians, and in taking out of them, whatever might do honour to the Britiſh nation (44). Mr. Lediard has copied him in this reſpect, and very little more (45). As to the writers of private memoirs, we are not much obliged to them for any light they have given us, one only excepted, of whom we ſhall preſently ſpeak. Biſhop Burnet's deſcription of this battle is penned with great bitterneſs, much in favour of the Dutch, and extremely to the diſcredit of the Engliſh; but he mentions no particulars, and ſeems more deſirous of giving his reader his own ſenſe of things, than to inform him of any circumſtances, that might enable him to form a true judgment of them himſelf (46). Biſhop Parker's Hiſtory of his own Times, is rather a picture than a hiſtory, ſo that no aſſiſtance could be received, or indeed expected from thence (47). There is in Sir William Temple's Memoirs, a paſſage relating to this engagement, which deſerves to be remembered, becauſe it ſhews what the ſenſe of the Dutch was upon this ſubject. Sir William tells us, that the famous John de Wit ſpeaking of this action, ſaid (48), 'That the Engliſh 'got more glory to their nation, by the invincible 'courage of their ſeamen in thoſe engagements, than 'by the two victories of this war, and that he was 'ſure, their own people could never have been brought 'on the following days after the advantages of the 'firſt, and he believed that no other nation was 'capable of it but the Engliſh.' But the cleareſt and beſt account, that, with the utmoſt induſtry, I have been able to meet with, both of the whole engagement, and of Sir George Ayſcue's misfortune, is in Dr. Skinner's Life of General Monk; and therefore I ſhall give the reader that part of it, which regards my ſubject, in his own words (49). 'On the 'third of June, in the morning, his Grace ordered all 'the men out of two or three ſlug-ſhips, which were 'unſerviceable, and commanded them to be fired, 'rather than put them to the hazard of falling into 'the enemy's hands in his retreat, and now he had 'not full forty good ſhips with him, to make good 'his retreat againſt about ninety of the enemies. 'But commanding all his weak and diſabled frigates 'to go off before him, and placing about ſixteen 'or twenty of the ſoundeſt and moſt in heart to 'the enemies front, he began a regular and leiſurely 'retreat, which was managed with ſo much bravery 'and courage, that the Dutch, though poſſeſſed with 'ſo many great advantages upon him, had no great 'ſtomach to the purſuit, contenting themſelves to 'follow aloof-off, and to fire their guns at ſuch diſtance as gave no prejudice to the Engliſh fleet; 'till about four in the afternoon, the wind increaſing, they came cloſe upon the Duke in two 'bodies, and ſpent ſome broadſides upon his ſhip, 'but were ſo warmly plied from the Engliſh fleet 'with their ſtern pieces, as made them contented 'to lie further off. The ſame freſh gale, which at 'this time had brought up the Dutch fleet, brought 'alſo the Prince with his ſquadron in view of the 'Duke's ſhips, which now appeared in the moſt 'ſeaſonable minute, having made all the ſail they 'could to come to his relief. Nor was the Duke 'leſs willing to join the Prince and his ſquadron; 'but in making their way towards him, ſeveral of 'the principal ſhips, and among them the Duke 'in the Royal Charles, came aground on the Gapper, 'or the Galloper Sands, but had all of them the good 'fortune to get off again, only the Royal Prince, 'a great and brave frigate, was ſo deeply ſtranded, 'that it was not poſſible to bring her off, but became a prey to the enemy, where Sir George Ayſcough, that commanded in her, and his company, 'were taken priſoners; and when the Dutch alſo 'had in vain attempted to get her off the ſands, 'at night they burnt her down. This unfortunate 'ſtriking of ſo many of our ſhips upon the ſands, 'gave the Dutch ſo great an opportunity of deſtroying the Duke's fleet, as they have cauſe never to 'forgive the commanders, that made no greater advantage of it, where all might have been loſt, if 'the enemy had been brave enough to have adventured for it.' The great Mr. Dryden, in a poem on the memorable events of the year 1666, has given us at once, the moſt beautiful and the moſt copious deſcription of theſe four days fights. But though this ſubject might have afforded as fine a picture in poetry, as any thing that has appeared in that finiſhed piece, yet there is not the leaſt notice taken therein of Sir George or his misfortune, of which however at firſt ſight, though applied by the poet to the Duke of Albemarle, the following ſtanzas might be thought intended (50):

And like maim'd fowl, ſwim lagging on the main:
Their greater loſs their numbers ſcarce confeſs,
While they loſe cheaper than the Engliſh gain.

Have you not ſeen when whiſtled from the fiſt,
Some falcon ſtoops at what her eye deſign'd,
And, with her eagerneſs, the quarry miſs'd,
Straight flies at check, and clips it down the wind.

The daſtard crow that to the wood made wing,
And ſees the groves no ſhelter can afford;
With her loud kaws her craven kind does bring;
Who ſafe in numbers, cuff the noble bird.

of General de Ruyter. The Engliſh ſhip was afterwards got off the ſands, notwithſtanding which, General de Ruyter ordered the reſt of the crew to be taken out, and the veſſel ſet on fire, that his fleet might be the leſs embarraſſed, which was accordingly done (t). But in the French relation, publiſhed by order of that court, we have another circumſtance which the Dutch have thought fit to omit, and it is this, that the crew gave up the ſhip againſt the Admiral's will, who had given orders for ſetting her on fire (u). There were ſome circumſtances which made the loſs of this ſhip, in this manner, very diſagreeable to the Engliſh court, and perhaps this may be the reaſon that ſo little is ſaid of it in our own relations [N]. In all probability, General de Ruyter took the opportunity of ſending Sir George Ayſcue to the Dutch coaſt the next morning, from an apprehenſion that he might be retaken in the next day's fight (w). On his arrival at the Hague, he was very civilly treated: but to raiſe the ſpirits of their people, and to make the moſt of this dubious kind of victory, the States ordered Sir George to be carried as it were in triumph, through the ſeveral towns of Holland, and then confined him in the caſtle of Louveſtein, ſo famous in the Dutch hiſtories for having been the priſon of ſome of their moſt eminent patriots, and from whence the party, which oppoſed the Prince of Orange, were ſtiled the Louveſtein Faction (x). As ſoon as Sir George Ayſcue came to this caſtle, he wrote a letter to King Charles II., to acquaint him with the condition he was in, which letter is ſtill preſerved in the Life of the Dutch Admiral, de Ruyter (y), and the reader will find a tranſlation of it in the notes [O]. How long he remained there, or whether he

[N] So little ſaid of it in our relations.] There are very often circumſtances attending loſſes, which ſo aggravate and heighten them, as to conduce more to our miſery and grief, than the very loſſes themſelves. Theſe, while we feel this paſſion ſtrongly upon us, we are apt to relate; but by degrees, as that paſſion ſubſides, we come to conſider things in a very different light, and often ſtrive to hide and to conceal what we before affected to publiſh. The Royal Prince, as all our writers agree, was the largeſt and beſt built ſhip in the royal navy: ſhe carried ninety-two guns, and ſix hundred and twenty men: her guns were all of them braſs, and the veſſel in the beſt condition poſſible. Theſe were reaſons ſufficient to make the loſs of her regretted. But the particular circumſtance hinted at in the text is this: the Royal Prince was the ſhip in which the King came over from Holland at his Reſtoration; a fact, ſet down in none of our private memoirs, though ſufficiently known and talked of at the time. But the Dutch, who knew this circumſtance full as well as the Engliſh, have taken ſpecial care to preſerve it (51). It was not a little hard upon Sir George Ayſcue to be laid aſide for this misfortune, which, for any thing appears, did not at all ariſe from any miſtake or overſight of his: but it ſeems that our ſeamen conceived from hence, that he was an unlucky commander, and that was enough in thoſe days to lay any man aſide, it being a conſtant rule with the Court to employ none but popular Admirals, and ſuch as were beloved by the ſeamen. It was on Sunday the third of June, about five in the afternoon, that this ſhip was given up to the Dutch, and about nine ſhe was ſet on fire; becauſe about that time it appeared, that Prince Rupert having joined the Duke of Albemarle, was bearing down again upon the Dutch fleet; ſo that though the Royal Prince was got off the ſands, they would not ſpare the time neceſſary to bring her away, but burnt her according to the expreſs inſtructions given by the States-General to de Ruyter.

[O] The reader will find a tranſlation of it in the note.] The reader has ſeen all the account I am able to give him of this letter in the text, and when he has read the piece itſelf, he will be ſenſible of the reaſons which induced me to leave out ſome particulars in the relation, to ſpare him the trouble of peruſing them twice. The letter exactly rendered into Engliſh runs thus (52):

'SIRE,

'YOUR Majeſty without doubt has been informed that we engaged the Dutch fleet on the 1–10th of this month, between Dunkirk and the North point of England, the enemy lying at anchor, but cutting their cables immediately upon our approach. We attacked them however with ſucceſs two or three times, but as our fleet was much inferior to theirs in number, we were not able to ſuſtain the fight. There happened on this occaſion a great concern among our people, on the ſcore of your Majeſty's couſin being ſailed to the Weſtward with a large ſquadron of ſhips, by which we were very much weakened and diſtreſſed. Several of our ſhips were that day very ill-treated; the Duke of Albemarle's particularly ſuffered much; the Dutch too had ſeveral ſhips ſet on fire, either by accidents happening to their own powder-rooms, or by our fire-ſhips. We fought the next day with freſh courage, but on the third we were ſo unlucky as to run aground, and juſt as we began to float again, we found ourſelves with ſome other ſhips of our ſquadron ſurrounded by the enemy; ſo that to our great regret we were obliged to ſtrike, after having upwards of one hundred and fifty men killed on board our veſſel, and have ſince been carried priſoners hither. After I went on board the ſhip of the Dutch Rear-Admiral, we were informed, that the ſhip confided to my care by your Majeſty had been burned, my Vice-Admiral is alſo taken, and my Lord Berkley is killed. I cannot ſay what happened afterwards in the action, becauſe it has been kept a ſecret from me. In general, however, they ſay, they have taken, ſunk, and burned, thirty-ſix of our ſhips, and that the Dutch have not made fewer than four thouſand priſoners, which God forbid. I beſeech your Majeſty not to take our misfortunes too much to heart, and that you would have compaſſion on my family.

'From my priſon at Louveſteyn,
10th / 20th } June, 1666. 'GEORGE AYSCUE.

'P. S. The officers of the Dutch fleet, as alſo the States-General, have treated me with all imaginable civility. On my arrival at Rotterdam, I was amazed to ſee ſo many thouſand men there, conſidering how many they have on board the Dutch fleet.'

There are ſome circumſtances in this letter, from whence I ſuſpect, that either it is entirely forged, or at leaſt altered to ſerve the purpoſes of the Dutch; as for inſtance, his ſaying, that his Vice-Admiral was taken, and Lord Berkley killed, the former muſt be meant of the ſhip if it be true, and as to the perſon he names in the latter place, he was not Lord Berkley, but Sir William Berkley (53), and therefore this is an error that we can ſcarce ſuſpect Sir George Ayſcue to be guilty of. But what is written after the letter is much more groſs than any thing contained in it; for, in the firſt place, Sir George was not extremely well treated, ſince the Dutch themſelves owned that they took his plate and every thing elſe that was valuable from him; and in the next to magnify the ſtrength of the enemy to his Prince, was a meanneſs of which an Engliſh Admiral muſt have been certainly incapable. Theſe remarks I thought due to Sir George Ayſcue's reputation, though as the letter ſo nearly concerns his perſonal hiſtory, I conceived myſelf obliged to inſert it.

continued a priſoner to the end of the war, is what we cannot determine from any lights that we have been able to procure; but it is ſaid, that he afterwards returned to England, and ſpent the remainder of his days in peace (z). It is a thing greatly to be regretted, that ſo little care has been taken, to do juſtice to the memories of ſo many great men as have ſerved this nation, ſome at the expence of their lives, and others of their liberties. Their virtues ſurely deſerve a better reward, and it is to be hoped, that the pains we have taken in this collection, will render the doing juſtice to ſuch great and good men, ſo viſibly neceſſary, that ſucceeding generations will have no reaſon to make this complaint. It is with a view to this, that even where we cannot render our memoirs of ſuch illuſtrious perſons ſo compleat as we could wiſh, we labour with the utmoſt diligence to render them as perfect as we can, which obſervation will be ſufficient to excuſe us to our readers, for concluding this article ſomewhat abruptly, ſince it is done merely through want of materials, and not of inclination. AYSSERIUS, or ASSERIUS (MENEVENSIS), by ſome called ASSER (a), by others ASKER (b), a learned Monk of St. Davids, concerning whom, though much has been ſaid, yet we find very little written with certainty, rather, as we apprehend, for want of conſidering the matter thoroughly, than from any want of materials, or from any real obſcurity in which his ſtory is involved. We ſhall therefore give as clear and diſtinct an account of him as may be, remove moſt of the difficulties which have been hitherto thought too obſcure in his hiſtory, and leave thoſe controverſial points to be diſcuſſed in the notes, which otherwiſe would ſerve only to puzzle and perplex the text. He was of Britiſh extraction (c), probably of that part of South Wales called Pembrokeſhire, and was bred up in the learning of thoſe times, in the monaſtery of St. Davids (d) (in Latin Menevia), whence he derived his ſurname of Menevenſis. There he is ſaid to have had for his tutor Johannes Patricius, one of the moſt celebrated ſcholars of his age (e). Here he had alſo the countenance of Nobis, or Novis, Archbiſhop of that ſee, who was his relation (f); but it does not appear, that he was either his Secretary or his Chancellor, as ſome writers would have us believe [A]. From St. Davids he was invited to the Court of Ælfred the Great, merely from the reputation of his learning. This ſeems to have been about the year 880, or ſomewhat earlier (g). Thoſe who had the charge of bringing him to Court, conducted him from St. Davids to the town of Dene (Dean) in Wiltſhire, where the King then was (h). He received him with great civility, and ſhewed him in a little time the ſtrongeſt marks of favour and affection, inſomuch that he condeſcended to perſuade him not to think any more of returning to St. Davids, but rather to continue with him as his Domeſtic Chaplain and aſſiſtant in his ſtudies. Aſſerius, however, modeſtly declined this propoſal, alledging, that it did not become him to deſert that holy place where he had been educated, and received the order of Prieſthood, for the ſake of any preferment that he could meet with elſewhere. King Ælfred then deſired, that he would divide his time between the Court and the Monaſtery, that is to ſay, that he would ſpend ſix months at Court, and ſix at St. Davids. Aſſerius would not lightly comply even with this requeſt, but deſired the King's leave to return to St. Davids, to aſk the advice of his brethren, which he

[A] Some writers would have us believe.] The firſt author who ſtarted this notion was Bale (1). He had read probably in our author's own work, that he was related to an Archbiſhop of St. Davids (2), and thence he took occaſion to make him his Chancellor: He does this very abruptly, inſerting his conjecture by way of parentheſis. However, he does not tell us what Biſhop: that was an error left for his tranſcriber Pits (3), who affirms, without heſitation, that he was Secretary, or Chancellor, to Aſſer the Elder, then Archbiſhop of St. Davids. Biſhop Godwin outſtrips both Bale and Pits, and makes Aſſer himſelf the author of this ſtory (4). The great Dr. Cave, following his predeceſſors, aſſerts, that Aſſerius, Biſhop of Sherburn, was a relation and Chancellor to Aſſerius Archbiſhop of St. Davids (5). The induſtrious Thomas Hearne tells us very magiſterially, that the Annals of Ælfred were not written by Aſſer Biſhop of Sherburn, but by his uncle Aſſer, Archbiſhop of St. Davids (6). In anſwer to all theſe numerous authorities, we ſhall only ſay, that Aſſer, whoever he was, became Archbiſhop of St. Davids, A.D. 909 (7), that is twenty-ſix years after the death of Aſſer Biſhop of Sherburn, according to the computation of theſe authors, and about a year before the true time of his death (8); ſo that he was Secretary, or Chancellor, to this Archbiſhop ſome thirty or forty years before he became ſo, and this Aſſer is ridiculouſly ſtiled the Elder, though he was made an Archbiſhop thirty years after our Aſſerius became a Biſhop, and if he had been a different perſon, muſt have been conſequently much younger than he. All this long train of miſtakes grew out of the following eaſy paſſage of our author's own writing, viz. 'Sperabant enim, noſtri, minores tribulationes et injurias ex parte Hemeid Regis ſuſtinere, (qui ſæpe deprædabatur illud Monaſterium et parochiam Sancti Degui, aliquando expulſione illorum antiſtitum, qui in eo præeſſent, ſicut & Novis Archiepiſcopum propinquum meum & me expulit aliquando ſub ipſis) ſi ego ad notitiam & amicitiam illius Regis qualecunque pacto pervenirem.' That is, Our Monks were in hopes that they ſhould ſuſtain fewer troubles and inſults from King Hemeid (who had often plundered that Monaſtery and the pariſh of St. Degui, ſometimes expelling thoſe who preſided in both places, as it happened to my relation Archbiſhop Novis and myſelf), in caſe by any ſuch agreement I came to be conſidered and gain the friendſhip of that Prince (9). He means Ælfred the Great, for this paſſage contains the reaſons which induced the Monks of St. Davids to conſent that Aſſer ſhould comply with the King's requeſt, and live half the year at Court. From hence it appears, that the Archbiſhop to whom he was related was Novis, who, according to the ancient Annals of St. Davids, became Archbiſhop in 841, and died in 873 (10); and inſtead of being his Chancellor, it ſeems that Aſſerius was parſon of the pariſh of St. Degui or Dewi, as it was called in the Britiſh language, which is alſo aſſerted by ſome writers (11). This ſhews the great uſe of a Critical Dictionary, ſince here is an error detected, which has paſſed current from hand to hand for ſo long a tract of time, and has been tranſcribed without ſcruple by perſons well verſed in our ancient hiſtory.

obtained, but in his journey falling ill at Wincheſter of a fever, he lay there ſick twelve months and a week, till the King, wondering at his long ſtay, wrote him letters requiring his return to Court. But it ſeems he was too weak to ride, of which when King Ælfred was informed by his letter, he deſiſted from his requeſt (i). As ſoon as he recovered, Aſſerius made a journey to St. Davids, where, conſulting with his brethren on the King's propoſal, they unanimouſly agreed that he ſhould accept it, promiſing themſelves great advantages from his favour with the King, of which, at that time, it ſeems they had great need; one Hemeid, a petty Prince of South Wales, making them exceedingly uneaſy, and ſometimes compelling their Archbiſhop to quit the place of his reſidence. But, at the ſame time, they requeſted of Aſſerius, that he would prevail on the King, to allow him to reſide quarterly at Court and at St. Davids, rather than that he ſhould remain abſent ſix months at a time (k). When he came back he found the King at Leoneforde, who received him with great marks of diſtinction. He remained with him then eight months at once, reading and explaining to him whatever books were in his library, whereby he grew into ſo great credit with that generous Prince, that on Chriſtmas-eve following, he gave him the monaſteries of Amgreſbyri, and Banuwille, that is, Ambroſbury in Wiltſhire, and Banwell in Somerſetſhire, with a ſilk pall of great value, and as much incenſe as a ſtrong man could carry, ſending together with them this compliment, That theſe were but ſmall things, and by way of earneſt of better which ſhould follow them (l). And indeed, ſoon after, Aſſerius tells us, he had Exeter beſtowed upon him, and not long after that, the biſhoprick of Sherburn, which however he ſeems to have quitted in 883 (m) [B], though he always retained the title, as Wilfred Archbiſhop of York was conſtantly ſo ſtyled, though he accepted of another biſhoprick (n). Thenceforward he conſtantly attended the Court, in the manner before ſtipulated, and is named as a perſon, in whom he had particular confidence, by King Ælfred in his Teſtament, which muſt have been written ſome time before the year 885 (o); ſince mention is made therein of Eſna Biſhop of Hereford, who died that year. He is alſo mentioned by the King, in his prefatory Epiſtle placed before his tranſlation of Gregory's Paſtoral, addreſſed to Wulfſig Biſhop of London; and therein the King does not call him Biſhop of Sherburn, but my Biſhop, acknowledging the help received from him and others in that tranſlation (p). For as we learn, both from the King and from Aſſerius himſelf, the method uſed by that Prince in tranſlating was this: he had the ſenſe of his author given him by one or other of the many learned men he had about him, and then he digeſted it into an eaſy flowing ſtyle (in which he had a peculiar excellency) that men might thereby be invited to reading (q); for Ælfred did not tranſlate as an author to gain reputation, but as a Prince, to promote the public good; neither did he deſign that the books he publiſhed ſhould paſs for exact tranſlations, but for good and uſeful treatiſes, from which ſuch as underſtood none but their mother tongue, might reap profit and inſtruction. It ſeems to have been the near reſemblance, which the genius of Aſſerius bore to that of the King, which gained him ſo great a ſhare in his confidence; and very probably, it was on this account, that Aſſerius drew up thoſe Memoirs of the life of Ælfred which we ſtill have, and which he dedicated and preſented to the King in 893 (r). In which work we have a very remarkable account of the manner wherein that Prince and our author ſpent their time together. Aſſerius tells us, that having one day, being the feaſt of St. Martin, cited in converſation a paſſage of ſome famous author, the King was mightily pleaſed therewith, and would have him write it down in the margin of a book he carried in his breaſt; but Aſſerius finding no room to write any ſuch thing there, and yet being deſirous to gratify his maſter, he aſked King Ælfred, whether he ſhould not provide a few leaves, in which to ſet down ſuch remarkable things, as occurred either in reading or converſation: the King was extremely delighted with this hint, and directed

[B] He ſeems to have quitted in 883.] The reaſon why many writers (12) have placed the death of Aſſer Biſhop of Sherburn in this year, is their finding that he was ſucceeded in his Biſhoprick by Sighelmus, who was ſent by King Ælfred to carry his alms to the Chriſtians of St. Thomas in the Indies. William of Malmſbury (13) is ſometimes cited to prove the death of our author in the life-time at leaſt of King Ælfred; but whoever reads him will find that he ſays no ſuch thing: he ſays indeed, that Aſſerius and Sighelmus were both Biſhops of Sherburn in the reign of Ælfred (14), which is true; but the conjecture founded hereupon, that Aſſerius died before Sighelmus ſucceeded is falſe, as appears from what this author himſelf ſays immediately afterwards. For he tells us that this Biſhop Aſſer came from St. Dewi, and conſequently was the author of the Annals of Ælfred written in 893, preciſely ten years after Sighelmus ſucceeded him (15). Though this is ſufficient, yet I think it may not be amiſs to add another proof of this fact, that though Aſſerius lived long after the year 883, yet he was not actually in poſſeſſion of the biſhoprick of Sherburn. In the old hiſtory of the Biſhops of Bath and Wells, publiſhed by the learned Wharton, there is an account, that in 905 Pope Formoſus did by his letters to King Edward the Elder, ſon and ſucceſſor to Ælfred the Great, and to Plegmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, exhort them on account of the few Biſhops who were then living, to fill up the vacant Sees; whereupon the Archbiſhop conſecrated ſeven Prelates in one day at Canterbury, amongſt whom one was Biſhop of Sherburn (16). But the Saxon Annals plainly prove, that our Aſſer did not die till 910 (17), which is ſix years afterwards. His quitting this Biſhopric ſo ſoon, is perhaps the reaſon that he does not expreſsly mention its being beſtowed on him as he does his other preferments, but contents himſelf with an oblique account of it (18), and referring frequently to his church at Sherburn, as a place to which he had particular relation (19). This is one of the difficulties we promiſed to remove, and indeed it is one of the greateſt with which the ſtory of this Prelate is affected.

Aſſerius to put it immediately in execution, which he accordingly did. Purſuing this method conſtantly, their collection began to ſwell, till at length it became of the ſize of an ordinary Pſalter; and this was what the King called his Hand-book or Manual. Aſſerius, however, calls it Enchiridion (s). In all probability, Aſſerius continued at court during the whole reign of Ælfred, and, for ought we know, ſeveral years after: but where, or when he died, was matter of diſpute, though the Saxon Chronicle poſitively fixes it to the year 910, to which we think no juſt objection can be made (t). The reader will obſerve, that we take Aſſer the Monk, and Aſſer Biſhop of Sherburn, for one and the ſame perſon, which ſome however have denied: yet we go farther ſtill, and aſſert him to have been alſo Archbiſhop of St. Davids, for all which, we hope the reader will find ſufficient authority in the notes [C]. We do indeed admit, that if there was ſuch a reader in the public ſchools at Oxford as Aſſer the Monk, he muſt have been ſome other perſon of the ſame name, and not our author: but we do not think this point ſo clearly made out, as to deſerve much diſpute about it, ſince it reſts almoſt wholly on the authority of Harpsfield (u); for though he cites the Annals of Wincheſter, yet we find no ſuch things in the Annals that we have, nor is the account conſiſtent with itſelf in ſeveral other reſpects, beſides this of Aſſer, as Sir John Spelman has juſtly obſerved [D]. There is no leſs controverſy about the works of Aſſerius, than about his preferments: for ſome alledge that he never wrote any thing but the Annals of King Ælfred: whereas, Pits gives us the titles of no leſs than five other books (w)

[C] The reader will find ſufficient authority in the notes.] It would take up too much time, and give the reader too much trouble, to mention all the miſtakes that have been made in relation to our author. It will be a much eaſier and ſhorter method to demonſtrate the truth of the facts above aſſerted, and ſpeak only as occaſion requires of what others have advanced. We will firſt prove, that Aſſer the Monk and Aſſer Biſhop of Sherburn was the ſame perſon, and this without relying upon authority at all; for if authority could abſolutely decide, we have that of Matthew of Weſtminſter (20) and Florence of Worceſter (21) on our ſide, which ought to be deciſive. But we will wave theſe, and take another method of proving the fact. If Aſſer Menevenſis and Aſſer Biſhop of Sherburn were two perſons, then certainly the former treated the latter very ill; for when he is ſpeaking of the learned men the King had about him, he mentions John the Monk of St. Davids, Werfreth Biſhop of Worceſter, Plegmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Ethelſtan and Werwalf the King's Chaplains, as perſons aſſiſting that Prince in his ſtudies (22), but he ſays not a word of Aſſer Biſhop of Sherburn; though he ſpeaks of the very work wherein that Biſhop aſſiſted the King, as the King himſelf tells us (23). This would be the higheſt injuſtice in the world, eſpecially conſidering he addreſſed his book to the King, and utterly inconſiſtent with his own character. But if himſelf was that Aſſer, then it is an inſtance only of his modeſty, and as ſuch is agreeable to the whole tenor of his writings. Yet in another place, he acknowledges the King made uſe of him for thoſe very purpoſes, for which the King himſelf ſays he made uſe of the Biſhop of Sherburn. That Aſſer was alſo Archbiſhop of St. Davids is no new opinion; for both Mr. Tyrrel and Mr. Wiſe have aſſerted it, though we differ in ſome reſpects from each of theſe authors. Mr. Tyrrel's notion was, that his being Archbiſhop of St. Davids, was a fiction of the Monks, in order to do honour to their brother Aſſer (24). Mr. Wiſe again believed he was Archbiſhop of St. Davids, and afterwards Biſhop of Sherburn (25); and in order to ſupport this, he alledges that there is an omiſſion in the Annals of St. Davids, of the year wherein he was made Archbiſhop; and that whereas he is ſaid to have become ſo in 909, the author ought to have placed his death there. But perhaps this is taking too great a liberty with MSS. That Aſſer was really Archbiſhop appears not only from the ancient Annals ſo often mentioned, and from another very ancient manuſcript in the Cotton Library (26), but alſo from the indubitable authority of Gerald Barry, commonly called Cambrenſis, one of his ſucceſſors, who, in his liſt of the Archbiſhops, ſets down Novis, Etwal, Aſſer (27). Our ſuppoſition therefore is, that he ſucceeded Etwal in 883, in which we contradict no manuſcript. As to what the Annals of St. Davids ſay, that he was made Archbiſhop in 909, we muſt ſet down the phraſes made uſe of by the author of thoſe Annals (28).

Anno 841, Novis eſt Epiſcopus Menevenſis.
Anno 873, Novis Epiſcopus moritur.
Anno 909, Aſſer Epiſcopus Britanniæ fit.

It ſhould ſeem therefore, that upon the new regulations made in the Church, mentioned in the former note, Aſſer had an additional juriſdiction given him; otherwiſe, why is he called Epiſcopus Britanniæ, Biſhop of Britain? whereas Novis, and all the other Biſhops, are ſtyled Biſhops of St. Davids. Aſſer therefore might become Biſhop of St. Davids, in 883, and now receive from King Edward the Primacy of Britain, or Wales, ſo far as he could beſtow it, which being a very remarkable fact, was taken notice of by the author of theſe Annals. To prove that Aſſer Archbiſhop of St. Davids, if he was a different perſon from Aſſer Biſhop of Sherburn, could not be author of the Annals of Ælfred, we need only take notice, that he never mentions his nameſake Aſſer of Sherburn, who aſſiſted that King in his literary labours, particularly in his tranſlation of Gregory's Paſtoral, of which mention is expreſsly made in thoſe Annals (29). Add to this, that the Saxon Chronicle, the hiſtory of Æthelward the Monk, and other ancient records of thoſe times, never mention two Aſſers, though they ſpeak copiouſly of one. On the whole therefore we think, that it is at leaſt extremely probable, that Aſſer the Monk of St. Davids became firſt Pariſh-Prieſt of St. Dewi, afterwards Abbot of Ambroſebury and Banwell, then Biſhop of Sherburn, and laſtly Archbiſhop of St. Davids by the favour of King Ælfred, and Primate of Britain through the kindneſs of Edward his ſon.

(29) Page 48.

[D] As Sir John Spelman has juſtly obſerved.] If Aſſer had really read at Oxford, it is not eaſy to gueſs why he never mentioned it. It is generally conceived that Grimbald went to Oxford in 886: at leaſt it is in that year Aſſerius places the great tumult that happened there on his account (30), which being ſo fair an opportunity, one would think the author could not have paſſed it by without mentioning his own employment, if he really had any in the ſame place. The truth ſeems to be, that whoever framed the ſtory of the Oxford profeſſors, took all the learned men, that are ſpoken of in the hiſtory of Ælfred's reign, and beſtowed them as the accounts he had met with of their works led him; one to Divinity, another to Grammar, which fell to Aſſer's ſhare, becauſe he had grammatically conſtrued Boëtius for the uſe of Ælfred, as William of Malmſbury tells us. Indeed if it were true, what ſome have ſuggeſted, that Aſſer was employed in bringing over St. Grimbald from France (31), then by placing the date a little higher, we might bring this ſtory to ſquare well enough with the chronology of Aſſer's hiſtory: but even then it would not agree with the matter of it; for if he read in the ſchools at Oxford, how could he divide his time between the court and his monaſtery? There is no compariſon between what Aſſer himſelf tells us, and what we have from an anonymous writer, of whom we have but a very indifferent account.

(30) Aſſer. Menev. p. 52.

of his writing, and adds, that he wrote many more. The firſt of theſe is a Commentary on Boëtius, which is mentioned by Leland, on the authority of the Chronicle of St. Neot's (x): the truth is, he explained this author to King Ælfred when he made his Saxon tranſlation, whence the cenſure paſſed upon it, that though it was a work of great uſe in thoſe times, yet it was in a manner ridiculous in ours (y): the ſame thing might be ſaid of any literal verſion. The ſecond piece mentioned by Pits, is the Annals of Ælfred's life and reign. The third he ſtyles Annales Britanniæ, or the Annals of Britain in one book, mentioned alſo by Leland and Bale (z), and which hath been ſince publiſhed by the learned Dr. Gale (a), who inclined to think it genuine, which is certainly more than it deſerved, as will be ſhewn in a note [E]. The fourth piece, he calls Aurearum Sententiarum Enchiridion, lib. 1. id eſt, An Enchiridion of Golden Sayings, in one Book, which is without queſtion the Manual or Common-Place-Book made for King Ælfred, and reckoned among his works by this very Pits (b): It muſt be owned that Leland had alſo ſpoken of this Enchiridion, but more accurately, and in a manner becoming ſo great a writer; for he ſpeaks of it as an inſtance of the learning and diligence of Aſſer, which it certainly was: and though the collections he made concerning this author, are much better and larger than thoſe of Bale and Pits, yet he modeſtly, upon this ſubject, apologizes for ſpeaking ſo little and ſo obſcurely of ſo great a man (c). The next in Pits' catalogue, is a Book of Homilies, and the laſt, a Book of Epiſtles: he took it for granted, that Aſſer being a Biſhop, preached ſometimes, and that having ſo many friends, he muſt needs write letters, which is all the foundation that can be in nature for theſe two volumes, no ancient author ſaying a word of them. Of the like ſtamp is Biſhop Godwin's account, of his being buried in his cathedral church of Sherburn (d), which is mere gueſs-work, founded on his being Biſhop there; and with equal probability we might ſay, he was buried at St. Davids, though there is not any authority for either. Thus we conclude the article of this moſt excellent perſon, who was, without queſtion, one of the moſt pious, moſt learned, and withal one of the modeſteſt Prelates of the age in which he lived.

[E] As will be ſhewn in a note.] The firſt notice we had of theſe Annals was from Leland (32); for as to what Bromton ſays, concerning Aſſer's mentioning King Offa, it does not appear to relate of theſe Annals (33). As to the account given by Leland, it is certain that he ſpeaks very doubtfully, and in a long paſſage which he afterwards blotted out (34), and which is therefore omitted in the printed edition, he aſcribes this very book, commonly called the Chronicle of St. Neots, to a Domeſtic of King Ælfred's. Though in another place he ſays, this Domeſtic abridged the Annals of Aſſerius (35). Dr. Gale who publiſhed it, inclines to think it really the work of Aſſerius (36), and Biſhop Nicholſon concurs with him, becauſe, ſays he, his book inſiſts chiefly on the fortunes of King Ælfred (37). Yet never ſure was a greater injury done to any author, than is done to Aſſerius, by aſcribing to him a work altogether unworthy of him. The very beginning of the Chronicle is little better than nonſenſe, and as to what the author ſays of King Ælfred, he tranſcribes the genuine Annals of Aſſerius, interpolating however many fabulous ſtories, which, without doubt, were invented long after our author's deceaſe. It is true that he ſpeaks often in the perſon of Aſſer (38): but this is no proof of any thing, but the author's ignorance, ſince in the former part of his work he ſpeaks in the perſon of Beda (39), which is a plain proof, that the whole is a tranſcript from various authors, by one who had not judgment enough to leave out thoſe perſonal phraſes which diſturb and confound the work. As to what Leland hath written about this Chronicle, it is eaſily accounted for; he had many large and arduous works upon his hands, and therefore had not leiſure to read every manuſcript which came into his power. Peruſing a part of this manuſcript, and perceiving that the author called King Ælfred his Lord, his Patron, and him to whom he was many ways obliged, he took it for granted, that he muſt have lived in his time: whereas, if he had read the beginning of the book, he muſt, according to the ſame way of reaſoning, have ſuppoſed he lived two hundred years higher. Beſides, at the end of this Chronicle, and there appears no marks of any continuation, we have an account of the death of Aſſer Biſhop of Sherburn, which is placed in the year 909 (40). Hence forward therefore, it is to be hoped, this Chronicle will be cited in the ſame way good judges have always cited it, that is, by the name of Pſeudo-Aſſerius, or the pretended Aſſer (41), as its author is fitly ſtyled. If this ſhould be thought too hard a cenſure, we will offer a conjecture of another nature, which is at leaſt new, and not altogether improbable. This Chronicle of St. Neots was ſaid to be the work of Joannes Aſſerius, whence Pits, ſtupidly enough, calls our author by the ſame name (42), though it is certain, that ſirnames were not in uſe here, till after our acquaintance with the Normans. It is therefore not impoſſible, that this Chronicle might be tranſcribed by ſome perſon whoſe name was John Aſſer or Aſker, for that there has been ſuch a ſirname, is evident from the author cited in the margin (43). In proceſs of time, the likeneſs of the name, and the likeneſs of the matter, might well enough occaſion ſuch a miſtake; but it is now certainly high time to correct it.

B.

BABINGTON (GERVASE), a learned Biſhop in the end of the XVIth, and beginning of the XVIIth century, was born in Nottinghamſhire [A], being deſcended from the ancient family of the Babingtons in that county (a). After having received there the firſt rudiments of learning, he was ſent to Trinity-College in Cambridge (b), of which he became Fellow (c). On the 15th of July 1578, he was incorporated Maſter of Arts at Oxford, as he ſtood in his own univerſity (d). Having laid a good foundation in other parts of learning, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Divinity, and became a famous Preacher in Cambridge, the place of his reſidence. When he was Doctor in Divinity, he was made domeſtic Chaplain to Henry Earl of Pembroke, Preſident of the Council in the marches of Wales [B], by whoſe intereſt he was conſtituted Treaſurer of the church of Landaff (e). In 1588, he was inſtalled into the Prebend of Wellington in the cathedral of Hereford (f). And, through his Patron's further intereſt, was advanced to the biſhoprick of Landaff [C], vacant by the death of William Blethin: he was conſecrated the twenty-ninth of Auguſt, 1591 (g). In February 1594, he was tranſlated to the See of Exeter (h), and confirmed the ninth of March (i) [D]. From whence, in 1597, he was tranſlated again to Worceſter (k), to which he was nominated Auguſt 30, elected September 15, and confirmed October 4, following (l). He was likewiſe made one of the Queen's Counſel for the marches of Wales (m). To the library of his cathedral at Worceſter he was a very great benefactor; for he not only fitted and repaired the edifice, but alſo bequeathed thereto all his books, which was a gift of good value (n). After having continued Biſhop of Worceſter near thirteen years (o), he died of the jaundice (p), May 17, 1610, and was buried in his cathedral of Worceſter, without any monument (q). As to his character; he was, in the midſt of all his preferments, neither tainted with idleneſs, pride, or covetouſneſs: not only diligent in preaching, but in writing books, for the underſtanding of the Holy Scriptures. So that he was a true pattern of piety to the people, of learning (r) to the miniſtry, and of wiſdom to all governors (s). He was an excellent Preacher, and happy in raiſing the affections and attention of his audience, which he would keep up till the end of his ſermon (t). We ſhall give the reſt of his character in the note [E]. He

[F] He publiſhed ſeveral things.] They were printed at firſt in 4to, then, with additions, in folio in 1615, and again in 1637, under this title, 'The 'works of the Right Reverend Father in God, Gervaſe Babington, late Biſhop of Worceſter. Containing comfortable notes upon the five books of 'Moſes, viz. Geneſis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, 'Deuteronomie. As alſo an Expoſition upon the 'Creed, the Commandments, the Lord's Prayer. The Expoſition of the Lord's Prayer is dedicated, by the author, to his very ſingular good Lord Henry Earl of Pembroke, &c. which dedication is dated from Wilton, the 11th of May 1588. Of the three ſermons; one was preached at Paul's Croſs, the ſecond Sunday in Michaelmas Term 1590, being upon Election; the ſecond was preached at the Court at Greenwich, the 24th day of May, 1590; and the third, is a funeral ſermon upon T. L. Eſq; preached by the author, whilſt he was Biſhop of Landaff. His ſtyle is good, conſidering the time he lived in; though it is too full of quibbles, of jingles, and quaint expreſſions. But ſuch was the falſe taſte, which then almoſt univerſally prevailed.

[That Biſhop Babington was born in Nottinghamſhire, of a conſiderable family in that county, and not in Devonſhire, is farther confirmed by the Hiſtory of Europe, Vol. i. p. 132 (8). Dr. Berkenhout hath juſtly obſerved, that the argument in the note [A], for determining our Prelate's birth to the year 1551, which is drawn from the date under the Effigies of him, prefixed to his Works, is far from being concluſive; becauſe the age in a print generally means the age of the perſon repreſented, at the time when he ſat for the picture, and not at the time of his death (9). Mr. Ballard controverts the aſſertion of Sir John Harrington, with regard to the aſſiſtance given by Dr. Babington to the Counteſs of Pembroke, in her tranſlation of the Pſalms, and produces ſeveral inſtances of ladies who have been ſkilled in the Hebrew language. He thinks too, that, as the picture of the Counteſs repreſents her with the book of Pſalms in her hand, it would have been inconſiſtent with her modeſty, if the performance had not been her own, to have been drawn in that manner (10). But, ſurely, it is no impeachment of her title to the work, which was a poetical one, to ſuppoſe that Biſhop Babington, from his ſuperior knowledge of the original, might enable her to give a more exact verſion of ſome particular paſſages.

The Miles Smith, who wrote the Preface to Babington's Works, and the verſes for his picture, inſerted in the note [E], was Biſhop of Glouceſter, and a very learned Prelate. He was born in the city of Hereford, and became, about the year 1568, a ſtudent in Corpus Chriſti College, Oxford; from which college he transferred himſelf to Brazen-Noſe, and took the degrees in Arts, as a member of that houſe. He was afterwards made one of the Chaplains, or petty Canons of Chriſt-church, and was admitted to the degree of Batchelor in Divinity, whilſt he belonged to that royal foundation. In proceſs of time, he was raiſed to the dignity of Canon reſidentiary of the cathedral church of Hereford: he was created Doctor of Divinity, in 1594; and, at length, in 1612, advanced to the See of Glouceſter, and conſecrated on the 20th of September in that year. His knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and Oriental languages was ſo extraordinary, that, upon this account, he was deſcribed, by a learned Biſhop of the kingdom, as a very walking Library. It was particularly for his exact and eminent ſkill in the Eaſtern tongues, that he was thought worthy, by King James the Firſt, to be called to that great work, the laſt tranſlation by authority of our Engliſh Bible. In this undertaking he was eſteemed one of the principal perſons. He began with the firſt, and was the laſt man in the tranſlation of the work: for after the taſk was finiſhed by the whole number appointed to the buſineſs, who were ſomewhat above forty, the verſion was reviſed and improved by a dozen ſelected from them; and, at length, was referred to the final examination of Bilſon Biſhop of Wincheſter, and our Dr. Smith. When all was ended, he was commanded to write a Preface, which being performed by him, it was made public, and is the ſame that is now extant in our Church Bible. It was for his good ſervices in this tranſlation, that Dr. Smith was appointed Biſhop of Glouceſter. He died in the beginning of November 1624, and was buried in his own cathedral. He was a ſtrict Calviniſt, and hated the proceedings of Dr. Laud. In 1632, a volume of Sermons, tranſcribed from his original manuſcripts, being fifteen in number, was publiſhed at London, in folio (11).] K.

BACON (ROBERT), an eminent Divine in the XIIIth century. The place, or time of his birth, cannot be certainly known; but from various circumſtances hereafter mentioned, it ſeems probable that it was about the year 1168 (a). Pits indeed informs us, that he was brother to the famous Roger Bacon, for which he produces no authority, and indeed the fact itſelf is highly improbable, if not impoſſible [A]. This Robert Bacon ſtudied in his youth at Oxford, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the quickneſs of his

[A] Highly improbable if not impoſſible.] This circumſtance is, in the General Dictionary, tranſcribed without ſcruple in the life of (1) Roger Bacon, for as to Robert, they are ſilent. Pits indeed relates it twice, affirming in both places, that Roger, as well as Robert Bacon, preached againſt the Biſhop of Wincheſter at Oxford (2). In a ſubſequent note, we ſhall deſtroy the credit of this text: at preſent our buſineſs ſhall be to ſhew, that it is very unlikely they were brothers. Firſt, then, the ſilence of Roger Bacon on this head, ſeems to be a good argument againſt the truth of it. He often mentions in his writings the learned men of his own time, ſpeaks frequently of his patrons and benefactors, and not ſeldom of his diſciples, but not once of his brother (3). Can we therefore believe, that he had one, eſpecially ſo learned and ſo conſiderable a man? Secondly, Leland knew nothing of this relation, who wrote expreſsly of Roger Bacon, and mentions Robert occaſionally more than once (4). In like manner, Bale, who wrote the lives of both the Bacons over and over, was either ignorant of their being brothers, or had a mind we ſhould continue ſo; for he ſays nothing of him in any of his editions (5). It is true, theſe are but negative arguments, and yet, whoever conſiders the diſpoſition of Roger Bacon, the integrity of Leland, and the induſtry of Bale, will ſcarcely imagine that ſo ſingular a thing as this could eſcape them. Thirdly, the ages of theſe celebrated men will by no means allow it. Pits himſelf tells us, that Robert Bacon died in 1248, and that he was ſenex et plenus dierum, old and full of days, which muſt imply fourſcore or thereabouts (6); and indeed this agrees very well with all the circumſtances of his life, for Bale tells us, he was very old, when he became a Frier, which was in 1240 (7), when, according to this computation, he muſt have been ſeventy-two; whereas Roger Bacon was born in 1214 (8), ſo that there muſt have been forty-ſix years between them, which is hardly credible there could have been, if they were brethren. We might add to this, the weakneſs, credulity, and haſtineſs of Pits, who concludes frequently from the ſlighteſt appearances, and made no difficulty of giving his readers his own conjectures for true hiſtory. But there is no need of inſiſting longer upon this, our former arguments being ſufficiently concluſive.

parts, and his aſſiduous application to his ſtudies. Thence, according to the cuſtom of that age, he removed to Paris, where he perfected himſelf in all the branches of learning, which were in repute in thoſe times (b). We are not told at what time he returned into England, but it appears clearly, that, after his return, he ſettled at Oxford, and read Divinity lectures there (c). His colleague in this office was Dr. Edmund Rich, in our hiſtories commonly ſtyled Edmund Abingdon, a man famous for literature, and yet in the opinion of Leland inferior to our Bacon (d). This Dr. Rich had been choſen by the Canons of Saliſbury, Treaſurer of their church, and in 1233, becoming Archbiſhop of Canterbury, his friend Robert Bacon ſucceeded him as Treaſurer of the cathedral church of Saliſbury (e). The ſame year he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a ſermon before his royal maſter King Henry III., at Oxford, whither his Majeſty came, in order to have held a great council of his Lords. In this diſcourſe, Bacon plainly told the King, the miſchiefs to which himſelf and his ſubjects were expoſed, by his repoſing too great a confidence in Peter de Rupibus, Biſhop of Wincheſter, and other foreigners, which honeſt ſermon had a great effect on the mind of his maſter, and inclined him to give ſatisfaction to his nobility, who were then, generally ſpeaking, diſaffected (f). This ſeaſonable ſervice rendered to the nation, did more to ſecure his memory from oblivion, than his many years laborious reading, or even his learned writings. Yet, by a ſtrange proneneſs to attribute all great things to his nameſake Roger Bacon, a ſtory has been framed of his preaching at the ſame time, and on the ſame occaſion, which doubtleſs was the occaſion that Pits ſuppoſed them to be brothers, though in truth there is no good ground to believe, that Roger Bacon preached at all at that time, or on that ſubject [B]. The learned Dr. Cave thought otherwiſe (g); but even the authority of ſo great a man ought not to eſtabliſh as a truth, a fact altogether abſurd, as in the notes we have ſhewn it to be, though with all due reſpect to that great man's memory [C]. After the pro-

[B] At that time, or on that ſubject.] All that we know of this matter, is from Matth. Paris, who was contemporary with Robert, and with Roger Bacon. He gives us a large account of King Henry's coming to Oxford in 1233, the occaſion of it, and what fell out there. Peter de Rupibus, Biſhop of Wincheſter, at that time governed the King and kingdom, drawing over ſuch numbers of his countrymen, the Poictovins, that the King was ſurrounded, and the nation ſwarmed with them. The King, ſenſible of the diſaffection of his ſubjects, called a great council of the Lords, to meet at Oxford, on the feaſt of St. John: but when he came thither, he found his ſummons ſlighted by the Barons. On this he, in great wrath, iſſued a ſecond and a third ſummons, reſolving to proceed againſt ſuch of the Lords as did not then attend, as traitors. At this time it was, that Friar Robert Bacon, preaching before the King and ſome Biſhops, told him plainly, that peace was not to be hoped for, till Peter, Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Peter de Rivallis, his ſon, were removed from his councils. Others alſo about the King affirmed the ſame thing. We read farther in this author, that the King hereupon recollecting himſelf, began to incline his heart unto reaſon, which being perceived, a certain court Chaplain, one Roger Bacon, of a facetious diſpoſition, pleaſantly, and yet cynically, reprehended him on this head. My Lord the King, ſaid he, what is it that moſt hurts, and moſt terrifies ſuch as croſs the ſeas? The King anſwered, they know beſt, who do their buſineſs in great waters. But, replied the Chaplain, my Lord, I will tell you, ſhelves and rocks (Petræ et Rupes), and it is ſaid, Peter de Rupibus. It is however neceſſary to give the author's own words. 'In hoc autem colloquio frater quidam Robertus 'Bacum, de Ordine Prædicatorum, qui coram Rege 'et quibuſdam Epiſcopis præſentibus Verbum Dei 'prædicaret; libera voce Regi patentur dixit: quod 'nunquam diuturna pace frueretur, niſi Petrum Win-'tonienſem Epiſcopum, et Petrum de Rivallis filium 'ejus (aut conſanguineum) à conſiliis ſuis amoveret. 'Cúmque alii, qui aderant, idipſum proteſtarentur: 'Rex aliquantulùm in ſeipſo ſe recolligens, cor ſuum 'nationi inclinavit: et cum ſic videret cum mitiga-'tum, quidam clericus de curia, ſcilicet Rogerus 'Bacum, jocundus in ſermone, jocundè ac lepidè, cy-'nicè tamen reprehendens, ait: Domine, mi Rex, 'quid plùs nocet trans fretum navigantibus, aut quid 'plus terret? At Rex: Noverunt facientes operatio-'nes in aquis multis. At clericus: Domine, dicam: 'Petræ et Rupes. Ac diceretur: Petrus de Rupibus. 'Hoc enim erat nomen Epiſcopi Wintonienſis cum 'tali cognomento (9).' It is evident enough that the Robert and Roger, mentioned here, induced Pits to make the celebrated Roger Bacon, the Franciſcan brother to our Robert Bacon, and to aſſert, that they both preached upon this occaſion, which, if there were no objection to the latter part of this paſſage, could not poſſibly be true; ſince at that time Roger Bacon was not above twenty years of age, and conſequently could never anſwer the character of the Roger Bacon, mentioned in the text. Beſides, whoever reads this paſſage carefully, cannot but obſerve that the latter part comes in very abruptly, and looks like a vulgar ſtory, built upon the paſſage before related, which is ſerious, ſolid, and has a ſtrong air of truth. This ſeems indeed to be the bottom of the buſineſs; for in the beſt MS. (10) of Matth. Paris, the ſentence ends with the word, proteſtarentur, and all the reſt ſeems to be added by ſome later writers from common fame.

[C] To that great man's memory.] Dr. Cave ſaw plainly the abſurdity of this ſtory, as the date ſtood, and therefore in his life of Roger Bacon, he has altered it, but without any authority. Roger Bacon, ſays he, flouriſhed chiefly about the year 1278, but he began to diſtinguiſh himſelf many years before, for in 1259, he preached before Henry III., at Oxford, at which time he freely reproved him on account of the Poictovins and other ſtrangers, whoſe councils he in a manner wholly followed, admitting them not only to his court, but advancing them likewiſe to the principal offices of State. Claruit præcipuè circa annum 1278, quin et jam ante plus annos inclareſcere cœperat, etiam anno 1259, coram Henrico III., Oxonii tunc agente, concionem habuit, quâ regem ob Pictavienſes, alioſque exteros, quorum conſiliis penè unicè agebatur, non modo in aulam admiſſos, ſed et ſummis reipublicæ muneribus adhibitos, liberè coarguebat (11). If this date could be ſupported, it would ſuit the ſtory of Roger Bacon very well, becauſe at that time he would have been forty-ſix years old; but the miſchief of it is, that it is in the very teeth of truth, as well as againſt all authority: for firſt, Robert Bacon, whoſe ſermon is ſaid to have given occaſion to Roger's, had been then eleven years in his grave, and what is ſtill worſe, Peter de Rupibus, againſt whom the ſermon is ſuppoſed to be preached, had been dead and buried one and twenty years (12). The only circumſtance founded in fact is this, that King Henry was that year at Oxford, where was held that called the mad Parliament, of which though we have a long account in Matth. Paris, yet is there nothing ſaid of this preaching, ſo that this emendation of Dr. Cave's cannot poſſibly be admitted. For if you take away the punning invective againſt the Biſhop of Wincheſter, there is no colour of authority for the ſtory, and if that remains, the date cannot be altered.

motion of Dr. Rich to the See of Canterbury, the famous Richard Fiſhakel, whom Leland calls Fizacrius, read, in conjunction with our Bacon, in St. Edward's ſchools, for many years together, to their own great honour, and to the benefit of all their hearers; nor were they leſs aſſiduous in preaching, ſo that their labours were equally divided between the learned and the vulgar (b). In 1240, Bacon loſt his great patron and intimate friend, Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and very poſſibly this accident, joined to his fervent piety, and great love to a retired life, might induce Bacon, though he was very old, to enter into the order of Friars Preachers (i), of which order alſo was his aſſociate Fiſhakel (k). In gratitude to the memory of the Archbiſhop, Bacon wrote his Life, notwithſtanding that Prelate had for ſome years lived, and was even ſo unfortunate as to die under the King's diſpleaſure, which work of his was highly (l) eſteemed [D]. He wrote alſo many other learned pieces, ſufficient to have eſtabliſhed his reputation, and of which we have nothing now excepting their titles (m) [E]. At length, worn out with ſo long a courſe of ſtudious application, he yielded to fate in the year 1248, and was interred at Oxford (n). His faithful friend Richard Fiſhakel, ſurvived him but a very ſhort time, his affection for him being ſo great, that he wanted a reliſh for life, when Bacon was no longer among the living (o). Leland has written very copiouſly upon this extraordinary event (p) [F]. It is ſcarcely to be conceived, how many miſtakes, both ancient and modern writers have committed in relation to this man. The editor of Leland's Commentaries has in many places corrupted his author, and inſtead of Robert has Roger Bacon, probably becauſe in the MS. he found it contracted. However it be, certain it is, that theſe miſtakes of his have brought great errors into Leland's book, as in the notes will be fully demonſtrated [G]. The famous Dr. Fuller hath,

[D] Which work of his was highly eſteemed.] The long and intimate acquaintance which had ſubſiſted between theſe two great men, St. Edmund, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and our Bacon, excellently qualified the latter for writing the life of the former, which though it was a taſk that could not but expoſe him to the ill-will of a court, yet he performed it ſo well, that when Matth. Paris afterwards wrote more largely upon the ſame ſubject, he tells us expreſsly, that he had recourſe to the writings of Richard de Witz, Biſhop of Chicheſter, who had been Chaplain to the Archbiſhop, and to this work of Robert Bacon's (13), as to the moſt authentic memoirs of that Prelate (14). Leland and many others have attributed this life to Roger Bacon, who did indeed receive ſome favours from the Archbiſhop while at Oxford, but as we have ſeen from unqueſtionable authority, could have no ſort of title to this work.

[F] Upon this extraordinary event.] It is in the life of Richard Fiſhakel, that this occurs. He tells us, that he was a moſt excellent Philoſopher and Divine, and on that account ſo dear to Robert Bacon, a man exquiſite in all the branches of literature, that he became his inſeparable companion. He afterwards adds, neither ought we to conceal what our writers of thoſe times mention, that Fizacrius and Bacon were as cloſely united as Bithus and Bacchius, a noble Engliſh pair, whether we conſider their friendſhip, or their learning. As living they were the deareſt companions, ſo in death they were not divided; for as the turtle, when it has loſt its mate, pines itſelf to death; ſo Bacon being dead, Fizacrius neither could nor would ſurvive. O ſingular amity, and worthy of perpetual remembrance! In our printed copy of Leland, the ſentence firſt cited, runs thus. 'Nam et inſignis Philoſophus et 'Theologus fuit, quibus nominibus tam charus erat 'Rogero Bacono, viro undecunque doctiſſimo, ut co-'mes illi individuus adhæreret (17).' This determines all the ſubſequent paſſages to Roger Bacon, than which there could not be a more monſtrous abſurdity, ſince Roger Bacon outlived Fiſhakel forty-four years, the latter dying in 1248, and the former ſurviving to 1292. Now that this is no miſtake in Leland, appears from what Bale has written of the ſaid Fiſhakel. 'He was, ſays he, the conſtant com-'panion of Robert Bacon, with whom he ſtudied 'at Paris. Leland tells us of them, that they were 'as ſtrictly united as Bithus and Bacchius, whom 'death itſelf could not divide, for Bacon being 'dead, Fiſhakel could not ſurvive him (18).' The MS. Bale uſed therefore was right, or at leaſt it muſt have been R. Baconus, which he had ſkill enough to read Robert, as it ought to be, and not Roger. To put the matter out of diſpute, Matth. Paris, under the year 1248, gives us this account of their deaths. 'This year, ſays he, died Walter 'Mauclerc, Biſhop of Carliſle, of the order of 'Friars Preachers; as alſo two other Friars of the 'ſame order, who left not greater men, perhaps not 'their equals in Divinity, and other ſciences, among 'the living. Theſe were Friar Robert Bacon, and 'Friar Richard Fiſhaker (or de Fiſhakele) who for 'many years had read excellently in the ſame facul-'ty, and had glorioufly preached the word of God 'to the people (19).'

[G] In the notes will be fully demonſtrated.] Not to tire the reader with a multitude of dry citations, we ſhall here mention but two inſtances of that careleſſneſs, which is complained of in the text. In the life of Matth. Paris, Leland is made to ſay, that this author compoſed the Life of Edmund Rich, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, from the Memoirs of Ricardus Vicanius, and Roger Bacon. Scripſit etiam Vitam Eadmundi Richii, Cantiorum Archiepiſcopi, omnia tamen à Ricardo Vicanio, et Rogeri Bacone, prius edoctus (20). This miſtake Leland himſelf could never have made, for he had this out of Matth. Paris's hiſtory, wherein it is ſaid, Hujus igitur aſſertionibus, necnon et Fratris Magiſtri Roberti Bacun, de Ordine Prædicatorum, certificatus Dominus Mattheus Pariſienſis, Monachus Eccleſiæ ſancti Albani, Vitam memorati ſancti Edmundi ſcripſit, et quæ indubitanter didicit à fide dignis, diligenter digeſcit. Quam qui videre deſiderat, in Eccleſia ſancti Albani ipſam poterit reperire (21). The other paſſage is ſtill more flagrant: it is in the article of Edmund Rich, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, where Leland is made to ſay, There was in his time one Roger Bacon at Oxford, a man diſtinguiſhed among the lovers of learning, with whom Edmund was very familiar, and often made uſe of his aſſiſtance; for though in many things he was much ſuperior to Bacon, yet was he inferior to him in learning, or I am much miſtaken. Afterwards he tells us, that this Bacon ſucceeded hath, with his uſual good humour, taken notice of the common cuſtom of confounding ſeveral learned men of the name of Bacon with each other (q): the paſſage is curious and deſerves to be read [H]. But what ſeems moſt extraordinary is this, that the induſtrious Thomas Hearne was ſo little acquainted with our author, that he was for ſubſtituting the name of Roger inſtead of Robert, in a MS. he publiſhed out of pure regard to the reputation of the former (r), which is however too juſt, and too extenſive, to ſtand in need of any ſuch helps [I].

ceeded Rich in his office of Treaſurer to the church of Saliſbury (22). But how could any part of this be true of Roger Bacon? How could Dr. Rich uſe the aſſiſtance of a child, or how could Leland prefer the learning of Bacon, who was not twenty years old, when Rich was made Archbiſhop of Canterbury? Is it poſſible, that at thoſe years he could ſucceed in the treaſurerſhip of Saliſbury? Leland's own account of Roger Bacon contradicts it. But if inſtead of Roger, we read Robert Bacon, then all is clear and plain, for he was at that time ſixty-five years of age. But if authority be deſired to ſupport this, even that may be had, in the cleareſt and moſt expreſs terms, for Nicholas Trivet, ſpeaking of Dr. Edmund Rich, and his reading at Oxford, ſays, that he had for his colleague, as reader in Divinity, Maſter Robert Bacon of the order of Friars Preachers, who alſo read with Richard Fiſhakel (23). Thus we ſee what confuſion may be introduced by the miſtake of a ſingle letter, and how neceſſary it is to tranſcribe and print ancient authors, literatim, ſince, if inſtead of Roger, it had ſtood in the printed copy R. Bacon, every reader muſt have judged for himſelf, and the editor had eſcaped all blame.

[H] The paſſage is curious and deſerves to be read.] It is in his Church Hiſtory, wherein having given a conciſe account of Roger Bacon, and the ill treatment he met with from the Monks, he proceeds thus: 'For my own part, I behold the name of 'Bacon in Oxford, not as of an individual man, 'but a corporation of men; no ſingle cord, but a 'twiſted cable of many together. And as all the 'acts of ſtrong men of that nature, are attributed 'to an Hercules; all the predictions of propheſying 'women to a Sibyl; ſo I conceive all the atchieve-'ments of the Oxonian Bacons, in their liberal 'ſtudies, are aſcribed to one, as chief of the name. 'And this in effect, is confeſſed by the moſt learned 'and ingenious orator of that univerſity (24). In-'deed we find one Robert Bacon, who died anno '1248, a learned Doctor, and Trithemius ſtyleth 'John Baconthorpe, plain Bacon, which addeth 'to the probability of the former aſſertion. How-'ever, this confounding ſo many Bacons in one, 'hath cauſed Antichroniſms in many relations. 'For how could this Bacon ever be a reader of 'Philoſophy in Brazen-Noſe College, founded more 'than one hundred years after his death; ſo that 'his Brazen Head (ſo much ſpoken of to ſpeak) 'muſt make time paſt to be again, or elſe theſe 'inconſiſtencies will not be reconciled; except any 'will ſalve it with the Prolepſis of Brazen-Noſe-'Hall, formerly in the place where the college is 'now erected. I have done with the Oxford Ba-'cons, only let me add, that thoſe of Cambridge, 'father and ſon, Nicholas and Francis; the one 'of Bennet, and the other of Trinity college, do 'hold (abſit invidia) the ſcales of deſert even, 'againſt all of their name in all the world be-'ſides (25).' After this, it will perhaps ſurprize the reader to tell him, that in the late edition of Moreri's Dictionary, the articles of Robert and Roger Bacon, are very properly diſtinguiſhed, and a very remarkable circumſtance relating to our author is preſerved there in, viz. that during his whole life, he kept up a ſtrict correſpondence with the learned men of the univerſity at Paris, and was ſo careful of the reputation of the univerſity of Oxford, and of the proficiency of the ſtudents therein, that he procured the conſtitution relating to profeſſors, which is found in their volume of ordinances, directed by Pope Clement V., to the General Council at Vienna, which are from thence ſtyled the Clementine Conſtitutions (26).

[I] Too extenſive to ſtand in need of any ſuch helps.] The circumſtance mentioned in the text, is to be met with in Robert of Glouceſter's Chronicle, publiſhed by Mr. Hearne, at Oxford, 1724. There is a large gap in the poem, where the ſtory of King Henry III. ſhould be related; and to ſupply this, ſome proſe writer hath inſerted a kind of annals, in which we find this note. A. xxiii. Hen. III. Maſter Robert Bacon, with Maſter Edmunde of Abyngdone, floreſhed in Oxendorſe, of the Craſte of whiche Bakon many Mervailes buth I telde a monkes Clerkes (27). In the index (28) to the book where this paſſage is referred to, Mr. Hearne corrects his author, and ſays, that inſtead of Robert, we ſhould read Roger, in which he is certainly miſtaken, for Edmund of Abington never read with Roger, but with Robert Bacon; and according to the beſt accounts we have, Roger Bacon did not return from his ſtudies in France till a year or two after. But to put the matter out of diſpute, this proſe writer owns, that he took moſt of his facts from Trivet, who, in the year following, ſpeaking of the death of St. Edmund, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, adds, Fuerat huic Socius in Schola Magiſter Robertus Bacon, qui Oxoniis regens in Theologia, Prædicatorum Ordinem eſt ingreſſus (29). Hence it is clear, that Hearne was wrong in his correction; for this is the very paſſage from which his old writer took the fact, which could not poſſibly be reconciled with the time and courſe of Roger Bacon's life, and yet what the author adds of the wonders performed by this Bacon, might very poſſibly be meant of Roger Bacon. Indeed the Merton college MS. of Trivet's Annals, reads Roger in this place, inſtead of Robert; but erroneouſly, as appears by compariſon with other MSS. and from the concurring teſtimony of Matthew Paris, ſo often cited. Such dry remarks as theſe, are ſometimes neceſſary; and never more ſo, than in the preſent caſe, where ſo many writers, ancient and modern, have confounded two great men, and by attributing the acts of the one to the other, embarraſs both their ſtories, which being now read ſeparately, will appear perfectly clear and ſatisfactory. BACON, BAKON, BACUN (Roger), a learned Engliſh Monk of the Franciſcan order, who flouriſhed in the XIIIth century. He was born near Ilcheſter in Somerſetſhire, which is held to be the Iſcalis of Ptolemy (a), ſome time in the year 1214, and was deſcended of a very ancient and honourable family (b). He received the firſt tincture of letters at Oxford, where having gone through Grammar and Logic, the firſt dawnings of his genius were ſo conſpicuous, that they gained him the favour and patronage of the greateſt lovers of learning, and ſuch as were equally diſtinguiſhed by their high rank, and the excellence of their knowledge (c), of which, even in that age, there were not a few [A]. It is not very clear whether he was of Merton college (d) or

[A] Of which even in that age there were not a few.] As there is ſcarcely any mention made in our antient hiſtory, of a man more famous, or indeed more juſtly famous, than Roger Bacon; ſo we may ſafely affirm, that, notwithſtanding his high reputation, there never was any man's perſonal hiſtory

of Brazen-noſe Hall (e), and perhaps he ſtudied at neither, but ſpent his time at the public ſchools; and when he arrived at years ſufficient to qualify himſelf for academical learning, he went over to Paris, where he made ſtill greater progreſs in all parts of learning, inſomuch that he was looked upon as the glory of that univerſity, and an honour to his country (f). It was the faſhion then, for ſuch as deſired to diſtinguiſh themſelves by an early and effectual application to their ſtudies, to reſort to that city, where, at this time, not only many of the greateſt men in Europe reſided and taught, but many of the Engliſh nation, by whom Bacon was highly encouraged and careſſed. Among others, he became known to Robert Grouthead, or, as the French write it, Groſſeteſte, afterwards Biſhop of Lincoln (g), who was his great patron, and ſingular good friend. While he remained here, he did not confine his ſtudies to any particular branch of literature, but endeavoured to embrace and comprehend the ſciences in general, not however in a ſlight or ſuperficial manner, but fully, perfectly, and to the bottom, by the help of a right method, and a conſtant and eager application. When he had attained the degree of Doctor, he returned again to his own country, and, as ſome ſay, took the habit of the Franciſcan order in 1240 (h), when he was about twenty-ſix years of age; but others aſſert, that he became a Monk before he left France (i). However that matter be, certain it is, that after his return to Oxford, he was conſidered by the greateſt men of that univerſity, as one of the ableſt and moſt indefatigable enquirers after knowledge, that the world had ever produced; and therefore they not only ſhewed him all the reſpect, and had for him all the eſteem that his great abilities deſerved, but likewiſe, perceiving that the courſe he took of improving and advancing all the ſciences by experiments, required another ſort of aſſiſtance than that either of books or favour, they generouſly contributed, out of their purſes, to his expences, ſo that, as he tells us himſelf, he laid out, within the compaſs of twenty years, no leſs than two thouſand pounds, in collecting curious authors, making trials of various kinds, and in the conſtruction of different inſtruments, for the improvement of uſeful knowledge (k) [B]. But if this aſſiduous hiſtory more embarraſſed or perplexed than his; and that chiefly through the want of care and diligence, in ſuch as have undertaken to pen his ſtory. The great Leland has given us little more than a character of him, and confeſſes himſelf, that nothing was more difficult, than to obtain a reaſonable account of his life and writings (1). Biſhop Bale, in the firſt work he publiſhed concerning our Engliſh writers (2), has treated our author very indifferently; but when he was afterwards better informed, he changed his opinion, and did him that juſtice, which his learning and great abilities deſerved (3). From theſe writers we are informed, that he ſtudied at Oxford in the early part of his life, and diſcovering an extraordinary genius for the ſciences, was encouraged and protected by the moſt learned men of that time. What we propoſe in this note, is to diſcover, in ſome meaſure, who thoſe learned men were, ſince we have ſhewn in the former article, that there have been very great miſtakes made in this matter, chiefly by confounding him with his nameſake, Robert Bacon, who flouriſhed much earlier, and who died, when our Roger Bacon was about thirty-four years of age. We will begin with Dr. Edmund Riche, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who, though he was not, as ſome have aſſerted, the companion of our Roger in his ſtudies (4), ſince he was promoted to the Archiepiſcopal dignity, when our author was but twenty years old; yet, as he reſided much at Oxford, and was a great encourager of learning, he might be, and indeed was, among the great men, who afforded Roger Bacon frequent marks of kindneſs and favour, when he firſt applied himſelf to learning (5). He was probably under the like obligation to Richard Fiſhacre, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learned lectures in the ſciences at Oxford and Paris, in both which places our Bacon ſtudied (6). We learn alſo from the writings of Bacon himſelf, that he was much indebted to William Shirwood, Chancellor of Lincoln, whoſe excellence in all kinds of knowledge, but chiefly in mathematical learning, he very highly celebrated (7). But the moſt remarkable of all his patrons, and him to whom he owed the greateſt gratitude, was Robert Grouthead, Biſhop of Lincoln, a man of prodigious learning, and of moſt unblemiſhed integrity; from whom, in all probability, our author received thoſe lights, that were of greateſt uſe to him in his ſtudies, ſince, as he freely profeſſes in his writings, there was hardly any man in that age, except this Biſhop of Lincoln and his diſciples, who diſtinguiſhed between real and uſeful learning, and that kind of empty and uſeleſs reading, which, through want of good ſenſe, and a true taſte, bore the name and carried the reputation of learning (8), and that, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew hereafter, to ſuch a degree, as to intitle thoſe who turned their thoughts that way, to reputation and dignity; while ſuch as cultivated that ſort of ſcience which was of real benefit to mankind, fell under grievous ſuſpicions, and were treated as perſons prone to novelties, and dangerous, from their having this diſpoſition, both to Church and State. We may reaſonably ſuppoſe, and indeed there is ſufficient authority to ſupport us in affirming, that it was the ſigns not only of pregnant parts, and a happy diſpoſition to literature, that recommended, even in the earlieſt part of his life, our Roger Bacon to the notice and patronage of the great men before mentioned, but likewiſe his docility, and readineſs to purſue, though with the greateſt labour and pains, that method in his ſtudies, which wiſer heads thought might be moſt for his benefit and advantage. It was with this view, that having laid the firſt foundation of learning in the languages and Logic, he went, as the cuſtom of thoſe times was, to Paris, where he improved himſelf, by a regular and natural method in all the ſciences, and returned, to the ſatisfaction of all his patrons, with a fair character and high reputation to Oxford, in the twenty-ſixth year of his age (9), which is the firſt date we meet with in his hiſtory.

[B] For the improvement of uſeful knowledge.] While our author ſtudied at Paris, he had an opportunity of diſcovering the true ſtate of learning at that time, and he has given us a very juſt picture thereof in his writings. There had been in the preceding century, a kind of perſecution commenced againſt Philoſophy, founded chiefly upon ſome paſſages collected from the antient Fathers, by Gratian in his Decretals, which had proceeded ſo far, that the divines of that city condemned Ariſtotle's Philoſophy, and excommunicated ſuch as ſhould ſtudy or peruſe his writings (10), which was principally owing to the bad behaviour of one Amauri of Chartres, who advanced abundance of heretical opinions, and amongſt the reſt, that God ſerved for the form to the matter of all natural beings, and that this matter being uncreated was divine; which notion he pretended to ſupport from the writings of Ariſtotle (11). This prejudice was however in ſome meaſure worn off, by our countryman Michael Scotus publiſhing a Latin tranſlation of ſome of Ariſtotle's works, keeping cloſely to the original; whereas moſt of thoſe tranſlations, which had been before in uſe, were made from the Arabic, affiduous application to his ſtudies, and the ſtupendous progreſs he made in them, raiſed his credit with the better part of mankind, it excited envy in ſome, and afforded plauſible pretences for covering the malicious deſigns of others (l). It is very eaſy to conceive, that the experiments he made in all parts of Natural Philoſophy and the Mathematics, muſt have made a great noiſe in an ignorant age, when ſcarcely two or three men in a whole nation were tolerably acquainted with thoſe ſtudies, and when all the pretenders to knowledge affected to cover their own ignorance, by throwing the moſt ſcandalous aſperſions on thoſe branches of ſcience, which they either wanted genius to underſtand, or which demanded greater application to acquire, than they were willing to beſtow. They gave out therefore, that mathematical ſtudies were in ſome meaſure allied to thoſe magical arts which the Church had condemned, and thereby brought ſuſpicions upon thoſe, whoſe learning ought to have defended them from ſuch imputations, more thán any other men. It was under colour of ſuch kind of ſuſpicion, that Bacon's firſt troubles began, which iſſued in reſtraining him from reading lectures to the young ſtudents in the univerſity, and at length in a cloſe confinement, in which he was almoſt ſtarved, the Prelates and the Monks being afraid leſt his writings ſhould extend beyond the limits of his convent, and be ſeen by any beſides themſelves and the Pope (m). But there is great reaſon to believe, that though his application to the occult ſciences was pretended, yet the true cauſe of his ill uſage was, the freedom with which he had treated the clergy in his writings, in which he ſpared neither their ignorance nor their want of morals (n). Beſides, his great intimacy with Biſhop Grouthead, might add not a little to the power as well as ſpirit of perſecution; for that Prelate had gone ſo far, as to reprove Pope Innocent IV. by letter, and was ſaid to have made no ſcruple

Arabic, and attended with commentaries of the philoſophers of that nation, which contributed not a little to obſcure the ſentiments of Ariſtotle, and to diſcredit his writings. But when this new verſion appeared, Ariſtotle's writings began to recover their credit; and the new orders of Dominicans and Franciſcans, which were inſtituted about the ſame time, favouring the doctrine of that philoſopher, and defending it in their public lectures, Ariſtotle's character was raiſed ſo high, that the title of philoſopher was ſolely appropriated to him (12). By this means, ſeveral others, beſides Michael Scotus, laboured in explaining his works, and ſoon after divers verſions of them, which were ſaid to have been made by Gerard of Cremona, Alured Anglicus, Herman Alemanus, and Willielmus Flemingus, were made public (13). However, Philoſophy was ſtill in a very rude ſtate, and Bacon himſelf tells us, that though there never was ſo great an appearance of knowledge, nor ſo great an application to ſo many ſciences in ſo many countries, as there had been for forty years paſt, yet there never was ſo great ignorance, and ſuch a variety of errors as then. Thoſe who had undertaken to publiſh new tranſlations of Ariſtotle's works, were not ſufficiently converſant in the languages, or in the ſciences of which they treated. Herman confeſſed to Bacon, that he was rather an aſſiſtant in the tranſlations than a tranſlator himſelf, ſince he employed Saracens in Spain, who had the chief hand in his verſions; Michael Scotus borrowed all that he publiſhed in his own name, from one Andrew, a Jew; and Willielmus Flemingus ſays, 'Bacon, as every body knows at Paris, has no ſkill in 'the Greek language, though he pretends to it; and 'therefore he tranſlates every thing falſely, and corrupts 'the learning of the Latins.' And therefore though Bacon eſteemed Ariſtotle's works as the foundation of all knowledge, yet he thought it would have been an advantage to learning, if all the copies of them, which were then in uſe among the Latins, were deſtroyed; and he declares, that if it had been in his power, he would have burnt them all; for the ſtudy of them was mere loſs of time and the occaſion of error, and the multiplying of ignorance beyond what could be expreſſed. He adds farther, that the herd of ſtudents with their teachers, had no valuable knowledge for the object of their purſuits, and therefore they languiſhed in a ſtupid application to bad tranſlations, and loſt both their time and expence (14); in ſhort, that they were amuſed with a mere appearance, or ſhadow of knowledge, and did not value what they really knew, but what they were thought to know by the ignorant multitude. Such was the ſituation of learning, when our enterprizing author began to ſet about that reformation which he thought neceſſary, and which he likewiſe thought it was impoſſible to make, by any other method than that of experiments, which he therefore ſet about with the utmoſt diligence. It was chiefly in theſe experiments, that he laid out ſo large a ſum as is mentioned in the text; about which two queſtions have ariſen, which however, at the bottom, the reader will find to be but one. Taking them however as commonly ſtated, they are theſe: Firſt, whether the two thouſand pounds that were thus ſpent, ought to be accounted French or ſterling money? And ſecondly, where theſe experiments were made? I muſt confeſs, I apprehend they were made at Oxford, and as this is an affair that muſt be ſolely determined by authorities, I ſhall mention thoſe upon which my opinion is grounded. In the firſt place, Bale tells us, that Friar Bacon incurred the vulgar imputation of magic and ſorcery, by the extraordinary things he performed while he reſided at Brazen-Noſe Hall at Oxon (15), which ſeems plainly to prove, that his experiments were made there. We are likewiſe told by ſeveral authors, that Friar Bacon was made ſo uneaſy by his enemies in the univerſity, that he was obliged to quit it, and live in a little retirement by himſelf, in a place which to this day is called Friar Bacon's ſtudy (16), and we are farther told by the induſtrious Mr. Hearne, that he ſometimes retired in the ſummer to Sunning-Well (17), the knowledge of which, and of the place where he reſided when there, are likewiſe preſerved by tradition. I deſire it may be remarked; that how little weight ſoever may be due to this tradition, with reſpect to the places, yet the tradition itſelf is a good argument, to prove that thoſe extraordinary experiments, which expoſed our author when living, to the inveterate malice of his ignorant enemies, and which will preſerve his reputation with the learned world to lateſt poſterity, were made at Oxford: for had it been otherwiſe, it is not eaſy to conceive how there ſhould have been any tradition there about his ſtudy or obſervatory. There is another thing I would remark upon this head, which, for any thing I know, has not been taken notice of before, and it is this: That the earlieſt of his works, and in which, as will be ſhewn hereafter, he gave the largeſt account of experiments, was addreſſed to William of Paris, and conſequently was not written there, but probably at Oxon (18). It may indeed be objected, that in other parts of his works, our author certainly reckons by French pounds; and if from thence it ſhould be thought requiſite to know what the difference at that time was, between French pounds and pounds ſterling; the queſtion may be eaſily anſwered from our author's own writings, who ſpeaking of the coſt of a burning-glaſs, ſays, that the firſt he made, ſtood him in ſixty pounds Paris money, or twenty pounds ſterling, which ſhews that the French livre was once worth ſix ſhillings and eightpence, though it is now dwindled down to leſs than one ſhilling (19).

(15) In his firſt edition printed in 4*to* at Ipſwich, A. D. 1538, fol. 114, his words are theſe, 'Operatione malorum Spirituum 'Oxonii ad Naſum æneum, 'Scholaſticorum 'Domicilium, 'mirabilia magna feciſſe traditus.'

(16) The moſt learned Olaus Borrichius, in his excellent book called Conſpectus Scriptorum Chemicorum, tells us, that he was ſhewn this retirement of Bacon's at Oxford, by Dr. Edmund Dickenſon. Leonard Hutten's Antiquities of Oxford, MS. p. 108.

of declaring to thoſe with whom he was intimate, that in his judgment the Pope was Anti-Chriſt (o). Our author's being the boſom-friend of ſuch a man, muſt naturally bring upon him the hatred of a great part of the clergy; more eſpecially, ſince his zeal led him to follow the practice as well as the opinion of his patron, by writing freely to the Pope about the neceſſity of a Reformation (p) [C]. But notwithſtanding this baſe and barbarous uſage from thoſe, who, of all others, ought to have behaved to him in a different manner, his reputation continued to ſpread itſelf over the whole Chriſtian world, inſomuch that Pope Clement IV., one of the wiſeſt and worthieſt men that for many years had been raiſed to that dignity, wrote him a letter, deſiring that he would ſend him all his works (q). This was in 1266, when our author was in the flower of his age, and who, to gratify his Holineſs, collected together, greatly enlarged and ranged in ſome order, the ſeveral pieces he had written before that time, and ſent them the next year by his favourite diſciple John of London, or rather, of Paris, to the Pope (r). This collection, which is the ſame that himſelf intitled OPUS MAJUS, or his great work, is yet extant [D]. It is ſaid, that this learned book of his procured him the favour of that Pontiff and

[C] Writing freely to the Pope about the neceſſity of a Reformation.] It appears clearly, that the great motive which induced Roger Bacon to embrace a monaſtic life, was that he might have greater leiſure to attend his ſtudies: and that he was deſirous that all his diſcoveries ſhould tend to the advancement of uſeful knowledge, which he thought of the higheſt conſequence to the honour and peace of the Church. He therefore takes great pains in all his writings to prove this, and to ſhew that the perfecting of Natural Philoſophy, was the ſureſt method of extirpating all hereſies, aboliſhing ſuperſtition, and deſtroying the kingdom of Antichriſt; as the perfecting of Moral Philoſophy, was the moſt effectual means of eſtabliſhing true religion in the hearts of men, and manifeſting the correſpondence between the laws of nature and the doctrine of the goſpel (20); in which he plainly followed the example of Robert, Biſhop of Lincoln, his great patron, and who had written many treatiſes in the ſame way. It was after the death of that great prelate, that he began to be diſturbed by the clergy, and eſpecially by the monks of his own order, under pretence of his endeavouring to innovate and eſtabliſh new doctrines, which they inſinuated might tend to diſturb the peace of the Church. This uſage made a great impreſſion upon his ſpirits, but did not in the leaſt alter his ſentiments, as appears by what he ſays in his addreſs to Pope Clement IV., that out of a reverence due to his high dignity, which ought to engage him in ſeeking to procure the benefit of the whole world, he was willing, as far as the impediments he laboured under would permit, and his memory would allow, to deduce a regular ſyſtem of true philoſophy to the utmoſt of his power; adding, at the ſame time, that if it were not for this reverence, which he had for the Vicar of Jeſus Chriſt, and the benefits that by him alone might be procured to the whole Chriſtian world, he would not have undertaken what he did, under the circumſtances in which he then was, however preſſed or ſolicited by the whole Chriſtian Church (21). This ſhews the ſpirit and temper of the man, who had no ſecret or worldly views, but was ſincerely inclined to employ the mighty abilities which God had beſtowed upon him, and all that learning, which, by his own indefatigable pains and induſtry, he had acquired, for the ſervice of mankind; with which view he would have laboured, if his ſociety would have permitted him, in the education of youth, that a new turn might have been given to their ſtudies; and that inſtead of employing themſelves as they had hitherto done, in what was of little or no uſe, they might apply in a regular method to ſuch ſciences, as might prove beneficial both to Church and State. If in this attempt he had ſucceeded, we may eaſily conceive how advantageous it would have been to the whole Chriſtian world, and what a new face it muſt have given to the affairs of learning; ſince, as we ſhall hereafter ſee, our author, by dint of his own penetration, and a right uſe of Experimental Philoſophy, arrived at, and even perfected, many of thoſe diſcoveries, which have done ſo much honour to the moderns, and which by the enquiring into, and publiſhing his writings, it is unqueſtionably manifeſt, might have been long ago known and rendered uſeful to the world, if our author had not been treated as he was, or if there had not been ſuch a tyrannical power exerciſed in the Chriſtian Church, as put it out of the capacity of private men to ſpread their diſcoveries, and to render the progreſs they made in knowledge, as uſeful to mankind as they now do. But it muſt be acknowledged, in juſtice to the memory of this great man, that he does not appear to have had the leaſt tincture of a private ſpirit, but was as communicative as he could; and that all his obſcurities are owing to the malice of his enemies, and not to any inclination he had to conceal his talents, or to raiſe his own reputation, by leaving others in ignorance.

[D] This collection, which himſelf intitled OPUS MAJUS, or his great work, is yet extant.] As this has been eſteemed, and with great juſtice, the moſt perfect of all our author's works, and is indeed, in ſome meaſure, a compleat ſyſtem of ſcience, built upon his principles of free inquiry, and uſeful experiments; ſo it is requiſite, that we ſhould give as large and full an account of the motives which engaged him to compoſe it, as, at this diſtance of time, it is poſſible for us to acquire; the rather, becauſe though much has been ſaid on this ſubject, eſpecially by the learned and excellent Dr. Jebb, whoſe induſtry and care in making it public, can never be too much admired or applauded; yet ſome circumſtances there are, that ſtill require ſome light, which if we can bring, it is certainly our duty and what we ought not to neglect, as well out of regard to the memory of ſo extraordinary a perſon, as from what we owe to the public. It was the opinion of the famous Dr. John Dee, who publiſhed an edition of another work of our author's, that his Opus Majus was addreſſed to Pope Clement III. (22); which was certainly an egregious error, ſince that Pope died above twenty years before Roger Bacon was born. We ſhall hereafter account for the occaſion of this ſtrange miſtake, and at preſent content ourſelves with obſerving, that there is unqueſtionable authority for aſſerting that our author compoſed this work, at the requeſt of Clement IV., before he was raiſed to that dignity; and in order to clear this point, it will be neceſſary to give a ſuccinct account of this excellent perſon. He was deſcended of a noble family in the province of Languedoc, in the kingdom of France, and his name was Gui le Gros Fulcodi. He applied himſelf in his youth to the ſtudy of the Law, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the bar to ſo high a degree, as to be ſtiled the light of that ſcience (23). After the deceaſe of his wife, by whom he had ſeveral children, he entered into the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and roſe gradually to the Archbiſhopric of Narbonne in 1259, in which high ſtation he conducted himſelf with ſuch piety and prudence, that in the month of December 1261, he was promoted by Pope Urban IV., to the dignity of Cardinal Biſhop of Sabina (24), and was afterwards declared his Legate in England, in order to compoſe the diſſentions which reigned there, between Henry III. and his Barons. Theſe roſe however to ſuch a height before he could get to England, that he found himſelf obliged to continue at Boulogne, where he remained a long time; and having called together ſeveral Engliſh Biſhops, that were then beyond the ſeas, by their advice and conſent he excommunicated ſuch as took up arms againſt their prince (25), and having committed the execution of the cenſure to thoſe Biſhops, he ſet out for Rome; but being arrived at Perouſa, he there met with the news of his being elected Pope. He and alſo ſome encouragement in the proſecution of his ſtudies (s): but if this contributed to raiſe his ſpirits, it could be for a ſhort time only, ſince that Pope died not long after, and

He then continued his journey to Rome with the utmoſt diligence, in the habit of a mendicant Friar; and on his arrival, did all that in his power lay, to avoid accepting that high dignity; but finding his endeavours to no purpoſe, he applied himſelf with the utmoſt diligence to the diſcharge of his duty, which he performed with ſuch apoſtolic ſeverity, that never any Pope was more feared or beloved. He was ſuch an enemy to pluralities, that he obliged his nephew who had three Prebends, to relinquiſh two of them, and behaved in every other reſpect in such a manner, as very plainly ſhewed, that he had nothing ſo much in view as the Reformation of the Church (26). It is no wonder, that ſo wiſe, ſo great, and ſo good a man, ſhould have a juſt eſteem for the merits of Friar Bacon, or that he ſhould contemn the weak and fooliſh calumnies that had been ſpread to his prejudice. It was probably during his ſtay at Boulogne, that he ſent letters to our author by Raymund de Lauduno, earneſtly deſiring that he would ſend him his works, which at firſt our Monk declined, becauſe the chief perſons of his order had forbidden him to communicate any of his writings to any perſon whatever, on pain of loſing them, and being compelled to live many days on bread and water (27). But when he afterwards heard, that the Cardinal Legate, was raiſed to the pontifical dignity, and had taken the name of Clement IV., our author, out of reverence to the Holy See, ſignified to him by letter, that he was ready to perform what his Holineſs had deſired. The Pope immediately wrote in anſwer, that he was extremely well pleaſed with the readineſs which he had expreſſed; and commanded him by his apoſtolic authority, and notwithſtanding any injunctions laid upon him, by the chief perſons of his order, or others, to ſend him what he had required by his former meſſenger, aſſuring him that he would take order, with reſpect to thoſe matters of which he had complained. This letter, dated at Viterbo the tenth of the kalends of July, in the ſecond year of his pontificate (28), no ſooner came to the hands of our author, than he prepared to ſatisfy his own promiſe, and the Pope's requeſt. When he had finiſhed his great work, which, as we ſhall preſently ſhew the reader, contains a complete circle of learning for the time in which it was written, he reſolved to ſend it to the Pope by a diſciple of his own, whom he had inſtructed while he was writing it, in all the ſciences of which it treats. There has been a prevailing miſtake with regard to the name of this youth, which almoſt all our writers will have to be John of London (29), and they quote our author Bacon himſelf to prove it; yet it is very certain that he ſays no ſuch thing, as his learned editor Dr. Jebb has well obſerved, but, on the contrary, has diſtinguiſhed him from John of London, who the ſame gentleman very ingeniouſly, and I think very truly, gueſſes to have been John Peccam, a monk of the Franciſcan order, then at London, and who was afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury (30). Whereas, this John ſent by our author with his book, was, as himſelf tells us therein, a poor boy, but of quick and lively parts, whom Bacon undertook to inſtruct with a view, as well to the boy's advantage, as to make an experiment of the poſſibility of infuſing, by the new and natural method which he had invented, the principles of all the ſciences in a very ſhort ſpace of time, which ſucceeded very happily: yet ſuch was the modeſty of our author, that, inſtead of taking occaſion from hence to boaſt, either of his own or his ſcholar's abilities, he draws from it this judicious concluſion, viz. that there was no room to conceive any high notions of the perfection of human wiſdom, when it was poſſible in a year's time, to teach a young man, all, that with the utmoſt induſtry and application, a zealous enquirer after knowledge, was able either to acquire or to diſcover in the ſpace of twenty or even of forty years (31). It is alſo a conjecture of the editor's, that this young man whom others have ſtiled John of London, ought rather to be ſuppoſed to be John of Paris, becauſe to one of that name there are ſeveral epiſtles addreſſed by our author, which is ſo juſt and reaſonable an account, that I think a better can hardly be given of this extraordinary young ſcholar (32). It is very ſurprizing, that this large and excellent work, ſhould have remained ſo long buried in obſcurity; but it is very happy for the learned world, that at length it has been delivered from duſt and oblivion, and ſent abroad with all the advantages imaginable, as it is at preſent in a beautiful folio, neatly and accurately printed for William Bowyer at London, A. D. 1733, under the title of Fratris ROGERI BACON ordinis Minorum Opus Majus ad Clementem quartum Pontificem Romanum. Ex MS. codice Dublinenſi, cum aliis quibuſdam collato, nunc primum edidit. S. JEBB, M. D. The editor has prefixed a long epiſtle addreſſed to Dr. Richard Mead, wherein he gives an account of his author and edition, and obſerves, that very few of his writings had been before publiſhed, though Leland, Balæus, and Pitſeus, have given us a long catalogue of them. However he tells us, that Sir Kenelm Digby, and Dr. George Langbain, Provoſt of Queen's College at Oxford, had formerly undertaken to publiſh Bacon's works, by the advice of Mr. Selden, as appears from their letters to that great man, ſome extracts of which Dr. Jebb has printed. Sir Kenelm Digby has this paſſage in his letter dated from Paris, the 11th of February 1637: Your collections concerning Bacon, I ſhall print before his works under your name. Dr. Langbain in a letter dated January 30th, 1653, ſays, When I have heretofore made report to ſome judicious friends, of ſeveral paſſages in Friar Bacon's epiſtle to Pope Clement, which I perceive is the ſame with what you call, de utilitate ſcientiarum, they were very much taken, and ſuitors to me for a publication. In a letter dated February the 9th, 1653, he ſays, I am very much encouraged by your laſt, to reſume thoſe thoughts which I had laid aſide, of publiſhing that piece of Dr. Bacon: And in another, dated February the 20th, 1653, he ſays, That latter copy is of ſo legible a hand, as unleſs I receive a countermand from you, I ſhall not long forbear to get it tranſcribed, with a purpoſe to print all together, for I judge it well deſerves to be more public. Dr. Jebb had propoſed to have publiſhed all his works about three years before his edition of the Opus Majus; but while he was engaged in that deſign, he was informed by letters from his brother at Dublin, that there was a manuſcript in the college library there, which contained a great many treatiſes generally aſcribed to Bacon, and diſpoſed in ſuch order, that they ſeemed to form one compleat work; but the title was wanting, which had been careleſsly torn off from the reſt of the manuſcript. The Doctor ſoon found that it was a collection of thoſe tracts, which Bacon had written for the uſe of Pope Clement IV., and to which he had given the title of Opus Majus, ſince it appeared, that what he ſaid of that work in his Opus Tertium, addreſſed to the ſame Pope, exactly ſuited with this; which contained an account of almoſt all the new diſcoveries and improvements that he had made in the ſciences. Upon this account Dr. Jebb laid aſide his former deſign, and reſolved to publiſh only an edition of this Opus Majus. The manuſcripts which he made uſe of to compleat this edition, are as follows, 1. MS. in the Cotton library, inſcribed Jul. D. V. which contains the firſt part of the Opus Majus, under the title of a treatiſe de Utilitate Scientiarum. 2. Another MS. in the ſame library marked Tib. C. V. containing the fourth part of the Opus Majus, in which is ſhewn the uſe of the Mathematicks in the ſciences and affairs of the world: in the MS. it is erroneouſly called the fifth part. 3. A MS. in the library belonging to Corpus Chriſti in Cambridge, containing that portion of the fourth part which treats of Geography. 4. A manuſcript of the fifth part containing a treatiſe upon Perſpective, in the Earl of Oxford's library. 5. A MS. in the library of Magdalen College Cambridge, comprehending the ſame Treatiſe of Perſpective. 6. Two MSS. in the King's library, communicated to the editor by Dr. Richard Bentley, one of which contains the fourth part of Opus Majus, and the other the fifth part. The reader will probably be pleaſed, with the general account of a work, which till lately was imagined to have been loſt, and which is eſteemed the moſt conſiderable and then we find our author under new difficulties, from the ſame cauſes as before; but the ſtorm now roſe higher, and the General of his order, Jerom de Eſculo, having heard his ſiderable of all his writings. He opens it with obſerving, that there are four great impediments which hinder men from arriving at true and uſeful knowledge, which he lays down thus, I. Too great dependance upon authority. II. Allowing too great weight to cuſtom. III. The fear of offending the vulgar. IV. The affectation of concealing ignorance, by the diſplay of a ſpecious appearance of knowledge. In order to remove theſe, he very fully and clearly ſtates the nature and force of authority, experience, and reaſon, and ſhews how injurious to mankind miſtakes upon theſe ſubjects may be, by miſleading them into abſurd and dangerous opinions, and hindering them from diſcerning truth. After handling theſe nice ſubjects in his ſix firſt chapters, he proceeds in his ſeventh to draw this concluſion, That we are not bound to adhere to every thing we hear or read, but that we ought ſtrictly to examine the ſentiments of thoſe who have gone before us, to add where their notions appear defective, and to correct them, where we may conclude, with reaſon, that they have erred, but with modeſty and decency. He ſupports this by various authorities from prophane authors, and from the Fathers of the primitive Church. In his ninth chapter, he expoſes the folly of affecting ſingularity; in the tenth, the danger of learned pride; and in the eleventh, the folly of being aſhamed of ignorance, and ſtriving rather to conceal than to remove it. In his twelfth, he complains that a great many parts of learning, and thoſe too of the utmoſt importance, were neglected merely from the ignorance of mankind, and that the knowledge of languages and Mathematics, though highly valued by the ancients, were deſpiſed by the moderns, who endeavoured to vindicate themſelves in that point, by the authority of ſome weak though good men. He ſhews that many of the Saints and Fathers were ſubject to the common infirmities of human nature, and, conſequently, that their example ought not abſolutely to determine our conduct; and in the following chapter he obſerves, that there were ſome peculiar reaſons, which prevented them from applying themſelves to Philoſophy, and particularly, becauſe Ariſtotle's books were not then tranſlated into Latin, and they were extremely attached to Plato's writings, whoſe doctrines they found to be inconſiſtent with thoſe of Ariſtotle. In his fourteenth chapter, he proceeds to mention other reaſons, for the neglect of philoſophy in the early ages of the Church, which neglect likewiſe continued among the later divines. In the laſt chapter, he addreſſes himſelf to Pope Clement, and tells him, that if it was not poſſible for him during his pontificate, to perfect the reformation of theſe vulgar errors, yet he might lay a foundation, ſo that his ſucceſſors might, with greater facility, compleat what ſhould be thus happily begun. In the firſt chapter of the ſecond part, he maintains that there is one perfect kind of wiſdom, which is contained in the holy ſcripture, from which ſource all real truth is derived. In the following chapters he demonſtrates, that true Philoſophy is not inconſiſtent with Divinity, but rather contributes to the true knowledge of the Deity and religion, which he confirms from the authority of the antient Chriſtians themſelves; and he tells us in the beginning of the ſeventh chapter, that the whole deſign of Philoſophy conſiſts in this, that we may know the Creator by means of the creature, and perceive the obligations which we are under from the excellence of his nature, and the good which he has exerted in the creation and preſervation of mankind, with the aſſurances of a future felicity, to ſerve him with a proper reverence of mind, and regulation of our behaviour, according to the laws of juſtice and reaſon. In his third part, he ſhews largely the uſefulneſs of grammar, and obſerves, that it is impoſſible for the Latins to obtain the knowledge of thoſe things which are neceſſary both in divine and human learning, without a proper ſkill in other languages, ſince the Old and New Teſtaments are tranſlated from the Hebrew and Greek, and Philoſophy is likewiſe borrowed from thoſe languages and the Arabic. And ſince it is impoſſible to preſerve the propriety and force of one language in another; the conſequence of this therefore is, that none of the Latins can obtain ſuch a knowledge as is neceſſary in the Holy Scriptures and Philoſophy, without underſtanding the original tongues from whence they are tranſlated. The ſecond conſideration which he urges in proof of this is, that the tranſlators had not words enough in Latin to expreſs the terms of the ſciences. In the third place he tells us, that it is neceſſary the tranſlator ſhould underſtand the ſcience which he treats of, and the languages which he tranſlates from and into, whereas almoſt all of them have been extremely defective in every one of theſe points. The fourth reaſon is, that many things both in Philoſophy and Divinity were ſtill wanting to the Latins, of which he mentions many inſtances. The fifth, that as the ſciences are delivered to the Latins from other languages, all among the Latins who treat of the ſciences have made great uſe of thoſe languages, and have employed a variety of Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic words. The ſixth reaſon is, the neceſſity of correcting an infinite number of errors, both in the text of Divinity, as he ſtiles it, and that of Philoſophy, which errors are not only in the letter, but likewiſe in the ſenſe; and becauſe errors are of more conſequence in Divinity than Philoſophy, he proceeds to point out the corruptions of the text of the Holy Scripture, the better to ſhew the neceſſity of the knowledge of the original tongues, in order to correct them. His ſeventh is, that it is neceſſary for the Latins to underſtand the languages, even ſuppoſing the text were pure and uncorrupt, in order to obtain the true ſenſe of the words amidſt the variety of interpretations. His laſt reaſon for this neceſſity of the tongues is, that the grammar of the Latin is derived from the Greek and Hebrew. Our author's fourth part is deſigned to ſhew the uſe of Mathematics in the ſciences, as alſo in the affairs and employments of this world. In the firſt chapter he tells us, that there are four capital ſciences without which the reſt cannot be underſtood, but by the knowledge of which, any perſon may make a progreſs without any difficulty both in divine and human learning; that the key of theſe ſciences is the Mathematics, which holy men diſcovered from the beginning of the world, which was always in uſe among wiſe men above other ſciences; but that the neglect of this for thirty or forty years paſt, had deſtroyed all true learning among the Latins, ſince a perſon who is not converſant in that ſcience can never underſtand the reſt, nor the affairs of this world, as he ſhews in the courſe of his work; and what is ſtill worſe, thoſe who are ignorant of it do not perceive their ignorance, and therefore ſeek no remedy: Whereas on the other hand, the knowledge of the Mathematics prepares the mind for compleat ſkill in all things; ſo that if men make themſelves maſters of this, as the foundation of their ſtudies, and apply it to the other ſciences in a proper manner, they may then be able to attain what follows with the utmoſt facility, and without any error or doubt: But without the aſſiſtance of the Mathematics, neither the preceding nor conſequent parts of learning can be obtained, ſince the ſtudy of it is the only means of opening the way to farther improvement in knowledge. In the ſecond chapter he ſhews from authority, that every one of the ſciences requires the knowledge of the Mathematics: And in the third, he demonſtrates the ſame from reaſon. In the ſecond diſtinction of the fourth part, he ſhews the neceſſity of that ſcience, in order to underſtand the things of this world. In the third and fourth diſtinctions he lays down mathematical principles, for the explication of ſeveral of the phænomena of the univerſe, and examines into the nature of the ſeveral climates of the world, eſpecially of thoſe near the poles and the middle of the earth. In the fifth chapter of the fourth diſtinction, he treats of the cauſe of the ebbing and flowing of the ſea: And in the ſeventh chapter, of the infinity of matter. In the eighth chapter, he enquires whether bodies touch each other in a point: And in the ninth he treats of the figure of the univerſe, which he determines to be ſpherical, and aſſerts, that the earth is likewiſe of the ſame form. In the twelfth chapter he endeavours to ſhew, that his cauſe, ordered him to be impriſoned (t). This is ſaid to have happened in 1278, and we are further told, that to prevent his appealing to Pope Nicholas III., that General of that there are no more worlds, nor ſuns, nor moons than one, and that matter is not extended in infinitum. In the thirteenth, he treats of the unity of time: And in the fourteenth he ſhews, that motion occaſions heat. In the fifteenth, he ſpeaks of the motion of a balance. After having ſhewn the neceſſity of Mathematics in human affairs and ſciences, he proceeds then to ſhew it likewiſe in thoſe which are divine; and he obſerves, that ſince he had proved that Philoſophy cannot be underſtood without Mathematics, and ſince every one perceived that Divinity cannot be underſtood without Philoſophy; it follows therefore, that a Divine is obliged to acquire the knowledge of the Mathematics. He next ſhews, that all holy men have made uſe of the Mathematics, and alledges ſeven reaſons, to prove the ſtudy fit and neceſſary to a Divine, more eſpecially from the uſe of Aſtronomy and Chronology in the explication of the Scriptures, and in doing this, he enters into ſeveral curious enquiries, as to thoſe ſciences and Muſick: he then anſwers the objections urged againſt Mathematics, and particularly that which is drawn from the unlawfulneſs of judiciary Aſtrology; upon which occaſion he obſerves, that true Aſtrologers do not pretend to an abſolute certainty in their judgments, nor aſſert that human actions are neceſſarily determined by the influence of the ſtars, but always proceed upon the ſuppoſition of human liberty. He expoſes next the errors in the kalendar, points out the cauſes of them, and propoſes moſt judiciouſly the means of reforming them, of which we ſhall hereafter ſpeak more largely. The next ſubject he handles is, the uſe of Mathematics in the practice of Phyſic, which he ſhews muſt vary according to the difference of climates, which gives him an opportunity of diſcourſing very largely upon that head. He makes a natural tranſition from thence to the influence of the heavenly bodies, in diſcourſing of which he informs us, that the number of fixed ſtars in his time, was held to be one thouſand and twenty two, and much time he ſpends in ſhewing the poſſibility of the celeſtial influences on terreſtrial bodies, in which he ſhows a prodigious reading. We come now to the fifth part of his Opus Majus, which contains his Treatiſe of Perſpective, which is one of the moſt curious pieces in his whole book; for in the third part of it, he very copiouſly diſcourſes of reflected and refracted viſion, and from thence explains the nature of a vaſt variety of glaſſes: To this part of his work is added his famous treatiſe de Multiplicatione Specierum. The ſixth part of his Opus Majus is concerning experimental knowledge, in the firſt chapter of which he ſays, that having thus laid the foundation of learning in Languages, Mathematics, and Perſpective, he ſhall proceed to the ſcience of experiments, ſince nothing can be ſufficiently underſtood without experiments; for he obſerves that there are two methods of obtaining knowledge, one by argument or reaſon, and the other by trial or experiment; an argument determines a queſtion and obliges us to determine it, but it does not give us abſolute certainty or remove all doubt, ſo that the mind cannot acquieſce in the perception of truth, unleſs it diſcover it by way of experiment: many perſons know arguments enough in the ſeveral parts of knowledge, but not having made experiments, they are negligent, and do not avoid and purſue what they ought to do. He obſerves, that this ſcience of experiments has three great prerogatives beyond all other ſciences; the firſt of which is, that it examines the noble concluſions of thoſe ſciences by experience: and this he illuſtrates by a long explication of the phænomenon of the rainbow: the ſecond prerogative of it is, that it diſcovers ſeveral truths within the limits of the other ſciences, which could not be found out by means of thoſe ſciences themſelves. He mentions ſome inſtances, which he tells us he knew by experience to be true. The firſt inſtance is as follows; Mathematics, ſays he, can eaſily produce a ſpherical inſtrument, in which are deſcribed all the parts of the heavens which are neceſſary, according to the longitudes and latitudes, with the proper circles agreeable to Ptolemy's method in his Almageſt: But it is not in the power of the Mathematics to cauſe a body of that form to move naturally with a diurnal motion; whereas a man perfectly ſkilled in Experimental Philoſophy, is able to deviſe various methods towards accompliſhing that motion, being induced to it by many things which follow the motion of the heavenly bodies; as in the firſt place, the three elements, which are moved circularly by the celeſtial influences; then the comets, ſeas, rivers, marrow, the brains of animals, and the matter of diſeaſes: plants likewiſe open and ſhut themſelves according to the ſun's motion. The Philoſopher, therefore, is excited by the conſideration of theſe things, which have ſome reſemblance to what he intends, ſo that he may poſſibly be able at laſt to compleat his deſign. Such an inſtrument as this, he ſays, would be worthy a King's treaſure, and the inſtruments of Aſtronomy and clocks would become uſeleſs. He draws his ſecond inſtance from the uſe of experiments in Phyſic, in reſpect to which he ſays, that a medicine might be found capable of extending human life much beyond its ordinary length. On this ſubject he diſcourſes very copiouſly, ſhewing his great learning and exquiſite judgment, interſperſing therein a multitude of very curious relations, all tending to prove the poſſibility of prolonging life, and retarding the inconveniencies of old age by the help of philoſophic medicines. His third example he draws from Alchemy, which he defines an art, by which the baſer metals may be converted into the purer, ſo that gold may be made from lead, and ſilver from copper. This art he allows is liable to many fraudulent practices, notwithſtanding which he avers, that ſuch an art there is, as is not only capable of converting baſe metals into gold, but alſo of exalting gold itſelf far beyond that degree of purity which it receives from nature, which ſecret, he ſays, is not only of the greateſt uſe to mankind, in furniſhing as much as may be deſired of that precious metal, but alſo of infinitely greater conſequence in prolonging life. For, continues he, that medicine which taketh away all the foulneſſes and corruptions of a baſer metal, ſo as to convert it into the pureſt ſilver and gold, is by wiſe men eſteemed likewiſe capable of wholly purging out the corruptions of the human body; and this, ſays he, is that extraordinary medicine before mentioned (33). Nam illa medicina quæ tolleret omnes immunditias et corruptiones vilioris metalli, ut fieret argentum et aurum puriſſimum, æſtimatur a ſapientibus poſſe tollere corruptiones corporis humani in tantum, ut vita per multa ſecula prolongaret, et hoc eſt corpus ex elementis temperatum, de quo prius dictum eſt. The third prerogative of this ſcience of experiments is, as he tells us, proper and eſſential thereto, which, without having regard to other ſciences, by its own power inveſtigates the ſecrets of nature, and this acts doubly, firſt, in beſtowing the knowledge of things, paſt, preſent, and to come; and ſecondly, in admirable operations, far exceeding any thing that can be wrought by what is ſtiled Judiciary Aſtrology. In proof of this he alledges, not only many authorities but many inſtances: he ſpeaks of a kind of bitumen called Malta, capable of burning men even through armour; and hints to us that it was by the uſe of ſomething like gunpowder with which their pots were filled, that Gideon with a handful of men did ſuch dreadful execution in the camp of the Midianites (34). Many other things of a like nature he touches upon; inſinuating to the Pope, that where verſes, ſuperſtitious rites, and charms, are made uſe of, it is not from any belief in the force of thoſe circumſtances, in ſuch as uſe them, but barely to cover and conceal the wonderful effects of natural cauſes from the knowledge of the vulgar. He labours therefore aſſiduouſly, in the cloſe of his work, to perſuade the Pontiff, to whom it is addreſſed, to countenance and encourage this kind of experimental knowledge, by reaſon of the many and great advantages, which may be deduced from thence, for the protection of the Church and Common-wealth, and for the reduction of the enemies of both. In reference to the laſt he maintains, that much greater and more extraordinary things, have been performed by the power of wiſdom than by force of arms, of which he aſſures us, an infinite number of examples of his order, procured a confirmation of his ſentence from Rome immediately (u); but it is not very eaſy to ſay, upon what pretences this condemnation was founded [E]. Yet we are told by others, that he was impriſoned by Reymundus Galfredus, who was General of his order, on account of ſome Alchemiſtical treatiſe which he had written; but this man afterwards ſet him at liberty, and became his ſcholar (x). might be deduced. 'But I, continues he, will mention but one of all theſe, which is that of Alexander the Great, who when he marched out of Greece to ſubdue the whole world, had no more than thirty-two thouſand foot, and four thouſand five hundred horſe; yet, as Oroſius ſays, in his treatiſe addreſſed to Auguſtin, with this handful of people he attempted this great deſign, in which it is hard to ſay, whether it be more wonderful that he ſucceeded, or that he durſt undertake it. In his firſt engagement with King Darius, he ſlew ſix hundred thouſand Perſians, with the loſs of one hundred and twenty horſe; and nine foot only of his own army. In the ſecond battle, he deſtroyed forty thouſand men, yet loſt of his own army but one hundred and thirty foot, and one hundred and fifty horſe, by which the reſt of the affrighted world was eaſily ſubdued. But Oroſius ſays, that it was not leſs by ſkill than valour that the Macedonians conquered. Nor do I wonder at this, ſince Ariſtotle, as we read in his life, attended the King in his wars. And Seneca alſo in his Natural Queſtions informs us, that Alexander conquered, having Ariſtotle and Caliſthenes for his inſtructors, who were his maſters in all kind of ſcience. But Ariſtotle was in all reſpects the chief; and it plainly appears from what has been before ſaid, how by the effects of wiſdom Ariſtotle might deliver up the world to his maſter Alexander; and this the Church ought to conſider in her diſputes againſt Infidels and rebels, that the effuſion of Chriſtian blood may be prevented, and more eſpecially upon account of the great dangers to which the Church will be expoſed in the times of Antichriſt, which, with the bleſſing of God, may be eaſily prevented, if Prelates and Princes would promote ſtudy, and the ſearching out the ſecrets of nature and art (35).'

Primo ergo cum Dario rege congreſſu ſexcenta millia Perſarum proſtravit, ſed in ſuo exercitu centum viginti equites & novem pedites defuere; in ſecunda vero congreſſu devicit, quadraginta millia hominum, & de ſuo exercitu centum triginta pedites et centum quinquaginta equites ceciderunt; per hoc reſiduum mundi territum facilius ſubjecit. Sed Oroſius dicit, non minus arte quam virtute Macedonum ſuperavit. Nec mirum, cum Ariſtoteles fuerit cum eo in his bellis, ut legimus in vita Ariſtotelis. Et etiam Seneca in naturalibus dicit, quod mundum vicit Alexander Ariſtotele & Caliſthene ducibus, quod magiſtri ei fuerunt in omni ſapientia. Sed Ariſtoteles extitit principalis & facile patet per prædicta, quomodo per vias ſapientiæ potuit Ariſtoteles mundum tradere Alexandro; & hoc deberet eccleſia conſiderare contra infideles & rebelles ut parcatur ſanguini Chriſtiano; & maxime propter futura pericula in temporibus Antichriſti, quibus cum Dei gratia facile eſſet obviare, ſi Prelati & Principes ſtudium promoverent, & ſecreta naturæ & artis indagarent.* Such is the concluſion of this famous piece, of which we have given the Engliſh reader, as exact and full an account as was conſiſtent with the nature of our plan. We were the rather inclined to this, becauſe as this great work was originally written, ſo it is like to continue, in the Latin tongue, which makes ſuch an extract as we have given, abſolutely neceſſary for the uſe of ſuch as cannot with facility go through a folio volume in that language. This extract likewiſe fully juſtifies and confirms all that has been delivered in the text, either as to the wonderful abilities, aſſiduous application, or prodigious progreſs made by Friar Bacon in all the ſciences. Whoever conſiders either the matter of his Opus Majus or the manner of it, and reflects at the ſame time on the ſtate of learning in general in the thirteenth century, will need few arguments to convince him, that Roger Bacon was the wonder of his age and country, and in every reſpect as great and good a man, as he is repreſented to have been by ſuch as beſt underſtood his worth. The learned editor of his work, the ingenious and judicious Dr. Jebb, obſerves very truly, that it does not appear from any thing contained in the Opus Majus, that our author Bacon, either meant to defend himſelf from the imputation of magic, or that he was ſo much as apprized that ever he was accuſed thereof to the Pope. But though this appears very clearly, yet I muſt take leave to obſerve, that both in this and in all the other works of our author which are ſtill remaining, there are abundance of paſſages which ſhew his great willingneſs to ſet the world right about Magic, Necromancy, and other unlawful arts, of which to be ſure he thought very juſtly, and as it became a wiſe man to do: for it is manifeſt that he conceived them in many caſes to be mere vanities, and the idle deluſions of weak minds; that in many other, he looked upon them as fraudulent practices, invented and uſed by knaves for the better deceiving of fools; and that in ſome few, he beheld them in the light of ſpecious but innocent pretences for covering that ſcience, which it was not fit to reveal to the vulgar, and thereby keep up their ignorance with their admiration. But as for our author himſelf, it is very evident that he was not in the leaſt infected with any of theſe narrow notions, but would moſt willingly have communicated all that he knew to the whole republic of Letters; and if ever he ſeems either to think or to act in a manner different from this, there is the juſteſt reaſon to conclude that he was forced thereto by the circumſtances he was under, of which we ſhall have occaſion to mention ſome inſtances, before we part with his memoirs. This Opus Majus of Bacon, was not only addreſſed or dedicated to Pope Clement IV., but is, in fact, a diſcourſe or epiſtle written entirely to him, and in which all that is delivered is particularly adapted to his uſe, yet without any mixture either of meanneſs or flattery: for our author tells him plainly, that as from the nature of his high office, the welfare or the ſuffering of the Chriſtian world muſt, in a great meaſure depend on him, ſo it was from a juſt ſenſe of this, and from a thorough perſuaſion that he would never be able to inſtruct others well, if he had not firſt right notions of true and uſeful knowledge himſelf, that he therefore thought himſelf bound in duty, eſpecially when required thereto by his Holineſs's letter, to exhibit this ſummary of ſcience to his view, that he might the better perceive the conſequence of giving a right turn to the ſtudies of the riſing generation, and prefer true taſte and ſolid learning to that falſe ſhew of both, which had ſo long and generally prevailed, to the unſpeakable detriment both of Church and State.

[E] It is not eaſy to ſay on what pretences this condemnation was founded.] We need wonder the leſs at the great uncertainty which attends this matter of fact, if we conſider how extremely difficult a thing it is, to obtain clear and perfect lights into matters of this nature, which happen in our own country, and as it were under our eyes. But the difficulty of the thing will not acquit us from the obligation we are under of giving the beſt account of this tranſaction, that at this diſtance of time can be attained. After the death of his patron Clement IV., Gregory X. aſcended the pontifical throne, and on his death Innocent V. and John XXI. ſucceeded in one year, and to John ſucceeded Nicholas III (36), in the ſecond year of whoſe reign our author's doctrine was condemned. The General of his order was at that time, Hieronymus de Eſculo, an Italian by birth, and certain enough, that they endured for many years, and must have brought him very low, since he was sixty-four years of age when he was first put in prison, and consequently the less able to sustain the hardships he endured, which were without question so much the more grievous, as they deprived him of the opportunity of prosecuting his studies, at least in the way of experiments; for that he was still indulged the use of his books, appears very clearly from the great use he made of them, in the learned works he composed, even under these misfortunes (y).

(y) See this point explained in note [F].

Pope Nicholas III., dying in the year 1280, Simon de Brie, Cardinal of St. Cecilia, was elected Pope, and took the title of Martin IV., who with great trouble and perplexity held that dignity about four years, and was then succeeded by Cardinal Savelli, who took the name of Honorius IV., in the year 1285. His reign also was full of troubles and very short; so that we do not wonder, that in all this time our author could never find an opportunity of applying to the Holy See, for the mitigation or repeal of the sentence pronounced against him (z). But when he had been ten years in prison, Jerom de Ascoli, who had condemned his doctrine, was chosen Pope, and assumed the name of Nicholas IV. (a) As he was the first of the Franciscan order that had ever arrived at this dignity, was reputed a person of great probity and much learning, our author, notwithstanding what had before happened, resolved to apply to him for his discharge; and in order to pacify his resentment, and at the same time to shew both the innocence and the usefulness of his studies, he addressed to him a very learned and curious treatise, On the Means of avoiding the Infirmities of Old Age (b) [F]. It does not appear and called in his own country, Jerom de Ascoli, a man of a severe temper, but one who was neither deficient in probity or learning. He is said to have condemned the doctrine of Friar Bacon at Paris, by the advice of the brethren of his order, to have forbidden any of the brethren to study or follow it, and to have ordered its author to be confined in prison, and all this because, as Bale tell us, his books contained some suspected novelties (37). Spondanus sets down the matter in much the same terms (38): 'This year, 'says he, the doctrine of Roger Bacon, an English-'man, was condemned on account of some suspected 'novelties; for he who was in all sorts of learning 'and in every kind of study and science perfectly 'well versed, and subtile to a miraculous degree, 'while employed in the most curious discoveries in 'Mathematics and Philosophy, to which he was 'every way equal, was by the vulgar looked upon 'as a Conjurer and Magician.' Hoc anno inquit, damnata est doctrina Rogerii Baconis Angli, propter aliquas novitates suspectas, quippe qui in omni doctrinæ facultatis, et scientia genere versatissimus, et ad miraculum subtilis dum Mathematicam et Philosophiam naturalem curiosius, quam par erat inquireret, vulgò, habitus est Præstigiator et Magus. But another author who treats more particularly, of the transactions of the Franciscans here in England informs us, what the several treatises were, which upon this occasion the General of his order condemned, and he reports them to be his several tracts de Necromanticis, de Prognosticis ex stellis, and de Astronomia Vera (39). As to the other story mentioned in the text, it is reported by Anthony Wood, who tells us, he found it at the end of a manuscript formerly belonging to the Earl of Dorset, in these words (40). 'Here ends the brief discourse '(verbum abbreviatum) the work of Reymundus Gal-'fredus, General of the order of Friars Minors, 'which said discourse he had from Brother Roger 'Bacon, who was of the order of Friars Preachers, 'which is a mistake, for he was also of the order of 'Franciscans, and the said Roger for this very work, at 'the command of the said Reymundus, by the Bre-'thren of the same order was taken and imprisoned; 'but Reymundus released Roger out of prison, who 'taught him this work, and the said Roger was him-'self the disciple of Brother Albert.' Wood likewise tells us, that he met with an entry of the same kind in another Alchemistical treatise, stiled Breve Breviarum fratris Rogeri Bacon ex dono Dei, which has been likewise attributed to this Reymundus Galfredus, though it is printed among other Chemical pieces of our author Bacon's in Germany (41). To speak my own opinion freely, I consider this story as an invention of the modern Alchemists, though I can say nothing as to the treatise itself, having never had an opportunity to examine it. This imprisonment of our author, consisted in his being shut up in his apartment in his monastery, in his being deprived of conversation and obliged to very severe abstinence; all which agreed very little with his free and chearful disposition; so that one may truly wonder how, under such oppressions as these, he was able not only to support life, but to maintain such a constancy of mind as enabled him to revise and augment his former performances, to enlarge his Astronomical tables, and to take all the care he could, his labours should be transmitted with some degree of perfection to posterity (42). But the hopes of having justice done him after death, enabled him to bear the miseries of life; and his confidence of future fame, lessened the sense of present calumnies.

[F] On the means of avoiding the infirmities of old age.] Upon the decease of Pope Honorius IV., the Cardinals then at Rome assembled at his palace, which was near St. Sabina, in order to elect a successor. As this happened in the very heat of summer, which is never a very healthy season at Rome, a kind of malignant fever broke out amongst them, which in a very short space carried off six or seven, and so frighted the rest, that they quitted the place of election, and retired each to his own palace. This Jerom de Ascoli, then Cardinal Bishop of Palestrina, was the only person that remained in the palace, where he secured his health by a very ingenious and philosophical contrivance; for perceiving that the distemper was bred by the foulness and stagnation of the air, he very wisely directed fires to be made in all the rooms of the palace, notwithstanding the heat of the weather, by which he caused a new and brisk circulation of that fluid, and so preserved himself in perfect health, when his associates despaired of it (43). When the Cardinals returned in the winter to the Conclave, they unanimously chose the Cardinal of Palestrina, Pope, who, in gratitude to his benefactor Nicholas III., took the name of Nicholas IV. I have mentioned this circumstance attending his election, to shew that he was a person of great abilities, and one who had turned his thoughts to philosophic studies (44). It was, in all probability, the knowledge of this, that induced Roger Bacon to aim at acquiring his favour by writing this treatise. If it be true that our author was more closely confined by the directions of this Pontiff, I should imagine it must have been in the the very beginning of his reign, and that Bacon addressed this book to the Pope, to shew him how falsely he had been represented, and how innocent and useful his studies were. He divided his work into three books, which, as we shall shew hereafter, was the reason, that such as made a catalogue of our author's writings, have represented these as three distinct treatises (45). In the second chapter of his work he discovers the person (though very obscurely) to whom it was addressed, for having laid down these principles, that the infirmities of old age are to be avoided and kept off, first, by a regular course of life, and next, by the use of certain secret and extraordinary medicines; he proceeds thus, 'The doctrine of soberly 'ordering one's life, teaching how to oppose, drive 'away, and restrain, the causes of old age; and this 'it does by appropriating the six causes distinct in 'kind, which are reckoned necessary to fence, pre-'serve, appear, however, that either his application, or the method he took to ſoften his Holineſs's temper, had any great effect: on the contrary, ſome writers ſay, that he cauſed him to be more cloſely confined (c). But however that matter might be, towards the latter end of his reign, Friar Bacon, by the interpoſition of ſome noblemen, obtained his releaſe, and returned to Oxford, where, at the requeſt of his friends, and very probably of thoſe who were moſt inſtrumental in obtaining his liberty, he compoſed, old as he was, and after all the hard uſage he had met with, A Compendium of Theology, which ſeems to have been his laſt work (d) [G]. He ſpent the remainder of his days in peace, and dying in the college of his order, on the eleventh of June 1292 (e), as ſome

'ſerve, and keep the body, which things when they 'are obſerved, and taken in quantity and quality as 'they ought, and as the rules of Phyſicians perſuade, 'do become the true cauſes of health and ſtrength; 'but when they are made uſe of by any man without 'regard to quality and quantity, they cauſe ſickneſs, 'as may be gathered from Galen's regimen with 'Haly's expoſition, where he treats of the regimen of 'health. But exactly to find out the true proportion 'of theſe cauſes, and the true degree of that pro'portion, is very hardly, or not at all to be done, 'but that there will be ſome defect or exceſs therein. 'Thus the ſages have preſcribed more to be done, 'than can be well put in practice; for the under'ſtanding is more ſubtle in operation, ſo that the 'true proportioning of theſe cauſes ſeems impoſſible, 'unleſs in bodies of a better nature, ſuch as now are 'rarely found: but medicines obſcurely laid down by 'the Ancients, and as it were concealed, whereof 'Dioſcorides ſpeaks, do make up theſe defects and 'proportions; for who can avoid the air infected 'with putrid vapours, carried about with the force 'of the winds? Who will meaſure out meat and 'drink? Who can weigh, in a ſure ſcale or degree, 'ſleep and watching, motion and reſt, and things 'that vaniſh in a moment, and the accidents of the 'mind, ſo that they ſhall neither exceed nor fall 'ſhort? Therefore it was neceſſary that the Ancients 'ſhould make uſe of medicines, which might in ſome 'meaſure preſerve the body from alteration, and de'fend the health of man, oft-times much hurt and 'afflicted with theſe things and cauſes; leaſt the body, 'utterly eaten up of diſeaſes, ſhould fall to ruin. 'Now for the benefit of Your Excellency, I have 'gathered ſome things out of the books of the An'cients, whoſe virtue and uſe may avert thoſe incon'veniencies, keep off this defect and weakneſs; may 'defend the temper of the innate moiſture, may hin'der the increaſe and flux of extraneous moiſture, and 'may bring to paſs (which uſually otherwiſe hap'peneth) that the heat of man be not ſo ſoon de'bilitated. But the uſe of theſe things and medi'cines are of no ſervice, nor any thing avails them 'that neglect the doctrine of the regimen of life; 'for how can it be, that he who either is ignorant 'or negligent of diet, ſhould ever be cured by any 'pains of the Phyſician, or by any virtue in phy'ſic? Wherefore the Phyſicians and wiſe men of 'old time were of opinion, that diet without phy'ſic ſometimes did good, but that phyſic without 'due order of diet never made a man one grain the 'better. Thence it is reckoned more neceſſary, that 'ſuch rather ſhould be treated of which cannot be 'known, unleſs of the wiſe, and thoſe too of a quick 'underſtanding, and ſuch as ſtudy hard and take a 'great deal of pains, than thoſe things which are 'eaſily known, even as a man reads them. As 'for my own part, being hindered partly by the 'charge, partly by impatience, and partly by the 'rumours of the vulgar, I was not willing to make 'experiment of all things, which may eaſily be tried 'by others, but have reſolved to expreſs thoſe things 'in obſcure and difficult terms, which I judge re'quiſite for the conſervation of health, leaſt they 'ſhould fall into the hands of the Infidels. One of 'which lies in the bowels of the earth (46); another 'in the ſea (47); the third creeps upon the earth (48); 'the fourth lives in the air (49); the fifth is likened 'to the medicine which comes out of the mine 'of the noble animal (50); the ſixth cometh out 'of the long lived animal (51); the ſeventh is that 'whoſe Mine is the plant of India (52). I have 'reſolved to mention theſe things obſcurely, imi'tating the precept of the Prince of the Philoſophers 'to Alexander, who ſaid that he is a tranſgreſſor of 'the divine law, who diſcovers the hidden ſecrets of 'nature and the properties of things; becauſe ſome 'men deſire as much as in them lies to overthrow 'the divine law, by thoſe properties that God has 'placed in animals, plants, and ſtones. But ſome 'of theſe things ſtand in need of preparation, others 'of a careful choice: Of preparation, leſt with 'the healthful part poiſon be ſwallowed down; of 'choice, leſt among the beſt thoſe things that are 'worſe be given, and thoſe that are more hurtful 'be taken.' Thus the reader plainly diſcerns, that the obſcurities in this treatiſe of our author, are not ſuch as proceeded from vanity, affectation, reſpect to cuſtom, or any other weakneſs of mind; but from pure concern for his own ſafety, and fear of drawing upon himſelf greater evils than he had yet ſuffered. This treatiſe was firſt printed at Oxford in 1590, and has been ſince tranſlated into Engliſh by Dr. Richard Browne, under the title of The Cure of Old Age and Preſervation of Youth. Shewing how to cure and keep off the Accidents of Old Age, and how to preſerve the Youth, Strength, and Beauty of Body, and the Senſes, and all the Faculties of both Body and Mind; by that great Mathematician and Phyſician Roger Bacon, a Franciſcan Friar (53): He added notes upon every chapter of this work, and explains therein the phraſes by which our author concealed his ſecret medicines. He will have that which lives in the air to be roſemary, but I have ſeen ſome Latin annotations in which it is ſuppoſed to be rue: the reader will judge of theſe interpretations as he thinks fit. It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that Dr. Browne likewiſe explains the fifth medicine, which is ſaid to reſemble what comes out of the mine of the noble animal, and he conceives it to be the youthful heat of a maid, and cites the inſtance of Abiſhag, who was given for this purpoſe to King David. Others have thought that it was an extract or quinteſſence of human blood, and ſome again have fancied that it was ſome kind of precious ſtone. For my own part I muſt confeſs, it does not appear to me ſo clearly, as that I dare pronounce what it is, but it ſufficiently appears, that none of theſe interpretations can ſatisfy a rational inquirer, eſpecially one who is well acquainted with our author's exactneſs. It were to be wiſhed that ſome ingenious and ſkilful Phyſician would review this work, and compare it with others of the ſame kind, more eſpecially with that excellent treatiſe written by the Lord Chancellor Bacon (54) upon the ſame ſubject; by which method many diſcoveries might be made, and this moſt important topic ſet in a light capable of being turned to the advantage, whereas hitherto it has ſerved for little more than the amuſement of mankind.

[G] A Compendium of Theology, which ſeems to have been his laſt work.] This work, of which there is ſtill a copy preſerved in the royal library, is divided into two parts; in the firſt of which the author propoſes, by a free inquiry into the nature of true ſcience, to find out the cauſes of errors, and the ſeveral manners in which men have erred in this ſtudy, that truth, and the proper method of purſuing it, might the more evidently appear; in the ſecond, he makes it his buſineſs to eſtabliſh capital truths, and to unfold and expoſe all ſorts of errors and miſtakes (55). But it is at leaſt probable from the titles of various MSS. that our author afterwards added three other treatiſes, or parts, to this work (56) of his, which we ſhould not have mentioned particularly, if it had not afforded us an opportunity of fixing the date of this book, and conſequently in ſome meaſure of our author's life, ſince it is certain that he ſome ſay, or in 1294 (f), as others aſſert, was interred in the church of the Franciſcans (g) [H]. Theſe are all the circumſtances that with the utmoſt care and diligence we have been able to collect, concerning the life and actions of this great man, whoſe deep ſcience and vaſt penetration enabled him to make ſuch a prodigious progreſs in all uſeful knowledge, that even the wiſeſt and ableſt men of later times, read his works with aſtoniſhment, and readily confeſs, that he was well diſtinguiſhed (however ill they treated him in other reſpects) by the title the Monks gave him of Doctor Mirabilis (h) [I], or, the Wonderful Doctor, which moſt certainly he deſerved, in whatever ſenſe the phraſe is taken.

But it is not ſufficient to obſerve this in general terms. The fame of the man, the reſpect due to truth, and the regard we owe to the honour of our country, which, in point of literary credit, has nothing greater to boaſt than the glory of producing ſuch a genius, require from us a more exact, authentic, and particular diſplay of his diſcoveries, in order to juſtify what has been already ſaid in his praiſe, and did not long ſurvive the writing it: for in this book he tells us, that among the forward and raſh profeſſors, whoſe vehemence and impetuoſity contributed greatly to the hindrance of true learning, he knew one Richard of Cornwall, the worſt and fooliſheſt of them all, who was in great credit with the ſilly multitude, though deſpiſed and rejected by the wiſer ſort, at Paris, for the errors which he invented and propagated, when he read there publickly the ſentences before he read at Oxford, which was in the year 1250, from which time, ſays he, to the preſent, many of this man's errors ſtill prevail, though it be now forty years ago and more. Et optime novi peſſimum & ſtultiſſimum iſtorum, qui vocatus eſt Richardus Cornubienſis, famoſiſſimus apud ſtultam multitudinem, ſed apud ſapientes fuit infamis & improbatus Pariſiis propter errores quos invenerat & promulgaverat, quando ſolemniter legebat ſententias ibidem, prius quam legeret ſententias Oxoniæ ab anno Domini 1250. Ab illo 1250, igitur tempore remanſit multitudo in hujus magiſtri erroribus uſque nunc, ſc. per quadraginta annos & amplius (57). It is ſufficiently evident from this paſſage, that our author did not compoſe this work before the year 1291, and as he made ſeveral additions to it, he muſt have lived ſome time longer; but as to the exact time of his death, we ſhall give the reader the beſt account of it we can in the ſucceeding note.

(57) Compend. Theolog. lib. ii. cap. 4.

[H] Was interred in the church of the Franciſcans.] The time of this great man's death is as differently reported as are moſt of the accidents of his life; and we may juſtly attribute thereto, many of the miſtakes that have been made about his hiſtory and writings, and therefore we ſhall labour to clear up this point, as far as at this diſtance of time it is poſſible. The famous Leland tells us, that he died at Oxford, and was buried in the church of the Franciſcans in the year 1248 (58), which is very amazing, ſince he elſewhere tells us, that he both dedicated and ſent his works to Pope Clement IV., who did not arrive at that dignity till the year 1265. It muſt however be allowed, that this miſtake was occaſioned by the ſetting down the time of Robert Bacon's death for that of Roger's, which in all probability the author would have corrected, if he had lived to put the laſt hand to his own work (59). Bale changes the date which Leland has given us, and places his death in 1284 (60), which is alſo a little ſtrange, ſince he had ſeen his work, on the means of avoiding the infirmities of old age, which was writ in 1288 at the ſooneſt. This error is tranſcribed by Pits, as indeed almoſt all Bale's errors are, notwithſtanding he takes particular notice, not only of the book which he addreſſed to Pope Nicholas IV., but alſo of Bacon's Compendium of Theology, which he tells us, was contained with other treatiſes of our author's in two volumes, in the library of the Lord Lumley, which book, as we have clearly ſhewn, was written at leaſt eight years after the time, which this author has fixed for his death (61). The learned Dr. Cave ſpeaks expreſsly of his being impriſoned at the command of Pope Nicholas IV (62), and ſays, that he did not know whether he was releaſed or not, and yet he places his death in 1284, which is three years before Pope Nicholas was raiſed to that dignity, in which he is implicitly followed by Oudin, who is otherwiſe a very diligent and careful writer (63). Anthony Wood, from two MSS. which he mentions, fixes his death to the eleventh of June 1292; to which date the learned Dr. Freind, who had taken great pains in the peruſal of our author's works, adheres (64). The excellent editor of his Opus Majus, however, places it in 1294, about which time alſo, he thinks, his Compendium of Theology was written (65).

[I] By the title they gave him of Doctor Mirabilis.] It was the cuſtom of thoſe times, to diſtinguiſh the characters of eminent ſcholars by ſuch kind of appellations. Thus St. Thomas Aquinas was called Doctor Angelicus, or the Angelic Doctor; Joannes Duns Scotus, Doctor Subtilis, or the Subtile Doctor; William Ocham, Doctor Singularis, or the Singular Doctor: but none of them were more expreſſive or à propos than this given our author, who appears as wonderful to us at the diſtance of four hundred and fifty years, as to the Monks of his order, who were his contemporaries. Yet it is currently reported, that for ſome time, our author's books were perſecuted with as much malice as his perſon, as Dr. Browne tells us, in his ſhort account of this great man's life; 'Many of Bacon's works, ſays he, and of 'Groſthead's alſo, curiouſly written, and well bound, 'were by ſome ignorant men, that would be account-'ed ſcholars, when they could not underſtand them, 'condemned for books of the Black Art, and ſo 'faſtened with long nails to the boards, they either 'became food for worms or moths, or rotted with 'mould and duſt.' This account was originally taken from John Twine (66). But Dr. Langbain, who had once ſome thoughts of publiſhing Bacon's works, was far from being ſatisfied as to the truth of it, as appears by the following paſſage, in a letter of his to the learned Selden, dated January the 20th, 1653: 'I doubt whether the ſtory be probable, as 'the ſcene is laid by Twine, where Abbot Voche 'ſpeaks it, as done before his time, which, if true, 'I think, would not have eſcaped the knowledge of 'Leland; and conſidering he was ſo much an admirer 'of Bacon, and withal ſo highly angry with that 'houſe, for making his acceſs into their library ſo 'difficult, I do not ſee well how he could omit to 'have taken notice of it, &c. Though it be no 'neceſſary conſequence in Logick, to argue ab autho-'ritate negativè, yet this authority, all circum-'ſtances conſidered, makes it to me very proba-'ble (67).' It is true, Leland ſays nothing of this particular, but he ſays, that it was as difficult to collect the works of Roger Bacon, as to find the Sibyls leaves. Another argument to prove that his fame and writings long laboured under the calumnies and aſperſions of the Monks, is the character afforded him by Biſhop Bale in the firſt edition of his work, when he was under thoſe prejudices reſulting from education, and had not applied himſelf, as he afterwards did, to the peruſal of our ancient writers. We may add to this, the reports ſpread to his prejudice abroad, which could ariſe from nothing but the bold aſſertions of the Monks, who could not ſuſtain their own characters but at the expence of his, ſince they had perſecuted him ſo cruelly in his life-time, and that wholly on account of his writings. But what ſeems to put this matter out of diſpute, is the condition of ſcience in the next century; for had Roger Bacon's books been regarded or ſtudied, it muſt have been where it is at this day, our greateſt men having gone very little beyond him; whereas, in fact, it ſunk lower than where he found it.

what will be hereafter delivered on the ſame ſubject, from the teſtimonies of others. If by doing this methodically, we can ſet his merits in a clearer and fuller light, or add any thing new on ſo curious and ſo important a ſubject, it will ſufficiently atone for the labour it requires, by adding to the pleaſure of the ingenious and inquiſitive reader. To begin then with the languages, which he thought the foundation of all true learning, as being abſolutely neceſſary to the perual of the beſt authors in ſeveral ſciences, in their originals; he not only underſtood them ſufficiently for that purpoſe, but was alſo a perfect maſter of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and has left poſterity ſuch indubitable marks of his critical ſkill in them, as might have ſecured him a very high character, more eſpecially conſidering the age in which he lived, if he had not diſtinguiſhed himſelf in any other branch of literature. But his various knowledge in other reſpects, has made his ſkill in the languages leſs taken notice of than it ought to be (i) [K]. In all branches of the Mathematicks he was wonderfully well verſed, and there is ſcarcely any part of them, on which he has not written with a ſolidity and clearneſs, which have been deſervedly admired by the greateſt maſters in that kind of ſcience. In reſpect to Mechanicks particularly, the learned Dr. Freind ſays, very juſtly, that a greater genius had not ariſen ſince the days of Archimedes (k); the truth of which the reader will readily allow, when he has conſidered the contents of a ſingle page of one of his treatiſes [L]. He underſtood likewiſe the whole ſcience of Optics, to a ſurprizing degree

[K] Made his ſkill in the languages leſs taken notice of than it ought to be.] It is very certain, from the account given us by Bacon himſelf, that grammar was at a very low ebb in his time; and as for the learned languages they were not underſtood, at leaſt to any tolerable degree, by above three or four perſons whom he names. It is really matter of wonder how in ſuch an age he became ſo excellently knowing himſelf; for he was not only acquainted with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, but with the Chaldee alſo, and was able to write grammars in them all. That part of his Opus Majus which treats of this ſubject is exceedingly curious and entertaining, in as much as it is written with a critical exactneſs (68). He ſhews his Holineſs therein, that all ſciences, human and divine, depend in ſome meaſure upon the languages; and in ſhewing this, he not only uſes the authorities of the Fathers and Doctors of the Chriſtian Church, and of the Philoſophers, but alſo of the Poets, particularly Horace and Statius; and he obſerves very pertinently, that the reading their works ſhould be encouraged, for the ſake of delighting the minds of young people, and engaging them to apply themſelves with diligence to the ſtudy of the languages. He even deſcends to pronunciation and quantity, which ſhews with how great accuracy he had ſtudied this ſubject, and how perfectly he was acquainted with every branch of it. To do him juſtice, the method and ſtyle of his works are as admirable as the matter of them, not that I would be underſtood to mean, he was a claſſical writer, for in that perhaps I might go beyond the truth: but his Latin ſtyle is neat, ſtrong, and remarkably expreſſive; nor was there any writer of his age, perhaps we might carry it farther, that either knew how to range his matter better, or to bring it into a ſhorter compaſs; ſo that in all his treatiſes on ſuch a variety of ſubjects, he ſeems to have written with equal facility and judgment, leaving nothing perplexed or obſcure, either from a want or from a redundancy of words. It is very ſurprizing that ſome learned men have cenſured him, for believing it poſſible to teach the learned languages in a very ſhort compaſs of time; but it muſt be owned, that they were led into theſe miſtakes for want of being well acquainted with his writings; ſince before his Opus Majus was publiſhed, it was impoſſible to conceive any true notion of its contents; and therefore, we need the leſs wonder at the miſtaken judgments that were paſſed upon it, or rather upon the ſeveral treatiſes of which it is compoſed, and which nobody, till that work appeared, conceived to have any relation to each other, much leſs that they formed, as they really do, a complete ſyſtem of learning. But the reader being already acquainted with the plan and diſpoſition of that great work, will have acquired ſuch an idea of it, as muſt enable him to enter perfectly into the truth and juſtice of theſe obſervations; and therefore I will dwell on them no longer.

(68) See his treatiſe de Utilitate Grammaticæ in his Opus Majus, p. 44.

[L] When he has conſidered the contents of a ſingle page of one of his treatiſes.] This occurs in the ſmall tract ſo often mentioned, which was one of the firſt publiſhed of our author's works, and intitled Epiſtola Fratris Rogeri Baconis, de ſecretis operibus Artis et Naturæ, et de nullitate Magiæ: i. e. 'An Epiſtle of 'brother Roger Bacon, concerning the ſecret Works 'of Art and Nature, and the non-entity of Magick.' In this very curious treatiſe, our author very clearly ſtates the means of working upon Nature, and heightning the wonders ſhe produces by the power of art; and in the fourth chapter of this work, he propoſes to ſpeak of wonderful inſtruments which may be artificially contrived, by which, ſays he, ſuch things may be done without the help of Magick, as indeed Magick is unable and incapable of performing. For a veſſel may be ſo conſtructed, and oars therein ſo diſpoſed, as to make more way with one man in her, than another veſſel fully manned. Several authors tell us, that this has been attempted ſince the time of Bacon; and the German author who wrote notes upon this treatiſe of Bacon's, expreſsly affirms, that one Thomas Norton made ſuch a boat, in which, while he ſat reading or writing, he quickened or retarded its motion at pleaſure. He likewiſe ſays, that one Horſington of Suſſex invented a mill which went of itſelf; and ſome other inſtances he gives, of which he was an eye-witneſs at London (69). But as to the invention mentioned by our author, it has been practiſed on the canals in Flanders and Holland with ſome degree of ſucceſs; and a writer who is allowed to be an excellent judge of things of this nature, declares his opinion, that this ſcheme will be one day brought to perfection, and ſuch veſſels come into uſe (70). But let us hear our author again: It is poſſible, ſays he, to make a chariot, which, without any aſſiſtance of animals, ſhall move with that irreſiſtible force, which is aſcribed to thoſe ſcythed chariots in which the ancients fought. Something of this kind we are told has been attempted in China with ſucceſs; which is the more credible, ſince it is certain that one Thomas Stevens, a celebrated Mathematician of the XVIth century, invented a kind of machine with maſts and ſails, which ran on plain ground at the rate of two leagues an hour, and which was uſed by Maurice Prince of Orange (71). It is poſſible alſo, ſays our author, to make inſtruments for flying, ſo that a man ſitting in the middle thereof and ſteering with a kind of rudder, may manage what is contrived to anſwer the end of wings, ſo as to divide and paſs through the air. It is no leſs poſſible to make a machine of a very ſmall ſize, and yet capable of raiſing or ſinking the greateſt weights, which may be of infinite uſe on certain occaſions, for by the help of ſuch an inſtrument, not above three inches high, or leſs, a man may be able to deliver himſelf and his companion out of priſon, and to aſcend or deſcend at pleaſure. This is a direct proof that our author was acquainted with the perpetual ſkrew. He ſpeaks alſo in the ſame chapter of machines for diving, and of flying bridges that may be thrown at pleaſure for the paſſage of armies over rivers, aſſuring us, that except the inſtrument for flying, he had ſeen and experienced all the reſt, and that he very well knew the author of that invention. We need not wonder that a man, who degree of accuracy and exactneſs; and is very juſtly allowed to have underſtood, both the theory and practice of thoſe diſcoveries, which have beſtowed ſuch high reputation on thoſe of our own and of other nations, who have brought them into common uſe (l) [M].

underſtood and deſcribed ſuch amazing machines, and who, by frequent experiments, plainly ſhewed, that he was not either a vain or a credulous perſon, ſhould paſs in thoſe days for ſomething more than man, and, in ſpite of all he writ to prove the contrary, for a Magician; and perhaps there are countries even in Europe, where, if a perſon attempted things of this nature, he might yet fall under the like imputation. But what made reflections of this kind on Roger Bacon more inhuman than upon any other man, was his plain and honeſt manner of communicating theſe things, not as wonders and prodigies, the effects of a ſecret and miraculous art, but as the genuine produce of true ſcience, the principles of which he offered to teach and to explain; ſo that he publiſhed theſe diſcoveries, not to aſtoniſh or amuſe mankind, but to encourage and excite them to a vigorous ſearch after true knowledge, by which they might have been convinced, that mathematical ſcience was much ſuperior to Magick.

[M] And of other nations who have brought them into common uſe.] The deſign of this note is no more than to ſatisfy the reader of the truth of what is advanced in the text; in doing of which we ſhall partly rely on the evidence derived from our author's own writings, and in part, on the authorities of ſuch learned men of our own and of other countries, as have been univerſally allowed proper judges of the ſubject. In reſpect to the ſcience of Perſpective, he took incredible pains, not only in the theory, but the practice, in which he ſpent conſiderable ſums, that he might bring into ſome method a ſcience, which was then underſtood but by very few; and he tells us, that no lectures had been read upon it at Paris, and but twice at Oxford, and that there were but three who had any ſkill in it (72). However, theſe perſons made ſuch prodigious advances in it, that, as Dr. Jebb obſerves, they ſeem to have left nothing for poſterity to add to the perfection of their inſtruments. Bacon has very accurately deſcribed the uſes of reading glaſſes, and ſhewn the way of making them, as appears from the following paſſage from his Opus Majus. Si vero homo aſpiciat literas & alias res minutas per medium cryſtalli, vel vitri, vel alterius perſpicui, ſuppoſiti literis & ſit portio minor ſpheræ, cujus convexitas ſit verſus oculum & oculus ſit in ære longe melius, videbis literas & apparebunt ei majores, & ideo hoc inſtrumentum eſt utile ſenibus & habentibus oculos debiles. Nam literam quantumcunque parvum poſſunt videre inſufficienti magnitudine (73). This point is alſo admitted by the very learned Profeſſor, Peter van Muſchenbroeck of Leyden, who attributes to our author the invention of reading-glaſſes (74). Dr. Freind likewiſe remarks, that he deſcribes the camera obſcura, and all ſorts of glaſſes which magnify or diminiſh any object, bring it nearer to the eye, or remove it farther off (75). Bacon tells us alſo himſelf, that he had made great numbers of burning-glaſſes, and that there were none ever in uſe among the Latins, till his friend Peter de Maharn Curia had applied himſelf to the making of them. He informs us, in another paſſage of his writings, that this Peter had already laboured three years about one glaſs, which was to burn at a certain diſtance, and that he would ſoon complete it through the favour of God; though the Latins knew not how to do that, nor was it ever attempted by them, notwithſtanding, ſays he, we have books concerning the method of forming glaſſes of that kind (76). We may obſerve likewiſe, that Thomas Galileo aſcribes the invention of the optic tube or teleſcope to himſelf (77), and Peter Borellus contends, that the honour of it is due to Zachary Joannides, a citizen of Middleburgh (78); yet it is evident, the invention was known to our author, from a paſſage wherein he tells us, that he was able to form glaſſes in ſuch a manner, with reſpect to our ſight and the objects, that the rays ſhall be refracted and reflected wherever we pleaſe; ſo that we may ſee a thing under what angle we think proper, either near or at a diſtance, and be able to read the ſmalleſt letters at an incredible diſtance, and to count the duſt and ſand, on account of the greatneſs of the angle under which we ſee the objects; and alſo that we ſhall ſcarcely ſee the greateſt bodies near us, on account of the ſmallneſs of the angle under which we ſee them. It is very clear, that he made uſe of his teleſcope in his aſtronomical obſervations, from what he ſays in his Opus Tertium, dedicated to Pope Clement, concerning ſuch things as were neceſſary for compleating thoſe aſtronomical tables which he deſigned: 'But, ſays he, what is much more requiſite than 'theſe things, is to have men who underſtand Per-'ſpective and the inſtruments of it very well, be-'cauſe the inſtruments of aſtronomy are only made 'uſe of by ſight, according to the laws of that 'ſcience (79).' The learned Dr. Plott, for the honour of the city and univerſity of Oxford, conſiders the invention of the teleſcope at large, and declares, that without wreſting of words or begging favourable conſtructions, it is very poſſible to prove, that Friar Bacon was either the inventor or improver of that uſeful inſtrument. How able he is to make good his aſſertion will beſt appear from his own words, ſince, in matters of this nature, it is but fair to let an author ſpeak for himſelf, eſpecially when, as in this caſe, we make uſe at once both of his arguments and his authority (80).

'That this learned Friar underſtood all ſorts of 'glaſſes, and to order and adapt them to ſuch like 'purpoſes (not to cite other places that might eaſily 'be brought), I think I may with truth as well as 'confidence affirm, from the unconſtrained ſenſe of 'his own words in his book of Perſpective (81). Si 'vero corpora non ſunt plana per quæ viſus videt, ſed 'ſphærica; tunc eſt magna diverſitas, nam vel con-'cavitas corporis eſt verſus oculum, vel convexitas. 'But, ſays he, if the glaſſes be not plain, (having 'treated of them before) but ſpherical, the caſe is 'much otherwiſe, for either the concavity of the 'glaſs is next the eye, or the convexity, &c. Now 'that he uſed theſe glaſſes in celeſtial obſervations, 'is altogether as evident from the ſame book, where 'he proceeds in theſe words (82). De viſione fracta 'majora ſunt, nam de facili patet, maxima poſſe ap-'parere minima, & è contra; & longe diſtantia vi-'debantur propinquiſſimè, & e converſo; ſic etiam 'faceremus ſolem & lunam & ſtellas deſcendere ſe-'cundum apparentiam hic inferius, &c. Greater 'things are performed if the viſion be refracted, for '(by refraction) 'tis eaſily made appear, that the 'greateſt things may be repreſented leſs, and little 'things as the greateſt, and that things afar off may 'be repreſented near. Thus we can make the ſun, 'and moon, and ſtars, to all appearance, to come 'down to us here below, &c.'

'Again, in his epiſtle ad Pariſienſem concerning the 'ſecret works of art and nature (83). Poſſunt enim ſic 'figurari perſpicua, ut longiſſimè poſita, appareant 'propinquiſſima, & e contrario; ita quod ex incredi-'bili diſtantiâ legeremus literas minutiſſimas, & nu-'meraremus res quantumcunque parvas, & ſtellas fa-'ceremus apparere quo vellemus. Glaſſes may be ſo 'figured, that things the moſt remote may appear 'near, ſo that at an incredible diſtance we may read 'the ſmalleſt character, and number things though 'never ſo ſmall; and laſtly, make ſtars appear as 'near as we pleaſe; and theſe things he ſays, in ano-'ther place, were to the illiterate ſo formidable and 'amazing, ut animus mortalis ignorans veritatem non 'poſſit aliqualiter ſuſtinere (84), that no mortal, ig-'norant of the means, could poſſibly bear it; wherein 'this learned Franciſcan did ſo far excell the ancient 'Magicians, that whereas they repreſented the 'moon's approach by their magical charms, he 'brought her lower with greater innocence, and 'with his glaſſes did that in truth, which the an-'cient poets always put in a fable. All which put 'together, it muſt neceſſarily be confeſſed that he 'had ſome ſuch inſtrument, though not ſo trimly 'made, 'tis like, as our teleſcopes are now, in favour 'of which truth much more might be alledged, did 'I not think this ſufficient to evince it to the unpre-'judiced reader.' Such is the judgment of this curious and able man, and ſuch the reaſons on which it is founded, and which we may ſafely add, are ſuch as cannot be refuted.

In Geography alſo he was admirably well ſkilled, as appears from a variety of paſſages in his works, which ſhew that he was far better acquainted with the ſituation, extent, and inhabitants, even of the moſt diſtant countries, than many who made that particular ſcience their ſtudy, and wrote upon it in ſucceeding times. This I ſuppoſe was the reaſon which induced the judicious Hackluyt to tranſcribe a large diſcourſe out of his writings, into his noble Collection of Voyages and Travels (m) [N]. But his ſkill in Aſtronomy was ſtill more amazing, ſince it plainly appears, that he not only pointed out that error which occaſioned the reformation in the calendar (n), that has given riſe to the diſtinction between the old ſtile and the new, but alſo offered a much more effectual and perfect reformation, than that which was made in the time of Pope Gregory XIII [O]. There are

[N] A large diſcourſe out of his writings into his noble Collection of Voyages and Travels.] I mention this circumſtance for the honour of both authors. It was the deſign of Hackluyt in his excellent collections, to inſtruct, to exhort, and to raiſe the emulation of his countrymen, by ſhewing them what was known to, and what had been performed by, their anceſtors, and not to amuſe his reader with ſtrange tales and wonderful relations (85). It was this deſign, that led him to enquire after the beſt writers of our country upon theſe ſubjects; as this brought him acquainted with the works of Bacon, which he ſoon found were extremely fit for his purpoſe. What he has publiſhed, is taken out of that part of our author's Opus Majus, in which he treats expreſsly of Geography, and gives ſo clear and plain, ſo full, and yet ſo ſuccinct, an account of the then known world, as, I believe, is ſcarcely to be found in any other writer, either of the paſt or preſent age (86). What is publiſhed in this collection of voyages, relates to the countries between the Danube and the utmoſt extremities of Tartary (87). A field ſufficiently large for any man's abilities, and in which he has ſhewn his own in an amazing degree: for whoever reads this fragment of his, as it ſtands in this Engliſh collection, will evidently ſee, that as he ſpared no pains to make himſelf abſolutely maſter of all the new diſcoveries which that age afforded; ſo he likewiſe knew how to make a right judgment of thoſe diſcoveries, ſo as to diſpoſe them in the propereſt manner, for the improvement of uſeful knowledge. It likewiſe very plainly appears, that he had a very juſt notion of the country of the Tartars, of the empire of China, and all the adjacent kingdoms, which are ſcarcely any where to be found more clearly, or more properly deſcribed, than in this diſcourſe. We muſt therefore allow it is much for the credit of our author, that as ſoon as true learning revived, his works came again into credit; ſo that all who ſtudied to bring uſeful knowledge into repute, had recourſe to the works of Bacon, and brought them out of the duſt of libraries, where they had been long buried, into day-light, and by a neceſſary conſequence into reputation.

(87) Hackluyt's Voyages, Vol. iii.

[O] A more effectual and perfect reformation than that in the time of Gregory XIII.] The firſt thing to be obſerved in this note is, that our author ſaw and demonſtrated the errors in the Kalendar, without any aſſiſtance, and purely from the knowledge he had in Aſtronomy. He obſerves, indeed, that the miſtake about the length of the year, was commonly known and objected to the Church; but he ſays nobody durſt attempt to mend it, without the authority of a General Council. To facilitate the amending ſo ſcandalous an error, he offers his aſſiſtance to the utmoſt of his power; and ſpeaking to Pope Clement IV., he thus lays open both the cauſes of this miſtake, and the means by which it might be remedied. 'Julius 'Cæſar, ſays he, being well ſkilled in Aſtronomy, 'ſettled, as well as it was poſſible in his time, the 'Kalendar; and, as hiſtory informs us, maintained 'in Egypt, againſt Achorius the Aſtronomer, and 'Eudoxus, his notion of the length of the ſolar 'year, upon which our computation is founded. 'Hence it is, that the Poet Lucan brings him in 'ſpeaking thus:

Non meus Eudoxi vincetur faſtibus annus.

'But Julius, however, did not diſcover the exact 'length of the year; for he has fixed it in our ka-'lendar at three hundred and ſixty-five days and the 'fourth of a day, which fourth-part is collected once 'in four years, ſo that in the biſſextile year, one day 'more is reckoned in every fourth year than in the 'common years. It is however manifeſt, not only 'by the old and new computation, but is alſo known 'from aſtronomical obſervations, that the ſolar year 'is not of that length but ſomewhat ſhorter; and 'this ſmall difference, wiſe men have computed to 'be the one hundred and thirtieth part of a day. 'So that in the ſpace of one hundred and thirty 'years, there is a ſuperfluous day taken in, which, 'if it were taken away, our calendar would be cor-'rected as to this fault; and therefore, as all 'things in our computation depend upon the quantity 'of the ſolar year, it is neceſſary to recede from 'this poſition, when it thus appears to be a funda-'mental error. From hence there ariſes ſtill a greater 'error, that is, in fixing the equinoxes and ſolſtices; 'and this error not only ariſes from the quantity of 'the year, but has alſo very miſchievous conſe-'quences: for the equinoxes and ſolſtices are there-'by fixed to certain days, as if they really happened 'upon them, and were ſo to happen for ever (88). 'But it is certain from Aſtronomy, which cannot lie, 'that they aſcend in the kalendar, as by the help 'of tables and inſtruments may be unqueſtionably 'proved.' Thus far we have uſed our author's words; but to avoid prolixity, we will content ourſelves now with purſuing his ſenſe only. He obſerves, that this error with reſpect to the equinoxes and ſolſtices was ſo great, as not only to diſguſt the learned, but to fall under the notice of every ploughman: for the Church having originally fixed the vernal equinox on the eighth of the kalends of April, and the autumnal equinox on the eighth of the kalends of October, that is, on the twenty-fifth of March and twenty-fourth of September, they were now riſen, that is, at the time he wrote, the one to the thirteenth of March, and the other to the ſixteenth of September. He collects from theſe obſervations, that the equinoxes aſcend about one day in one hundred and twenty-five years, and he therefore propoſes, that the alteration of the kalendar ſhould be made, not from the time afterwards fixed by the Council of Nice, but according to the places which the equinoxes and ſolſtices held at the time of our Saviour's nativity; and this he thought might very well be known, from an obſervation made by Ptolemy in his Almageſt, who, one hundred and forty years after the birth of Chriſt, found the vernal equinox to have been on the twenty-ſecond of March, and the winter ſolſtice on the twenty-ſecond of December, upon which he founds his computation of their riſing one day in one hundred and twenty-five years. It muſt be owned, that this reaſoning of his is very clear and exact, and not very far from the truth; for according to this method of computing, the vernal equinox ſhould have riſen this year, one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-five, to the eleventh of March, whereas it happened on the ninth. He goes on to ſhew very clearly, what prodigious inconveniencies muſt neceſſarily attend the ſuffering this error to continue; and therefore he concludes, that it was then high time to apply a remedy to theſe palpable miſtakes, which brought ſo much ſhame and ſcandal upon the Church. 'For, 'ſays he, all who are verſed in computations and 'Aſtronomy know theſe miſtakes well; and deride 'the Prelates for their ignorance, in not ſuffering 'them to be corrected; and the Infidel Philoſophers, 'Arabians, Jews, and Greeks, who live amongſt 'Chriſtians in Spain, in the Eaſt, and many other 'parts of the world, abhor the folly that appears in 'ſettling the times, on which the ſolemn feſtivals 'of the Church are celebrated; and this too, when 'Chriſtians are ſkilful enough in Aſtronomy to ſettle 'all theſe points as they ſhould be. Your Reverence 'therefore may command, and there will be found 'perſons every way capable of applying proper re-'medies are alſo remaining, ſome works of his relating to Chronology, which would have been thought worthy of very particular notice, if his ſkill in other ſciences had not made his proficiency in this branch of knowledge the leſs remarkable. But it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that he was perfectly well verſed in the hiſtory of the four great empires of the world, which he has treated very accurately and ſuccinctly, in his great work addreſſed to Pope Clement IV (o). He was ſo thoroughly acquainted with Chemiſtry, at a time too that it was ſcarcely known in Europe, though it had been long cultivated among the Arabians, that Dr. Freind ſays truly, it is no more than doing juſtice, to aſcribe the honour of introducing it to this our countryman, who, as he likewiſe ſays, ſpeaks in ſome part or other of his works, of almoſt every operation now uſed in Chemiſtry, and deſcribes the method of making tinctures and elixirs (p). But we muſt not ſo haſtily paſs over his excellency in this art; ſince there are no leſs than three capital diſcoveries made by him, which deſerve to be particularly conſidered. The firſt is, the invention of gun-powder, which, however confidently aſcribed to others, was unqueſtionably known to him, both in regard to its ingredients and effects (q) [P]. The ſecond is that which commonly goes under the name of Alchemy, or the art of tranſmuting

'medies in theſe reſpects, and not only to theſe, but 'to the defects of the whole Kalendar; for there are 'no leſs than thirteen radical errors, which have al-'moſt an infinite number of branches. If therefore 'this glorious work could be done in the reign of 'your Holineſs, it would be one of the greateſt, beſt, 'and faireſt performances, that ever was attempted 'in the Church of God (89).' Our author afterwards framed a Kalendar for this very purpoſe; a fair and perfect MS. copy of which was once in the hands of Mr. Theyer of Glouceſterſhire. There is alſo another tranſcript of this Kalendar in the Bodleian Library at Oxford (90). Dr. Plot, who had ſeen Mr. Theyer's copy (91), diſcourſes farther on this ſubject thus, 'From which, or ſome other Kalendar of his, 'Paulus Middleburgenſis, Biſhop of Foſſombrone, 'in the dukedom of Urbin, ſtole half of his great 'volume, which he calls his Paulina, concerning the 'true time of keeping Eaſter, and day of the paſſion 'of our Lord Jeſus, directed to Pope Leo X., in order 'to the reformation of the Roman Kalendar and 'Eccleſiaſtical Cycles, written juſt in the ſame order 'and method, generally and particularly, as Roger 'Bacon long before had done to Clement IV.; and 'yet full ſlender mention (ſays Dr. Dee (92), doth 'this Biſhop make of him, though his chief inſtruc-'tor in the beſt part of the matter contained in his 'book: in which deſign, though the plagiary were 'unſucceſsful, his endeavours being fruſtrated for a 'time, yet it was he that ſtirred up Nicholas Co-'pernicus (as the ſame Nicholas honeſtly confeſſes, 'in an epiſtle of his to Paul III.) (93), more accu-'rately to obſerve the motions of the ſun and moon, 'and thence to define the quantities of years and 'months, more truly than they were before in the 'Julian Kalendar; upon whoſe foundations Aloyſius, 'and the reſt of the ſumptuous college of Mathema-'ticians at Rome, having built their reformation, it 'is eaſily deducible, that whatever has been done in 'this matter, from the time of Friar Bacon to that of 'Pope Gregory XIII., muſt, in a great meaſure, be 'aſcribed to him, their whole reformation ſcarcely 'differing from his (94).' In fact, however, as Dr. Plot alſo obſerves, it was not only ſtolen from our author Bacon, but manifeſtly injured by thoſe who had the direction of that reformation, and who might have made it much more effectual, and have carried it back as he adviſed, not to the Nicene Council, but quite to the nativity of our Lord: for then the vernal equinox this year, would have been placed much nearer the true time than it is, and the Kalendar have ſooner become perfect (95). The learned editor therefore of the Opus Majus, Dr. Jebb, had reaſon to ſay of this propoſal of our author's to Pope Clement IV., that it was one of the nobleſt efforts of human induſtry (96). It is, indeed, conſidered in all its circumſtances, one of the moſt ſtupendous inſtances of the force of human underſtanding that has been recorded, and will do honour to our learned countryman's memory as long as the ſun and moon endure (97).

[P) Was unqueſtionably known to him, both in regard to its ingredients and effects.] It is in the firſt place to be obſerved, that our author died near one hundred years before the invention of gun-powder, according to the ordinary computation; but that he was really acquainted with the ſecret, ſuch as have examined his works have readily confeſſed; and the only queſtion is, whether he has or has not fully revealed this ſecret. We ſhall have occaſion to ſay ſomething new upon this head, and which has not hitherto ever been taken notice of; but we will firſt lay down what has been generally advanced on this ſubject. In the ſixth chapter of his famous work of the Secrets of Nature and Art, he tells us, 'That 'from ſalt-petre and other ingredients, we are able 'to make a fire that ſhall burn at what diſtance we 'pleaſe.' In omnem diſtantiam quam volumus, poſſumus artificialiter componere ignem comburentem ex ſale petræ et aliis. He likewiſe mentions other methods of doing the ſame thing, and then ſpeaking of the effects of theſe ſtrange fires, he ſays, 'That 'ſounds like thunder, and corruſcations may be 'formed in the air, and even with greater horror 'than thoſe which happen naturally; for a little 'matter, properly diſpoſed, about the bigneſs of a 'man's thumb, makes a dreadful noiſe, and occa-'ſions a prodigious corruſcation: And this, ſays he, 'is done ſeveral ways, by which a city or an army 'may be deſtroyed, after the manner of Gideon's ſtra-'tagem, who having broken the pitchers and lamps, 'and the fire iſſuing out with an inexpreſſible noiſe, 'killed an infinite number of the Midianites, with 'only three hundred men.' Nam ſoni velut tonitrus & corruſcationes poſſunt fieri in aëre, immo majore horrore quam illa quæ fiunt per naturam. Nam modica materia adaptata, ſcilicet ad quantitatem unius pollicis, ſonum facit horribilem & corruſcationem oſtendit vehementem; & hoc fit multis modis quibus civitas aut exercitus deſtruatur, ad modum artificii Gideonis qui lagunculis fractis & lampadibus, igne exſiliente cum fragore inæſtimabili, infinitum Midianitarum deſtruxit exercitum cum trecentis hominibus (98). This very plainly proves, that he knew the effects that ſuch a compoſition, as what we now call gun-powder, would produce; and if it were of any conſequence to make this point ſtill clearer, it might very eaſily be done from another paſſage in his Opus Majus, wherein he expreſſes himſelf in yet ſtronger terms upon the ſame ſubject. But ſtill a queſtion may be aſked, Was this thundering powder preciſely the ſame with that which we call gun-powder? In anſwer to this, Dr. Plot tells us poſitively, that the alia before mentioned in a MS. copy of the ſame treatiſe, in the hands of the learned Dr. G. Langbain, which was ſeen by Dr. John Wallis, was explained to be ſulphur and wood-coal (99). We are told the ſame thing by the judicious Dr. Freind (100); but who vouches that theſe words were of Bacon's writing? It was no difficult thing, when ſaltpetre and a thundering powder was mentioned, to think of ſulphur and wood-coal; but the point is, did Roger Bacon think of it? If he did, how does this appear? I anſwer, from all the MSS. of this very treatiſe, but never in the place theſe learned gentlemen looked for it; for our author did not then intend to reveal it. But after he had written his treatiſe, of the ſecret Works of Nature and Art, he added two appendixes, which are the tenth and eleventh chapters, in which he farther explains to him correſpondent, ſome paſſages which appeared to him obſcure transmuting metals, of which he has left many treatises, some published, and some still remaining in MS. which, whatever they may be thought of now, procured him the reputation of an adept, among the greatest masters in that mysterious branch of learning; and in which writings, there are, without doubt, a multitude of curious and useful passages, which, independently of their principal subject, will render them always valuable (r) [Q]. The third discovery in Chemistry which deserves the reader's attention, was the tincture of gold for the prolongation of life, of which, as Dr. Freind says, he has given obscure in the foregoing work; and it is in the last of these chapters, that he divulges this secret; yet not absolutely; but in a cypher, by transposing the letters of two of the words, for thus it is set down: Sed tamen salis petræ LURU MOPE CAN UBRE et sulphuris; et sic facies tonitrum et corruscationem, si scias artificium (101). So that if the words carbonum pulvere were set down in the sixth chapter of Dr. Langbain's MS. they were taken from hence; the author, as I observed before, not intending at that time to mention all the ingredients of this dangerous discovery, for if he had, there would have been no need of his appendix.

[Q] Will render them always valuable.] We have already considered our author in the several lights of a Philologist, a Critic, a Mathematician, a Mechanist, a Natural Philosopher, an Astronomer, and are now come to view him in that of a Chemist. He was, as we have shewn in the text, one of the earliest in Europe, and contemporary with Albertus Magnus, or Albert the Great, Bishop of Ratisbon; a man exactly of Bacon's temper; for he quitted his bishopric, that he might pursue the pleasures of Experimental Philosophy in quiet, in a monastery at Cologne (102). Yet our author appears to have had no instructor, but gathered all from his books and his own meditation. However, with this assistance only, he became the greatest Chemist of his own time beyond comparison, and perhaps, without exceeding truth, we might say, of any other. His writings on this subject are highly finished, and they seem to speak the master in every line. His style is neat, elegant, concise, perspicuous, and expressive; so that the reader not only understands whatever he delivers, but is also sensible at the same time, that he perfectly understood what he wrote. The most considerable of his chemical works have been printed; but the MSS. which were at Oxford are now at Leyden, being carried abroad amongst those of Vossius. In these pieces of his he attempts to prove, that imperfect minerals may be ripened into perfect metals. He maintains Geber's principles, that mercury is the common basis of all metals, and sulphur the cement. Upon these principles he shews, that it is by a gradual depuration of the mercurial matter, and the accession of a subtile sulphur, that nature forms gold; and that if while the gold is producing any third matter intervenes, some baser metal arises, according to the nature of the intervening substance. Hence he infers, that it is a thing very practicable by pursuing nature's method, to purify and change all baser metals into gold (103). He is so perfectly clear in all he has written on this subject, and appears to have been so well versed from experience in the facts which he lays down, and the consequences he draws from them, that one would be tempted to imagine, some of those trials were actually made by him, that in latter times have passed for new experiments. The late Duke of Orleans, Regent of France, and one of the most curious and inquisitive, as well as knowing and penetrating Princes that have lived in our times, commanded an excellent Chemist to examine into the nature of metals, and more especially of gold, that it might appear, whether the old principles of the Arabs (most clearly defined, and rationally explained by our author) were solid truths, or empty chimeras. This was putting the ancient science of Chemistry to the experimentum crucis, and giving posterity an opportunity of learning, by unexceptionable trials, what was to be depended upon in this respect. If our author and his instructors had been, as some have fancied, mere enthusiasts and dreamers, their folly had been now discovered and exploded; but the very contrary of this happened, and the experimental Philosophers, who profess themselves only the disciples of nature, have been obliged to adopt, or at least to admit, the principles of the Chemists. But to come closer to the point, and to compare the doctrine of our Bacon with the conclusions of the French proficient. The former we know laid it down in direct terms, that the component parts of gold, are, a most pure mercury, and a subtile sulphur (104). On the other hand, M. Homberg, in his Essai du souffre principe, gives us two experiments, the first with mercury, which upon being exposed to a digesting heat, ceases to be fluid, becomes a powder heavier than mercury, and at length acquires such a fixedness, as to be capable of remaining red-hot for twenty-four hours without loss, though upon applying a naked fire, the greatest part flies off in fume, leaving a piece of hard metal formed of the mercury behind. The other experiment is with regulus of antimony, which, upon being exposed to the Duke of Orleans's great burning-glass to calcine, gained one-eighth part in weight: from the experiments he concludes, that light may be introduced into porous bodies, may there fix and increase both their weight and bulk, and that the light thus retained in mercury, becomes inseparable therefrom in the most vehement fire, and even changes the form of the mercury into a malleable ductile metal, heavier than any other metal, except gold. In another place the same author argues, that gold consists principally of two kinds of matter, viz. mercury or quicksilver, and a metallic sulphur; the latter, according to him, being no other than light; either of which being taken apart, evaporates with the least heat, but when joined together in a metal, after the manner just mentioned, they lose their volatility, and become so fixed, that the most intense fire of our laboratories cannot separate them (105). Thus this very knowing and judicious person, who, in consequence of all the trials and experiments he ran through on this subject, was never taught to speak clearer or more assuredly than our author, who lived so many ages before him. But let us next hear a greater and more famous author among the moderns than Homberg; I mean the most excellent and incomparable Boerhaave, whose learning, great as it was, yielded much to his veracity, and whose diligence was only equalled by his candour. This admirable man, who had not only the courage to seek truth wherever she might be met with, but likewise to own where he met with her, let it be in what place it would, discourses thus, both on the subject and of our author (106). 'By all that I have hitherto delivered, 'it appears, that Chemistry is of great use and 'extent through all, or at least the chief of, the mechanical arts, so that they who cultivate them might 'truly be called artificers, and make incredible improvements in their several provinces, if at the same 'time they were skilled in Chemistry: consequently 'there are many and weighty reasons to induce men 'to superadd Chemistry to all the other sciences employed in the consideration or changing of bodies; 'and, lastly, carefully to observe, and faithfully write 'down such effects as arise therefrom, to be afterwards reduced into order and made public, that by 'a number of contributions thus brought from all 'quarters, the arts may at length be brought to perfection. What was in my power I have endeavoured 'to perform in this undertaking, wherein, though I 'make no great advances, I am of some use, as I 'have set an example of labour before you, which 'with the advantage of genius, may lead you on 'to make much greater discoveries. I come now to 'add a few, but candid and ingenuous, considerations on the great use of Chemistry in Alchemy. 'To speak my mind freely, I have not met any 'writers on Natural Philosophy, who treat of the 'nature of bodies, so profoundly, and explained the 'manner of changing them so clearly, as those called 'Alchemists. To be convinced of this, read carefully their genuine writings; for instance, the piece 'of Raymond Lully, which he intitles Experiments, 'you will find him, with the utmost clearness and 'simplicity, given broad hints in his writings (s); and which it is very probable he would have laid open more fully, if his diſcourſes upon theſe, and other important ſubjects, had been received with the candour they deſerved. As it is, he has ſaid enough to ſhew that he was no pretender to this art, but underſtood as much of it (in this reſpect at leaſt) as any who have lived ſince his time (t) [R]. That he was far from being unſkilled in the art of phyſic, we might rationally conclude, from his extenſive knowledge in thoſe ſciences, ſimplicity, relating experiments, which explain the nature and actions of animals, vegetables, and foſſils: after this, you will hardly be able to name any author, wherein phyſical things are treated of to ſo much advantage. The bodies which Chemiſtry reſolves before our eyes, afford demonſtrations which call for our aſſent, infinitely more cogently than any words could do; by theſe we do what we ſay, and what we teach we perform; inſomuch, that theſe writers ſeem to have attempted to build that body of Philoſophy wiſhed for by the great Lord Bacon, viz. a Philoſophy, which ſhould lay down ſuch powers of bodies, as the bodies themſelves, when preſent, really exhibit effects to warrant, and conſequently, ſhould aſſign ſuch cauſes of things, as being given, will readily produce the things themſelves, ſo that when it pleaſed, it could do what it taught.' He then enters on a moſt judicious abridgment of the principles, practice, and promiſes of the Alchemiſts, the laſt of which he cenſures, as in ſome meaſure abſurd and extravagant. He adds, however, after all, this modeſt, candid, and moſt ſenſible concluſion (107). 'But enough is ſaid on this head. We are always to remember, that the limits of nature are by no means to be defined by us: things are taken for impoſſible, which are only unknown by the ignorant. The ancient writers ſpoke ſomething of a perpetual fire, which was of a ſolid nature, and endured even under water; but it was exploded as an idle chimera, though the ſame has ſince been actually diſcovered by Kraff, and prepared by Kunkel, deſcribed by Boyle, farther explained by Nieuwentyt, and more amply ſtill by Hoffman. Roger Bacon's artificial thunder and lightning were long laughed at as empty fictions, but have been diſcovered by Schwartz to be too true; and many of the other things related in the chapter of Natural Magic, will appear much more incredible to thoſe unacquainted with experiments, than that lead ſhould loſe its natural form and be converted into gold. Credulity is hurtful, and ſo is incredulity: the buſineſs therefore of a wiſe man is to try all things, hold faſt what is approved, never limit the power of God, nor aſſign bounds to nature.' Such are the ſentiments of the learned and unprejudiced Boerhaave on this ſubject, and as to our author, whoſe reputation as a Chemiſt has been always higheſt among thoſe, by whom the practice of this art was beſt underſtood, becauſe they found from their own experience, the correctneſs, cloſeneſs, and veracity of all his numerous writings.

[R] As any who have lived ſince his time.] In this note I intend to examine what our author's notions were, in regard to the medicinal virtues of gold, of which, as the learned Phyſician quoted in the text, ſays, he gave broad hints of a tincture, which muſt have been a ſort of aurum potabile, or golden elixir. There is no doubt to be made, that our author had a very high opinion of gold as a medicine. It is the firſt in his liſt of ſecret or concealed medicines, which he recommends to Pope Nicholas IV.; and the phraſe he uſes to expreſs it is, the medicine found in the bowels of the earth. He largely explains its virtues, and ſhews particularly how great they are in the cure of head-achs, palſies, and other diſorders which ſpring from the brain. He ſays, That Ariſtotle thought the life of man could not be preſerved by any preparation from gold, becauſe gold itſelf is periſhable, or at leaſt the medicines drawn from it: but our author adviſes the Pope not to believe this; for, ſays he, This medicine will do admirable things when it is well prepared, and thoroughly drawn out. That he might alſo ſhew what he meant by this drawing out, he tells his Holineſs, that perhaps the liquor was of that kind; i. e. a tincture of gold, which an old huſbandman in the kingdom of Sicily found, as he was ploughing, in a gold veſſel. The man, it ſeems, was hot and faint, and taking this yellowiſh water, which the veſſel contained, for a kind of dew, he greedily ſwallowed it, which ſo entirely changed his habit of body and complexion, that of an old man of ſixty he became like one of thirty, his judgment, memory, and underſtanding, becoming much better than they were before; ſo that of a labouring peaſant he became a courtier, and was advanced to be a gentleman of the chamber to William King of Sicily, in whoſe ſervice (and that of his ſucceſſor's I ſuppoſe) he lived fourſcore years. This fact ſeems to have been very well known, for our author mentions it thrice: Firſt, in his book of the Secrets of Art and Nature (108), again in his Opus Majus (109), and, laſtly, in this book of the Cure of Old Age (110); and it is from all three relations that I have collected the ſeveral circumſtances before mentioned. But I cannot help obſerving upon this occaſion, that our author not only hints at the tincture of gold; but alſo at another tincture much beyond it in operation, which is the famous medicine taken notice of in a former note, and of which I propoſe to ſay ſomething here, becauſe I think it is not impoſſible to give a better account of it, than has been hitherto done. But firſt it will be requiſite to give the author's deſcription. 'Wiſe men, ſays he, have cautiouſly made mention of a certain medicine, which reſembles that going out of the mine of the noble animal. They affirm, that in it there is a force and virtue, which reſtores and increaſes the natural heat: as to its diſpoſition, they ſay it is like youth itſelf, and contains an equal and temperate complexion; and the ſigns of a temperate compexion in men are, when their colour is made up of white and red, when the hair is yellow inclining to redneſs and curling. According to Pliny, when the fleſh is moderate both in quality and quantity, when a man's dreams are delightful, his countenance chearful and pleaſant, and when his appetite of eating and drinking is moderate. This medicine indeed is like to ſuch a complexion, for it is of a temperate heat, its fume is temperate and ſweet, and grateful to the ſmell. When it departs from this temperature, it departs ſo far from its virtue and goodneſs. This medicine therefore doth temperately heat, becauſe it is temperately hot; it therefore heals becauſe it is whole, when it is ſick, it makes a man ſick, when it is diſtempered, it breeds diſtempers, and changeth the body to its own diſpoſition, becauſe of the ſimilitude it hath with the body; for the infirmity of a brute animal rarely paſſeth into a man, but into another animal of the ſame kind; but the infirmity of a man paſſeth into man, and ſo doth health becauſe of likeneſs. Know (moſt gracious Prince) that in this there is a great ſecret; for Galen ſaith, that whatever is diſſolved from any thing, it muſt of neceſſity be aſſimilated to that thing, as is manifeſt in diſeaſes paſſing from one to another; ſuch as weakneſs of the eyes and peſtilential diſeaſes. This thing hath an admirable property; for it doth not only render human bodies harmleſs from corruption, but it defends alſo the bodies of plants from putrefaction; this thing is ſeldom found, and although ſometimes it be found, yet it cannot commodiouſly be had of all men; and inſtead of it, the wiſe do uſe that medicine which is in the bowels of the earth complete and prepared, and that which ſwims in the ſea, and that which is in the ſquare ſtone of the noble animal, ſo that every part may be free from the infection of another: but if that ſtone cannot be acquired, let other elements ſeparated, divided, and purified, be made uſe of; now when this thing is like to youth, that is of temperate complexion, it hath good operations, if its temperature be better, it produceth better effects, ſometimes it is even in the higheſt degree of its perfection, and then it operates beſt, and then there is that property whereof we have ſpoken before. This differs from other medicines and nutriments, which heat and moiſten ſciences, which have the neareſt relation thereto: but beſides this, we have a particular and manifeſt proof of his perfect acquaintance with the moſt material and uſeful branches of Phyſic, in his Treatiſe of Old Age, which, as Dr. Freind, whoſe authority on that ſubject cannot well be diſputed, obſerves, is very far from being ill written (u); and Dr. Brown, who publiſhed it in Engliſh, eſteemed it one of the beſt performances that ever was written (w). In this work he has collected whatever he had met with upon the ſubject, either in Greek or Arabian writers, and has added a great many remarks of his own. The whole, conſidering the time in which it was written, is in reality a very extraordinary performance, in point both of learning and judgment, and will appear the more curious and the more valuable, the oftener it is read, and the more it is conſidered [S]. In Logic and Metaphyſics he was excellently well verſed, as appears by thoſe

' moiſten after a certain temperate manner, and are ' good for old men; for other meditines principally ' heat and moiſten the body, and ſecondarily they ' ſtrengthen the native heat; but this doth princi- ' pally ſtrengthen the native heat, and after that re- ' freſhes the body by moiſtening and heating it: for ' it reduces this heat in old men, who have it but ' weakly and deficient, to a certain ſtronger and more ' vehement power: if a plaiſter be made hereof, ' and applied to the ſtomach, it will help very much; ' for it will refreſh the ſtomach itſelf and excite an ' appetite. It will very much recreate an old man, ' and change him to a kind of youth, and will make ' complexions, by what means ſoever depraved or ' corrupted, better. Many wiſe men have ſpoken ' but little of this thing; they have indeed laid down ' another thing like it, as Galen in his fifth book of ' ſimple Medicines, and Johannes Damaſcenus in his ' Aphoriſms. But it is to be obſerved, that Venus doth ' weaken and diminiſh the power and virtue of this ' thing; and it is very likely that the ſon of the ' Prince, in his ſecond Canon of the Operations of ' Simple Medicines, ſpoke of this thing, where he ' ſaith, that there is a certain medicine concealed by ' wiſe men, leſt the incontinent ſhould offend their ' creator; there is ſuch a heat in this thing, as is in ' young men of a ſound complexion; and if I durſt ' declare the properties of this heat, this moſt hidden ' ſecret ſhould preſently be revealed; for this heat ' doth help the palſical, it reſtores and preſerves the ' waſted ſtrength of the native heat, cauſeth it to flou- ' riſh in all the members, and gently revives the aged.' It is from this deſcription that Dr. Brown (111), as we before obſerved, concludes, that the medicine here recommended, was a healthy young woman of a proper complexion. But whoever will conſider the whole of this account attentively, and will compare it with what our author ſays upon the ſame ſubject in his Opus Majus (112), in which he ſpeaks much more clearly than in this treatiſe, will (or I am much miſtaken) ſee good grounds to believe, that this medicine is no other than the great ſecret, the grand elixir of the Chemiſts, far beyond the tincture of gold in its effects, though where this cannot be had, that may be uſed (according to our author) for the ſame purpoſe, but with leſs ſucceſs.

[S] The oftener it is read, and the more it is conſidered.] There never was an author who took more pains to finiſh and perfect his diſcourſes than Friar Bacon, who was continually reviewing, retouching, and augmenting his pieces; that as he grew older and wiſer, theſe children of his brain might partake of their parent's fortune. The ſubject of this book appears plainly to have thrice exerciſed its author's application; for it makes the ſeventh chapter of his celebrated treatiſe of the Secret Works of Art and Nature. He reviſed it again, and inſerted ſo much of it as he thought proper in his Opus Majus (113); yet in both theſe works he delivers himſelf only in general terms: but in this laſt treatiſe, which was written for the uſe of Pope Nicholas the Fourth, he deſcends to practice, and gives thoſe receipts in direct and expreſs terms, which he had only hinted at before. If the reader inclines to ſee the ſubject of all theſe three treatiſes in a narrow compaſs, and to take a view of the author's theory, as to the extent of human life, he may find it in the following extract from his firſt work; which contains a ſhort view of his whole ſyſtem (114). ' The poſſibility of prolong- ' ing life, ſays he, is confirmed by this: That a man ' is naturally immortal, that is, able not to die, and ' even after he had ſinned, he could live near a thouſand ' years: afterwards, by little and little, the length ' of his life was abbreviated; therefore, it muſt needs ' be, that this abbreviation is accidental. Therefore, ' it might be either wholly repaired, or at leaſt in ' part. But if we would but make inquiry into the ' accidental cauſe of this corruption, we ſhould find ' it neither was from Heaven, nor from ought but ' want of a regimen of health. For in as much as ' the fathers are corrupt, they beget children of a ' corrupt complexion and compoſition, and their chil- ' dren from the ſame cauſe are corrupt themſelves, ' and ſo corruption is derived from father to ſon, ' till abbreviation of life prevails by ſucceſſion. Yet ' for all this it does not follow, that it ſhall always ' be cut ſhorter and ſhorter, becauſe a term is ſet ' in human kind, that men ſhould at the moſt of their ' years arrive at fourſcore, but more is their pain ' and ſorrow. Now the remedy againſt every man's ' proper corruption is, if every man from his youth ' would exerciſe a complete regimen, which conſiſts ' in theſe things; meat and drink, ſleep and watch- ' ing, motion and reſt, evacuation and retention, air, ' the paſſions of the mind: for if a man would ob- ' ſerve this regimen from his nativity, he might live ' as long as his nature aſſumed from his parents would ' permit, and might be led to the utmoſt term of ' nature, lapſed from original righteouſneſs, which ' term nevertheleſs he could not paſs; becauſe this ' regimen does not avail in the leaſt againſt the old ' corruption of our parents. But it being in a manner ' impoſſible, that a man ſhould be ſo governed in the ' mediocrity of theſe things, as the regimen of health ' requires, it muſt of neceſſity be, that abbreviation ' of life do come from this cauſe, and not only from ' the corruption of our parents. Now the art of ' Phyſic determines this regimen ſufficiently. But ' neither rich, nor poor, neither wiſe men, nor fools, ' nor Phyſicians themſelves, how ſkilful ſoever, are ' able to perfect this regimen, either in themſelves ' or others, as is clear to every man. But nature is ' not deficient in neceſſaries, nor is art complete; ' yea it is able to reſiſt and break through all acci- ' dental paſſions, ſo as they may be deſtroyed, either ' altogether or in part: and in the beginning when ' men's age began to decline, the remedy had been ' eaſy; but now after more than five thouſand years, ' it is difficult to appoint a remedy. Nevertheleſs, ' wiſe men, being moved with the aforeſaid con- ' ſiderations, have endeavoured to think of ſome ' ways, not only againſt the defect of every man's ' proper regimen, but againſt the corruption of our ' parents. Not that a man can be reduced to the ' life of Adam or Arteſius, becauſe of prevailing cor- ' ruption; but that life might be prolonged a cen- ' tury of years or more beyond the common age of ' men now living, in that the paſſions of old age ' might be retarded, and if they could not altogether ' be hindered, they might be mitigated; that life ' might uſefully be prolonged, yet always on this ſide ' the utmoſt term of nature; for the utmoſt term of ' nature is that which was placed in the firſt men ' after ſin, and there is another term from the cor- ' ruption of every one's own parents. It is no man's ' fortune to paſs beyond both theſe terms; but one may ' well the term of his proper corruption. Nor yet ' do I believe, that any man, how wiſe ſoever, can ' attain the firſt term, though there be the ſame poſ- ' ſibility and aptitude of human nature to that term, ' which was in the firſt men: nor is it a wonder, ' ſince this aptitude extends itſelf to immortality as ' it thoſe parts of his works, in which he has treated of theſe ſubjects: neither was he unſkilled in Philology and the politer parts of learning, as might be demonſtrated from his writings, if we had not touched upon ſo many ſubjects already (*). In Ethics, or Moral Philoſophy, he was a very great maſter; and as he was a man of good ſenſe and unblemiſhed probity, ſo he has laid down the nobleſt and moſt generous principles for the conduct of human life, in the treatiſe he has left us upon that ſubject (y) [T]. But as his profeſſion and courſe of life required a particular application to Theology, ſo it plainly appears, that he made all his other ſtudies ſubſervient thereto, and directed both his actions and his writings to the glory of God, and the good of his fellow-creatures. He had the higheſt deference for the Holy Scriptures, and thought that in them were contained the principles of true ſcience, and of all uſeful knowledge. He therefore preſſed the ſtudy of them in their original languages, and an aſſiduous application to the ſeveral branches of learning, which he thought neceſſary for the thorough underſtanding of them (z). To ſay the truth, the impreſſing this ſtrongly on the minds of men, who made religion peculiarly their profeſſion, is the great endeavour of all his works; as the applying this properly was the buſineſs of his laſt treatiſe, which he left as a kind of Teſtament to thoſe of his order, and is a very excellent work in its kind [U].

(*) See the note [K].

(y) This Treatiſe was by the author annexed to his Opus Majus.

(z) Opus Majus, p. 29, 30.

As to the vulgar imputation on his character, of his leaning to Magic, it was utterly unfounded; and the ridiculous ſtory of his making a brazen head, which ſpoke and anſwered queſtions, is a calumny indirectly fathered upon him, having been origi-

' it was before ſin, and will be after the reſurrection. ' But if you ſay, that neither Ariſtotle, nor Plato, ' nor Hippocrates, nor Galen, arrived at ſuch pro- ' longation; I anſwer you, nor at many mean truths, ' which were after known to other ſtudents; and ' therefore they might be ignorant of theſe great ' things, although they made their aſſay: but they ' buſied themſelves too much in other things, and ' they were quickly brought to old age, while they ' ſpent their lives in worſe and common things, be- ' fore they perceived the ways to the greateſt of ſe- ' crets. For we know that Ariſtotle ſaith in his ' Predicaments, that the quadrature of the circle is ' poſſible, but not then known, and he confeſſes, ' that all men were ignorant of it even to his time: ' but we know that in theſe our days this truth is ' known, and therefore, well might Ariſtotle be ig- ' norant of far deeper ſecrets of nature. Now alſo ' wiſe men are ignorant of many things, which in ' time to come every common ſtudent ſhall know; ' therefore this objection is every way vain.' Theſe were the thoughts of our author when he firſt turned his inquiries upon this ſubject, and it is upon theſe principles that he reaſons in his third book. It is remarkable that he profeſſes in all his treatiſes, that he had never made any experiments upon himſelf, whence one might be tempted to conclude, that though he did not ſuffer his misfortunes ſo to break his ſpirits, as to hinder him from purſuing his ſtudies; yet was he ſo little pleaſed with life, that he would not take any meaſures to prolong it; notwithſtanding the ſentiments he was in as to that point. For though it might be ſurmiſed, that Bacon might amuſe others with grave diſcourſes accommodated to their humours, though not at all to his own belief; yet whoever reads his works, will evidently perceive that ſuch notions muſt be utterly groundleſs; ſince there is not only the ſtrongeſt character of veracity in all he writes, but the whole is ſo ſyſtematical, that one part ſuſtains another in ſuch a manner, that it is almoſt impoſſible to form any doubts, or to fall into any miſtakes about his opinions, when his Opus Majus has been once thoroughly peruſed and attentively conſidered; becauſe it is a kind of key to all the reſt.

[T] In the treatiſe he has left us upon this ſubject.] The ſentiments of our author on morality, are very ſingular, both in this treatiſe, and in other parts of his works; for he conſidered Moral Philoſophy as the end and perfection of all human knowledge. He therefore conſidered all ſpeculative ſcience, as uſeful or uſeleſs in proportion as it contributed to the advantage of mankind. He declares, That, in his judgment, the Moral Philoſophy of Chriſtians is the ſame with their Divinity; and that though it is by far more perfect than the Philoſophy of the Pagans, yet it reſts upon and takes in their principles; ſo that he makes Natural Religion the ground-work, and Revealed, the ſtructure, ſuppoſing each neceſſary to the other; and therefore, not to be ſeparated or divided. He conſtantly manifeſts ſo much clearneſs and good ſenſe, in treating every ſubject, and this, notwithſtanding the difficulties under which he laboured, and his differing almoſt upon every topick from the notions then in vogue, that inſtead of wondering, there was ſo ſtrong a clamour againſt him, we ought rather to wonder that he was able to ſupport himſelf at all againſt the tide of popular prejudice, which is always ſtrongeſt in the moſt ignorant ages. To ſay the truth, Bacon was the fartheſt from being a popular writer, perhaps of any man that ever wrote; and this I take to be one reaſon, why his writings have hitherto been admired only by the few, and I very much queſtion, whether any age will ariſe ſo learned and ſo juſt, as to afford them a general reception.

[U] And is a very excellent work in its kind.] Beſides the MS. in the Royal Library, there are ſeveral others ſtill remaining, ſome more, and ſome leſs perfect. Mr. Theyer, of Glouceſterſhire, had ſeveral parts of this work (115); and perhaps there are ſome copies of it yet undiſcovered, which, however, might be brought to light, if any man of equal learning and induſtry with the excellent editor of his Opus Majus, would undertake the publication of it, which could not but prove extremely agreeable to the learned world, ſince it contains a multitude of things, that one would ſcarcely expect to find in a performance under this title. For it was the cuſtom of our author, never to confine his thoughts too ſtrictly unto any particular ſubject; but, on the contrary, believing, as he did, that all ſciences had a relation amongſt themſelves, and were of uſe to each other, and all of them to Theology; it was very natural for him to illuſtrate this, in a work calculated to ſhew how the ſtudy of Divinity might be beſt promoted. It might alſo let us into many particulars, relating to the Eccleſiaſtical and Literary Hiſtory of thoſe times, which could not but be very curious and inſtructive. We may add to all this, that it would undoubtedly have very good effects, in elucidating and explaining the other works of our author, which are already made public, and which are in many places not a little obſcure. We may ſay the ſame thing, with regard to other treatiſes of our author yet remaining, but never hitherto printed; all of which, if carefully conſidered and compared, might be of very great uſe; the rather becauſe there are ſome things hinted at in ſeveral parts of Bacon's works, which if we could derive lights ſufficient from his hitherto unpubliſhed works, perfectly to underſtand, might be of as great benefit to mankind, as any of thoſe diſcoveries, which, though now common, have given great credit to this author, ſince it appeared from his works, that they were originally due to him, or at leaſt, that they were long before in his poſſeſſion. It would be no very difficult matter to give inſtances of theſe things, but that we have already exceeded our ordinary bounds, and are therefore forced to confine ourſelves more ſtrictly, that theſe memoirs may not exceed the juſt rules of proportion.

nally imputed to his patron Robert Groſthead, Biſhop of Lincoln (a) [W]. The pains therefore that have been taken to vindicate him in this reſpect, by the learned Gabriel Naudé (b), and other writers, however charitably deſigned, were not very neceſſary; and that he had too high an opinion of Judicial Aſtrology, and ſome other arts of that nature, was not ſo properly an error of his as of the age in which he lived: and conſidering how few errors, among the many which infected that age, appear in his writings, it may be eaſily forgiven (c). As his whole life was ſpent in labour and ſtudy, and he was continually employed, either in writing for the information of the world, or in reading and making experiments, that might enable him to write with greater accuracy; ſo we need not wonder his works were extremely numerous, eſpecially when it is conſidered, that on the one hand his ſtudies took in the whole circle of the ſciences, and that on the other, the numerous treatiſes aſcribed to him, are, often in fact, but ſo many chapters, ſections, or diviſions; and ſometimes we have the ſame pieces under two or three different names: ſo that it is not at all ſtrange before theſe points were well examined, that the accounts we have of his writings appeared very perplexed and confuſed [X]. But notwithſtanding this ſeeming perplexity and confuſion, it is not a very difficult thing, from [W] Originally imputed to his patron, Robert Groſthead, Biſhop of Lincoln.] One may very eaſily imagine, how when the common people are at a loſs to account for any thing, they ſhould call in, more eſpecially in the darkeſt and moſt ignorant ages, the aſſiſtance of the Devil. To them this is as eaſy and as neceſſary, as the machinery of the poets, or of the playhouſe, and anſwers the end as effectually: but what is moſt extraordinary, and which really deſerves wonder, is, that men of good ſenſe, and no way deſpicable in their underſtandings, ſhould adopt theſe ſilly tales, and publiſh them to the world as truths. Yet this happened to many others beſides our author, and thoſe too of the worthieſt perſons of the ages in which they lived. As for inſtance, William of Malmſbury (116) tells us very gravely, of Pope Sylveſter II., who flouriſhed in the XIth century, that he made ſuch a head under certain conſtellations, which would ſpeak when ſpoken to, and oraculouſly anſwer ſuch queſtions as were propoſed to it. But it ſeems theſe anſwers were confined to ſingle words. For the ſame writer tells us, that being aſked by his maſter, Whether he ſhould ever become Pope? it anſwered Yes; and when he inquired, Whether he ſhould die before he ſung Maſs in Jeruſalem? it anſwered No. Which, however, proved a lie, for the Pope died at Rome: but to keep up the credit of this ſtory it was pretended, that he died on that Sunday, which in the Roman Ritual is intitled, Statio ad Jeruſalem, immediately after he had ſung Maſs. After this fooliſh ſtory had got into the world, without any other foundation than the Pope's being a great Mathematician, there never aroſe in any country a perſon of extraordinary abilities, eſpecially in thoſe ſciences that were leaſt cultivated, but preſently he was reported to have made a brazen head. Hence Robert Groſthead, Biſhop of Lincoln, is reported by an ancient writer of his life in verſe, to have made ſuch a brazen head when he was Maſter of Arts at Oxford, which being broken by ſome accident, the relics thereof are ſaid by him to have been kept in a vault under Lincoln College (117). Something of the ſame kind is thrown out by John Gower the poet (118). And indeed the ſtory was ſo univerſally ſpread, and ſo firmly believed among the vulgar, that becauſe Roger Bacon was his diſciple, they could not help ſuppoſing, that he muſt be as learned in theſe ſecret arts as his maſter, and therefore they beſtowed a brazen head upon him too, in conjunction with Friar Bungy. But the deſign of making this head was ſo extraordinary, and the end it met with ſo odd, that it deſerves to be remembered. For theſe two learned Friars were no leſs than ſeven years employed in framing it, and the matter about which they were to inquire, was, Whether it might not be poſſible to build a wall of braſs round this iſland? But as they had a great many things upon their hands, it ſeems they forgot the time at which their head was to ſpeak, and ſo loſt the opportunity of hearing the anſwer diſtinctly, and thus their labour being vain, and the head in a manner uſeleſs, it was demoliſhed (119). But of all the great men who are fooliſhly ſaid to have dealt in brazen heads, Albertus Magnus was the moſt extraordinary; for he is ſaid to have made not barely a head, but a man, who not only anſwered queſtions very readily and truly when demanded, but was alſo ſo flippant with his brazen tongue, that Thomas Aquinas, a reſerved and contemplative perſon, and pupil at that time to Albertus Magnus, knocked the idol to pieces to ſtop its talking (120). Theſe great men lived at the ſame time with our author, and it is not impoſſible that he might have heard ſomething of this nature; for in a work of his which has been often mentioned, he deplores the attributing every thing that was great and remarkable to the power of Art Magic, which hindered the propagation, as it alſo did the reputation, of true ſcience, depriving men thereby of that reward, which could alone encourage them to take the pains neceſſary to ſucceed in the purſuit of uſeful knowledge. The moſt learned Selden (121), in a diſcourſe of his, wherein, with vaſt reading and judgment, he has examined the riſe and progreſs of theſe notions, declares poſitively, that this ſtory of Friar Bacon's brazen head was equally fooliſh and groundleſs, and never gained belief, but with the meaneſt and loweſt of the people. Yet there want not ſome writers who have had more credit than they deſerve, that have really doubted whether our author was not a Magician (122); and perhaps in this reſpect his character would not have been much aſſiſted, if the famous John Dee had publiſhed as well as promiſed his defence of him (123). To ſay the truth, there cannot be a greater injury offered to the memory of ſo wiſe a man, and ſo univerſal a ſcholar, as to treat ſuch a calumny as this with any degree of gravity, becauſe, in fact, there cannot be any thing more abſurd, or more ridiculous.

[X] The accounts we have of his writings appeared very perplexed and confuſed.] This was the natural conſequence of the bad uſage our author met with while living, and the great declenſion of learning after his death. Leland complains, that either through negligence, or other caſualties, the writings of Bacon were ſo diſperſed, that it would be eaſier to collect the leaves of the Sibyl, than the very names of the treatiſes he wrote. He ſets down, however, the titles of thirty, of which he had ſeen about a third part (124). The induſtrious Bale, by that time he finiſhed his uſeful collection, had met with and digeſted the titles of upwards of fourſcore pieces attributed to our author, of which he had ſeen near one half (125). Pits ſpeaks with amazement of the multitude of books written by our author, and increaſes the number of their titles to near one hundred (126). The learned Dr. Jebb has digeſted all theſe titles under the proper heads of the ſciences to which they belong; ſo that the whole of what was either written by, or attributed to, our author, appears to the eye of the reader at one view, as in the following table he will perceive.

So that on the whole we may very ſafely affirm, that the hiſtory, character, and reputation of Roger Bacon, are in a great meaſure reſtored; ſo that we may

[Y] Than even the learned imagined.] When we find on one hand, ſome modern authors complaining that almoſt all the works of our old writers are either deſtroyed out of malice; or, through careleſſneſs, have the monuments of their learning buried in oblivion; and on the other, ſee ſuch a multitude of books aſcribed to our old authors by Leland, Bale, and Pits, we can hardly tell what to believe, or how to doubt the truth of either of theſe aſſertions. Yet this inſtance of Roger Bacon may ſerve to ſhew us, that ſuch general expreſſions ought not to have too much weight; but that it becomes us to inquire as carefully as we can after theſe precious monuments of antiquity, notwithſtanding ſome who have gone before us in the ſearch, aſſure us it is to little or no purpoſe. At firſt ſight, it muſt appear an endleſs, and, at the ſame time, a fruitleſs labour, for us to endeavour to pick up all the little treatiſes written by Roger Bacon. Yet, for all this, it may be: the thing is not altogether as difficult as it ſeems: for, as the learned Dr. Jebb very juſtly obſerves, the number of our author's works may be much reduced, if we conſider, that the copies of his writings being diſperſed into ſeveral places, it fell out that the ſame tracts had different titles given them; and, which has added ſtill more to the confuſion, the titles of the ſeveral chapters of his works have been taken for the titles of ſo many treatiſes. Now to extricate ourſelves as well as may be out of theſe difficulties, let us conſider what our author himſelf tells us concerning his writings. He aſſerts in his Opus Majus, that before he ſet about that work, he had publiſhed only a few pieces, and we know that he wrote this book in the year 1267. The buſineſs then is to find out firſt of all theſe Capitula quædam, as he calls them, and then we are ſure we have his firſt writings. But this we ſhall find no very difficult matter, ſince it plainly appears, that the pieces addreſſed to William of Paris, were written before the Opus Majus, and were publiſhed altogether in 1542, under the title of Epiſtola Fratris Rogerii Baconis de ſecretis Operibus Artis et Naturæ, et de Nullitate Magiæ (127); i. e. 'The Epiſtle of Brother Roger Bacon of the ſecret Works of Art and Nature, and of the Non-Entity of Magic.' At the end of this treatiſe we have explicuit epiſtola Baconis, &c. ad Gulielmum Pariſienſem conſcripta. It is divided into eleven chapters, of which the two laſt (as we before obſerved) are appendixes or poſtſcripts. The other nine chapters, from their titles, appear to be what have paſſed for his treatiſes, de Poteſtate mirabili Artis et Naturæ; i. e. 'of the wonderful power of Art 'and Nature:' de Vigore Artis et Naturæ; i. e. 'of 'the Force of Art and Nature:' de Operibus occultis Naturæ; i. e. 'of the Secret Works of Nature:' de 'Operibus non occultis; i. e. 'of the Works not ſe-'cret:' de Rerum mirabilibus; i. e. 'of Wonders:' contra Necromanticos; i. e. 'againſt Necromancers;' de Necromanticis Imaginibus; i. e. 'of Necromantic 'Images:' de Geomantia; i. e. 'of Geomancy, or Di-'vination by Points:' de Excantationibus; i. e. 'of 'Charms:' de Practicis Magiæ; i. e. 'of the Prac-'tices of Magic:' and, de Prolongatione Vitæ; i. e. 'of the Prolongation of Life;' which is a different thing from that addreſſed to Pope Nicholas IV. on the ſame ſubject. As to the two laſt chapters, they are dated, but ſo confuſedly, that inſtead of affording any light, they have hitherto ſerved only to increaſe the obſcurity. For example, the tenth chapter begins in the ſix hundred and ſecond year of the Arabians; but it ſeems the manuſcript was ſo obſcure, that it might be read the ſix hundred eighty-eighth year of the Arabians. John Dee (128) takes the firſt date, and from thence infers, that our author wrote to Clement the Third, inſtead of Clement IV., becauſe the year 602 of the Hegira, anſwers to the year of Chriſt 1205, which is nine years before our author was born: the other date of 688 might poſſibly be true, ſince it anſwers to the year 1289, which is three years before our author's death. But though this be poſſible, yet it is far enough from being probable, and therefore we will next conſider the date of the eleventh chapter, or ſecond poſtſcript. This is A. H. 630, which anſwers the year of our Lord 1232, and to the eighteenth year of our author's life; whence I am perſuaded that both dates are wrong, nor do I know how it is poſſible to correct them. We may with certainty enough conclude, that theſe ſeveral little pieces were written before the year 1267, and that the two laſt chapters were penned ſome years after the reſt, and poſſibly A. H. 648 and 650. His next work was his Opus Majus, divided into ſix parts, and which had three tracts of his annexed. The ſeveral parts being ſeparately tranſcribed, with a proper and diſtinct title to each, increaſed the ſuppoſed number of our author's works, by at leaſt ſo many tracts. But let us explain this more particularly; and having ſo experienced a guide, as Dr. Jebb, to direct us, let us try if we cannot point out the particular treatiſes which are involved in that great work. In the two firſt books are contained the treatiſes which have hitherto gone under the titles of de Impedimentis Sapientiæ; i. e. 'of the Impedi-'ments to Wiſdom:' de Cauſis Ignorantiæ humanæ; i. e. 'of the Cauſes of Human Ignorance:' and, de Utilitate Scientiarum; i. e. 'of the Uſefulneſs of the 'Sciences.' The third book, is what was formerly called his book de Utilitate Linguarum; i. e. 'of the 'Uſe of Languages.' In the fourth book of the Opus Majus, are his tracts de Centris Gravium; i. e. 'of the Centres of heavy Bodies:' de Ponderibus; i. e. 'of Weights:' de Valore Muſices; i. e. 'of Muſic:' de Judiciis Aſtrologiæ; i. e. 'of the Judgments of 'Aſtrology:' de Coſmographia; i. e. 'of Coſmogra-'phy:' de Situ Orbis; i. e. 'of the Situation of the 'World:' de Regionibus Mundi; i. e. 'of the Regions 'of the World:' de Situ Paleſtinæ; i. e. 'of the 'Situation of Paleſtine:' de Locis Sacris; i. e. 'of 'the holy Places:' and, Deſcriptiones Locorum Mundi; i. e. 'Deſcription of the World.' To this fourth book is annexed his tract de Prognoſticis ex Stellis, in which is comprehended, de Utilitate Aſtronomiæ; i. e. 'of 'the

(127) Pariſ. 1542, 4*to.* Baſil. 1593, 8*vo.* Hamburgh, 1608. 1618, 8*vo.* It is alſo involved in the fifth volume of the Theatrum Chemicum, and in the firſt of the Bibliotheca Chemica Curioſa, of Mangetus.

may truly judge of them all, and determine from the light of evidence, of the uſage he has received from all parties. We may now juſtly applaud thoſe learned prelates of Canterbury and Lincoln, and all the great men who were the patrons of his junior years, the encouragers of his riper ſtudies, and the protectors of his injured innocence. We can plainly diſcern how harſhly, cruelly, and unjuſtly he was perſecuted, by the ignorant and malicious Monks of his order, who envied that learning which they ought to have imitated, and hated that reputation which it became them to admire. We know now with certainty to what Popes he addreſſed his writings, what thoſe writings were, and why they were addreſſed to them. We can form a juſt notion of the reaſon why he was honoured to ſo extraordinary a degree, by the moſt learned and the moſt worthy men of the age in which he flouriſhed, and how his writings have been in ſome ſort the ſtandard of a true taſte for ſcience; that is to ſay, ſought for and admired when it prevailed, neglected and miſrepreſented whenever it was clouded or obſcured. We are now ſenſible of the folly of thoſe prejudices, the falſhood of thoſe calumnies, and the cauſes of thoſe miſtakes, which have been ſpread concerning our author and his writings. Laſtly, we are enabled to diſcern, from the fulleſt and moſt authentic evidence, the juſtice and ſincerity of thoſe praiſes, which in the higheſt degree have been beſtowed upon him, by the ableſt writers and beſt judges of true and uſeful knowledge, in our own and in foreign countries [Z]. It is true, that a great deal of time and pains have been

' the Uſefulneſs of Aſtronomy;' Prognoſtica ex Siderum Curſu; i. e. ' Prognoſtics from the Courſe of the ' Stars;' and perhaps alſo his tract, de Aſpectibus Lunæ; i. e. ' of the Aſpects of the Moon.' His fifth part includes the various treatiſes of Perſpective aſcribed to him in the foregoing catalogue, viz. Perſpectiva quædam ſingularis, Perſpectiva diſtincta, and Perſpectiva continua. To the end of this book is added, his large treatiſe de Specierum Multiplicatione. In the ſixth book we find contained his tracts de Arte experimentali; i. e. ' of the experimental Art;' de Radiis ſolaribus; i. e. ' of the ſolar Rays;' and, de Coloribus per artem fiendis; i. e. ' of the Colours that ' may be produced by Art.' Beſides his Opus Majus, our author wrote two other pieces, and addreſſed them to the ſame patron, that is to ſay, Pope Clement IV. one of which he ſtiled his Opus Minus, and the other Opus Tertium, of which there are ſtill copies amongſt the MSS. in the Cotton library; but that of the Opus Minus is imperfect. It is not to be doubted, that in theſe works, abundance of the tracts which have been aſcribed to our author are involved; the rather, becauſe it is certain, that after the death of Pope Clement, Bacon reviſed and augmented theſe pieces, in order to render his ſyſtem more compleat, and of greater uſe to poſterity. There is in the Royal Library a treatiſe of our author's, which bears the title of Liber Naturalium Rogeri Bacon, which is the ſame that in the common catalogues of his works, is ſtiled Communia Naturalis Philoſophiæ; i. e. ' the Heads of ' Natural Philoſophy;' which, on a cloſer inſpection, appears to be the third part of the Opus Minus. On the whole, there is reaſon to believe, that in this treatiſe are comprehended the tracts following, de Summa Grammaticali, de Conſtructione Partium, de Logica, de Laudibus Artis Mathematicæ, Communis Naturalis Philoſophiæ, de Intellectu et Intelligibili, and de Univerſalibus. His treatiſe of Chronology, which in the MS. in the King's Library (129), is entitled Computus Rogeri Baconis, called by Balæus and Pitſeus Computus Naturalium. He divided it into three parts. At the end are ſubjoined a calendar and ſome aſtronomical tables, which, though they have not his name to them, are moſt probably of his own compoſition; ſince he tells us himſelf, that he had undertaken to draw up ſuch a ſet of tables, and ſome of them relate to the year 1269, which very well agrees with the age of Bacon (130). As to the chemical writings of our author, that are extant in MS. or in print, they are theſe; Tractatus duo de Chemia, i. e. ' Two Treatiſes ' of Chemiſtry.' Speculum Alchemiæ, ' Mirror of ' Alchemy.' Theſaurum Chymicum, i. e. ' Chemical ' Treaſure (131).' Specula Mathematica, i. e. ' Mathematical Mirrors.' Medulla Alchemiæ, in 8*vo*, ann. 1608, i. e. ' Marrow of Alchemy.' De Arte Chemia Scripta, i. e. ' Writings upon the Art of Chemiſtry.' Breviarium de dono Dei, ' Breviary of ' God's Gifts.' Verbum abbreviatum de Leone viridi, i. e. ' A ſhort Word of the Green Lyon.' Secretum ſecretorum Naturæ de laude Lapidis Philoſophorum, i. e. ' Secret of Nature's Secrets in praiſe of the Philoſopher's Stone.' Tractatus trium Verborum, i. e. ' Treatiſe of three Words.' Epiſtola de Modo miſcendi, i. e. ' Epiſtle on the Manner of mixing.' Epiſtola ſecretiſſima de Ponderibus, i. e. ' A ſecret Epiſtle of Weights.' Speculum ſecretorum, ' Mirror of ' Secrets.' It is not eaſy to aſſign the dates of theſe ſeveral pieces, but moſt probably they were written and ſent abroad before the time of his impriſonment; and they ſeem to have had a much greater currency than his other writings, ſince we find them frequently quoted by the ſucceeding ſages in that ſchool, ſuch as Norton, Ripley, &c. About the year 1288, he addreſſed to Pope Nicholas IV., his book De retardandis ſenectutis accidentibus, which being divided into three parts, each of theſe has been taken for a ſeparate treatiſe, and ſo the whole divided into De retardatione ſenectutis, i. e. ' Of the retarding Old Age.' De univerſali regimine ſenum, i. e. ' Of the Regimen for Men in Years;' and De conſervatione Senſuum, i. e. ' Of the ' Preſervation of the Senſes.' His laſt work, as we have already ſhewn, was his Compendium Theologiæ, i. e. ' Compendium of Divinity,' of which there are ſeveral MSS. yet in being, ſome more and ſome leſs perfect. Thus it plainly appears, that though it may be true, that ſome of our author's works are loſt, or at leaſt ſo hid, as that the public has no knowledge of them; yet that the far greater part of Bacon's works ſtill remain, and if they were publiſhed with the ſame care that has been taken about his Opus Majus, it would undoubtedly be an acceptable ſervice rendered to the commonwealth of learning, and contribute not a little, to the bringing ſuch pieces of our author to light, as are ſtill buried in obſcurity. We muſt likewiſe obſerve, in order to complete the deſign of this note, that ſeveral of the pieces mentioned in the foregoing catalogue, are falſly aſcribed to our author, and ought really to be accounted the works of other men. Such as the Treatiſe Of the Flux and Reflux of the Britiſh Sea, which belongs to William Burley (132). The diſcourſe on the Uſefulneſs of Aſtronomy, which is attributed to William Botoner (133). The treatiſe of the Magnet or Loadſtone, ſaid to have been written by Peter Peregrinus (134): The Rogerina Major & Minus, which as Dr. Freind juſtly obſerves, are not at all like to be his, but belong rather to Roger of Parma (135): The treatiſe on the Pſalms, and the Life of St. Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, we have already aſſerted to be the works of Robert Bacon (136). On the whole therefore it will appear, that we are already in a much better condition in this reſpect, than Leland thought was poſſible; and that we know much more of the life, character, and writings, of this famous man, than Bale or Pits, or any of the writers who tranſcribe from them; which is not ſaid with any deſign of diſcrediting their labours, but with a view to encourage others to ſurpaſs ours, and give ſtill a clearer account of this admirable perſon and his diſcoveries, to which we ſhall eſteem ourſelves happy, if we have any way contributed by the pains we have beſtowed.

been employed, as indeed they were moſt neceſſary, to bring theſe ſeveral points, with the authorities requiſite to ſupport them, to the view of the public: but, when the deſign

in their praiſes of much more inconſiderable perſons, and yet ſilent as to Roger Bacon, 'that ſurely ſome 'relation of ſo extraordinary a genius, would have 'as well deſerved to have had a place in their wri-'tings, as the detail of a blazing ſtar or a bloody 'ſhower, which they never fail to regiſter at large. 'And it might perhaps have been of as much uſe 'and pleaſure to the reader, as a long recital of 'the riſe and fall of a great miniſter, or the wars 'and victories of our Kings (137).' It is indeed doubtful, whether he would have been remembered at all in the times neareſt his own, if it had not been for the rumours ſpread amongſt the vulgar of his being a great Magician, and the honours paid him by the Alchemiſts at home and abroad, by whom he is always mentioned with great eſteem, and as one of the Patriarchs in their ſcience. Thus Thomas Norton, in his famous book on this ſubject, places him before Raymond Lully, and frequently cites his very words (138). He is alſo mentioned with great applauſe by George Ripley (139), which evidently ſhews, that his chemical works were univerſally known, among ſuch as addicted themſelves to that ſtudy. It is not at all ſtrange therefore, that when John Leland, with moſt laudable zeal, undertook to reſcue ſome part of the literary hiſtory of his country from oblivion; he found it ſo difficult to obtain any tolerable account of our author's life and writings; as to which, however, he made very diligent ſearch, and found enough to warrant his declaring our author, a man moſt diligent in acquiring every kind of learning, and juſtly meriting the title, of the miracle of the age in which he lived. Nay, ſo great an opinion had he of Bacon's learning, more eſpecially in the Mathematics, that he wiſhes for an hundred mouths and an hundred tongues to proclaim his praiſes, and moſt paſſionately deplores the various accidents, by which he was deprived of the pleaſure of peruſing all his works (140). Biſhop Bale, though carried away at firſt by the ſtream of common opinion, yet afterwards did him ample juſtice, and fairly acknowledges, that he was both an excellent Mathematician, and a moſt learned Philoſopher (141). John Pits gives him a very high character, and celebrates him as one perfectly ſkilled in Poetry, Rhetoric, and every part of polite learning, all the liberal arts, in the ſeveral branches of Mathematics, Phyſics, and Philoſophy, eminent in Divinity and Law, well read in Greek and Hebrew learning, and thoroughly verſed in all the monuments of venerable antiquity. So that, ſays he, there was nothing wanting to render him the moſt knowing perſon of his age, and in every various kind of knowledge, moſt excellent. He vindicates him from all the injurious calumnies that had been thrown upon him, and very juſtly pronounces them the effects of that envy, to which the ignorant are provoked againſt ſuch as diſtinguiſh themſelves by their extraordinary learning (142). After this, we find him mentioned with the greateſt honour, by the moſt learned and moſt judicious writers; and it began to be accounted a merit to publiſh his writings, and to defend his character. The famous Dr. John Dee (143) undertook the former, and promiſed the latter, and perhaps performed it too, though his work was never publiſhed. The learned Selden often mentions our author, with reverence and applauſe (144). The judicious Sir Thomas Brown ſpeaks of him with great reſpect, and takes particular notice of the ſtory of the brazen-head, which he tells us, ſaid no more than Time is. He will have it that this tale is too literally received, as being but a myſtical fable concerning the Philoſopher's great work, wherein he eminently laboured, implying no more by the copper-head, than the veſſel wherein it was wrought, and by the words it ſpake, than the opportunity to be watched of the birth of the myſtical child, or Philoſophical King; which critical opportunity having ſlipped, he miſſed the intended treaſure; which, ſays Sir Thomas, had he obtained, he might have made out the tradition of making a brazen wall about England; that is, the moſt powerful defence and ſtrongeſt fortification, which gold could have effected (145). But our author's memory has been indebted to none more than the induſtrious Anthony Wood, who, with incredible pains and diligence, firſt drew together the moſt remarkable paſſages of Friar Bacon's hiſtory, from his own, and from the writings of original authors near his time (146). We have already ſhewn what the learned Dr. Plot has ſaid in his defence, in his excellent Natural Hiſtory of Oxfordſhire: but it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that in another work of his, he takes notice of Friar Bacon's curious remarks, on the efficacy of unction and painting for preſerving the body, and thereby prolonging life (147); as alſo, of his having obſerved the motion of aſteriæ or ſtar ſtones in vinegar, four hundred years before he wrote (148). Our author is likewiſe celebrated for his diſcoveries by the famous Joſeph Glanvil, who wrote in defence of the Royal Society (149). The great Mr. Boyle ſpeaks of him as the father of the Chemiſts, and the author of that notion, that metals are compoſed of mercury and ſulphur, which however he does not abſolutely approve (150). The famous Dr. Cave ſays of him very truly, that being immerſed in philoſophic ſtudies, he wholly gave himſelf up to the ſearch of hidden things, ſo that penetrating into the ſecret receſſes of nature, he was able to aſſign the cauſes of things, and ſo to exert the effects of his wiſdom in practice, as, by the performance of extraordinary deeds, to create in the vulgar an apprehenſion of his being a Magician (151). We have often quoted Dr. Freind in his praiſe, ſo that we ſhall at preſent borrow only a few words from him, and theſe ſuch as ſhew him to have been a very impartial judge. 'We find, ſays he, enough in him 'to let us ſee, that the purſuit after the Philoſopher's 'ſtone began early; and Lully, who owns himſelf 'his diſciple (which probably might be when both 'were at Paris) carried theſe viſionary notions to an 'extravagant height. However, there is a great 'deal of new and ſolid learning upon this ſubject of 'Chemiſtry in the works of Bacon; if we ſtrip it of 'that jargon of language, which was ſo faſhionable 'in thoſe times. We may be the leſs ſurprized to 'find ſuch diſcoveries in him, who was indeed the 'miracle of the age he lived in (152).' After this excellent perſon, I ſhall not mention any more of our own countrymen, but content myſelf with ſhewing, in how great eſteem our learned author has been with ſuch foreigners, as were ſo happy to meet with, and ſo well verſed in the ſciences, as to be able to judge of his writings: for as to ſuch as have written general introductions to literature, or ſhort characters of great men, whoſe works they never ſaw, and on whom therefore they paſs raſh cenſures, capable only of miſleading raw and weak minds, they are not worth regarding (153). The celebrated Picus de Mirandula, who was himſelf ſuch a prodigy of learning, that, ſolely on this account, he was traduced for a Magician, from a ſuppoſition that it was impoſſible for him to have acquired ſo large a ſtock of ſcience, without more than human aſſiſtance, ſpeaks himſelf with reverence and admiration of Roger Bacon (154). One of the moſt emin[illegible] members of the republic of learning in Holland, Gerard Joannes Voſſius, has beſtowed many and high commendations upon our author, whoſe works he had read and ſtudied. I will mention only what he ſays of him in one place. 'In the year 1270 'flouriſhed in every kind of learning among the Eng-'liſh, Roger Bacon, a Monk of the Franciſcan order, 'and an Oxford Divine, a man of ſuch vaſt learning, 'that England, nay the whole world beſide, had not 'in this reſpect his equal, or his ſecond; yet either 'through the envy, or the ignorance, of the age in 'which he lived, he was ſtigmatized as a Magician '(155).' That moſt ingenious Daniſh Philoſopher Olaus Borrichius ſhewed himſelf a zealous admirer of Bacon's learning and merit, with which he was well acquainted, and aſſerts him to have diſcovered all the kinds of glaſſes now in uſe, to have known gun-powder, and to have made many other important diſcoveries, which entitle him, as he obſerves, to immortal reputation (156). In another book of his, he declares, that he had a moſt extenſive and ſurprizing capacity, in penetrating whatever ſubject he ſtudied ſign of this work is conſidered, the merit of the man duly weighed, together with the glory which reſults to this nation from having produced, and that too in one of the darkeſt and moſt unlettered ages, the brighteſt and moſt univerſal genius that perhaps the world ever ſaw, it is hoped that this time and pains, both with regard to the reader and the writer, will be eſteemed properly employed.

ſtudied. He recommends him as one of the moſt candid, as well as moſt able of the Chemiſts, and one from whom many of the reſt borrowed (157). There are few of the French writers who have given us greater marks of their general learning, than Gabriel Naudé, who expreſsly undertook the defence of our author, and who appears to have been very well acquainted with ſuch of his writings, as in his time were made public (158). The famous Morhoff mentions him often, and always with the greateſt marks of approbation and eſteem, and often with the higheſt praiſes; neither does he make any doubt of the diſcoveries aſcribed to him by Wood, and other Engliſh writers (159). To him I may ſubjoin the learned and impartial Caſimir Oudin, who, with infinite labour and diligence, has collected the beſt accounts that are any where to be met with, of the pieces written by Bacon, and the places where his manuſcripts are preſerved (160). The moſt judicious and indefatigable Fabricius commends him highly in the ſhort account he has given us of his life and writings. I cannot help taking notice of the amazing induſtry of this excellent perſon, whoſe labours are, and ever will be extremely uſeful to the lovers of learning; for though his account of Roger Bacon very little exceeds two pages, yet it plainly proves, that he had neglected nothing in his power, to gain a competent knowledge of this author and his works, and the deſire he expreſſes of ſeeing Dr. Jebb's edition of his Opus Majus, an account of which he had met with in a French Journal, is a ſingular inſtance of his veracity and willingneſs to let his readers know, how far his materials extended and where they fell ſhort (161). The moſt ingenious author of the Hiſtory of Hermetic Philoſophy Abbé Langlet du Freſnoy, has given a very conciſe and accurate account of Roger Bacon as a Chemiſt, and done him all the juſtice that could be deſired (162). Another French writer of diſtinguiſhed abilities ſpeaks of him with ſuch an air of admiration, and ſo warmly aſſerts his right to thoſe diſcoveries which have made other men famous, as ſhews, that he preferred truth to all things, and was reſolved to eſpouſe merit, in what age or country ſoever he found it (163). I ſhall conclude this catalogue of authorities in ſupport of Bacon's character, which however long it may appear, comes very far ſhort of what might have been collected, with that of the famous Boerhaave, who, in his account of Chemical writers, tells us, that Roger Bacon, an Engliſh Monk, who flouriſhed in the thirteenth century, excelled in Alchemy, Chemiſtry, Natural Magic, Mechanics, Metaphyſics, Phyſics, and Mathematics, and that ſuch of his works, as have been handed down to us, are generally written in a clear, eaſy ſtile, without circumlocutions (164). Thus it appears that the reputation of this extraordinary perſon, has not riſen from any ſuperſtitious regard to antiquity, or the prejudices of a few great men in his favour, but is truly founded on merit, and has been cheriſhed and maintained, from a principle of juſtice, by the ableſt men, and the moſt competent judges in all ages, and of all countries, from the times neareſt his own, down to thoſe in which we live. [From the whole of the preceding moſt excellent article, we perceive that the depth and extent of Roger Bacon's talents and diſcoveries were indeed wonderful: nor ought we to eſteem him the leſs a prodigy, that he could not get above all the prejudices of the age in which he lived. Neither ſhould we be ſurprized that he aſcribed more to ſcience, with regard to Medicine, Mechanics, Chymiſtry, and other things, than it could poſſibly perform. This, in conjunction with the unavoidable credulity of the times, was natural to a man of ſuch elevated views; and eſpecially, at a period when the boundaries of knowledge could not be aſcertained. To be able to fix the exact limits of ſcience, muſt be the laſt reſult of progreſſive experience and improvement. In that age, when Roger Bacon ſaw that ſo much could be done by it, he was ready to imagine that it was almoſt capable of performing every thing. And this notion, though it might lead him into error in particular inſtances, was, upon the whole, a very uſeful principle. Great additions have been made to knowledge by the operation of this principle. In attempting impracticabilities, valuable acquiſitions have been obtained. Lord Bacon has an obſervation to our purpoſe, too beautiful to be omitted. 'Surely 'to Alchemy this right is due, that it may be com-'pared to the huſbandman whereof Æſop makes 'the fable; that, when he died, told his ſons, that 'he had left unto them gold buried under ground 'in his vineyard; and they digged over all the 'ground, and gold they found none; but by reaſon 'of their ſtirring and digging the mould about the 'roots of their vines, they had a great vintage the 'year following: ſo aſſuredly the ſearch and ſtir to 'make gold hath brought to light a great number 'of good and fruitful inventions and experiments, 'as well for the diſcloſing of nature, as for the uſe 'of man's life (165).' Perhaps, it hath been the fault of more modern times, to preſcribe too narrow boundaries to ſcience, and not to have given ſufficient encouragement to a noble boldneſs of mind, in the inveſtigation of nature. However, this fault, if it may be ſaid to have exiſted, no longer ſeems likely to prevail. For, ſince the diſcoveries in Electricity, and, above all, ſince the curious and extraordinary experiments of Dr. Prieſtley, with regard to the different kinds and properties of air, there is an ardour for philoſophical reſearches diffuſed throughout Europe, which promiſes a new Era in the hiſtory of the progreſs of Natural Knowledge.

(165) Bacon's Works, Vol. i. p. 15. Folio edition of 1753.

It is probable that Roger Bacon's ſkill in the Greek and Hebrew languages may, conſidering the general ignorance of the times, appear not a little ſurpriſing to ſome of our readers. But this is more eaſily to be accounted for than his other attainments. Polite and Claſſical Literature had not been ſo univerſally neglected as is ſometimes imagined. During the two centuries which ſucceeded the Norman Conqueſt, a variety of perſons had, in our own country, directed their ſtudies this way; of whom the ingenious and learned Mr. T. Warton hath given an account, at the concluſion of the ſecond Diſſertation prefixed to his hiſtory of Poetry. Among the reſt, Robert Groſthead, Biſhop of Lincoln, Roger Bacon's great friend and patron, was eminently diſtinguiſhed for his profound knowledge in the learned languages, and for his zeal in promoting the ſtudy of them. It is not ſtrange, therefore, that Roger Bacon, with ſuch an example before him, ſhould excel in the ſame ſpecies of learning. As philological literature was ardently cultivated, in the period we are ſpeaking of, by a number of individuals, both in our own nation and in other parts of Europe, it may be enquired whence it came to paſs that it ſhould, in fact, make ſo ſmall a progreſs. This may be accounted for from ſeveral cauſes. What liberal knowledge there was in thoſe times lay entirely with ſome churchmen, who were not ſufficiently numerous and powerful to diſpel the general ignorance and ſuperſtition of the clerical order, and the almoſt univerſal barbarity of the laity. Nor were their own minds duly enlightened in matters of the moſt eſſential importance to the right exerciſe of the underſtanding. The ardent application to the ſtudy of the Civil and Canonical Laws (though the diſcovery of the imperial code had contributed to civilize Europe) was no ſmall impediment to the propagation of polite letters. And moſt of all, the barbarous and barren ſubtilties of ſcholaſtic divinity, which came into the higheſt reputation, involved true reaſon, juſt taſte, and ſound religion in one common ruin (166).] K.

BACON (Sir NICHOLAS) Lord Keeper of the Great Seal in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He deſcended from an ancient and honourable family in Suffolk [A]. His father was Robert Bacon of Drinkſton in that county, Eſq; and the name of his mother was Iſabel, the daughter of John Gage of Pakenham in the ſaid county, Eſq. (a) Our Nicholas was their ſecond ſon, and born ſome time in the year 1510, at Chiſlehurſt in Kent (b). After having received the firſt rudiments of learning, either in the houſe of his father, or at ſome little ſchool in the neighbourhood; he was ſent when very young to Corpus Chriſti (vulgarly) Bennet college in Cambridge (c), where having improved himſelf in all branches of uſeful knowledge, for which he made a very grateful return [B], he travelled into France, and made ſome ſtay at Paris, in order to give the laſt poliſh to his education (d). On his return he ſettled in Gray's-Inn, and applied himſelf with ſuch aſſiduity to the ſtudy of the Law, that he quickly diſtinguiſhed himſelf in that learned profeſſion; ſo that on the diſſolution of the monaſtery of St. Edmund's-Bury in Suffolk, he had a grant from King Henry VIII., in the thirty-ſixth year of his reign, of the manors of Redgrave, Boteſdale, and Gillingham, with the park of Redgrave, and ſix acres of land in Wortham, as alſo the tythes of Redgrave to hold in capite by Knight's ſervice (e), which ſhews that he ſtood high at that time in the favour of his Prince, who was one that never gave or preferred but where great abilities invited. In the thirty-eighth of the ſame King, he was promoted to the office of Attorney in the court of Wards, which was a place both of honour and profit. In this office he was continued by King Edward VI., his patent being renewed in the firſt year of that Prince (f), and in 1552, which was the laſt year of his reign, Mr. Bacon was elected Treaſurer of Gray's-Inn (g). His great moderation and conſummate prudence, preſerved him through the dangerous reign of Queen Mary. In the very dawn of that of Elizabeth he was knighted, and the Great Seal of England being taken from Nicholas Heath Archbiſhop of York, was delivered to Sir Nicholas Bacon, on the twenty-ſecond of December 1558, with the title of Lord Keeper (h). He was alſo of the Privy-Council to her Majeſty, who had much regard to his advice. The Parliament met on the twenty-third of January, but was prorogued on account of the Queen's indiſpoſition to the twenty-fifth, when the Lord Keeper opened the ſeſſion with a moſt eloquent and ſolid ſpeech [C]. [A] An ancient and honourable family in Suffolk.] The learned Camden tells us, that Auverton, in the county of Suffolk, was the ſeat of the ancient family of Bacon, who held the manor of Thornage and that of Brome, by conducting all the footmen of Suffolk and Norfolk to the wars in Wales (1), and indeed there is a fair pedigree of this family extant, which deduces them from Grimbaldus, who came over hither at the Norman conqueſt, and had lands given him near Holt in Norfolk, where he founded the pariſh church of Letheringſet, of which he made his ſecond ſon Parſon. From him Robert Bacon, the father of our Nicholas, was lineally deſcended. In ſupport of this account many quotations might be made from our moſt ancient writers, and particularly from Weever's Monuments, wherein there is mention made of many of the family of Bacon in Suffolk (2).

[B] A very grateful return.] In regard to the univerſity in general, he ſhewed his kindneſs, by making a preſent to the public library of 103 Greek and Latin books, when ſuch preſents were much wanted, and not a little encouraged by his example (3). To the college he was a great benefactor, by beſtowing two hundred pounds towards erecting a new chapel, and by engaging other friends to contribute to the ſame purpoſe. He ſettled, likewiſe, upon the college, an annuity of 20l. for the maintenance of ſix ſcholars, who are to be choſen out of the grammar ſchool at Redgrave, near Boteſdale, in Suffolk. This ſchool was founded by himſelf, and he allotted 30l. per ann. for the ſupport of it; he founded, alſo, Curſitor's or Bacon's Inn in Chancery Lane, thus did he ſhew himſelf a true lover and encourager of learning, which never ennobled any family more conſpicuouſly than his own. For the furtherance of religion, he appointed two annual ſermons in St. Paul's cathedral, allotting four marks per ann. for the payment of the preachers, and the cleaning of his tomb (4).

[C] A moſt eloquent and ſolid ſpeech.] [This ſpeech was a long one; notwithſtanding which we ſhall inſert it at large, becauſe it relates to a very important period, and diſplays in a ſtrong light the real abilities of Sir Nicholas Bacon. It ſhews him to have poſſeſſed a manly and vigorous eloquence, which, indeed, was greatly ſuperior to what had hitherto appeared in the Lord Chancellors or Lord Keepers of this kingdom.

'My Lords and Maſters all,

'THE Queen's moſt excellent Majeſty, our natural and moſt gracious Sovereign Lady, having, as you know, ſummoned hither her High Court of Parliament, hath commanded me to open and declare the chief cauſes and conſiderations that moved her Highneſs thereunto. And here, my Lords, I wiſh (not without great cauſe) there were in me ability to do it in ſuch order and ſort as is beſeeming for her Majeſty's honour, and the underſtanding of this preſence, and as the great weightineſs and worthineſs of the matter doth require it to be done. The remembrance whereof, and the number of my imperfections to the well-performing of it, doth indeed (plainly to ſpeak) breed in me ſuch fear and dread, that as from a man abaſhed and well nigh aſtoniſhed, you are to hear all that I ſhall ſay therein. True it is, that ſome comfort and encouragement I take, through the hope I have conceived, by that I have ſeen and heard of your gentle ſufferance by others, whereof I look upon equal cauſe equally with others to be partaker; and the rather, for that I am ſure good-will ſhall not want in me to do my uttermoſt; and alſo, becauſe I mean to occupy as ſmall a time as the greatneſs of ſuch a cauſe will ſuffer; thinking that to be the meeteſt medicine to cure your tedious hearing, and mine imperfect and diſordered ſpeaking, ſummarily to ſay, the immediate cauſe of this ſummons and aſſembly, be conſultation, advice, and contentation: for although divers things that are to be done here in Parliament, might, by means, be reformed without Parliament, yet the Queen's Majeſty ſeeking, in her conſultation of importance, contentation by aſſent, and ſurety by advice; and therein repoſing herſelf not a little in your fidelities, wiſdoms, and diſcretions, meaneth not at this time to make any reſolutions in any matter of weight, before it ſhall be by you ſufficiently and fully debated, examined, and conſidered. Now the matters and cauſes whereupon you are to conſult, are chiefly and principally three points. Of thoſe the firſt is, of well making of laws, for the according

Some of the Queen's Counſellors thought it neceſſary that the attainder of the Queen's mother ſhould be taken off; but the Lord Keeper was of another mind. He thought the crown purged all defects, and in compliance with his advice, two bills were brought into

'according and uniting of theſe people of the realm 'into an uniform order of religion, to the honour 'and glory of God, the eſtabliſhing of the church, 'and tranquillity of the realm. The ſecond, for the 'reforming and removing of all enormities and miſ-'chiefs that might hurt or hinder the civil orders 'and policies of this realm. The third, and laſt, is, 'adviſedly and deeply to weigh and conſider the 'eſtate and condition of this realm, and the loſſes 'and decays that have happened of late to the impe-'perial crown thereof; and therefore to adviſe the 'beſt remedies to ſupply and relieve the ſame. For 'the firſt; the Queen's Majeſty, having God before 'her eyes, and being neither unmindful of precepts 'and divine counſels, meaneth and intendeth, in 'this conference, firſt and chiefly there ſhould be 'ſought the advancement of God's honour and glory, 'as the ſure and infallible foundation whereupon 'the policies of every good commonwealth are to 'be erected and knit; and as the ſtraight line 'whereby it is wholly to be directed and governed; 'and as the chief pillar and buttreſs wherewith it is 'continually to be ſuſtained and maintained. And 'like as the well and perfect doing of this cannot 'but make good ſucceſs in all the reſt, ſo the remiſs 'and looſe dealing in this cannot but make the reſt 'full of imperfections and doubtfulneſs; which muſt 'needs bring with them continual change and alte-'ration; things much to be eſchewed in all good 'governances, and moſt of all in matters of faith 'and religion; which of their natures be, and ought 'to be, moſt ſtable.

'Wherefore her Highneſs willeth, and moſt earneſt-'ly requireth, you all, firſt and principally, for the 'duty you bear unto God, whoſe cauſe this is; and 'then for the ſervice you owe to her Majeſty, and 'your country, whoſe weal it concerneth, univer-'ſally; and for the love you ought to bear to your-'ſelves, whom it toucheth one by one particularly; 'that, in this conſultation, you, with all humble-'neſs, ſingleneſs, and pureneſs of mind, confirm 'yourſelves together, uſing your whole endeavour 'and diligence, by laws and ordinance, to eſtabliſh 'that which, by your learning and wiſdom, ſhall be 'thought moſt meet for the well performing of this 'godly purpoſe: and this without reſpect of honour, 'rule or ſovereignty, profit, pleaſure or eaſe, or of 'any thing that might touch any perſon in eſtima-'tion or opinion of wit, learning, or knowledge; 'and without all regard of other manner of affec-'tion. And therewith, that you will alſo in this 'your aſſembly and conference clearly forbear, and, 'as a great enemy to good Council, fly from all 'manner of contentions, reaſonings, and diſputa-'tions, and all ſophiſtical, captious, and frivolous 'arguments and quiddities, meeter for oſtentation 'of wit, than conſultation of weighty matters; come-'lier for ſcholars than Counſellors; more beſeeming 'for ſchools, than for Parliament-Houſes; beſides, 'that commonly they be great cauſes of much ex-'pence of time, and breed few good reſolutions. 'And like as in Council, all contention ſhould be 'eſchewed, even ſo, by Council, proviſion ſhould 'be made, that no contentions, contumelious nor 'opprobrious words, as heretic, ſchiſmatic, papiſt, 'and ſuch like names, being nurſes of ſuch ſeditious 'factions and ſects, be uſed; but may be baniſhed 'out of men's mouths, as the cauſers, continuers, 'and encreaſers of diſpleaſure, hate, and malice; 'and as utter enemies to all concord and unity, the 'very marks that you are now come to ſhoot at.

'Again, as in proceedings herein, great and wary 'conſideration is to be had, that nothing be adviſed 'or done, which any way, in continuance of time, 'were likely to breed or nouriſh any kind of idolatry 'or ſuperſtition: ſo, on the other ſide, heed is to be 'taken that, by no licentious or looſe handling 'any manner of occaſion be given, whereby any 'contempt, or irreverent behaviour towards God 'and godly things, or any ſpice of irreligion might 'creep in, or be conceived: the examples of fearful 'puniſhments that have followed theſe four extre-'mities; I mean, idolatry, ſuperſtition, contempt, 'and irreligion, in all ages and times, are more in 'number than I can declare, and better known than 'I can make recital to you of. And yet are they 'not ſo many, or better known than by the con-'tinual budding benefits and bleſſings of God to 'thoſe that have forſaken thoſe extremities, and 'embraced their contraries. And for your better 'encouraging to run this right and ſtraight courſe, 'although that which is ſaid ought to ſuffice thereto, 'I think I may affirm, that the good King Hezekiah 'had no greater deſire to amend what was amiſs in 'his time, nor the noble Queen Heſter a better 'heart to overthrow the mighty enemies to God's 'elect, than our Sovereign Lady and Miſtreſs hath 'to do that may be juſt and acceptable in God's 'ſight. Thus forced to this by our duties to God, 'feared thereto by his puniſhments, provoked by his 'benefits, drawn by your love to your country and 'yourſelves, encouraged by ſo princely a patroneſs, 'let us, in God's name, go about this work, endea-'vouring ourſelves with all diligence (as I have be-'fore ſaid) to make ſuch laws as may tend to the 'honour and glory of God, to the eſtabliſhment 'of his church, and to the tranquillity of the 'realm.

'For the ſecond; there is to be conſidered what 'things, by private men deviſed, be practiſed and 'put in uſe in this realm contrary or hurtful to the 'commonwealth of the ſame, for which no laws be 'yet provided; and whether the laws, before this 'time made, be ſufficient to redreſs the enormities 'they were meant to remove; and whether any 'laws made but for a time, be meet to be continued 'for ever, or for a ſeaſon. Beſides, whether any 'laws be too ſevere or too ſharp, or too ſoft and too 'gentle: to be ſhort; you are to conſider all other 'imperfections of laws made, and all wants of laws 'to be made, and thereupon to provide the meeteſt 'remedies; reſpecting the nature and quality of 'the diſorder and offence, the inclination and diſ-'poſition of the people, and of the manner of the 'time.

'For the third and laſt (a marvellous matter); I 'cannot ſee how a good true Engliſhman can enter 'into the conſideration of it, but it muſt breed in 'his breaſt two contrary effects; comfort, I mean, 'and diſcomfort, joy and ſadneſs: for, on the one 'part, how can a man, calling to his remembrance 'that God of his divine power and ordinance, hath 'brought the imperial crown of this realm to a 'Princeſs, that ſo nobly, diligently, willingly, and 'carefully doth, by the advice of all the eſtates of 'the realm, ſeek all the ways and means that may 'be, to reform all diſorders and things that be 'amiſs; to continue and make firm that that is 'good; to detect and diſcourage thoſe that be diſ-'honeſt and evil; to execute juſtice in all points to 'all perſons, and at all times, without rigour and 'extremity; and to uſe clemency without indulgence 'and fond pity.

'A Princeſs, I ſay, that is not, nor ever meaneth 'to be, ſo wedded to her own will and fantaſie, 'that, for the ſatisfaction thereof, ſhe would do any 'thing that was likely to bring any ſervitude or 'bondage to her people; or give any juſt occaſion 'to them of any inward grudge whereby any tumult 'or ſtirs might ariſe, as hath done of late days, 'things moſt pernicious and peſtilent to the com-'monwealth; a Princeſs, that never meaneth or in-'tendeth, for any private affection, to advance the 'cauſe or quarrel with any foreign Prince, or Poten-'tate, to the deſtruction of her ſubjects, to the loſs 'of any of her dominions, or to the impoveriſhing 'of her realm; a Princeſs, to whom nothing, what 'nothing? no, no worldly thing under the ſun is ſo 'dear, as the hearty love and good-will of her nobles 'and ſubjects; and to whom nothing is ſo odible, as 'that they might cauſe or by any means procure the 'contrary.

'How can (I ſay) a man remember this wonderful 'benefit, but of neceſſity he muſt needs heartily into Parliament, and paſſed into laws, one for recognizing the Queen's title, the other for reſtoring her in blood as heir to her mother (i). The main buſineſs of this ſeſſion was the ſettlement of religion, in which no man had a greater ſhare than the Keeper, though (i) Strype's Annals, Vol. i. in the Appendix, where the laſt of theſe Acts may be found.

'rejoice, and give God thanks for the ſame? but, 'my Lords, the handling of the princely virtues 'of this noble Princeſs, the cauſe of our rejoicing, 'of purpoſe I pretermit, partly, becauſe I ever ſup-'poſed it not altogether meet for this preſence; but, 'chiefly, for that it requireth a perfect and excellent 'orator, in whom both art and nature concurs, and 'not to me, a man in whom both fail. Marry, I 'wiſh in my heart, an apt perſon might oft have 'meet preſence, and juſt occaſion, to handle this 'matter as the weightineſs of the cauſe requireth: 'but, as the cauſes of our rejoicing for ſuch reſpects 'be (thanks be to God) both many and great; ſo 'for the cauſes of our ſadneſs and diſcomfort, they 'be neither few nor little.

'But here upon great cauſe, as a man perplexed 'and amazed, I ſtay, not knowing what is beſt to 'be done; very loth I am to utter that which is 'much unpleaſant for me to ſpeak, and as uncom-'fortable for you to hear: but, becauſe ſores and 'wounds be hardly cured, except they be well open-'ed and ſearched, therefore, conſtrained of neceſſity, 'I ſee I muſt trouble you with theſe ſad matters. 'What man, that either loveth his ſovereign, his 'country, or himſelf; that thinketh of, and weigh-'eth the great decays and loſſes of honour, ſtrength, 'and treaſure; yea, and the peril that hath hap-'pened to this imperial crown of late time, but muſt 'inwardly and earneſtly bewail the ſame? could 'there have happened to this imperial crown a 'greater loſs in honour, ſtrength, and treaſure, than 'to loſe that place, I mean Calais, which was, in 'the beginning ſo nobly won, and hath ſo long 'time, ſo honourably and politickly, in all ages and 'times, and againſt all attempts, both foreign and 'near, both of forces and treaſons, been defended 'and kept? did not the keeping of this breed fear 'to our greateſt enemies, and made our faint friends 'the more aſſured, and lother to break? yea, hath 'not the winning and keeping of this bred through-'out Europe an honourable opinion and report of our 'Engliſh nation?

'Again, what one thing ſo much preſerved and 'guarded our merchants, their traffic and inter-'courſe, or hath been ſo great a help for the well 'uttering of our chief commodities; or what, ſo 'much as this, hath kept a great part of our ſea-'coaſts from ſpoiling and robbing? to be ſhort, the 'loſs of this is much greater than I am able to utter, 'and as yet, as I ſuppoſe, is able to be underſtood 'by any: and yet, my Lords, if this were the whole 'loſs, then might men have ſome hope in time to 'come to recover that, that in time hath been thus 'ſuddenly and ſtrangely loſt: but when a man look-'eth further, and conſidereth the marvellous decays 'and waſtes of the revenues of the crown; the in-'eſtimable conſumption of the treaſure, levied both 'of the crown and of the ſubject; the exceeding 'loſs of munition and artillery; the great loſs of 'divers valiant Gentlemen of very good ſervice; the 'incredible ſums of monies owing at this preſent, 'and in honour due to be paid, and the biting 'intereſt that is to be anſwered for the forbearance 'of this debt; therewith remembering the ſtrength 'and mightineſs of the enemy, and his confederates, 'and how ready he is upon every occaſion, upon 'every ſide, and in every time, to annoy you; and 'how the time moſt meet for that purpoſe draweth 'on at hand. Again, if a man conſider the huge 'and moſt wonderful charge, newly grown to the 'crown, more than ever hath heretofore been wont, 'and now of neceſſity to be continued; as firſt, the 'maintenance of garriſons in certain places on the 'ſea-coaſts, as Portſmouth, with new munition and 'artillery, beſides the new increaſed charge for the 'continual maintenance of the Engliſh navy to be 'ever in readineſs againſt all evil happs; the ſtrongeſt 'wall and defence that can be againſt the enemies 'of this iſland; and further alſo, the new augmen-'tation or charge, for the maintenance of a garriſon 'at Berwick, and the frontiers northward. Indeed, 'I muſt confeſs that in thoſe matters mine under-'ſtanding is but ſmall, and mine experience and 'time to learn leſs; but, in my opinion, this doth 'exceed the ancient yearly revenue of the crown. 'Beſides, that double ſo much is of neceſſity to be 'preſently ſpent, about the fortifying of theſe places 'in buildings. When, I ſay, a man remembereth 'and conſidereth thoſe things, it maketh him ſo far 'from hope of recovery of that that is loſt, without 'ſome aid or contribution of the ſubject, that he will 'judge all to be little enough to make and prepare 'good defence for that that is left.

'Here perchance a queſtion would be aſked (and 'yet I do marvel to hear a queſtion made of ſo plain 'a matter), what ſhould be the cauſe of this? if it 'were aſked, thus I mean to anſwer; that I think 'no man ſo blind but ſeeth it, no man ſo deaf but 'heareth it, nor no man ſo ignorant but underſtand-'eth it. Marry, withal, I think there is no man ſo 'hard-hearted in thinking of it, but for the reſtoring 'of it would adventure lands, limbs, yea the life. 'But now to the remedies, wherein only this I have 'to ſay, that as the well looking to the whole 'univerſally is the only ſure preſervation of every 'one particularly, ſo ſeemeth it of all congruence 'and reaſon meet, that every one particularly, by 'all ways and means, readily and gladly, according 'to his power, ſhall concur and join to relieve and 'aſſiſt the whole univerſally. Neither can I ſee, 'things ſtanding as they do, how any that loveth 'his country, or hath wit to foreſee his own ſurety, 'can be withdrawn from this. Is there any, think 'you, ſo mad, that, having a range of houſes in 'peril of fire, would not gladly pluck down part, to 'have the reſt preſerved and ſaved? doth not the 'wiſe merchant, in every adventure of danger, give 'part to have the reſt aſſured? theſe cauſes well 'compared, ſmall difference ſhall be found. And 'for this, (a ſtrange matter and ſcarce credible) 'with how deaf an ear, and how hardly the Queen's 'Majeſty may endure to hear of any device that may 'be burthenous to her ſubjects, I partly do under-'ſtand, and divers others partly perceive. Is not the 'cauſe marvellous and pitiful, that the neceſſity and 'need of this ragged and torn ſtate by miſgovern-'ance, ſhould, by force, ſo bridle and reſtrain the 'noble nature of ſuch a Princeſs, that ſhe is not 'able to ſhew ſuch liberality and bountifulneſs to 'her ſervants and ſubjects, as her heart and inclina-'tion diſpoſeth her Highneſs unto? what a grief 'and torment this is to a noble mind! what a grief? 'ſurely ſuch a grief, as, but to a noble mind who 'feels, it cannot be underſtood. But for the more 'plain declaration of her Highneſs's diſpoſition in 'this matter, her Highneſs hath commanded me to 'ſay unto you, even from my own mouth, that 'were it not for the preſervation of yourſelves, and 'the ſurety of the ſtate, her Highneſs would ſooner 'have adventured her life (which our Lord long 'preſerve), than ſhe would have adventured to trouble 'her loving ſubjects with any offenſive matter, or 'that ſhould be burthenous or diſpleaſant unto them; 'and for the further notifying of her Highneſs's 'mind herein, ſhe hath commanded me to ſay unto 'you, that albeit you yourſelves ſee that this is no 'matter of will, no matter of diſpleaſure, no private 'cauſe of her own, which, in times paſt, have been 'ſufficient for Princes pretences (the more pity!) 'but a matter for the univerſal weal of this realm, 'the defence of our country, the preſervation of 'every man, his wife and family particularly; yet 'her Majeſty's will and pleaſure is, that nothing 'ſhall be demanded or required of her loving ſub-'jects, but that which they, of their own free wills 'and liberalities, be well contented, readily and 'gladly, frankly and freely, to offer; ſo great is the 'truſt that ſhe repoſeth in them, and the love and 'affection that her highneſs beareth towards them, 'nothing at all doubting, but that they will ſo 'lovingly, carefully, and prudently, conſider and 'weigh this great and weighty matter, that ſuch pro-'viſion out of hand be taken therein, as her High-'neſs ſhall be preſerved in all honour and royal dig-'nity, though he acted with such prudence as never to incur the hatred of any party. On this account he was made choice of, together with the Archbishop of York, to be Moderator in a dispute between eight Protestant Divines, and eight Popish Bishops; and the latter behaving very unfairly in the opinion of both the Moderators, and desiring, to avoid a fair disputation, to go away, the Lord Keeper put that question to each of them, and when all except one insisted on going, his Lordship dismissed them with this memorandum, For that ye would not that we should hear you, perhaps you may shortly hear of us; and accordingly for this contempt, the Bishops of Winchester and Lincoln were committed to the Tower, and the rest were bound to appear before the Council, and not to quit the cities of London and Westminster without leave (k). The whole business of the session, than which there was none of greater importance throughout that reign, was chiefly managed by his Lordship, who pursued therein his wise maxim, Let us stay a little, that we may have done the sooner (l), and thereby brought all to a good conclusion, ending the session as he began it, with a most excellent speech [D]. Thenceforward the Lord-Keeper stood as high in the favour of the Queen as any of her ministers, and he took care to fortify his friendship, by maintaining a cordial interest with other great men, particularly with those eminent persons (m), who had married into the same family with himself, viz. Cecil, Hobby, Rowlet, and Killigrew. By their assistance he maintained his credit at Court, though he sometimes differed in opinion from the mighty favourite Leicester, who yet once bad fair for his ruin. There was, it seems, great intrigues at that time carried on in relation to the succession. Some great men, and particularly the Earl of Leicester, pretended to favour the title of the Queen of Scots, whereas others were more inclined to the House of Suffolk. The Queen sometimes affected a neutrality, but at others, she shewed a tenderness for the title of the Scottish Queen. In 1564, when these disputes were at the height, one Mr. John Hales, Clerk of the Hanaper, thought fit to write a treatise, or rather to publish it, for it seems to have been written before, in favour of the Suffolk line, and directly, and in plain terms, against the title of the Queen of Scots. This book was complained of by the Bishop of Ross, who was Ambassador from the Queen of Scots, and his cause being warmly supported by the Earl of Leicester, Hales was committed to prison, and so severe an enquiry made after all who had any notice of, or had expressed any favour for, this piece, that at last the Lord-Keeper came to be suspected, which drew upon him the Queen's displeasure to such a degree, that he was forbidden the Court, removed from his seat at Council, and prohibited from meddling with any affairs but those of the Chancery: nay, Camden carries it so far as to say he was confined. Certain it is, that the Queen was much estranged from him, and he in the utmost danger of total ruin (n) [E]. At last, however, Cecil

[D] A most excellent speech.] On the subject of religion he spoke thus: 'That as to the observation 'of the uniform order in religion, they of the Parliament in their several places, should endeavour, 'to the best of their powers, to further and set forth 'the same; which by great and deliberate advice in 'that Parliament, had been established: that watch 'should be had of the withdrawers and hinderers 'thereof, especially of those that subtilly, and by 'indirect means, sought to procure the contrary. 'Among these he comprehended, as well those that 'were too swift, as those that were too slow; those 'that went before the Law or behind the Law, as 'those that would not follow. For good government 'could not be where obedience failed, and both these 'alike broke the rule of obedience. That these were 'they, that in all likelihood would be the beginners 'and maintainers of factions and sects, the very 'mothers and nurses of all seditions and tumults. 'Of these therefore great heed should be taken; and 'upon their being found, sharp and severe corrections 'should be imposed, according to the order of Law; 'and that in the beginning, without respect of persons, 'as upon the greatest adversaries that could be to 'unity and concord, without which no common-'wealth, he said, could long endure.' After this speech, which was made on the fifth of May, 1559, the Parliament was dissolved (6).

[E] In the utmost danger of total ruin.] This is the most curious, as well as most difficult point to settle, that occurs in the memoirs of this great man, and yet few of our historians have given any clear account of this matter. I will therefore endeavour to set it in the best light that may be, so that the reader may at least comprehend, how a matter of no great importance at first sight, came to affect so great a man so deeply. Among other projects formed by Queen Elizabeth, to make herself easy in relation to the Queen of Scots, one was contrived in the beginning of 1564, for marrying that Princess to Lord Robert Dudley, created for that purpose Earl of Leicester, and the great argument used to persuade the Queen of Scots to this marriage, was a solemn assurance, that, upon its taking place, Queen Elizabeth would declare her presumptive heir to the crown. This project alarmed all the great men, who were of a party opposite to that of the Earl of Leicester; and this induced them to wish that something might be written, to shew that this new project was impracticable, by reason of the title of the House of Suffolk to the crown. This occasioned some countenance to be given to a treatise written the year before, on the marriage of the Earl of Hertford with Lady Catherine Gray, under the title of A Declaration of the Succession of the Crown Imperial of England, which the author laboured to prove, must belong to the issue of this marriage (7). The Earl of Leicester highly resented this, for which various reasons have been assigned, the most obvious of which is its crossing his intended match. A late writer has guessed, that he might think it necessary to declare against the House of Suffolk, because of his near relation to it, which might otherwise have brought him into suspicion with Queen Elizabeth (8). For my own part, I think a better reason than any of these may be given, and that is, his hopes of ruining his adversaries, by fixing this book upon them, which he

Cecil with much difficulty reſtored him to the Queen's good opinion, who in all probability liked him not the leſs in the ſucceeding part of her reign, for this diſtaſte he had ſhewn towards the title of the Queen of Scots (o), as appears by her ſetting him at the head of that commiſſion, granted in the year 1568 (p), for hearing the difference between that unfortunate Princeſs, and her rebellious ſubjects; and in 1571 (q), we find him again acting in the like capacity, though very little was done before the Commiſſioners at either time, and very likely this was what Queen Elizabeth chiefly deſired, and the covering her inclination with a decent appearance of juſtice, was perhaps not a little owing to the addreſs of the Lord-Keeper. Thenceforward he continued not only in, but at the head of her Majeſty's Councils, and had a great hand in preventing, by his moderation, ſome warm advices that afterwards took effect. The ſhare, however, that he had in the buſineſs of the Duke of Norfolk, his known diſlike to the title of the Queen of Scots, and his great care for promoting the Proteſtant religion, created him many bitter enemies among the Papiſts both at home and abroad, who though they were able to do him no great hurt, yet by ſeveral bitter libels gave him no ſmall pain (r) [F]. As a ſtateſman he was remarkable for a clear head, and deep counſels, and while it was thought of ſome other great men that they ſeemed wiſer than they were, yet the common voice of the nation agreed in this, that Sir Nicholas Bacon was wiſer than he ſeemed. His great ſkill lay in balancing factions, and it is thought he taught the Queen that ſecret, the more neceſſary to her becauſe the laſt of her family, and conſequently without many of thoſe ſupports incident to Princes (s). In the Chancery he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a very moderate uſe of power, and ſhewing great reſpect to the Common Law. At his own requeſt, an act of Parliament was made, to ſettle and eſtabliſh the power of a Lord-Keeper (t) [G]; though he might probably have taken away he knew muſt be as odious to the Queen his miſtreſs, as to the Queen of Scots. In the month of April 1564, Hales was committed to the Fleet, and the farther enquiry into the matter was committed to Sir William Cecil Secretary of State. He, in a letter to Sir Thomas Smith, written at this very time, expreſſes a great concern at his being obliged to meddle in ſo knotty a buſineſs: however, he profeſſes that he would act in it uprightly, and move neither to the right-hand nor to the left. Upon his report, one Mr. Nudigate was likewiſe committed, and upon farther ſearching into the buſineſs, Lord John Gray of Pyrgo was reſtrained. Theſe proceedings occaſioned ſuch general diſcontent, that the Queen thought proper to prorogue the Parliament, and in the month of November, Hales was committed to the Tower, and the Lord-Keeper diſgraced, upon which Secretary Cecil in one of his letters ſays, The affairs of the nation ſuffered much, as well as the Lord-Keeper's life, being in danger through heavineſs of mind (9); and this appears the more probable, ſince Lord Gray beforementioned died through apprehenſion of what might befal him. The matter ſuſpected was, that the Lord-Keeper had ſome hand in writing the book. Anthony Wood tells us, that Cecil had as much hand in it as Bacon, but that it was agreed he ſhould lay the whole weight upon the former, that he might preſerve his intereſt with the Queen entire, and ſo be the more capable of bringing the Keeper again into favour, which however he was not able to do, till the beginning of the next year: nor had it been done at all, if Sir Anthony Browne, who in the reign of Queen Mary was Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, would have accepted the ſeals. But he a wiſe man, and of a religion different from that of the ſtate, wiſely and ſteadily refuſed them, though ſtrongly importuned by the Earl of Leiceſter, who, by this gentleman's prudence, found all his fine-ſpun ſchemes defeated (10).

[F] Gave him no ſmall pain.] About the year 1570, ſome Popiſh fugitives in Scotland, not content with having printed there ſeveral ſeditious books, ſent one of them, entitled A Detection of certain Practices, &c. with the following letter, addreſſed to their loving friends, Sir Thomas Littleton, and Sir Thomas Ruſſel, the Queen's Lieutenants in the county of Worceſter. 'After our hearty commendations; 'foreſeeing, by mature advice and conſideration, 'the preſent perils and imminent dangers whereinto 'the realm is like to fall, and that even at hand, if 'wiſdom prevent not the ſame; and having a natural 'care, and faithful affection towards our country, as 'beſeemeth all true Engliſhmen, we have thought 'good, as well to prevent the peril, as alſo to take 'care for the continual, proſperous, and peaceable government of this State, to ſignify unto you, what 'we, as well by credible report of ſtrangers, as alſo 'by the univerſal ſpeech of our countrymen at home, 'underſtand to be the cauſes of theſe ſo ſudden dangers 'like to enſue. The commonalty of this realm are 'thoroughly perſuaded, that the Lord-Keeper, Maſter Secretary, Mr. Mildmay, and Mr. Sadler, 'ſhould ſo miſgovern the State, and abuſe our Sovereign; that all, or the moſt part, of theſe dangers 'ſhould ariſe from them, as procurers of the ſame; 'and that by them, and the Paganical pretended 'Biſhops, now uſurping in this realm, we ſhould be 'thus ſtill drawn and continued in a religion of their 'deviſing, much worſe than Turkerie, &c. (11).' From the cloſe of this letter it appears, that letters of the ſame ſort had been diſpatched to every county in England, with a view, no doubt, to ſtir up a general rebellion, under pretence, that the Queen was guided by evil Counſellors. In the beginning of the year 1572, there was a libel publiſhed in France, deeply charging the Lord-Keeper, and the Lord-High Treaſurer Burleigh, as traytors to the State of England, which book was written with ſuch bitterneſs, that it gave theſe great men much diſquiet. The Treaſurer hereupon wrote to the Engliſh Ambaſſador. 'That 'he had a great mind to know who the author was, 'and deſired him to make his enquiry, adding that 'if by means of the printer it might be found out, 'he would beſtow a reward upon the diſcovery. But 'that if it could not, then he wiſhed that ſome 'means might be uſed, as of himſelf, to the Queen-mother, that the print might be deſtroyed, for 'that otherwiſe they ſhould think themſelves, conſidering the places they held in this eſtate, not well 'conſidered by that eſtate. He added, that this licentiouſneſs to inveigh againſt men by name in printed 'books, who did not themſelves uſe by books to 'provoke any, was in all good eſtates intolerable. 'And then he added, by way of proteſtation of the 'integrity and faithfulneſs of both their ſervices, 'God, ſaid he, ſend this eſtate no worſe meaning 'ſervants in all reſpects than we two have been, who 'indeed have not ſpared labour nor care to ſerve our 'Queen and country, and if we had not, we might 'truly avow, neither our Queen nor country had enjoyed 'that common repoſe that it hath done (12).' Mr. Camden, in his annals, tells us, the title of this book was, A Treatiſe of Treaſon, and that the Queen was ſo moved therewith, as to publiſh a proclamation to juſtify her Miniſters, and directing that all theſe books ſhould forthwith be brought in and burnt, under ſevere penalties (13).

away all need of this, by procuring the title of Lord Chancellor: but according to his motto, which was Mediocra firma, he was content to be ſafe, and did not deſire to be great. In that court, and in the Star Chamber, he made uſe, on proper occaſions, of ſet ſpeeches, in which he was happier than moſt men, pleaſing the people by their ſound, and charming the wiſeſt men of that age with their ſenſe, whence he attained the reputation of uniting two oppoſite characters, viz of a witty and a weighty ſpeaker (u). His great parts and great preferment were far from raiſing him in his own opinion, as appears from the modeſt anſwer he gave Queen Elizabeth, when ſhe told him his houſe at Redgrave was too little for him: Not ſo, Madam, returned he, but your Majeſty has made me too great for my houſe. Yet to ſhew his reſpect for her Majeſty's judgment, he afterwards added wings to his houſe (w). His modeſty in this reſpect was ſo much the greater, ſince he had a great paſſion for building, and withal a very fine taſte, as appeared by his houſe and gardens at Gorhambury near St. Albans, a deſcription of which the reader will find in the notes [H]. Towards the latter end of his life he became very corpulent, which made Queen Elizabeth ſay merrily, that Sir Nicholas's ſoul lodged well. To himſelf however his bulk was very cumberſome; inſomuch, that after walking from Weſtminſter-Hall to the Star-Chamber, which was but a very little way, he was uſually ſo much out of breath, that the Lawyers forbore ſpeaking at the bar till he recovered himſelf, and gave them notice of it by knocking with his ſtaff (x). After having held the Great-Seal more than twenty years, this able Stateſman and faithful Counſellor was he began to doubt to what degree his authority extended, which ſeems to have been owing to the general terms uſed upon the delivery of the Great-Seal, of which we have various inſtances in Rymer's Fœdera (15). Upon this, he firſt applied himſelf to the Queen, from whom he procured a patent, bearing date at Weſtminſter, the fourteenth of April, in the firſt year of her reign, whereby ſhe declares him to have as full powers as if he were Chancellor of England, and ratifies all that he had already done (16). This however did not fully ſatisfy him, but four years afterwards he procured an act of Parliament (17), which declares, 'That the Common Law always 'was, that the Keeper of the Great Seal always had, 'as of right belonging to his office, the ſame autho- 'rity, juriſdiction, execution of laws, and all other 'cuſtoms, as the Lord Chancellor of England lawfully 'uſed.' What the true reaſon was that made his Lordſhip ſo uneaſy, is not perhaps known to poſterity. But Sir Henry Spelman (18) has obſerved, that for the benefit of that wiſe counſellor Sir Nicholas Bacon, the authority of the Keeper of the Great Seal, was by this law declared to be in all reſpects the ſame with that of the Chancellor.

On the diſſolution of the monaſtery, it was granted to Ralph Rowlet, Eſq; afterwards knighted, and by him conveyed to Sir Nicholas Bacon (19), who, charmed with the pleaſant ſituation, built here a neat and elegant houſe, adorned with fine gardens, which in thoſe days made it very famous. was ſuddenly removed from this life, as a certain writer informs us, by the following accident. 'He was under the hands of his barber, and the weather being ſultry, had 'ordered a window before him to be thrown open. As he was become very corpulent, 'he preſently fell aſleep, in the current of freſh air that was blowing in upon him, and 'awaked after ſome time diſtempered all over. Why, ſaid he to the ſervant, did you 'ſuffer me to ſleep thus expoſed? The fellow replied, That he durſt not preſume to 'diſturb him. Then ſaid the Lord-Keeper, By your civility I loſe my life; and ſo 'removed into his bed-chamber, where he died a few days after (y).' I have tranſcribed this ſtory exactly, though I think there is ſome reaſon to doubt the circumſtances of it; for all our writers agree, that Sir Nicholas Bacon paid his laſt debt to nature, on the twentieth of February 1579 (z), and one would imagine, that the weather could not then be very ſultry. If it had, that muſt have been very unuſual, and the hiſtorians of thoſe times would not have failed to take notice of it. It cannot however be ſuppoſed, that ſuch a fact as this is abſolutely unſupported by authority, though the original writer, whoever he was, muſt probably have been miſtaken, and have applied to Sir Nicholas Bacon, what was true of ſome other great perſon in thoſe times. However that matter may be, moſt certain it is, that the Lord-Keeper Bacon, after a long, happy, and honourable life, died, equally lamented by the Queen and her ſubjects, as I have ſaid, on the twentieth of February 1579, and, on the ninth of March following, was buried with great ſolemnity, under a ſumptuous monument erected by himſelf in St. Paul's church (a) [I]. Here repoſes Nicholas Bacon,
The ſame who was ſo long
The ſecond pillar of the Britiſh ſtate,
Scourge of the wicked, to the good a refuge;
Whom no blind fate exalted
To this high honour; but equity and truth,

[Beſides the ſpeeches of Sir Nicholas Bacon already mentioned, ſeveral others were made by him at the opening and concluſion of the different ſeſſions of parliament, and upon the preſentation of ſpeakers of the Houſe of Commons; for which we ſhall refer ſuch of our readers as are deſirous of ſeeing farther ſpecimens of his abilities in this reſpect, to the work cited in the margin (22).

The objection which is made to Mr. Mallet's account, from Archbiſhop Teniſon, of the cauſe of the Lord Keeper's death, is not ſufficient to invalidate the truth of that account. About mid-day in the month of February, the ſun might be very warm; and yet the incident might not be deemed ſo extraordinary as to be recorded by hiſtorians. It ſhould be obſerved, that there were not in thoſe days either news-papers or ſuch other periodical publications as, in our time, preſerve the memory of the minuteſt events. We well remember, that, ſome years ſince, there were two remarkably hot days, earlier in February than is mentioned with regard to Sir Nicholas Bacon. But, though this circumſtance is undoubtedly taken notice of in the magazines and meteorological journals of the year, we ſhould ſcarcely, if we had been writing a general hiſtory of England, have thought of introducing it into ſuch a work.

Holland, in his Heroologia Anglica, p. 61. from the information of his own mother, who had lived in the Lord Keeper's family, gives a teſtimony to his piety as follows: Et quod fuerit non ſolum ſapiens, eruditus, et gravis, ſed etiam perquam religioſus; tam hujus eminentis muneris in republica exercitio, quam pia et præſtans diſciplina domeſtica, evicit. Cui aſſertioni meæ indulgentiſſima mea et ornatiſſima mater, etiamnum ſuperſtes (1620), teſtimoniam perlubet; quæ ante quadraginta annos, ejus chariſſimæ uxori Annæ, clariſſimæ illæ doctiſſimæque heroinæ, operam navavit et famulata eſt, idque ante mariti obitum (23).

We ſhall here add the character of Sir Nicholas Bacon, which was drawn by his own ſon, the great Lord Verulam. He was 'a plain man, direct, and 'conſtant, without all fineſſe and doubleneſs; and 'one that was of a mind that a man in his private 'proceedings and eſtate, and in the proceedings of 'ſtate, ſhould reſt upon the ſoundneſs and ſtrength 'of his own courſes, and not upon practice to circumvent others, according to the ſentence of Solomon, Vir prudens advertit ad greſſus ſuos; ſtultus autem divertit ad dolos: inſomuch that the biſhop 'of Roſs, a ſubtle and obſerving man, ſaid of him, 'that he could faſten no words upon him, and that 'it was impoſſible to come within him, becauſe he 'offered no play: and the Queen mother of France, 'a very politic princeſs, ſaid of him, that he 'ſhould have been of the council of Spain, becauſe 'he deſpiſed the occurrents, and reſted upon the 'firſt plot (24).'

We muſt not omit the project which he formed, in Henry the Eighth's reign, for a ſeminary of miniſters of ſtate, to be founded out of the revenues of diſſolved monaſteries. At that time, ſeveral ſchemes were ſuggeſted for noble foundations, and the King ſeemed very earneſt for carrying them into execution; but he had ſo outrun himſelf in his bounty, that it was not poſſible to bring them to any effect. Among the reſt of theſe deſigns, his majeſty intended to found a houſe for the ſtudy of the civil law, and the purity of the Latin and French tongues. He ordered, therefore, Sir Nicholas Bacon, and two others, Thomas Denton, and Robert Cary, to make a full project of the nature, and orders, of ſuch a houſe. This they accordingly did, and brought it to the king in writing. The intention of it was, that there ſhould be frequent pleadings, and other exerciſes in the Latin and French languages; and that when the ſtudents had attained to ſome degree of ripeneſs, they ſhould be ſent out with our ambaſſadors, and trained up in the knowledge of foreign affairs; by which means the inſtitution would become a nurſery for public miniſters. Others of the ſtudents were to be employed in writing the hiſtory of the national tranſactions both at home and abroad; including, particularly, embaſſies, treaties, arraignments, and ſtate trials. But before they were to be permitted to write on theſe ſubjects, they were to take an oath, before the Lord Chancellor, that they would do it truly, without reſpect of perſons, and without any corrupt views. This noble deſign miſcarried. But if it 'had been well laid and regulated, it is eaſy to 'gather, of him is juſt and plain, Vir præpinguis, ingenio acerrimo, ſingulari prudentia, ſummâ eloquentia, tenaci memoria, & ſacris Conciliis alterum Columen (b); i. e. A man of a groſs body but moſt quick wit, ſingular prudence, ſupreme eloquence, happy memory, and for judgment the other pillar of the State. His felicity was not greater in his fortune than in his family. His firſt wife was Jane, daughter of William Fernley, of Weſt Creting in the county of Suffolk, Eſq; by whom he had iſſue three ſons and three daughters. The ſons were, 1. Sir Nicholas. 2. Nathaniel Bacon of Stiffkey in Norfolk, Eſq; who married two wives, 1. Anne, daughter of Sir Thomas Greſham of London, Knt. by whom he had three daughters his coheirs; 1. Anne, who being married to Sir Roger Townſhend of Rainham in Norfolk, anceſtor to the preſent Lord Viſcount Townſhend, brought the Stiffkey eſtate into that family; 2. Elizabeth, married to Sir Thomas Knyvet of Aſhwelthorp in Norfolk; and 3. Winifred, to Sir Robert Gawdy, of Claxton in Norfolk, Knt. Sir Nathaniel's ſecond wife was Dorothy, daughter of Sir George Hopton of Suffolk, Knt. by whom he had no iſſue. 3. Though the epitaph for the Lord Keeper, aſcribed to Buchanan, hath been much commended, it does not appear to contain any remarkable beauty. Camden, in his remains, p. 390, ſays, that the excellent poet Buchanan is thought to have made it. Henry Holland aſcribes it to Sir Nicholas Bacon himſelf. Hoc epitaphium ille dum vixit adornavit et concinnavit. But it is not likely that a man of the Lord Keeper's character, in which we find no traces of vanity, ſhould thus be the reciter of his own praiſes. The epitaph is publiſhed in Buchanan's works, and, if it was written after Sir Nicholas's death, it is probably one of the laſt of that poet's good performances. Indeed, his poetical fire ſeems in it to be much exhauſted (26).

Biſhop Tanner hath enrolled Sir Nicholas Bacon among the writers of this country. His reaſons are, the following pieces, preſerved in different manuſcript collections. ' An Oration to the Queen, exhorting ' her to marriage.' ' A Speech to the Lord Mayor ' of London.' ' A Speech to the Serjeant called to a ' Judge.' ' An Oration touching the Queen's Mar- ' riage, and Succeſſion to the Crown.' ' His Speech ' to the Queen, when ſhe made him Lord Keeper.' ' His Speech in the Star Chamber, 1568.' ' His ' Speech to Sir Thomas Gargrave, elected Speaker ' for the Commons Houſe of Parliament.' ' His ' ſpeech at the Council Table, concerning Aid re- ' quired by the Scots, to expel the French out of ' Scotland.' ' His Speech concerning an Interview ' between Queen Elizabeth and the Scottiſh Queen, ' 1572.' His Speech to the Lords and Commons in ' Parliament, in the beginning.' ' His Speech to ' Mr. Bell when he was called to be Judge.' All theſe are in the Norwich Manuſcripts of More, 228; and are, we ſuppoſe, at preſent, in the public library of Cambridge. ' Several Speeches of Lord ' Keeper Sir Nicholas Bacon, from 1558 to 1571 in- ' cluſive,' in Mr. Ralph Thoreſby's collection. ' A ' Diſcourſe upon certain Points touching the Inheri- ' tance of the Crown, conceived by Sir Anthony ' Brown, and anſwered by Sir Nicholas Bacon.' This is in Smith's manuſcripts, 57. ' Three Letters to Dr. ' Parker;' in Corpus Chriſti College, Cambridge; mentioned by Strype, in his life of the Archbiſhop. One of theſe, entitled, ' A Letter of Mr. Nicholas ' Bacon, Counſellor at Law, to Parker, Dean of Stoke ' College; in Anſwer to certain Caſes put to him re- ' lating to the ſaid College,' Mr. Strype has publiſhed at length. Holinſhed, at the end of his 2d volume, p. 1589, hath ranked Sir Nicholas Bacon in the catalogue of thoſe who have written ſomething concerning the hiſtory of England (27). Mr. Maſters refers to a comment of Sir Nicholas's on the twelve minor prophets, dedicated to his ſon Anthony. And Mr. Strype hath printed an excellent letter of advice, which was written by the Lord Keeper, a little before his death, to the Queen, on the ſituation of her affairs. Many of his apothegms are among thoſe of Lord Verulam (28).

Before Mr. Walpole had obliged the world with his anecdotes of painting in England, it was, we believe, very little known that Nathaniel, the ſecond ſon of Sir Nicholas Bacon, by his firſt lady, was an eminent proficient in that polite art. ' There was ' one gentleman, ſays Mr. Walpole, in this reign ' (Queen Elizabeth's) who really attained the perfec- ' tion of a maſter, Sir Nathaniel Bacon.—— He tra- ' velled into Italy, and ſtudied painting there; but ' his manner and colouring approaches nearer to the ' ſtyle of the Flemiſh ſchool. Peacham on Limning, ' p. 126, ſays, " But none, in my opinion, deſerv- " eth more reſpect and admiration, for his ſkill and " practice in painting, than Maſter Nathaniel Bacon " of Broome in Suffolk (younger ſon to the moſt " honourable and bountiful-minded Sir Nicholas " Bacon), not inferior, in my judgment, to our ſkill- " fulleſt maſters." At Culford, where he lived, ' are preſerved ſome of his works; and at Gorham- ' bury, his father's ſeat, is a large picture in oil by ' him, of a cook maid with dead fowls, admirably ' painted, with great nature, neatneſs, and luſtre of ' colouring. In the ſame houſe is a whole length of ' him by himſelf, drawing on a paper: his ſword ' and pallet hung up, and a half length of his mother ' by him. At Redgrave-Hall, in Suffolk, were two ' more pieces by the ſame hand, which afterwards ' paſſed into the poſſeſſion of Mr. Rowland Holt; ' the one, Ceres with fruit and flowers; the other, ' Hercules and the Hydra. In Tradeſcant's muſeum ' was a ſmall landſcape, painted and given to him ' by Sir Nathaniel Bacon (29).' In the chancel of Culford, in Suffolk, are a monument and buſt of him, with his pallet and pencils. Another monument was erected to his memory at Stiffkey in Norfolk, the inſcription upon which is publiſhed by Mr. Maſters. The ſame writer informs us, that Sir Nathaniel was famed for painting plants, and well ſkilled in their virtues (30).]

BACON (FRANCIS) Viſcount St. Albans, and High-Chancellor of England in the reign of King James I., the glory and ornament, as he has been juſtly ſtiled, of his age and nation. His parents were, Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal, with whoſe character the reader is already acquainted; his mother, Anne, one of the daughters of Sir Anthony Cook, Tutor to King Edward VI., a lady equally diſtinguiſhed by her piety, prudence, and learning (a). She was the ſecond wife of Sir Nicholas Bacon, and this Francis her ſecond ſon, was born at York-Houſe in the Strand, on the twenty-ſecond of January, 1560-1 (b). His infancy being paſt, his noble genius, cultivated and encouraged by his excellent parents, gave early proofs of its ſurprizing ſtrength and pregnancy; inſomuch that we may juſtly ſay, his fame commenced with his childhood, as it accompanied him to his grave: for ſo remarkably conſpicuous were his parts, even in his tender years, that perſons of great worth and high dignity delighted in converſing with him while a boy; and Queen Elizabeth herſelf, whoſe peculiar felicity it was to make a right judgment of merit, was ſo charmed with the ſolidity of his ſenſe, and the gravity of his behaviour, that ſhe would often call him her young Lord-Keeper (c); a happy preſage, which, in the ſucceeding reign, was fully accompliſhed. When he had acquired the neceſſary rudiments of learning to qualify him for academical ſtudies, he was ſent to the univerſity of Cambridge, where, on the tenth of June 1573, he was entered of Trinity-college, under Dr. John Whitgift, afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, being then in the thirteenth year of his age (d). The quickneſs of his natural parts, aſſiſted by an uncommon diligence and application, under the direction of as able and careful a Tutor, as any that learned age afforded, enabled our young ſcholar to make a moſt ſurprizing progreſs in his ſtudies; ſo that before he was full ſixteen, he had not only run through the whole circle of the liberal arts, as they were then taught, but began to perceive thoſe imperfections in the reigning Philoſophy, which he afterwards ſo effectually expoſed, and thereby not only overturned that tyranny which prevented the progreſs of true knowledge, but laid the foundation of that free and uſeful Philoſophy, which has ſince opened a way to ſo many great and glorious diſcoveries (e): a thing highly worthy of notice, and which would certainly be eſteemed incredible, if it were not ſupported by as clear evidence, as the nature of the fact requires [A]. His father, the Lord-Keeper, diſcovering in his ſon ſuch a ripeneſs of judgment and diſcretion, as ſeemed to warrant taking an extraordinary ſtep in his education, reſolved to ſend him, young as he was, to France, that he might improve himſelf in the knowledge of the world, under a Miniſter as capable and as honeſt as that age produced, Sir Amias Powlet, then the Queen's Ambaſſador at Paris. His behaviour while in the houſe of that famous ſtateſman was ſo well conducted, that he gained the eſteem and confidence of Sir Amias to ſuch a degree, as to be intruſted with a commiſſion of importance to the Queen, which required both ſecreſy and diſpatch. To execute this he came over hither, and performed it with ſuch applauſe, as gained both himſelf and the Ambaſſador credit (f). He afterwards returned to Paris, from [A] As clear evidence as the nature of the fact requires.] We are indebted to Dr. Rawley, who was our author's Chaplain, for this and many other circumſtances relating to the earlier years of his life. He tells us, for inſtance, that Queen Elizabeth was charmed at an anſwer given her by Bacon, when a perfect child. Her Majeſty it ſeems had aſked him how old he was, to which he anſwered, that he was two years younger than her Majeſty's happy reign (1). There was certainly a great deal of wit in this ſprightly and well-turned compliment, from whence one may eaſily be induced to believe, that by the help of his education, and the example of his parents, who were as well bred and learned a couple as any in their time, Mr. Bacon might have acquired very extraordinary lights even before he went to the Univerſity. But the point which in this note we are to make good, was not at all of this nature; ſince, whatever he heard of Ariſtotle before he went to College, muſt have been ſuch things as would have ſerved rather to impreſs on him an awe of his authority, than a diſtruſt of his knowledge. Yet we are aſſured by Dr. Rawley, that he received this particular from Lord Bacon's own mouth; who likewiſe told him, that his exceptions againſt that great Philoſopher were not founded upon the worthleſſneſs of the author, to whom he would ever aſcribe all high attributes, but for the unfruitfulneſs of the way; being a Philoſophy (as his Lordſhip uſed to ſay) only for diſputations and contentions, but barren in the production of works for the benefit of the life of man, in which mind he continued to his dying day (2). Dr. Teniſon likewiſe, in his introduction to the Baconiana tells us, that when our author began his ſtudies, Ariſtotle was in effect the Pope in Philoſophy. The lectures both in his private college and in the public ſchools, were generally expoſitions upon Ariſtotle's text, and every opinion written by him as his own, was eſteemed as authentic, as if it had been given under the ſeal of the fiſher. It was therefore a very ſingular felicity in a young gentleman, to ſee farther into nature than the celebrated Philoſopher, at whoſe feet he was placed; and it was as happy as it was extraordinary, that he took diſtaſte betimes at the vulgar ſchemes of Natural Philoſophy. 'Uſe and cuſtom in that 'way, continues Dr. Teniſon, might have reconciled 'it to him, as it had done to others of great learn-'ing. For a Philoſopher is like a vine, of which 'they ſay, it muſt be ſet of a plant and not of a 'tree. But though there was bred in Mr. Bacon ſo early 'a diſlike of the Phyſiology of Ariſtotle, yet he did 'not deſpiſe him with that pride and haughtineſs 'with which youth is wont to be puffed up. He had 'a juſt eſteem of that great maſter of learning, a 'greater than that which Ariſtotle expreſſed himſelf, 'towards the Philoſophers that went before him; for 'he endeavoured (ſome ſay) to ſtifle all their labours, 'deſigning to himſelf an univerſal monarchy over 'opinions, as his patron Alexander did over men. 'Our hero owned what was excellent in him, but in 'his enquiries into nature, he proceeded not upon 'his principles. He began the work anew, and laid 'the foundation of philoſophic theory in numerous 'experiments (3).' Thus we ſee that, upon the whole, there is not the leaſt reaſon to doubt the truth of this matter of fact, how extraordinary ſoever it may appear in its nature; and we ſhall very ſoon have occaſion to ſupport the evidence already given, by another proof as convincing as either of thoſe which we have alledged already: for truths appear clearer the more cloſely they are examined, whereas errors, however ſpecious, cannot endure ſuch teſts.

whence he made ſome excurſions into the French provinces, that he might be the better acquainted with the country; reſiding for ſome time at Poictiers, and making ſuch obſervations upon men and things, as opportunities would allow, of which we have a remarkable inſtance in his writings [B]. He applied himſelf during his ſtay there, not only to ſuch ſtudies as were agreeable to his inclination, but to thoſe likewiſe, for his improvement in which, his father might probably be ſuppoſed to have ſent him thither, as appears from a very ingenious and elegant performance of his, containing A ſuccinct View of the State of Europe at that time, which, as the worthy writer of his life, with great penetration, has obſerved, appears plainly to have been written when our author was but nineteen (g). In this ſhort treatiſe there appears, not only much of the ſpirit and judgment, but of the method alſo, which he purſued in his ſucceeding writings; which is a point particularly worthy of notice, becauſe it corroborates and ſupports what has been before related, of his early proficiency, and ſurprizing progreſs in learning, and is indeed not only worthy in all reſpects of ſo great a genius, but deſerves likewiſe to be eſpecially pointed out, for the imitation of other young gentlemen in like circumſtances [C]. But while he was thus improving his talents abroad, his fortune received a very untoward check at home, by the ſudden and unexpected death of his father, the Lord-Keeper, who having provided amply for his eldeſt ſon by his ſecond venter, had laid by a conſiderable ſum of money for the ſettlement of the younger ſon; but dying before he could find a proper purchaſe, Mr. Francis Bacon had no more than the fifth part of this money for his whole fortune, which proving but a narrow proviſion, he found himſelf obliged to return to England, and to think of ſome profeſſion that might ſuſtain his fortune (b). He was not long in making this choice, in which perhaps the advice of his relations, the perſuaſion of friends, and the fame of his father, had to the full as great a ſhare as his own inclinations. However that might be, he, on his return home, applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Common Law, and for that purpoſe entered himſelf of the honourable ſociety of Gray's-Inn, where his ſuperior talents rendered him the ornament of the houſe,

[B] Of which we have a remarkable inſtance in his writings.] The moſt curious as well as the moſt authentic paſſages of the lives of learned men, are uſually drawn from their own works, and therefore they ought to be read with the utmoſt attention for this purpoſe. The paſſage I am to cite on this occaſion, has not, for any thing that I know, been taken notice of by any who have laboured to oblige the world with memoirs of this learned perſon; and I the rather cite it, becauſe it ſhews how early he began thoſe enquiries into human nature, which were finiſhed only with his life. Speaking of the differences between youth and old age, and having enumerated many of them, he proceeds thus: When I was a young man at Poictiers in France, I familiarly converſed with a young gentleman of that country, who was extremely ingenious, but ſomewhat talkative; he afterwards became a perſon of great eminence. This gentleman uſed to inveigh againſt the manners of old people, and would ſay, that if one could ſee their minds as well as their bodies, their minds would appear as deformed as their bodies; and indulging his own humour, he pretended, that the defects of old men's minds, in ſome meaſure correſponded to the defects of their bodies. Thus dryneſs of the ſkin, he ſaid, was anſwered by impudence; hardneſs of the viſcera, by relentleſſneſs; blear-eyes, by envy; and an evil eye, their down look, and incurvation of the body, by atheiſm, as no longer, ſays he, looking up to heaven; the trembling and ſhaking of the limbs, by unſteadineſs and inconſtancy; the bending of their fingers, as to lay hold of ſomething, by rapacity and avarice; the weakneſs of their knees, by fearfulneſs; their wrinkles, by indirect dealings and cunning, &c. (4).

(4) Hiſtoria Vitæ & Mortis, Vol. iii. p. 180.

[C] The imitation of other young gentlemen in like circumſtances.] The principal deſign in travelling is, or ought to be, the ſhaking off ſuch prejudices as are contracted in a manner unavoidably in the courſe of common education, and the acquiring of ſuch lights, by experience and enquiry, as can be obtained no other way. It was to facilitate theſe, that Mr. Bacon compoſed, as far as we can judge from the piece itſelf, this treatiſe, intitled, Of the State of EUROPE (*), in which he ſets down the names of all the Princes then reigning, their characters, families, intereſts, dominions, forces, revenues, and principal tranſactions of their reigns; together with ſome notices of their miniſters, favourites, and the principal perſons in their dominions; which without doubt our author drew forth into this form, that he might with the greater eaſe underſtand what he heard or read concerning them, as alſo to help his own converſation on any of theſe ſubjects, and thereby prevent his falling into any of thoſe errors, which are but too common with young travellers, and which frequently lay them open to ſuch corrections, as muſt naturally put them out of countenance. It is a very ingenious obſervation of Mr. Mallet, who has written our author's life with great ſpirit and vivacity, that this tract muſt have been written about the year 1580, becauſe he tells us therein, that Henry III. of France was then thirty years old; and as that Prince began his reign in 1574, when he was twenty-four years of age; this is certainly a very clear proof of the fact, and that our author compoſed this work by that time he was nineteen (5). I cannot however help believing, that it was not compoſed all at once, but rather, that our author began it in his travels, and afterwards reviſed and finiſhed it when he was ſettled at Gray's-Inn. I am confirmed in this by obſerving ſome other dates, mentioned in this ſhort tract, which do not fall in exactly with that year; as for inſtance, ſpeaking of Pope Gregory XIII, he ſays, he was then ſeventy years old, but as that Pontiff died in 1585, at the age of eighty-three (6), it is plain that he muſt have written this particular paſſage in 1582. Again, ſpeaking of Philip II. King of Spain, he ſays he was about ſixty years of age: but this King Philip was born in 1527, and conſequently, was not ſixty till the year 1587 (7); and if we examine his other dates with the ſame care, we ſhall find that they refer to different years, which plainly proves that my conjecture is probable at leaſt, if not certain. But what is extremely remarkable in this ſmall treatiſe, is the care and accuracy with which he has ſet down moſt of the little Princes in Germany, with the ſtate of their dominions. In ſhort, the whole of this piece argues the author's great diligence and exactneſs, and at the ſame time demonſtrates, how early he had found the advantages of committing whatever he thought worthy of notice to writing, and reducing it into a proper method. To ſay the truth, this was a thing very cuſtomary in thoſe days, with ſuch as applied themſelves to the ſtudy of public affairs, with a view to make themſelves uſeful to the ſtate; of which many inſtances might be given, if we had not already exceeded the bounds of a note, and ſpent rather too much time upon a performance, chiefly remarkable, for being in all probability the firſt that fell from the pen of this eminent writer, and which, in all likelihood, was never intended by its author for the eye of the public; though from the great eſteem attracted by many excellent works, it was juſtly held a benefit conferred upon poſterity to deliver from obſcurity, whatever was aſſuredly the product of ſo vaſt a genius.

as the gentleneſs and affability of his deportment procured him the affection of all its members. The place itſelf was ſo agreeable to Mr. Bacon, that he erected there a very elegant ſtructure, which many years after was known by the name of the Lord Bacon's Lodgings, which he inhabited occaſionally through the greateſt part of his life, and thereby teſtified, how pleaſantly he had paſſed his time in that ſeat of learning, while he had no higher title than that of a member of Gray's-Inn (i). He ſpent his time during the firſt years of his reſidence in that place, in very hard ſtudy, not confining himſelf entirely to the Law, which however he made ſufficiently his care, but indulging his extenſive genius in the free contemplation of the whole circle of ſcience. This appears clearly from hence, that he framed, as he tells us himſelf, not long after his being ſettled here, the plan of that great philoſophical work, which will not only render his name immortal, but do honour to his age and country, ſo long as learning ſhall continue to flouriſh (k). As to this tract of his, in which, as an ingenious writer obſerves, he traced the out-lines of that magnificent ſtructure, which after thirty years labour he finiſhed; it ſeems (at leaſt to me) doubtful, whether it be entirely loſt, or whether we have it ſtill as its author left it, imperfect and unfiniſhed [D]. But though he did not entirely confine

[D] Or whether we have it ſtill, as its author left it, imperfect and unfiniſhed.] In order to clear up this point, I ſhall endeavour to ſhew upon what grounds it is believed that our author wrote ſuch a work ſo early; next, what the title of that piece really was; and laſtly, what reaſons there are to conceive it is not wholly loſt, as has hitherto been the common opinion. As to the firſt, the author himſelf, in a letter to Father Fulgentio, a very learned Italian (8), who deſired to have an account of the works he had already written, and of thoſe he had ſtill thoughts of making public, having firſt mentioned the ſeveral parts of his great body of Philoſophy, which had already ſeen the light, he goes on thus: 'Attamen in prodromis (iis dico 'tantum, quæ ad univerſalia naturæ fere pertingunt) 'non levia jacta erunt hujus rei fundamenta. Cona-'mur (ut vides) tenues grandia: in eo tamen ſpem 'ponentes, quod videntur iſta a Dei providentia & 'immenſa bonitate profecta. Primo, propter ardorem '& conſtantiam mentis noſtræ, quæ in hoc inſtituto 'non conſenuit, nec tanto temporis ſpatio refrixit. 'Equidem memini me quadraginta abhinc annis ju-'venile opuſculum circa has res confeciſſe, quod 'magna prorſus fiducia et magnifico titulo, temporis 'partum maximum inſcripſi. Secundo quod propter 'utilitatem infinitam Dei opt. max. auctoramento 'gaudere videatur (9).' That is, Nevertheleſs, in theſe introductory pieces (thoſe I mean which related chiefly to generals) the foundation of this matter was not haſtily laid. We ſtruggled (as you ſee) to effect great things by a ſmall force, putting our firm confidence in God, that through his providence and great goodneſs, we ſhould accompliſh them. Firſt, becauſe of the ardour and conſtancy of our mind, which grew not languid after making a beginning, or cooled at all in ſo long a ſpace. For well I remember that forty years ago, I compoſed a juvenile work about theſe things, which with great confidence I graced with the ſwelling title of the Greateſt Birth of Time. Secondly, becauſe for its infinite utility, the moſt wiſe God ſeemed to encourage my progreſs. It is very clear from hence, that our author wrote a book, containing the rudiments of his Philoſophy, when he was very young, for if we ſhould even allow this letter, which is without date, to have been written in the laſt year of his life, yet this will carry the treatiſe ſo far back as to the year 1586, when our author was in the twenty-ſixth year of his age, and before he had attained to any preferment; and it is poſſible that it might have been written ſome time before. As to the title of this book, the Reader has it in the letter; but then there is ſome doubt, whether this title were the true one, or rather as I think, whether it was the only one. It may not be amiſs to hear, what a very learned editor of ſome of our author's works has ſaid upon this ſubject, in which, ſpeaking of the works of Lord Bacon that are miſſing, he ſays (10), 'Loſt 'likewiſe is a book, which he wrote in his youth: 'he called it (Temporis Partus Maximus) the Greateſt 'Birth of Time, or rather, Temporis Partus Maſ-'culus, the Maſculine Birth of Time, for ſo Gruter 'found it called in ſome of the papers of Sir William 'Boſwel. This was a kind of embryo of the Inſtau-'ration, and if it had been preſerved, it might have 'delighted and profited philoſophical readers, who 'could then have ſeen the generation of that great 'work, as it were, from the firſt egg of it.' In like manner, the ingenious Mr. Mallet (11), ſpeaking of this treatiſe, is pleaſed to deliver himſelf thus: 'Though 'the piece itſelf is loſt, it appears to have been the 'firſt out-lines of that amazing deſign, which he af-'terwards filled up and finiſhed, in his grand Inſtau-'ration of the Sciences. As there is not a more a-'muſing, perhaps a more uſeful ſpeculation, than 'that of tracing the hiſtory of the human mind, 'if I may ſo expreſs myſelf, in its progreſſion from 'truth to truth, and from diſcovery to diſcovery; 'the intelligent reader would, doubtleſs, have been 'pleaſed, to ſee in the tract I have been ſpeaking of, 'by what ſteps and gradations, a ſpirit like Bacon's 'advanced in new and univerſal theory.' But perhaps, after all this, the treatiſe ſo much deplored may not be loſt: for it is certain, that the tract mentioned by Gruter, under the title of Temporis Partus Maſculus, or the Maſculine Birth of Time; is in ſome meaſure preſerved by him, in the Latin works which he publiſhed of Lord Bacon, and we find it again in the lateſt Engliſh edition of his works, in the language and ſtate in which its noble author left it (12). But here ſeems to lie the difficulty: ſome writers who have reviewed the ſcattered works and fragments of Lord Bacon have, with great labour and induſtry, endeavoured to bring in this treatiſe, otherwiſe ſtiled Of the Interpretation of Nature, as a part of that great body of Philoſophy which he had framed; whereas our author himſelf, ſpeaking of this treatiſe, tells us, as the reader may ſee above, that it was not a part or portion of his great ſtructure of Philoſophy, but the firſt ſketch or rough draught of the whole. Now I conceive, that whoever looks into theſe fragments of the book on the Interpretation of Nature, as they ſtand in the works of our author, and ſhall afterwards compare them with the beginning of his Inſtauration, will not need many arguments to perſuade him, that this conjecture is founded in truth, and that there is as much reaſon to conceive that the great work juſt mentioned, roſe out of the Temporis Partus Maſculus, as that the Novum Organon, ſprung from another of the fragments which accompanies this, and is commonly called his Cogitata & Viſa. If the reader would be told what is the iſſue, what the advantage of this laboured inquiry, he will ſurely be ſatisfied with this anſwer; that by drawing theſe fragments of the Interpretation of Nature into a good light, it appears, that what the honeſt and candid Teniſon thought ſo fine a ſight, the generation of Lord Bacon's Philoſophy from the egg is ſtill in our power; and what the ingenious and inſtructive Mr. Mallet moſt truly obſerves, the ability of reviewing and tracing the author's ſteps from one diſcovery in ſcience to another, is yet in a great meaſure with us; which, to ſuch as rightly apprehend Lord Bacon's worth, and have a juſt conception of the value of his writings, will appear ſomewhat of conſiderable conſequence. I am ſatisfied, that in matters of this nature there is no abſolute certainty, and that in the depths of Lord Bacon's knowledge, a man of ordinary talents may be very eaſily loſt; but I own at the ſame time, the thing ſtruck me ſo ſtrongly, that confine his thoughts to his profeſſion, yet his quick parts and ſurprizing penetration enabled him to make as rapid a progreſs in that, as in other kinds of learning; and the rather, becauſe he was extremely methodical, and wonderfully diligent in his ſtudy, taking all imaginable pains to make himſelf thoroughly maſter of the principles of the Law, and to extend his knowledge gradually through all the branches of that laborious, but moſt uſeful and noble profeſſion, as is very evident, from his ſolid and learned writings. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf no leſs in his practice, which was very conſiderable; and after diſcharging the office of Reader at Gray's-Inn, which he did in 1588, when in the twenty-eighth year of his age, he was become ſo conſiderable, that the Queen, who never over-valued any man's abilities, thought fit to call him to her ſervice, in a way which did him very great honour, by appointing him her Counſel learned in the Law Extraordinary; by which, though ſhe contributed abundantly to his reputation, yet ſhe added but very little to his fortune, as indeed in this reſpect he was never much indebted to her Majeſty, how much ſoever he might be in all others (l).

We are henceforth to conſider him in a new character, I mean that of a ſtateſman and candidate for Court favour, as well as a Lawyer; and it will require ſome pains, and much caution, ſo to ſpeak of him in this light, as to avoid injuring either his character or the truth. He ſeemed to come into the world with as great advantages, and with as high pretenſions to preferment as any man of his time: for, beſides being the ſon of a Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal, and one of the ableſt ſtateſmen of the age, he was nephew to William Lord Burleigh, who married his mother's ſiſter, and firſt couſin to Sir Robert Cecil, his ſon, who was Principal Secretary of State; ſo that one would have thought Mr. Bacon's abilities, ſupported by ſuch powerful mediators, might eaſily have made their way at Court (m). But it was his misfortune to have too much merit, and too extenſive intereſt. The former rendered him ſuſpicious to his Court patrons, and the latter engaging both parties in his favour, produced him much credit, but contributed more than any thing to ſpoil his fortune. The Court and Miniſtry of Queen Elizabeth was through her whole reign divided into two parties, at the head of one of which were the two Cecils, and at the head of the other, firſt the Earl of Leiceſter, and afterwards his ſon-in-law the Earl of Eſſex (n). If Mr. Bacon, who, as we have already ſhewn, was nearly allied to their family, had ſteadily adhered to the Cecils, he might very probably have riſen by their intereſt: but he made a very early friendſhip with Robert Earl of Eſſex, who was at the head of the other faction, and attached likewiſe his elder brother, Mr. Anthony Bacon, to that nobleman's ſervice, and that in ſo ſtrict a manner, as could not fail to give great jealouſy to the Cecils (o). All theſe are indiſputable matters of fact; and therefore ſuch as are acquainted with the intrigues of a court, will not be very much ſurprized at the fate of Mr. Bacon, of whoſe parts and application, while both parties made their advantage, yet neither made his fortune. Sir Robert Cecil is repreſented, and perhaps juſtly, as the perſon who threw thoſe obſtacles in Mr. Bacon's way, that throughout this whole reign he was never able to ſurmount: for he who had all the arts and addreſs of a Court, failed not to ſuggeſt, that Mr. Bacon was a ſpeculative man, and conſequently the leſs fit for buſineſs, one who had his head full of philoſophical notions, and therefore more likely to perplex than to promote public affairs, if permitted to have any ſhare in their direction (p). However, that they might not ſeem to neglect ſo near a relation, or to ſlight a perſon of ſuch diſtinguiſhed abilities, the Cecils procured for him the reverſion of a very conſiderable place, viz. the Regiſter of the Court of Star-Chamber, which nevertheleſs he did not enjoy till the next reign (q) [E]. As for his other patron, Robert Earl of Eſſex, as he was a nobleman juſtly celebrated for his great qualities and eminent virtues, ſo that I could not help putting it down, yet with all imaginable ſubmiſſion to the reader, to whoſe ſervice, as I dedicate my labours, I hope (ſhould it be found ſo) he will the more eaſily pardon my miſtake. There are, however, a few circumſtances more, to which I muſt deſire the reader's attention, and then he will have a juſt notion of Mr. Bacon's frame of mind. While at Gray's-Inn, he was eagerly engaged in the ſtudy and purſuit of his new Philoſophy, the whole ſcheme of which he had already formed. It was to this he applied his thoughts, and this was the great object of his ambition. If he deſired or laboured for preferment in civil life, it was but with a view to gain thereby the means of improving and accompliſhing his ſyſtem; for he made even the moſt ſhining tranſactions of his life, but ſubſervient thereto. In a word, the introducing this new method of attaining wiſdom was his ruling paſſion, and his great ſpring of action through life. It quickened him in the purſuit of employments, it conſoled him when he met diſappointments in that purſuit; it filled up (moſt agreeably) his few leiſure moments when in the zenith of his grandeur; it ſoftened his fall, by propoſing a new road to fame and eſteem, in which he was in no danger of being either impoſed on by one ſet of men, or ſacrificed to the intereſts of another. Thus, this was always, and in all conjunctures, his leading object, of which he never loſt ſight; and as we have already had a train of evidence ſufficient to convince us, that he conceived ſomething of this kind when he was but ſixteen, and brought it into ſome form by that time he was twenty-ſix; ſo the remainder of this article will ſhow, how warmly he proſecuted this point till death overtook him on the road, when his mind was wholly occupied with theſe ſpeculations.

[E] The regiſter of the court of Star-Chamber, which, however, he did not enjoy till the next reign.] When our author firſt applied himſelf to public affairs, he ſtudied to recommend himſelf ſolely to the good graces of the Lord High-Treaſurer Burleigh, from whom, as his uncle, he expected, and had reaſon to expect, the faireſt quarter in the world. We learn this from his own writings; for there are many of his letters to that nobleman ſtill extant, in which he declares no leſs, and expreſſes a very warm and paſſionate deſire, to dedicate himſelf entirely to the Queen's ſervice, through the interpoſition, and ſolely by the recommendation of that great Miniſter

ſo he approved himſelf to Mr. Bacon, a warm, ſteady, and indefatigable friend. This appeared clearly, upon Mr. Bacon's preſſing very earneſtly to be made Queen's Solicitor, in the year 1594, in which he made uſe of all his friends, and exerted his own endeavours to the utmoſt. It was now that he diſcovered, how little reaſon he had to truſt to, or depend upon, the Cecils, and had very little cauſe to be well pleaſed with the conduct of the then Lord-Keeper (r); but as for the Earl of Eſſex, he not only afforded him all the aſſiſtance, both by perſonal application, and by engaging his friends to intereſt themſelves on the behalf of Mr. Bacon, that was in his power, but had ſo generous a concern for his want of ſucceſs in that application, which he believed to be owing to his own appearing in this gentleman's cauſe, that he moſt kindly and freely made him amends for his diſappointment out of his own fortune (s) [F]. This was ſo rare, ſo extraordinary an inſtance of this nobleman's ſincere friendſhip, and tender regard for Mr. Bacon, and, at the ſame time, ſo noble a teſtimony of his ſpotleſs honour and boundleſs generoſity, that one would have thought it muſt for ever have attached Mr. Bacon to that Earl's fortunes. But it happened otherwiſe: that great favourite fell into deep misfortunes, which prove ſo frequently the fate of all Court favourites, that it ought not to be eſteemed a wonder: yet, that Mr. Bacon ſhould be apparently, and in the eye of the world, an inſtrument of his misfortunes, that in the exerciſe of his profeſſion he ſhould ſter (14). It was by the means of that Lord he obtained the reverſion of this office, as he acknowledges in the ſame letters, with this additional circumſtance, that his Lordſhip obtained it for him, notwithſtanding a vehement oppoſition. What this place was and the value of it. Dr. Rawley, who was his Lordſhip's Chaplain, and one who lived with him in the ſtricteſt intimacy, tells us plainly, and with circumſtances worthy notice (15). 'His birth and other capacities, ſays he, qualified him above others of his profeſſion 'to have ordinary acceſſes at Court, and to come frequently into the Queen's eye, who would often grace 'him with private and free communication, not 'only about matters of his profeſſion or buſineſs in 'Law, but alſo about the arduous affairs of ſtate, 'from whom ſhe received from time to time a great 'ſatisfaction. Nevertheleſs, though ſhe cheared him 'much with the bounty of her countenance, yet ſhe 'never cheared him with the bounty of her hand, 'having never conferred upon him any ordinary place, 'or means of honour, or profit, ſave only one dry 'reverſion of the Regiſter's-Office in the Star-Chamber, 'worth about 1600*l. per ann.* for which he waited 'in expectation, either fully, or near twenty years; 'of which his Lordſhip would ſay, in Queen Elizabeth's time, That it was like another man's ground 'buttalling upon his houſe, which might mend his 'proſpect, but it did not fill his barn.' His having the reverſion of this place, I take to be the reaſon, why ſeveral writers ſtyle him one of the Clerks of the Privy-Council (16); for that he had no other employment than this under that reign, is very clear from the foregoing paſſage in Dr. Rawley's Memoirs, and from his own letters (17). It was in gratitude for his obtaining for him this reverſion, that in the year 1592, our author compoſed a large treatiſe, which he called Certain Obſervations upon a Libel entitled, A Declaration of the true Cauſes of the great Troubles; in which he very warmly vindicates the Lord Treaſurer particularly, and his own father, and the reſt of Queen Elizabeth's Miniſters occaſionally, and this I take to have been the firſt political production of his pen (18); and, by the way, it may not be amiſs to remark, that theſe ſort of miniſterial pamphlets were much in faſhion in thoſe days, and proved the great ſupport of that Queen's adminiſtration: for her Miniſters, being wiſe and able men, and acting upon juſt and honeſt principles, were not afraid of explaining and juſtifying their conduct, by which they were ſure to ſatisfy the ſenſible part of the nation, and ſecure to themſelves the rational ſupport of a well founded popularity during their lives, and a juſt reſpect for their memories after their deceaſe; which are bleſſings that can never be enjoyed by wicked or weak miniſters, ſuch as act either upon bad principles, or upon no principles at all.

[F] Made him amends for his diſappointment out of his own fortune.] We learn this ſingular particular from the beſt authority poſſible; viz. that of our author himſelf, who, in his apology (19), addreſſed to the Earl of Devonſhire, gives us the ſtory at large in theſe words: 'I muſt and will ever acknowledge 'my Lord's love, truſt, and favour towards me, and 'laſt of all his liberality, having enfeoffed me of 'land, which I ſold for eighteen hundred pounds to 'Maſter Reynold Nicholas, which I think was more 'worth, and that at ſuch a time, and with ſo kind 'and noble circumſtances, as the manner was as much 'as the matter, which though it be but an idle 'digreſſion, yet becauſe I am not willing to be ſhort 'in commemoration of his benefits, I will preſume to 'trouble your Lordſhip with relating to you the 'manner of it. After the Queen had denied me the 'Solicitor's place, for the which his Lordſhip had 'been a long and earneſt ſuitor on my behalf, it 'pleaſed him to come to me from Richmond to 'Twicknam-park, and brake with me, and ſaid, Mr. 'Bacon, the Queen hath denied me the place for 'you, and hath placed another; I know you are the 'leaſt part of your own matter, but you fare ill, becauſe you have choſen me for your mean and dependance; yet you have ſpent your time and 'thoughts in my matters; I die (theſe were his 'words), if I do not ſomewhat toward your fortune, 'you ſhall not deny to accept a piece of land, which 'I will beſtow upon you. My anſwer, I remember, 'was, that for my fortune, it was no great matter, 'but that his Lordſhip's offer, made me call to mind 'what was wont to be ſaid when I was in France of 'the Duke of Guiſe, that he was the greateſt uſurer 'in France, becauſe he had turned all his eſtate into 'obligations; meaning, that he had left nothing, 'but only had bound numbers of perſons to him. 'Now, my Lord, ſaid I, I would not have you imitate his courſe, nor turn your eſtate thus by great 'gifts into obligations, for you will find many bad 'debtors. He bad me take no care for that and 'preſſed it: whereupon I ſaid, my Lord, I ſee I 'muſt be your homager, and hold land of your gift, 'but do you know the manner of doing homage in 'Law? Always it is with the ſaving of his faith to 'the King, and his other Lords; and therefore, my 'Lord, ſaid I, I can be no more your's than I was, 'and it muſt be with the ancient ſavings, and if I 'grow to be a rich man, you will give me leave to 'give it back again to ſome of your unrewarded 'followers.' There is an odd ſtory reported by a perſon who was once in Lord Bacon's ſervice, which attributes this gift to another cauſe, which I muſt confeſs, is not very probable; but however, as the man tells it with extraordinary confidence, it ought not to be paſſed over. He ſays, that our author, then his maſter, preſented to the Earl of Eſſex a ſecret curioſity of nature, whereby to know the ſeaſon of every hour of the year by a philoſophical glaſs (with a ſmall proportion of water) in a chamber; with which that Earl was ſo pleaſed, that he beſtowed upon him Twitnam-park, and its garden of paradiſe, as a place for his ſtudies (20). It was ſuch a ſtory as a ſervant might pick up and repeat; but, as Dr. Teniſon (21) juſtly obſerves, could have no farther foundation in fact, than what is contained in the beforementioned account by our author himſelf on ſuch an occaſion to ſuch a perſon, and attended with ſuch circumſtances, as leaves no room to ſurmiſe, he would either conceal or depart from truth, which at the time he wrote could have done him no good.

appear againſt him as a Lawyer, that he ſhould plead for the Crown when that nobleman was tried for his life, and that after he had ſuffered a ſhameful death, Mr. Bacon ſhould endeavour to perpetuate this ſhame, by drawing that declaration of the treaſons of the late Earl of Eſſex, which was calculated to juſtify the Government, in a meaſure very diſagreeable to the bulk of the people, and to ward off the public hate, from thoſe who had ruined the Earl of Eſſex, and had never done Mr. Bacon any good; this indeed is ſtrange, but at the ſame time it is true, ſo true, that our author found himſelf obliged to write an apology for his conduct, which he addreſſed to the Earl of Devonſhire, who was the faſt friend of the unhappy Earl of Eſſex, and his own (t) [G]. But this apology, though admirably well penned, and which ſeems to be as much diſtinguiſhed by the ſincerity of the writer's heart, as enlivened by the beauties of his eloquence, amounts to no more than this, that he had given the Earl good advice, which he did not follow; that upon this a coldneſs enſued, which kept them at a greater diſtance than formerly; that however he continued to give his advice to the Earl, and laboured all he could to ſerve him with the Queen; that in reſpect to his laſt unfortunate act, which was in truth no better than an act of madneſs, he had no knowledge or notice whatever; that he did no more than by duty he was bound to do for the ſervice of the Queen, in the way of his profeſſion; and that the declaration was put upon him altered, after he had drawn it, both by the Miniſters and the Queen herſelf: and it had not the wiſhed for effect, of entirely wiping off the imputation of ingratitude, but left him under ſuch a ſtain, as injured his reputation, in the common opinion of mankind, as long as he lived (u) [H]. The ingenious author of his life has treated this matter very freely and fairly, and has ſhewn that he was not led away by that fond ſpirit of par-

[G] Which he addreſſed to the Earl of Devonſhire, who was faſt friend to the unhappy Earl of Eſſex and himſelf.] This diſcourſe of our author's, in vindication of his conduct towards the Earl of Eſſex, was written many years after the death of that nobleman, and is certainly a very curious and very elegant performance. The chief topics inſiſted on therein are briefly ſummed up in the text. But whereas our author poſitively declares in his addreſs at the beginning of that work, that he did not write it for the ſatisfaction of the many, but of the few; it from thence moſt clearly appears, that with all his learning and all his art, he did not think it poſſible to ſatisfy common minds on that topic, and therefore affected to deſpiſe them. But undoubtedly, he was too good a judge of truth and of the nature of mankind to be really of this opinion; ſince at the bottom it will be found that the meaſures and obligations of gratitude, muſt depend upon the ſentiments of mankind in general, or have no foundations at all. The ground-work of his defence is this, that he indeed had obligations to the Earl of Eſſex as his friend and patron, which we have already ſeen he had in the higheſt degree, but then he likewiſe owed duty and obedience to the Queen, which he thought, and very juſtly too, ought not to be ſacrificed to his private obligations to the Earl of Eſſex. But this is ſo far from untying, that it does not touch the knot, which he ought to have reſolved, and which was plainly this; whether, after the Earl of Eſſex had been ſo active in his favour, he ſhould have been ſo buſy as he was in the proceedings that brought him to the block: that he was not bound to rebel with the Earl becauſe he was his friend, which yet the Earl of Southampton did, no man in his wits would deny; but that he ſhould be ſo ready to do againſt the man that he had profeſſed ſuch friendſhip for, and that had been ſo good a friend to him, what any other man might have done as well, is what even the wit of this able author could not account for. I could mention a late inſtance of a great man in the like circumſtances with the Lord Bacon, who, when called upon by the higheſt authority to proſecute his benefactor, modeſtly declined it, though he might have pleaded the ſame excuſe, and even a better than our author had to alledge; which proved no bar to his preferment, and which, when his name ſhall come to adorn a work like this, will redound to his immortal honour, as at the time it happened, it procured him univerſal applauſe; which ſhews the truth of what I advanced, that the obligations of gratitude are determined by common opinion.

[H] Injured his reputation in the common opinion of mankind as long as he lived.] There is extant a letter of our author's to Queen Elizabeth, written ſome little time after this unlucky affair, when it ſeems he thought fit to abſent himſelf from court, on account of the uneaſy ſituation in which he found himſelf there; and yet it appears, his privacy did not give him that quiet and content he looked for in it, as we may gather from the following concluſion of this letter to her Majeſty (22): 'But in this mind I 'find ſuch ſolitude and want of comfort, which I 'judge to be becauſe I take duty too exactly, and 'not according to the dregs of this age, wherein the 'old anthem might never be more truly ſung: Totus 'mundus in maligno poſitus eſt. My life hath been 'threatened, and my name libelled, which I count an 'honour. But theſe are the practices of thoſe whoſe 'deſpairs are dangerous, but yet not ſo dangerous as 'their hopes, or elſe the devices of ſome that would put 'out all your Majeſty's lights, and fall on reckoning 'how many years you have reigned, which I beſeech 'our bleſſed Saviour may be doubled, and that I may 'never live to ſee any eclipſe of your glory, inter'ruption of ſafety, or indiſpoſition of your perſon, 'which I commend to the Divine Majeſty who keeps 'you and fortifies you.' This plainly ſhews into how great danger, as well as obloquy, he was fallen by taking this courſe, to which, from this letter, and whatever elſe he has written about it, he would perſuade us he was moved by duty and reverence for the Queen his miſtreſs; but perhaps, there might be alſo a mixture of fear, which I do not by any means hint as an imputation on his memory, but on the contrary ſuggeſt it by way of excuſe. If we may credit a writer who lived near, not to ſay in thoſe times (23), the Queen and her miniſtry, drove the proſecution upon Eſſex's treaſon, which might as well have been ſtyled madneſs, with unaccountable fury, and exerciſed ſuch rigour againſt all offenders, nay, and all ſuſpected of having a will to give offence, as is ſcarcely credible to us in better times. Thus, for inſtance, he talks of Sir Henry Lee loſing both life and fortune, for wiſhing well to the three Lords in the Tower, and of another meaner perſon who was hanged in Smithfield, for only writing to his father in the country, an account of their apprehenſion and commitment. In a ſeaſon like this, our author, who had been both a favourite and of the privy-council to the Earl of Eſſex, might very well doubt his ſafety, and make it his choice, rather to perform the functions of his office, yet with tenderneſs and decency (as it is owned he did) than expoſe himſelf either to the Queen's anger, or to the reſentment of thoſe miniſters who had her confidence at that time, and whoſe power in the ſucceeding reign not only continued, but increaſed; which I take to be the reaſon that this affair was never more truly ſtated by men of knowledge and capacity, but left to the pens of ſuch, as for want of more authentic vouchers had recourſe to traditional memoirs, enlarged and pieced out by their own fancies, by which means, this is become one of the moſt perplexed paſſages in our hiſtory.

tiality, which too often betrays the writers of great men's lives, into an approbation of their weakneſſes, as well as a zeal and admiration for their virtues (w) [I].

(w) Mallet's Life of Lord Bacon, p. 14.

But it is now time to return, not only to the thread of our memoirs, but to the courſe of our author's ſtudies, which were always the principal buſineſs of his life, and which we interrupted a little, that we might proſecute the ſtory of his tranſactions as a courtier, without breaking the thread. His enemies repreſented him as a man, who, by applying too much of his time in purſuit of other branches of knowledge, could not but neglect that of his profeſſion; which, however, at this diſtance of time, when all prejudices are worn off, and nothing hinders men from perceiving or owning truth, is confeſſed by the beſt judges to have been a rank calumny. This judgment of theirs is founded on his writings upon the Law, moſt of which were written, though not publiſhed under this reign. About the year 1596, he finiſhed his Maxims of the Law (x) [K], which, though he had been ſo hardly dealt with the year before in his ſuit for the Solicitor-ſhip,

[I] Approbation and defence of their weakneſſes, as well as zeal and admiration of their virtues.] The author cited in the text, ſpeaking of this tranſaction, ſays (24), 'The untimely fate of this noble-'man, who died on a ſcaffold in the prime and vigour 'of his years, excited univerſal pity, and was mur-'mured againſt by all conditions of people. Their 'reflexions on the prevailing party at Court, even on 'the Queen herſelf, were ſo bold and injurious, that 'the Adminiſtration thought it neceſſary to vindicate 'their conduct in a public appeal to the people. 'This taſk was aſſigned to Bacon, even then in high 'eſteem for his excellencies as a writer. Some ſay it 'was by his enemies inſidiouſly impoſed on him, to 'divert the national reſentment from themſelves upon 'a particular perſon, who was known to have lived 'in friendſhip with Eſſex, and whom they intended 'to ruin in the public eſteem. If ſuch was their in-'tention, they ſucceeded but too well in it. Never 'man incurred more univerſal or more laſting cenſure 'than Bacon by this writing. He was every where 'traduced as one who endeavoured to murder the 'good name of his benefactor, after the Miniſtry had 'deſtroyed his perſon. His life was even threatened; 'and he went in daily hazard of aſſaſſination. This 'obliged him to publiſh, in his own defence, the 'apology we find among his writings. It is long 'and elaborate; but not perhaps in every part ſatis-'factory. Let us believe him on his own teſtimony, 'that he had never done that nobleman any ill 'offices with the Queen; though ſhe herſelf had, it 'ſeems, inſinuated the contrary; that, on the other 'hand, he had always, during the time of their in-'timacy, given him advice no leſs uſeful than ſin-'cere; that he had wiſhed, nay endeavoured, the 'Earl's preſervation, even at laſt, purely from af-'fection to him, without any regard to his own in-'tereſt in that endeavour: let all this be allowed; 'ſome blemiſh will ſtill remain on his character. 'Eſſex deſerved the fate he underwent, but he had 'paid his debt to juſtice, and the common-wealth 'had now nothing to fear from any of his party. 'The declaration abovementioned could therefore be 'intended only to ſtill the preſent clamours of the 'multitude; and though the matter of it might be 'true, Bacon was not the man who ſhould have pub-'liſhed thoſe truths. He had been long and highly 'indebted to the Earl's friendſhip, almoſt beyond 'the example even of that age. In another man 'this proceeding might not have been blameable: 'in him it cannot be excuſed. Sir Henry Yelver-'ton, in the next reign, ventured on the diſpleaſure 'both of the King and his minion, rather than do 'the miniſtry of his office, by pleading againſt the 'Earl of Somerſet who had made him Solicitor-'General. Had Bacon refuſed that invidious part, 'there were others among the herd of aſpiring and 'officious lawyers ready enough to have performed 'it; and his very enemies muſt have thought more 'advantageouſly of him, for declining a taſk in 'itſelf of no eſſential importance to the State, and 'in him unjuſt to friendſhip, obligation, gratitude, 'the moſt ſacred regards among men.'

(24) Life of Lord Bacon prefixed to his Works.

[K] About the year 1596 he finiſhed his Maxims of the Law.] As theſe are now publiſhed they make only the firſt part of what are ſtiled, The Elements of the COMMON LAW of ENGLAND (25); but I think there can be no ſort of doubt, that the author himſelf intended a ſeparate work. His own title was, A Collection of ſome principal Rules and Maxims of the COMMON LAW, with their Latitude and Extent. To this work of his, which however was intended but as a ſpecimen of a much larger, ſince it contains but twenty-five rules out of three hundred which he had collected, he prefixed a dedication and a preface, in both which he largely explains the intention and utility of his performance. The former is addreſſed to Queen Elizabeth, and is written in a very high ſtrain of compliment, yet mixt with many ſerious and important truths. He obſerves, that thoſe were times in which if ſcience increaſed, conſcience decayed, and laws, though multiplied in number, were ſlackened in vigour and execution; ſo that ſuits in law, the major part of which, he ſays, are always unjuſt, daily multiplied and increaſed; and, which was ſtill worſe, indirect courſes and practices to abuſe Law and Juſtice, were often attempted and put in uſe: from whence, he adds, much greater enormities would have been bred, but for the royal policy of the Queen, the foreſight at her Council-table and Star-Chamber, and the integrity of her Judges, by whom they were repreſſed and reſtrained: for he farther notes, that for the preventing frauds in agreements, abuſes in the Law, and the bad behaviour of its miniſters and inſtruments, there had been more ſtatutes made in her Majeſty's reign, and thoſe too of deeper reach, than in any of her predeceſſors. He then proceeds to the reaſons which induced him to offer this work, in repreſenting which, we will make uſe of his own words (26). 'But I am an unworthy 'witneſs to your Majeſty, of an higher intention 'and project, both by that which was publiſhed by 'your Chancellor in full Parliament from your royal 'mouth, in the five and thirtieth year of your 'happy reign, and much more by that which I 'have been ſince vouchſafed to underſtand from 'your Majeſty, imparting a purpoſe for theſe many 'years infuſed into your Majeſty's breaſt, to enter 'into a general amendment of the ſtate of your laws, 'and reduce them to more brevity and certainty; 'that the great hollowneſs and unſafety in aſſurances 'of lands and goods, may be ſtrengthened, and 'ſwerving penalties that lie upon many ſubjects re-'moved, the execution of many profitable laws re-'vived, the Judge better directed in his ſentence, the 'Counſellor better warranted in his counſel, the 'ſtudent eaſed in his reading, the contentious ſuitor 'that ſeeketh but vexation diſarmed, and the honeſt 'ſuitor that ſeeketh but to obtain his right relieved: 'which purpoſe and intention, as it did ſtrike me 'with great admiration when I heard it, ſo it might 'be acknowledged to be one of the moſt choſen 'works, and of the higheſt merit and beneficence 'towards the ſubject, that ever entered into the mind 'of any King, greater than we can imagine. Be-'cauſe the imperfections and dangers of the Laws, 'are covered under the clemency and excellent tem-'per of your Majeſty's government.' In his preface he very fully ſhews, the nature and the conſequence of his deſign; and explains, with great accuracy, the benefit and advantage ariſing from the uſe of maxims or general rules in the Law, and their being univerſally known and underſtood. As for the ſecond treatiſe, which, together with this, goes to the making up of what is called his Elements of the Common Law, it was by himſelf ſtyled, The Uſe of the Law for Preſervation of our Perſons, Goods, and good Names, according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of this Land.

ſhip, he dedicated to Queen Elizabeth; and yet, for reaſons we are unacquainted with, he did not think proper to print it, which was a great misfortune to the public, ſince, by coming abroad after his deceaſe, it has conſiderably ſuffered. The next year he publiſhed a work of quite another kind, that is to ſay, the firſt part of his Eſſays or Counſels, Civil and Moral (y) [L]; an admirable work, in which our author inſtructs men in the moſt uſeful principles of wiſdom and prudence, and teaches how to acquire what are eſteemed the greateſt bleſſings, and how to avoid the evils which are moſt dreaded in the conduct of human life. His penetration, exactneſs, and perfect ſkill in all the offices of civil life, appeared to great advantage in this performance; which, as our author himſelf was ſenſible, proved of great ſervice to his character, and promoted the high eſteem that was already conceived of his parts and learning. About the cloſe of the ſucceeding year, 1598, he compoſed, on a particular occaſion, his Hiſtory of the Alienation-Office (z) [M], which, however, was not publiſhed till many years after his deceaſe. In this learned work he has fully ſhewn, how great a maſter he was, not in our Law only, but in our Hiſtory and Antiquities; ſo that it may be juſtly ſaid, there never fell any thing from his pen, which more clearly and fully demonſtrated his abilities in his profeſſion. It is not written in that dry, dark, and unentertaining way, which ſo much diſcourages young readers in the peruſal of books of this kind; but, on the contrary, the ſtile is pleaſant and agreeable, though plain and ſuitable to the ſubject; and facts, authorities, obſervations, remarks, and reflections, are ſo judiciouſly interwoven, that whoever reads it with a competent knowledge of the ſubject, muſt acknowledge him an able lawyer, and an elegant writer. It is needleſs to mention ſome ſmaller inſtances of his abilities in the Law, which nevertheleſs were received by the learned ſociety of which he was a member, with all poſſible marks of veneration and eſteem, and which they have preſerved with that reverence due to ſo worthy a perſon, and ſo eminent an ornament of their houſe (a). As a farther argument of their reſpect, they choſe him Double Reader

Land (27). An excellent work it is; and not only completely fitted for the improvement of ſuch as ſtudy the Law, but alſo the book in the world beſt calculated, to give every man of good ſenſe and unbiaſſed judgment, both a general idea, and a good opinion of the Law, which is repreſented therein in that light, which is at once the faireſt, fulleſt, and moſt agreeable; that is, not as a contrivance to limit the freedom, and abridge the natural liberty of mankind, but as an inſtitution, principally intending the benefit and advantage of men, as rational beings, and members of ſociety, by protecting them in their perſons, fame, and eſtates; and therefore I eſteem it one of the beſt and moſt uſeful pieces that our author ever compoſed.

(27) Bacon's Works, Vol. iv. p. 56.

[L] The firſt part of his Eſſays or Counſels Civil and Moral.] The reaſon why Mr. Bacon publiſhed theſe eſſays at this time, is aſſigned in his dedication of them to his brother Mr. Anthony Bacon, which was, that many of them had ſtolen abroad in writing, and were very likely to come into the world in print, with more imperfections than the author thought it juſt to take upon himſelf (28). About ſixteen years afterwards, he had thoughts of publiſhing a new edition of them, which he intended to dedicate to Prince Henry, and in his dedication he inſerted a very clear and candid account of the book (29). 'To write 'juſt treatiſes, ſays he, requires leiſure in the writer, 'and leiſure in the reader, and therefore are not ſo fit 'neither in your Highneſs's princely affairs, nor in 'regard of my continual ſervice, which is the cauſe 'that hath made me chuſe to write certain brief notes, 'ſet down rather ſignificantly than curiouſly, which 'I have called Eſſays. The word is late, but the 'thing is ancient; for Seneca's Epiſtles to Lucilius, 'if you mark them well, are but eſſays, that is, diſperſed meditations, though conveyed in the form of 'epiſtles. Theſe labours of mine, I know, cannot 'be worthy of your Highneſs, for what can be 'worthy of you! But my hope is, they may be as 'grains of ſalt, that will rather give you an appetite than offend you with ſatiety. And although 'they handle thoſe things, wherein both men's lives 'and their perſons are moſt converſant, yet what 'I have attained I know not, but I have endeavoured 'to make them not vulgar; but of a nature whereof 'a man ſhall find much in experience and little in 'books, ſo as they are neither repetitions nor fancies.' Sir Francis Bacon deſigned to have prefixed this epiſtle to his Eſſays, printed in the year 1612, but was prevented by the Prince's death. Yet it was ſo well liked by Mr. Matthew, that he inſerted it in his dedication to the Grand Duke of Tuſcany, before his tranſlation of thoſe Eſſays printed in 1618 (30). This ſecond edition, when publiſhed, the author addreſſed to Sir John Conſtable, his brother-in-law. He afterwards ſent them abroad again reviſed and enlarged in Latin and in Engliſh, dedicating them in both languages to the Duke of Buckingham, in which dedication he tells his Grace, that he thought it agreeable to his affection and obligations to prefix his name before them, becauſe he conceived they might laſt as long as books laſt (31). There are other places in our author's writings in which theſe Eſſays are mentioned, and in which he expreſſes a particular ſenſe of their uſefulneſs to mankind, and redounding as much or more to his honour, than thoſe large and extenſive works, which had coſt him much greater pains and labour, in which he certainly was not miſtaken, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew in its proper place.

[M] He compoſed, on a particular occaſion, the Hiſtory of the Alienation-Office.] This curious and highly finiſhed tract, which has been but lately publiſhed from a MS. in the Inner-Temple Library (32), is one of the moſt laboured pieces penned by our moſt learned author, containing his reſolutions of a very perplexed queſtion, Whether it was moſt for the Queen's benefit, that the profits ariſing from this office for Alienations, ſhould be let out to farm or not? In handling this he has ſhewn ſuch diverſity of learning, and ſo clear a conception of all the different points of Law, Hiſtory, Antiquities, and Policy, as is really amazing. For I think it may be truly ſaid, that there is not any treatiſe of the ſame compaſs extant in our language, which manifeſts ſo comprehenſive a genius, and ſo accurate a knowledge, both with reſpect to theory and practice as this, and therefore it cannot but ſeem ſtrange, that it lay ſo long hid from the world. But what appears to me moſt ſurpriſing is, that it ſhews our author to have had as true notions, and as good a turn for œconomy as any man ever had, which before the publication of this treatiſe, was thought the only kind of knowledge in which he was deficient. But it ſeems it was one thing as a Lawyer, Stateſman, and candidate for Court favour, to enter into a detail of the Queen's revenues, to conſider the various methods in which they might be managed, together with the advantages and diſadvantages attending each method; and quite another, to enter with like ſpirit and diligence into his own affairs, which if he had done, he might have paſſed his days more happily, and have left his fame without blemiſh.

in the year 1600, and in the fortieth of Mr. Bacon's age, which office he diſcharged with remarkable ſufficiency, as appears by his learned reading on the Statute of Uſes, being one of the firſt who argued Chudleigh's caſe, largely reported by Lord Coke (b); which reading, as it well deſerves, has been printed in his works, and in the collection of his Law Tracts, where it remains an everlaſting monument of his abilities in his profeſſion (c). He diſtinguiſhed himſelf likewiſe, during the latter part of the Queen's reign, in the Houſe of Commons, where he ſpoke often, and yet with ſuch weight and wiſdom, that his ſentiments were generally approved by that auguſt aſſembly, and himſelf ſo much eſteemed therein, that though he uſually ſpoke on the ſide of the Court, yet he was ever looked upon as a friend to the people, and therefore as popular a member as any, though ſometimes, as appears from his letters, it created great jealouſy in the Miniſters, who took it ill, that any thing they thought proper to introduce into that Houſe, ſhould be oppoſed by ſuch as were in the Queen's ſervice (d). However, this did not hinder him from perſevering in the ſame courſe to the end of that reign, in which, though he received but ſlender marks of honour, and ſcarcely any of profit, which yet his family, his merit, and his circumſtances, not to mention his near relation to the Miniſters, and his perſonal favour with the Queen, ſeemed to require; yet this was ſo far from warping him either in duty or affection, that, ſo long as the Queen lived, he ſerved her both with zeal and fidelity, and after her deceaſe, compoſed a memorial of the happineſs of her reign, which did equal honour to her adminiſtration, and to the capacity of its author, being eſteemed a moſt exquiſite performance in its kind, and as ſuch made uſe of by the learned M. de Thou, in his invaluable Hiſtory (e) [N].

After the deceaſe of his miſtreſs, Mr. Bacon applied very early to her ſucceſſor King James VI., who, by a quiet and peaceable acceſſion, became King James I. of England. He had many reaſons to hope, that this tender of his ſervices would be well received by that Prince, as he was known to be learned himſelf, and a great encourager of learning; as he was well acquainted with the general characters and reputation of all perſons of note in England, and as he had a ſingular eſteem for, on account of the ſignal ſervices rendered him by our author's brother, Mr. Anthony Bacon (f). So that taking all theſe circumſtances together, there was nothing forward or haſty, much leſs mean or indecent, in the firſt applications of our author to that Prince. He ſeems in this, as in the former reign, to have fixed his hopes of advancement upon the proſecution of a plan of his own framing, which conſiſted in procuring a fair report of him to the King, by men of different parties and different nations; and it is remarkable, on this occaſion, that he offered his ſervice to the Earl of Northumberland, and at the ſame time ſought the friendſhip of the Earl of Southampton, who was ſo near deſtruction in the unfortunate affair of the Earl of Eſſex (g). But if he depended upon the Engliſh, he did not totally neglect the Scotch, with ſome of whom he had formerly had an acquaintance, which he now renewed, and thereby wrought himſelf into great credit with that nation (h). He likewiſe offered his pen, and drew up the form of a proclamation, which, though it was not uſed, had nevertheleſs a good effect, and was taken for an inſtance of his duty and [N] Made uſe of by the learned M. de Thou in his invaluable hiſtory.] It was one, and that not the leaſt remarkable, point of the felicity of Queen Elizabeth, that not only thoſe who owed their being, or at leaſt their greatneſs to her bounty, but even ſuch as experienced little or nothing of her favour, were equally deſirous of ſupporting her fame and tranſmitting it to poſterity. As for this piece written by our author, it ſeems to have been originally compoſed in the life-time of that Queen (33), and after her deceaſe thrown into another form, reviſed, corrected, and tranſlated into Latin (34). It was tranſmitted by the requeſt of the author to M. de Thou, who freely owns, that he made uſe of it in his hiſtory (35). As for our author, he was not only pleaſed with ſhewing this mark of eſteem and honour for his deceaſed miſtreſs, but conſidering that the piece he had written was not publiſhed in his life-time, he particularly directed, that it ſhould be printed after his deceaſe, which, though at a conſiderable diſtance of time, was performed (36). There is not, perhaps, in all the works of Lord Bacon, any treatiſe which does more honour to his memory than this, in which he ſhews himſelf not only a great maſter of learning and language, one capable of expreſſing great things in an equal and elevated ſtyle, but an admirable politician alſo; one capable of penetrating even into the depths of the councils of thoſe times, which perhaps were as deep and as intricate, as any this country ever ſaw, or perhaps that have guided the concerns of any country whatever. Yet if this performance does honour to the ſolid wiſdom and prodigious abilities of our author, it does much more with reſpect to the great Princeſs celebrated therein, and is, beyond all doubt, the nobleſt of the many monuments erected to her memory. The great point laboured in this panegyric is to ſhew, that as, on the one hand, the wiſe councils, prudent meaſures, and great undertakings of this high-ſpirited Queen, merited the greateſt ſucceſs; ſo they were conducted in ſuch a manner as to be, generally ſpeaking, crowned with that ſucceſs which they deſerved: herein he places, and indeed very juſtly places, the felicity of Queen Elizabeth. But there is ſtill another light in which this piece may be conſidered with equal reputation to the author who wrote, and to the monarch who is the ſubject of this excellent diſcourſe: the light I mean is that of a political hiſtory, or rather ſpeculum of the politics of this reign. And I think one may truly aſſert, that it was the peculiar felicity of this Queen, to have the actions of her reign recorded by ſo able and ſo candid a hiſtorian, as the learned and judicious Camden (37); and the councils and ſprings of thoſe actions, repreſented to poſterity by the pen of ſo capable a writer as Bacon; who in this treatiſe has given us an admirable ſupplement to the hiſtories of thoſe times, and has therein taken notice of many things that would otherwiſe have eſcaped the knowledge of ſucceeding ages, and ſet all the facts of which he takes notice in ſuch lights, as they could have ſcarcely been repreſented by any other writer than himſelf. This tribute therefore to the memory of his Sovereign, deſerved, in every reſpect, the regard paid to it both at home and abroad, as well as the particular concern which our author expreſſed that it might be printed after his deceaſe, as an everlaſting teſtimony of his reverence for the memory of his incomparable Sovereign.

good affection (i). On the twenty-third of July 1603, he was introduced to the King at Whitehall, when he received the honour of knighthood, as a mark of his Majeſty's gracious acceptance of paſt ſervices, and of the tender he had made of the continuance of them for the future (k). This might have been thought a greater favour, if the new King had been more careful of his honours; but moſt of our hiſtorians have remarked, that King James was as profuſe in this particular, as Queen Elizabeth was ſparing. But however it ought to be conſidered, that many circumſtances concurred to make this difference in their conduct. It was neceſſary at the opening of a new reign, and even cuſtomary, ſo that Queen Elizabeth herſelf had then uſed it: but this was not only a new reign, but the coming in alſo of a new family, and, which was ſtill more, a family from another country, which made ſuch numerous acts of royal favour more expedient. We may add to this another reaſon, which was the quiet and peaceable acceſſion of King James, ariſing from the readineſs of all ranks of people, to own and acknowledge him for their Sovereign, and as he could not, without ingratitude, avoid beſtowing ſome honours on ſo ſingular an occaſion; ſo in policy he could not beſtow ſuch marks of diſtinction on one ſet of people, or in one part of the kingdom, without taking notice of the loyalty and affection ſhewn in other places, and by other perſons. There was yet another cauſe of the beneficence of this Monarch in this particular, which was his deſire to unite the whole nation in their affections to himſelf, and to one another, inſtead of governing, as his predeceſſor had done, by factions, which, though no error in her, becauſe founded in neceſſity, would have been a great error in him, when that neceſſity was taken away (l). In his firſt applications to the King, Sir Francis Bacon appeared as a Courtier and ſervant of the Crown, but it was not long before he had occaſion to approach his Majeſty in quite a different capacity. The country people found themſelves greatly oppreſſed in the laſt reign by Purveyors, and had complained of their exactions as an intolerable grievance. Queen Elizabeth had been informed of it by accident, and, it is ſaid, had given way to an act of extraordinary ſeverity to repreſs it: but ſtill there had been nothing done towards a thorough reformation, which obliged the Houſe of Commons, in the firſt Parliament of King James, to think of ſome method for effectually redreſſing this evil. The way they took, was by a ſolemn repreſentation of this grievance and its conſequences; and the perſon they made choice of to ſet forth the ſenſe of the Houſe on this ſubject, was Sir Francis Bacon, which ſhews his credit in Parliament at that juncture. He performed it in ſuch a manner, as both ſatisfied the Houſe, whoſe ſervant he was in this particular, and pleaſed the King (m) [O]. His Majeſty, from his firſt entrance, had continued him in his ſervice, in the ſame manner in which he had ſerved the late Queen; but when his affairs were better ſettled, he thought fit to ſhew

[O] Both ſatisfied the Houſe, whoſe ſervant he was in this particular, and pleaſed the King.] It appears evidently enough by a letter ſtill extant, from Sir Francis Bacon to his Majeſty, that he managed the buſineſs of this complaint with great addreſs, in which I conceive, the chief point was the procuring himſelf to be choſen to this difficult taſk: difficult indeed, it might well be called, ſince, on the one hand, it required much delicacy to preſs a complaint of this kind, to a Prince of King James's temper, ſo as not to wound his authority by the manner of doing it; and next, there required no leſs art, ſo to repreſent the grievance as to come up to what the people expected from their repreſentatives, and the Houſe from their member. He did both very happily, for by magnifying the King's power, wiſdom, and natural clemency, at the beginning, and premiſing, likewiſe, that the Houſe had no intent to injure the royal prerogative, but barely to provide againſt the abuſe of it; he thereby obtained the means, under colour of vindicating his Majeſty's perſon and government, from the imputations brought upon both, by theſe illegal and unjuſtifiable actions, to deliver the very utmoſt, of what even the warmeſt patriots of thoſe times, could deſire ſhould be ſpoken in the royal preſence. The reader will fully apprehend this, from the manner of his ſtating the complaint (38): 'The abuſes of purveyors, ſays he, naturally divide 'themſelves into three ſorts; the firſt they take in 'kind, that they ought not to take; the ſecond they 'take in quantity, a far greater proportion than 'cometh to your Majeſty's uſe; the third, they take 'in an unlawful manner, in a manner, (I ſay) directly, 'and expreſsly, prohibited by diverſe laws. To the 'firſt of theſe I am a little to alter their name, for 'inſtead of Takers, they become Taxers; inſtead of 'taking proviſion for your Majeſty's ſervice, they tax 'your people ad redimendam vexationem; impoſing 'upon them, and extorting from them diverſe ſums 'of money, ſometimes in groſs, ſometimes in the 'nature of ſtipends annually paid, ne noceant, to be 'freed and eaſed of their oppreſſion. Again they 'take trees, which by law they cannot do, timber 'trees, which are the beauty, countenance, and ſhelter 'of men's houſes, that men have long ſpared from 'their own purſe and profit, that men eſteem (for 'their uſe and delight) above ten times the value, 'that are a loſs which men cannot repair or recover; 'theſe do they take to the defacing and ſpoiling of 'your ſubjects manſions and dwellings, except they 'be compounded with to their own appetites. And 'if a gentleman be too hard for them while he is 'at home, they will watch their time when there is 'but a Bailiff or ſervant remaining, and put the 'axe to the root of the tree, ere ever the maſter 'can ſtop it. Again, they uſe a ſtrange and moſt 'unjuſt exaction, in cauſing the ſubjects to pay 'poundage of their own debts due from your Ma'jeſty unto them; ſo as a poor man, when he has 'had his hay, or his wood, or his poultry, (which 'perchance, he was full loth to part with, and had 'for the proviſion of his own family, and not to 'put to ſale) taken from him, and that not at a 'juſt price, but under the value, and cometh to re'ceive his money, he ſhall have after the rate of 'twelve pence in the pound abated for poundage, 'of his due payment upon ſo hard conditions: Nay 'farther, they are grown to that extremity, (as is 'affirmed, though it be ſcarce credible, ſave that in 'ſuch perſons all things are credible) that they will 'take double poundage, once when the debenture 'is made; and again the ſecond time, when the 'money is paid, &c.' As to the particular facts which had been laid before the Houſe in order to juſtify this charge, Sir Francis Bacon cauſed them to be digeſted into as narrow a compaſs as poſſible, and deſired they might be read to his Majeſty, as accordingly they were after he had finiſhed his ſpeech.

him higher marks of favour than he had received from her late Majeſty; and accordingly, on the twenty-fifth of Auguſt 1604, conſtituted him by patent, one of his Counſel learned in the Law, with a fee of forty pounds a year, which is ſaid to have been the first act of royal power of that nature (n). He granted him the ſame day, by another patent under the Great Seal, a penſion of ſixty pounds a year, for ſpecial ſervices received from his brother Anthony Bacon and himſelf, which I the rather take notice of, becauſe it has not hitherto been mentioned by any of the authors who have undertaken to write his life (o). He was from this time a ſpecial ſervant to the Crown, and ſeemed to be in a fair road to preferment; but, however, he found himſelf ſtill croſſed by the jealouſy and envious diſlike of two great men, who were afraid of his parts, and apprehended that the courſe of his fortune might thwart the views of their ambition. The firſt of theſe, was his near relation and old antagoniſt, Sir Robert Cecil, now created Earl of Saliſbury, and in as great credit with King James, as ever his father, the wiſe Lord Burleigh, had been with Queen Elizabeth: the other was Sir Edward Coke, diſtinguiſhed by his great knowledge of the Law, and the King's Attorney-General, a man who affected to ſlight our author's knowledge in his profeſſion, who envied his general reputation, and feared his abilities as a ſtateſman. But though no man ſaw clearer than Sir Francis Bacon, into matters of this nature, and though he perceived very early, how little ſervice the one, and how much diſſervice the other of theſe great men meant him; yet he behaved towards both in the manner that became him; towards the Earl of Saliſbury, who was now become Lord-Treaſurer and Prime-Miniſter, with ſubmiſſion and reſpect, and yet with frequent admonitions, as to what he had reaſon to believe he might expect, from the nearneſs of their relation, and his Lordſhip's fair promiſes. Towards the other, he uſed more freedom and leſs ceremony, as appears clearly from a letter of his, in which he expoſtulates with Mr. Attorney very roundly, on the uſage he had met with (p). But in the midſt of theſe difficulties and diſappointments, he not only proſecuted his own plan for preferment with the utmoſt ſteadineſs, but alſo that of his ſtudies; ſo that in the year 1605, he publiſhed the firſt ſpecimen of his great work, in his book of the Advancement of learning (q) [P], a performance moſt excellent in itſelf, and conſidered by itſelf,

[P] In his book of the Advancement of Learning.] This admirable and elegant performance was intitled, 'The two Books of Francis Bacon of the Proficience 'and Advancement of Learning Divine and Human; 'to the King (39). We have a large and excellent account of this work given us by the learned Dr. Teniſon (40), who ſpeaking of the great Inſtauration of the Sciences, which our author divided into ſix parts, proceeds thus. The firſt part propoſed, was the partition of the ſciences, and this the author perfected in that golden treatiſe of the Advancement of Learning, addreſſed to King James; a labour, which he termed a comfort to his other labours (41). This he firſt wrote in two books in the Engliſh tongue, in which his pen excelled; and of this firſt edition, that is to be meant, which with ſome truth and more modeſty, he wrote to the Earl of Saliſbury, telling him (42), That in his book he was contented to awake better ſpirits, being himſelf like a bell-ringer, who is firſt up to call others to church. Afterwards he enlarged thoſe two diſcourſes, which contained, eſpecially the aforeſaid Partition, and divided the matter of it into eight books; and knowing that this work was deſired beyond the ſeas, and being alſo aware, that books written in a modern language, which receiveth much change in a few years were out of uſe, he cauſed that part of it which he had written in Engliſh, to be tranſlated into the Latin tongue by Mr. Herbert, and ſome others, who were eſteemed maſters in the Roman eloquence. Notwithſtanding which, he ſo ſuited the ſtile to his conceptions, by a ſtrict caſtigation of the whole work, that it may deſervedly ſeem his own. The tranſlation of this work (that is, of much of the two books written by him in Engliſh) he firſt commended to Dr. Playfer, a Profeſſor of Divinity in the univerſity of Cambridge, uſing, among others, theſe words to him (43). 'The privateneſs of the 'language conſidered, wherein the book is written, 'excluding ſo many readers, as on the other ſide, 'the obſcurity of the argument in many parts of it, 'excludeth many others; I muſt account it a ſecond 'birth of that work, if it might be tranſlated into 'Latin, without manifeſt loſs of the ſenſe and matter: For this purpoſe, I could not repreſent to myſelf 'any man, into whoſe hands I do more earneſtly deſire the work ſhould fall than yourſelf; for by that 'I have heard and read, I know no man a greater 'maſter in commanding words to ſerve matter.' The Doctor was willing to ſerve ſo excellent a perſon and ſo worthy a deſign, and within a while ſent him a ſpecimen of a Latin tranſlation. But men generally come ſhort of themſelves, when they ſtrive to outdo themſelves. They put a force upon their natural genius, and by a ſtraining of it crack and diſable it; and ſo it ſeems it happened to that worthy and elegant man upon this great occaſion. He would be over accurate, and he ſent a ſpecimen of ſuch ſuperfine Latinity, that the Lord Bacon did not encourage him to labour farther in that work, in the penning of which, he deſired not ſo much neat and polite, as clear, maſculine, and apt expreſſion. The whole of this book was rendered into Engliſh by Dr. Gilbert Wats of Oxford, and the tranſlation has been well received by many. But ſome there were who wiſhed, that a tranſlation had been ſet forth, in which the genius and ſpirit of the Lord Bacon had more appeared; and I have ſeen a letter written by a certain gentleman to Dr. Rawley, wherein they thus importune him for a more accurate verſion by his own hand: It is our humble ſuit to you, and we do earneſtly ſolicit you, to give yourſelf the trouble to correct the too much defective tranſlation of de Augmentis Scientiarum, which Dr. Wats hath ſet forth. It is a thouſand pities ſo worthy a piece ſhould loſe its grace and credit by an ill expoſitor; ſince thoſe perſons who read that tranſlation, taking it for genuine, and upon that preſumption not regarding the Latin edition, are thereby robbed of the benefit, which (if you would pleaſe to undertake the buſineſs) they would receive. This tendeth to the diſhonour of that noble Lord, and the hindrance of the advancement of learning. This work hath been alſo tranſlated into French, upon the motion of the Marquis Fiat, but in it there are many things wholly omitted, many things perfectly miſtaken, and ſome things (eſpecially ſuch as relate to Religion) wilfully perverted; inſomuch that in one place, he makes his Lordſhip to magnify the Legend, a book ſurely of little credit with him, when he thus began one of his eſſays (44): I had rather believe all the fables in the Legend, and the Talmud, and the Alcoran, than that this univerſal frame is without a mind. The faireſt and moſt correct edition of this book in Latin is that in folio, printed at London, anno 1623: And whoſoever would underſtand the Lord Bacon's cypher, let him conſult that accurate edition (45): For in ſome other editions which I have peruſed, the form of the letters of the alphabet, in which much of the myſtery conſiſteth, is not obſerved; but the Roman and Italic ſhapes of them are confounded.

itſelf, and not as a part of that great ſyſtem to which it belonged, and into which it was afterwards incorporated by its author. He likewiſe continued his diligence in Parliament, where he did the King and his Miniſters great ſervice, which ought to have been ſo much the more regarded, becauſe ſcarcely any other man could have rendered them ſuch ſervice (r). One thing there was above the reſt, about which the King was extremely ſolicitous, and yet only in part ſucceſsful, which was the promoting an union between his ſubjects in the two kingdoms, and becoming thereby fully and perfectly, as well as ſtrictly and literally, King of Great Britain. In Parliament, Sir Francis Bacon laboured this point with great diligence, and to his great reputation, though it went on ſlowly, and never came to any concluſion: But in Weſtminſter-Hall, his eloquence was more prevailing, and the Judges did for the King there, almoſt as much as he ſought elſewhere (s) [Q]. In other things of the like nature, he proceeded with the like diligence; and this giving him not only great countenance at Court, but gaining him alſo the general eſteem of the world, his friends adviſed him to take this opportunity of marrying, that ſo he might eſtabliſh his family; which motion he readily embraced, and ſoon after took to wife, Alice, daughter of Benedict Barnham, Eſq; Alderman of London, a lady who brought him an ample fortune, but by whom he never had any children (t). A little after this marriage, there happened a promotion in the Law, which induced him to renew his application for the Solicitorſhip, which was then likely to become vacant, by the promotion beforementioned, in which, with ſome difficulty, he prevailed, and upon Sir John Doderidge's being advanced from that poſt to be the King's Serjeant, he was, in the year 1607, appointed Solicitor, with the conſent at leaſt, if not by the recommendation, of his couſin, the Earl of Saliſbury, and then he appeared more frequently in Weſtminſter-Hall, grew into more extenſive practice as a Lawyer, and had a ſhare in almoſt all great cauſes; which were the reaſons he aſſigned, for being ſo preſſing in his applications for that employment, though one may reaſonably ſuppoſe, he was influenced in ſome degree by motives of a ſuperior nature, as conſidering this, but as a ſtep to higher preferment (u). He aſſured the King, before he obtained this employment, that it would give him ſuch an increaſe of capacity, though not of zeal, to ſerve his Majeſty, that what he had done in times paſt ſhould ſeem as nothing, in compariſon of the ſervices he would render for the future. In this reſpect, Sir Francis Bacon kept his word; for in that ſeſſion of Parliament, held in the year in which he was made Solicitor, he ran through great variety of buſineſs, and that of a nature which demanded a man, not only of great abilities but of great art, and yet of general repu-

founded. To this book we may reduce the firſt four chapters of that imperfect treatiſe, publiſhed in Latin by Iſaac Gruter, and called, The Deſcription of the Intellectual Globe; they being but a rude draught of the partition of the ſciences, ſo accurately and methodically diſpoſed in the book of the Advancement of Learning. To this alſo we may reduce the treatiſe called Thema Cæli, publiſhed likewiſe in Latin by Gruter; and it particularly belongeth to the fourth chapter and the third book of it, as being a diſcourſe tending to an improvement of the ſyſtem of the Heavens, which is treated of in that place, the houſes of which (had God granted him life) he would have underſtood, as well almoſt as he did his own. For the ſame reaſon, we may reduce to the ſame place of the Advancement, the fifth, ſixth, and ſeventh chapters, of the Deſcriptio Globi Intellectualis above remembered.

[Q] Did for the King there almoſt as much as he ſought elſewhere.] There was no one point which King James preſſed ſo eagerly as this, which he thought would do him honour in his own country, and procure him credit in this. The laſt attempt made in the Houſe of Commons, was to procure a law for a general naturalization of all the inhabitants of Scotland, which met, as might be very readily expected, a very warm oppoſition. It is very eaſy to conceive, that though there might be many reaſons for the King's deſiring the thing, and ſome very good ones why the Engliſh nation, ſhould, out of regard to their own intereſts, have yielded to it; yet there were many cauſes, why the people in general ſhould be then extremely averſe to it; and indeed, it does ſufficiently appear that their prejudices were very ſtrong againſt it. In this ſituation things were, when Sir Francis Bacon was prevailed upon to ſpeak in favour of this point in the Houſe of Commons; and one cannot help wondering, that he ſhould do this with great warmth, without loſing his character for popularity (46): But upon peruſing of his ſpeech it will appear, that he had ſtudied this ſubject ſo well, and underſtood it ſo perfectly, that though he might not be able to conquer the prejudices of ſome, or to convince the judgments of all, yet he ſhewed evidently, that he was far enough from having taken up his own opinion upon truſt, or undertaking to manage this affair upon no better ground than that of making his court to his maſter. His diſcourſe was ſo eloquent, and withal ſo weighty, the arguments he offered ſo ſtrong in themſelves, and ſo well ſupported by examples drawn from hiſtory, that though they might be over-ruled, they could not eaſily be anſwered; and as in moſt other things ſo in this, what he has delivered upon the ſubject, is as full and as ſatisfactory as the learning of thoſe could, or the experience of ſucceeding times is ever likely to furniſh. In as much as that I may venture to aſſert, the inhabitants of Scotland never had ſo good an advocate, and never can have a better. Yet after all, the diſpute upon this head was of no great conſequence, as Sir Francis Bacon well obſerved; for it was only whether the fathers ſhould be put into as good a condition as their children: for it was held for Law then by the ableſt men of the profeſſion, and decided afterwards in a great cauſe argued by Sir Francis Bacon, when King's Solicitor, that the Poſt Nati, or ſuch as were born in Scotland after the King's acceſſion to the throne of England were naturalized; ſo that the point then under the conſideration of the Houſe, was whether the Ante Nati ſhould be naturalized by law or not (47). The reader, from what has been ſaid on this head in the text and in this note, will eaſily comprehend the merit of Sir Francis Bacon's ſervices in this affair, which is all that we intended: For if a hiſtory were to be written of the endeavours uſed in this reign, to procure an union between the two nations, it would take up much more room than we have to ſpare, and would beſides, lead us too far from our preſent ſubject; and therefore we have included, in as few words as poſſible, thoſe points in which this gentleman was principally concerned; and if the reader is inclined to obtain a farther view of this matter in all its branches, he may conſult the hiſtories of thoſe times, and the letters and works of our author, which will afford him tolerable ſatisfaction (48).

tation; for he was employed from the Houſe of Commons to the King, to repreſent to him the grievances under which the nation laboured: and though the paper relating to them was couched in pretty ſtrong terms, which could not but be diſagreeable to his maſter's temper, yet Sir Francis, by a ſoft and ſmooth ſpeech, ſo abated their harſhneſs, as to perform this difficult commiſſion with univerſal applauſe (w). He was likewiſe employed by the Houſe at a conference with the Lords, to perſuade them to join in an application to the Crown, for the taking away the ancient tenures, and allowing a certain and competent revenue in lieu of them; and in his ſpeech on this occaſion, Sir Francis Bacon ſet that affair in ſo clear a light, as excited that ſpirit, which at length procured the diſſolution of the Court of Wards, which has been juſtly eſteemed a point of the higheſt conſequence to the liberties of this kingdom (x). He likewiſe ſatisfied the Houſe, at a time when they were much out of temper, at the manner in which the King's meſſages were conveyed to them; and towards the cloſe of the ſeſſion, when the ſupply ſtuck in the Houſe, he procured a paſſage for it, by a very ſhort and well-timed ſpeech, which effectually ſhewed of how great conſequence it was to the King, to have ſo able and ſo popular a ſpeaker at his devotion (y). One would have imagined, that in the midſt of ſo many arduous affairs of State, joined to the cares of his employment, and the buſineſs of his profeſſion, Sir Francis Bacon ſhould have had but little leiſure for his philoſophic ſtudies; and yet we find, that about this time, he had in ſome meaſure digeſted the plan of the ſecond part of his great work, which he tranſmitted to his friends, who were the ableſt and the beſt judges in the kingdom, in order to have their free ſentiments upon the ſubject: for as Sir Francis laboured only to arrive at truth, and not to acquire a mighty reputation, ſo he was rather deſirous of hearing the objections that might be made againſt his new ſyſtem, than to ſeek the praiſes of ſuch, as were more willing to beſtow applauſe, than to enquire into his title to it (z) [R]. It was

[R] More willing to beſtow applauſe, than to inquire into his title to it.] This piece of our author's was intituled, Cogitata & Viſa, and contained the ground-work or plan of his Novum Organum, ſo eſſential a part of his Inſtauration, that it ſometimes bears that title. He was ſenſible of the difficulties that would attend his great deſign of building up the whole Palace of Wiſdom anew; and that he might be the better able to overcome thoſe difficulties, he was deſirous of ſeeing what they were, before he undertook his large work, of which this piece was no more than the out-lines. We may form a true notion of what he ſought by conſidering the letter, which he wrote to the learned Biſhop Andrews, when he ſent him the diſcourſe of which we are ſpeaking (49). 'Now your Lordſhip hath been ſo 'long in the Church and the Palace diſputing be-'tween Kings and Popes, methinks you ſhould take 'pleaſure to look into the field, and refreſh your 'mind with ſome matter of Philoſophy, though the 'ſcience be now through age waxed a child again, 'and left to boys and young men; and becauſe you 'were wont to make me believe you took a liking to 'my writings, I ſend you ſome of this vacation's 'fruits, and thus much more of my mind and pur-'poſe. I haſten not to publiſh: periſhing I would 'prevent, and I am forced to reſpect, as well my 'times as the matter; for with me it is thus, and I 'think with all men in my caſe. If I bind myſelf to an 'argument it loadeth my mind, but if I rid my mind 'of the preſent cogitation, it is rather a recreation: 'this hath put me into theſe Miſcellanies, which I 'purpoſe to ſuppreſs, if God give me leave to write 'a juſt and perfect volume of Philoſophy, which I 'go on with, though ſlowly. I ſend not your Lord-'ſhip too much, leaſt it may glut you: now let me 'tell you what my deſire is; if your Lordſhip be ſo 'good now, as when you were the good Dean of 'Weſtminſter, my requeſt to you is, that not by 'pricks but by notes, you will make known unto me 'whatſoever ſhall ſeem unto you, either not current in 'the ſtile, or harſh to credit and opinion, or incon-'venient for the perſon of the writer. For no man 'can be judge and party; and when our minds 'judge by reflection of ourſelves, they are more ſub-'ject to error; and though for the matter itſelf, my 'judgment be in ſome things fixed, and not acceſſible 'by any man's judgment, that goeth not my way; 'yet even in thoſe things, the admonition of a friend 'may make me expreſs myſelf diverſly.' He likewiſe recommended with the ſame view, the peruſal of the Cogitata & Viſa to Sir Thomas Bodley, who wrote him a very full anſwer, which, together with the piece itſelf, is printed amongſt the Latin works of our author (50). There is alſo in the laſt Collection of Mr. Stephens, a ſmall diſcourſe in Engliſh, under the Latin title of Filum Labyrinthi; ſive Formula Inquiſitionis, ad Filios. Pars prima. This we ſee plainly was the original of the Cogitata & Viſa, and the firſt draught of our author's firſt plan. Of this very ſhort treatiſe, the three firſt paragraphs (which may ſerve as a ſpecimen of the whole) run thus (51). 'FRANCIS BACON 'thought in this manner: the knowledge whereof the 'world is now poſſeſſed, eſpecially that of nature, ex-'tendeth not to magnitude and certainty of works. The 'Phyſician pronounces many diſeaſes incurable, and 'faileth oft in the reſt: The Alchemiſts wax old and 'die in hopes: The Magicians perform nothing that 'is permanent and profitable: The Mechanics take 'ſmall lights from Natural Philoſophy, and do but 'ſpin out their own little threads: Chance ſometimes 'diſcovereth inventions, but that worketh not in 'years but ages; ſo he ſaw well, that the inventions 'known are very imperfect, and that new are not 'like to be brought to light but in great length of 'time, and that thoſe are come not to light by Phi-'loſophy. He thought alſo this ſtate of knowledge 'was the worſe, becauſe men ſtrive (againſt them-'ſelves) to ſave the credit of ignorance, and ſo ſa-'tisfy themſelves in this poverty: For the Phyſician, 'beſides the cauteles of practice, hath this general 'cautele of art, that he diſcharges the weakneſs of 'his art upon ſuppoſed impoſſibilities, neither can his 'art be condemned, when itſelf judgeth. That Phi-'loſophy alſo, out of which the knowledge of Phy-'ſic which now is in uſe is hewed, receiveth certain 'poſitions and opinions, which (if they be well 'weighed) induce this perſuaſion that no great works 'are to be expected from art and the hand of man; 'as in particular, that opinion that the heat of the 'ſun and fire differ in kind, and that other in com-'poſition is the work of man, and mixture is the 'work of nature and the like, all tending to the 'circumſcription of man's power, and to artificial 'deſpair; killing in men not only the comfort of 'imagination, but the induſtry of trial; only upon 'vain glory, to have their art thought perfect, and 'that all is impoſſible that is not already found. The 'Alchemiſt diſcharges his art upon his own errors, 'either ſuppoſing a miſunderſtanding of the words 'of his authors, which maketh him liſten after au-'ricular traditions, or elſe a failing in the true pro-'portions and ſcruples of practice, which maketh 'him renew infinitely his trials, and finding alſo 'that he lighteth upon ſome mean experiments and 'concluſions by the way, feedeth upon them and 'magnifieth them to the moſt, and ſupplieth the 'reſt in hopes. The Magician, when he findeth 'ſomewas by this means, which very few great writers have taken, that Sir Francis obtained thoſe lights, which enabled him to finiſh thoſe parts of the Inſtauration to ſo high a degree of perfection. He likewiſe in a great meaſure avoided, by taking this method, thoſe ill-natured cenſures, and critical examinations, to which works of this nature are uſually expoſed, and to which his own ſyſtem was ſo much the more liable, as it went entirely upon new principles, and could therefore only be ſupported by its own worth, and ſtand on no other foundation than its own ſolidity (a). But that he might relieve himſelf a little from the ſeverity of theſe ſtudies, and as it were amuſe himſelf with erecting a magnificent pavilion, while his great palace of Philoſophy was building; he compoſed and ſent abroad in 1610, his celebrated treatiſe Of the Wiſdom of the Antients, in which he ſhewed that none had ſtudied them more cloſely, was better acquainted with their beauties, or had pierced deeper into their meaning (b) [S]. There have

'ſomething (as he conceiveth above nature) effected, 'thinketh when a breach is once made in nature, 'that it is all one to perform great things and ſmall, 'not ſeeing that they are but ſubjects of a certain 'kind, wherein Magic and ſuperſtition hath played 'in all times. The mechanical perſon, if he can refine 'an invention, or put two or three obſervations or 'practices together in one, or couple things better 'with their uſe, or make the work in leſs or greater 'volume, taketh himſelf for an inventor. So he ſaw 'well, that men either perſuade themſelves of new 'inventions as of impoſſibilities, or elſe think they 'are already extant but in ſecret and in few hands, 'or that they account of thoſe little induſtries and 'additions, as of inventions, all which turneth to 'the averting of their minds from any juſt and con-'ſtant labour, to invent further in any quantity. He 'thought alſo, that when men did ſet before them-'ſelves the variety and perfection of works produced 'by mechanical arts, they are apt rather to admire 'the proviſions of man, than to apprehend his wants, 'not conſidering that the original inventions and 'concluſions of nature, which are the life of all 'that variety, are not many nor deeply fetched; and 'that the reſt is but the ſubtile and ruled motion of the 'inſtrument and hand, and that the ſhop therein, is 'not unlike the library, which in ſuch number of 'books, containeth (for the far greater part) nothing 'but iterations, varied ſometimes in form, but not 'new in ſubſtance; ſo he ſaw plainly that opinion of 'ſtore was a cauſe of want, and that both works and 'doctrines appear many, and are few.' We may from hence conceive, the manner in which this piece was written, and how well it was ſuited to ſerve the author's purpoſe, of ſo far manifeſting his own deſign, as to obtain a tolerable account of the ſtrongeſt and beſt founded objections which could be brought againſt it, ſo as that in his larger work, he might either correct his own faults, or ſhew ſuch as were inclined to criticize his performance, theirs.

[S] Had pierced deeper into their meaning.] In the firſt part of his Inſtauration our author had obſerved, that there was a great deficiency in explaining the allegorical poetry of the Antients, and more particularly in laying open the Philoſophy of antient fables; and as he was deſirous of affording inſtances of the poſſibility of ſupplying all the deficiencies he pointed out, he compoſed this work, to anſwer the end of ſupplying the deficiency before mentioned (52). In his introduction to this book, he gives a large and very clear account of the reaſons which induced him to believe, that notwithſtanding the ſeeming abſurdities in the fabulous hiſtory of the Antients; there was however, ſomething at the bottom which deſerved to be examined into and enquired after. Theſe obſervations, which are full of very curious learning, he concludes thus: But the argument of moſt weight with me is this, that many of theſe fables by no means appear to have been invented by the perſons, who relate and divulge them, whether Homer, Heſiod, or others; for if I were aſſured they firſt flowed from thoſe latter times, and authors that tranſmit them to us, I ſhould never expect any thing ſingularly great or noble from ſuch an origin. But whoever attentively conſiders the thing, will find that theſe fables are delivered down and related by thoſe writers, not as matters then firſt invented and propoſed, but as things received and embraced in earlier ages. Beſides, as they are differently related by writers nearly of the ſame ages, it is eaſily perceived, that the relators drew from the common ſtock of antient tradition, and varied but in point of embelliſhment, which is their own, and this principally raiſes my eſteem of theſe fables; which I receive not as the product of the age, or invention of the Poets, but as ſacred relics, gentle whiſpers, and the breath of better times, that from the traditions of more antient nations, came at length into the flutes and trumpets of the Greeks. But if any one ſhall, notwithſtanding this, contend that allegories are always adventitious, or impoſed upon the antient fables, and no way native, or genuinely contained in them, we might here leave him undiſturbed in that gravity of judgment he affects, (though we cannot help accounting it ſomewhat dull and phlegmatic) and if it were worth the trouble, to proceed to another kind of argument. Men have propoſed to anſwer two different and contrary ends by the uſe of parable, for parables ſerve as well to inſtruct and illuſtrate, as to wrap up and envelope; ſo that though for the preſent we drop the concealed uſe, and ſuppoſe the antient fables to be vague undeterminate things, formed for amuſement, ſtill the other uſe muſt remain and can never be given up; and every man of any learning muſt readily allow, that this method of inſtructing is grave, ſober, and exceedingly uſeful, and ſometimes neceſſary in the ſciences, as it opens an eaſy and familiar paſſage to the human underſtanding in all new diſcoveries, that are abſtruſe, and are out of the road of vulgar opinions. Hence in the firſt ages, when ſuch inventions and concluſions of the human reaſon, as are not trite and common, were new and little known, all things abounded with fables, parables, ſimilies, compariſons, and alluſions, which were not intended to conceal, but to inform and teach, whilſt the minds of men continued rude and unpractiſed in matters of ſubtilty or ſpeculation, or even impatient, or in a manner uncapable of receiving ſuch things, as did not directly fall under and ſtrike the ſenſes: for as hieroglyphics were in uſe before writings, ſo were parables in uſe before arguments; and even to this day, if any man would let new light in upon the human underſtanding, and conquer prejudice without raiſing conteſts, animoſities, oppoſition, or diſturbance, he muſt ſtill go in the ſame path, and have recourſe to the like method of allegory, metaphor, and alluſion. To conclude, the knowledge of the early ages was either great or happy; great, if they by deſign made this uſe of trope and figure; happy, if whilſt they had other views, they afforded matter and occaſion to ſuch noble contemplations. Let either be the caſe, our pains perhaps will not be miſemployed, whether we illuſtrate antiquity, or the things themſelves: the like indeed has been attempted by others; but, to ſpeak ingenuouſly, their great and voluminous labours have almoſt deſtroyed the energy, the efficacy, and grace of the thing, whilſt being unſkilled in nature, and their learning no more than that of common-place, they have applied the ſenſe of the parables to certain general and vulgar matters, without reaching to their real purport, genuine interpretation, and full depth. For myſelf therefore, I expect to appear new in theſe common things, becauſe leaving untouched ſuch as are ſufficiently plain and open, I ſhall drive only at thoſe that are either deep or rich (53). In this admirable work our author has laid open with great ſagacity and penetration, the ſecret meaning of the phyſical, moral, and political fables of antiquity, in doing which, he very wiſely and prudently took occaſion to throw out many obſervations of his own, for which he could not have found otherways ſo have been very few books publiſhed, either in this or in any other nation, which either deſerved or met with more general applauſe than this, and ſcarcely any that are likely to retain it longer; for in this performance, Sir Francis Bacon gave a ſingular proof of his capacity to pleaſe all parties in literature, as in his political conduct, he ſtood fair with all the parties in the nation. The admirers of antiquity were charmed with this diſcourſe, which ſeems expreſsly calculated to juſtify their admiration; and, on the other hand, their oppoſites were no leſs pleaſed with a piece, from which they thought they could demonſtrate, that the ſagacity of a modern genius, had found out much better meanings for the Antients, than ever were meant by them (c). At this time, Sir Francis Bacon was in ſuch high credit with his maſter, as well as in ſuch high eſteem with all ranks and degrees of people, that as, on the one hand, he was able to attain, with little or no aſſiſtance from the Miniſters, whatever he thought expedient to aſk of the King; ſo, on the other, there was no danger that any ſuit he obtained, ſhould beget either popular diſlike, or diſtaſte thoſe of his profeſſion. Yet it does not appear, that Sir Francis made any great advantages of this favourable ſituation, excepting that in the year 1611, he procured the office of Judge of the Marſhal's Court (d), jointly with Sir Thomas Vavaſor, then Knight Marſhal, by which he preſided, though for a very ſhort time, in the court newly erected, under the title of the Palace Court for the verge of the King's houſe, in which ſtation he has left us a moſt learned and methodical charge, given to the jury there upon a commiſſion of oyer and terminer (e). One may eaſily diſcern from hence, that he had not either a very aſpiring, or a very covetous diſpoſition, but was content to wait the proper ſeaſons and favourable opportunities of riſing, which are brought forth by time. It muſt however be owned, that his private fortune was never in a better condition, or his domeſtic affairs in a happier ſituation, than at preſent. He was poſſeſſed, and had been ſo for ſome years, of a good eſtate in Hertfordſhire, and of his father's pleaſant ſeat of Gorhambury, which came to him by the death of his brother, Mr. Anthony Bacon. He was in great practice at the bar, the King's Solicitor, and, beſides the new place laſt mentioned, was juſt come into the poſſeſſion of that office, which had been granted him twenty years before, of Regiſter of the Court of Star-Chamber, which was of great value; ſo that at this time he could not enjoy leſs than five thouſand pounds a year, including the fortune brought him by his wife, of which, though there are good reaſons to believe that he took little to himſelf, yet it muſt have prevented a very conſiderable expence in his family, which would have been otherwiſe neceſſary. Beſides, as his employments were not of a nature to require much ſplendor or magnificence, ſo, notwithſtanding the generoſity of his temper, which it muſt be confeſſed leaned a little towards profuſeneſs, yet he muſt have been at this juncture in very eaſy circumſtances, which to a man who never affected riches, muſt have been a very comfortable condition, eſpecially when joined to the high reputation and unenvied credit which at this time he enjoyed (f). He had now the King's ear ſo entirely, that he obtained a promiſe of ſucceeding Sir Henry Hobart, then Attorney General, in caſe either of his death or removal. In the beginning of the year 1612, that worthy man had a very ſevere fit of illneſs, which induced Sir Francis Bacon to put the King in mind of his promiſe; and it ſeems by another letter of his, that he was now on very good terms with the Earl of Saliſbury, Lord-Treaſurer, who ſupported his pretenſions (g). However the Attorney recovered, and he did not ſucceed him in that employment till the year following, when Sir Henry Hobart was made Chief juſtice of the Common-Pleas, upon the removal of Sir Edward Coke from that office, who was made Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench. Sir Francis Bacon took poſſeſſion of his new office, on the twenty-ſeventh of October, 1613 (h), in which he made as great a figure as any of his predeceſſors, and had ſome particular honours done him, which few or none of them had received: as for inſtance, he was allowed to take his ſeat in Parliament, though it was adjudged, that by reaſon of his office he had no right to it, as being an attendant on the Houſe of Lords. But this favour was granted him, purely out of reſpect to his perſon, and the ſervices he had formerly rendered his country in that Houſe (i). In the court of Star-Chamber again, a ſolemn decree having been made againſt the faſhionable, though fatal practice of duelling, his ſpeech, which gave occaſion to it, was, contrary to cuſtom, printed therewith [T]. Theſe are the ſtrongeſt ſo fit and favourable an opportunity. He publiſhed this treatiſe in Latin, in which language he ſeems to have written it, and dedicated it to his couſin, the Lord Treaſurer Saliſbury, and the univerſity of Cambridge. This work has been very often reprinted ſince, and, except his Eſſays, is of all his writings the moſt generally known and eſteemed. Sir Arthur Gorges rendered the whole into Engliſh, which is uſually added to the author's eſſays; and it is to this book the great poet as well as traveller, Mr. George Sandys (54) doth, in his learned notes on his verſion of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, acknowledge himſelf to be much indebted, ſtiling my Lord St. Albans, the crown of all modern authors.

[T] His ſpeech which gave occaſion to it, was, contrary to cuſtom, printed therewith.] This barbarous and bloody cuſtom, like moſt of our other bad cuſtoms, was derived to us from France, where, notwithſtanding the edicts of Henry IV. and Louis XIII., it occaſioned the ſhedding of rivers of blood, till the great Cardinal de Richelieu, though cruel and revengeful himſelf, put ſome ſtop to it, by the execution of Lord Bouteville, a man of high quality, and of as great intereſt as any in France, which though ſevere, was univerſally allowed one of the beſt acts of his adminiſtration. It is eaſy to perceive from the writings of Wilſon, Oſborne, and other authors of thoſe times, to what height it was riſen in England, and what lamentable ſtrongeſt marks of the high eſteem he was then in that can be deſired; and indeed Sir Francis Bacon had now overcome all difficulties, and ſtood ſecurely on his own intereſt with the King, the Earl of Saliſbury being dead, and for any thing that appears, Sir Francis mentable effects it produced. For when once it grew into practice amongſt perſons of diſtinction, thoſe of an inferior degree, forgetting that it was altogether inconſiſtent with the laws of God and man, affected it as a point of good breeding; ſo that it grew every day more and more frequent, notwithſtanding the melancholy conſequences with which it was attended, and the ſeverity with which ſome had been proſecuted, who by this means had been drawn in to commit capital offences. But ſtill the root of the evil was left: ſuch perſons, though they died with ſhame, had the pity and compaſſion of the people, and, though murderers, were regarded as men of honour (55). This ſerved to keep up the practice to the ſcandal of Law, Religion, and Government, which were ſet at defiance by this lawleſs and bloody courſe of calling men to account for trifles, and taking that ſatisfaction by the ſword, which the laws of nature and the land would never have granted. Sir Francis Bacon being made the King's Attorney, uſed all his efforts to put a ſtop to this practice here, and his charge with regard to duels, upon an information in the Star-Chamber againſt Prieſt and Wright, was ſo highly approved by the Lords of the Council, who were then in the Star-Chamber, that they ordered it, as is ſaid in the text, to be printed and publiſhed with the decree of the Court itſelf (56). 'In this charge he ſpeaks of 'the nature and greatneſs of the miſchiefs of duels, 'the cauſes and remedies of it, the juſtice of the 'Law of England, which ſome, he ſays, ſtick not 'to think defective in this matter; of the capacity 'of the Court in the Star-Chamber, where certainly 'the remedy of that miſchief was to be found;' and of his own purpoſe and reſolution, wherein he humbly deſires the aſſiſtance of that Court. With regard to the miſchief itſelf, he obſerves, that when revenge is once extorted out of the magiſtrate's hand, contrary to God's ordinance; and every man ſhall bear the ſword, not to defend but to aſſail, and private men begin once to preſume to give law to themſelves, and to right their own wrongs, no man can foreſee the dangers and inconveniences which may ariſe and multiply by that means. Other offences yield and conſent to the law, that it is good, not daring to make defence, or to juſtify themſelves; but this offence expreſsly gives law an affront, as if there were two laws, one a kind of gown law, and the other a law of reputation as they term it: So that Paul's and Weſtminſter, the pulpit and courts of juſtice, muſt give place to the Law (as King James expreſſes it in his proclamation) of ordinary tables, and ſuch reverend aſſemblies. The year books and ſtatute books, muſt give place to ſome French and Italian pamphlets, which handle the doctrine of duels, which if they be in the right, tranſeamus ad illa, let us receive them, and not keep the people in conflict and diſtraction between two laws. He conſiders then the loſs which the nation ſuffers by the deſtruction of thoſe perſons by private, inſignificant quarrels, whoſe blood, if it was adventured in the ſervice of the King and realm, would be able to make the fortune of a day, and to change the fortune of a kingdom. With reſpect to the cauſe of it; the firſt motive undoubtedly is a falſe and erroneous imagination of honour and credit, upon which account, King James in his proclamation, calls them bewitching duels, 'for if one 'judge of it truly, ſays the Attorney, it is no better 'than a ſorcery that inchanted the ſpirits of young 'men, that bear great minds with a falſe ſhew, 'ſpecies falſa, and a kind of ſatanical illuſion, and 'apparition of honour againſt Religion, againſt Law, 'againſt moral virtue, and againſt the precedents and 'examples of the beſt times, and the valianteſt nations.' Beſides this, men have almoſt loſt the true notion, and underſtanding of fortitude and honour. 'For fortitude diſtinguiſheth the grounds of quarrels 'whether they be juſt, and not only ſo, but whether 'they be worthy, and ſetteth a better price upon men's 'lives than to beſtow them idly; nay it is a weakneſs 'and diſeſteem of a man's ſelf, to put a man's life upon 'ſuch lieger performances: a man's life is not to be 'trifled away; it is to be offered up and ſacrificed to 'honourable ſervices, public merits, good cauſes, 'and noble adventures: It is in expence of blood as 'it is in expence of money: it is no liberality to make 'a profuſion of money upon every profane occaſion, no more is it fortitude to make effuſion of 'blood, except the cauſe be of worth.' The remedies which he propoſes for the reſtraint of this evil are, Firſt, that there appear and be declared a conſtant and ſettled reſolution in the State to aboliſh it: Secondly, care muſt be taken that it be no longer countenanced, or the humour of it indulged: Thirdly, ſays he, 'I muſt 'acknowledge that I learned out of the King's laſt 'proclamation, the moſt prudent and beſt applied remedy for this offence (if it ſhall pleaſe his Majeſty 'to uſe it) that the wit of man can deviſe. This 'offence is grounded upon a falſe conceit of honour, 'and therefore it ſhould be puniſhed in the ſame 'kind, in eo quis rectiſſime plectitur, in quo peccat; 'the fountain of honour is the King and his aſpect, 'and the acceſs to his perſon continueth honour in 'life, and to be baniſhed from his preſence, is one 'of the greateſt eclipſes of honour that can be. If 'his Majeſty ſhall be pleaſed, that when this court 'ſhall cenſure any of theſe offences in perſons of eminent quality, to add this out of his own power and 'diſcipline, that theſe perſons ſhall be baniſhed and 'excluded from his court for certain years, and the 'courts of his Queen and Prince; I think there is 'no man, that hath any good blood in him, will 'commit an act, that ſhall caſt him into that darkneſs, that he may not behold his Sovereign's face:' Laſtly, that this court ſhould puniſh all the middle acts and proceedings which tend to the duel, and ſo to hew and vex the root in the branches, which no doubt will kill the root, and yet prevent the extremity of the Law. The Attorney obſerves then, that the Law of England is excepted to, though ignorantly, in two points; the one, that it ſhould make no difference between an inſidious and foul murder, and the killing a man upon fair terms, as it is called: The other, that the Law has not provided ſufficient puniſhment and reparations for contumely of words, as the lie, and the like. But theſe are no better than childiſh novelties againſt the divine law, and all laws in effect; and againſt the example of all the braveſt and moſt virtuous nations in the world; for in the law of God there is never to be found, any difference made in homicide, voluntary and involuntary, which we term miſadventure: As for example in civil ſtates, 'All memory, ſays he, doth conſent that Greece 'and Rome were the moſt valiant and generous nations 'of the world, and that which is more to be noted, 'they were free ſtates, and not under a monarchy, 'whereby a man would think it a great deal the 'more reaſon, that particular perſons ſhould have 'righted themſelves; and yet they had not this practice 'of duels, nor any thing that bear ſhew thereof, and 'ſure they would have had it if there had been any 'virtue in it: nay, as he ſaith (fas eſt & ab hoſte 'doceri), it is memorable, that is reported by a 'Counſellor, Ambaſſador of the Emperor's, touching 'the cenſure of the Turks of theſe duels. There 'was a combat of this kind, performed by two perſons of quality of the Turks, wherein one of them 'was ſlain, the other party was convented before the 'Council of Baſhaws, the manner of the reprehenſion 'was in theſe words: "How durſt you undertake to "fight one with the other? Are there not Chriſtians "enough to kill? Did you not know, that whether of "you ſhould be ſlain, the loſs would be the Grand "Seignior's?" So as we may ſee, that the moſt warlike nations, whether generous or barbarous, have 'ever deſpiſed this, wherein now men glory.' As for the ſecond defect pretended in our Law, that it hath provided no remedy for lies or fillips; it may receive the ſame anſwer. It would have been thought a madneſs amongſt the ancient lawgivers to have ſet a puniſhment upon the lie given, which, in effect, is but a word of denial, a negative of another's ſaying. Any lawgiver, if he had been aſked the queſtion, would have made

Francis had no dependance on the Earl of Somerſet, who was the reigning favourite, but kept at a diſtance from him when he was in his greateſt power; and conſequently had nothing to anſwer for, with reſpect either to his perſonal or political failings (k). It is, however, manifeſt, that after the death of the Earl of Saliſbury, there grew many diſorders in the government, which verified the character Sir Francis Bacon gave of that great Miniſter to the King his Maſter, viz. That though it was not likely the King's affairs ſhould ever have gone much better under his management, yet he was ſuch a Miniſter, as would have hindered them from growing worſe (l); which, as things ſtood, would have been of very great ſervice; as appeared by what happened in the year following, when the King having called a Parliament in hopes of obtaining a ſupply, ſome forward people in the Houſe of Commons, to ingratiate themſelves with the Court, made a tender to the King of their intereſt, with a kind of promiſe, that in caſe they were obliged, his Majeſty's affairs in Parliament ſhould go to his wiſh (m). Theſe people, from this bold, and as it afterwards appeared, ill-grounded preſumption of their own abilities and intereſts, were ſtiled undertakers; yet ſo far were they from being able to carry matters, as they pretended, in the Houſe of Commons, that this fooliſh and unjuſtifiable ſcheme of theirs having taken air, one of the firſt things the Houſe fell upon, was an inquiry after theſe Undertakers (n). To pacify the heats occaſioned by this ſtrange project, the Attorney-General made a long and very fine ſpeech, which is ſtill preſerved. It had not however the deſired effect; for the Houſe was ſo much out of humour at this, and ſome other miſtakes in the adminiſtration, that the King, ſeeing no hopes of obtaining any thing from them, diſſolved the Parliament in a heat, and ſoon afterwards committed ſeveral Members, who had ſpoken freely of his meaſures in the Houſe of Commons. This, inſtead of allaying, increaſed the ferment in the nation (o), and that to ſuch a degree, that the King ſeeing little hopes of better ſucceſs in another, than he had found in the former Parliament, declined calling one: but being extremely diſtreſſed for money, he was glad to receive it in any manner, and by any means; and upon this, ſeveral of the nobility and clergy in and about London, made at leaſt a ſeeming voluntary preſent to his Majeſty, which the Council taking notice of, and being willing to encourage ſuch an example, and make it more diffuſive, they wrote letters to the Sheriffs, and Juſtices of Peace of the counties, and Magiſtrates of ſeveral corporations, informing them of what had been done above, and how acceptable and ſeaſonable the bounty of his ſubjects would be to the King and his occaſions; but without any clauſes of compulſion, or requiring, or returning of the names of ſuch as ſhould refuſe (p). Among others, one was directed to the Mayor of Marlborough, in Wiltſhire, where Mr. Oliver St. John, a Gentleman of an ancient family, was then reſiding; who being conſulted thereupon, he wrote a letter to the Mayor upon the eleventh of October, 1614, repreſenting to him, that this benevolence was againſt the laws, reaſon, and religion; inſinuating, that the King, by promoting the ſame, had violated his coronation oath, and that by ſuch means as theſe, King Richard II., had given an opportunity to Henry IV., to deprive him of his crown, deſiring, if he thought fit, to communicate his ſentiments to the Juſtices who were to meet about the benevolence (q). For this action, Mr. St. John was proſecuted in the Star-Chamber, and upon the fifteenth of April, 1615, the cauſe was brought to a hearing, as appears by Sir Francis Bacon's letter of that date (r). In this Court, which was compoſed of a great many Lords of the Council, the Chief-Juſtices and Chief-Barons, ſome of them thought that this offence was of a higher nature than a contempt; but they all agreed, that this benevolence, as it was circumſtanced, was not reſtrained by any of the acts of parliament, which prohibits that ſort of taxation, and that the defendant ſhould be fined five thouſand pounds, impriſoned during the King's pleaſure, and make ſubmiſſion in writing, which he accordingly did (s). While this cauſe was depending, Sir Francis Bacon, in right of his office, was employed in the proſecution of two other offenders for high-treaſon, and they were both caſes in ſome ſort ſingular, and in which he had a great deal of trouble. The firſt was that of Peacham, a Clergyman, who had inſerted ſeveral trea-

made Solon's anſwer, That he had not made any puniſhment for it, becauſe he never imagined the world would have been ſo fantaſtical as to take it ſo highly. The Civilians diſpute, whether an action of injury lie for it, and rather reſolve the contrary; ſo every touch or light blow of the perſon is not in itſelf conſiderable, except that they have got upon them the ſtamp of a diſgrace, which makes theſe light things paſs for great matter. 'The law of England, and all laws, hold 'theſe degrees of injury to the perſon, ſlander, bat-'tery, maim, and death; and if there be extraordi-'nary circumſtances of deſpite and contumely, as in 'caſe of libels, and baſtinadoes, and the like, this 'Court taketh them in hand, and puniſheth them ex-'emplarily: but for this apprehenſion of a diſgrace, 'that a fillip to the perſon ſhould be a mortal wound 'to the reputation, it were good that men did 'hearken to the ſaying of Conſalvo, the great and 'famous commander, that was wont to ſay, that a 'Gentleman's honour ſhould be, de tela craſſiore, of 'a good ſtrong warp or web, that every little thing 'ſhould not catch it, whereas now it ſeems they are 'but cobweb, lawn, or ſuch like ſtuff, which cer-'tainly is weakneſs, and not true greatneſs of mind; 'but like a ſick man's body, that is ſo tender that 'it feels every thing.' We find likewiſe, that in December, in the year 1616, he proſecuted one Mr. Markham, for diſperſing letters of challenge to the Lord Darcy. He mentions this in a letter to the Lord Viſcount Villiers, publiſhed in the works of our author; who, in reference to this crime, ſhewed himſelf no reſpecter of perſons, but proſecuted with the utmoſt ſeverity, ſuch as, forgetting their duty to God and the government by which they were protected, ran into offences of this kind, merely to gain or to ſupport their reputation, with ſuch as were the worſt judges of what deſerved praiſe or diſpraiſe.

ſonable paſſages in a ſermon never preached, and which, as ſome ſaid, was never intended to be preached. However, the papers being found in his ſtudy, it was reſolved that he ſhould be proſecuted; and the King being, it ſeems, doubtful of the event, was reſolved to go upon as ſure grounds as he could, and therefore directed Sir Francis Bacon, to procure the opinion of Sir Edward Coke and the reſt of the Judges beforehand, which was accordingly done. But the Chief-Juſtice Coke was not prevailed upon to give his without much difficulty, declaring it to be a thing unuſual, and which he was very much afraid might be attended by very ill conſequences. The point was at laſt carried notwithſtanding, and Peacham was afterwards tried and found guilty, but not executed (t); which, however it may leſſen the ſeverity, does not in the leaſt excuſe the injuſtice of the proceeding, ſince ſeveral of the Judges were of opinion, that his crime was not high-treaſon. The other caſe was that of Mr. Owen, of Godſtowe in Oxfordſhire, who returning out of Spain, did not only affirm, but enforce with reaſons, a doctrine, which it is probable Suarez and ſome other Jeſuits had diſſeminated, in that country; That if the King were excommunicated and deprived by the Pope, it was lawful for any perſon to kill him. This being a poſition in direct terms contrary to the late Oath of Allegiance, and of dangerous conſequence if believed and propagated, it was thought neceſſary that he ſhould be made an example; and accordingly in Eaſter term, 1615, he was proſecuted and convicted in the King's-Bench; my Lord Coke, and the other Judges of that Court, declaring, That it was high-treaſon within the ſtatute of 25 Edward III (u). The ſpeech of Sir Francis Bacon at the arraignment of this Owen, is preſerved in his works (w) [U], and there are alſo a great many paſſages in his letters, relating to both theſe proſecutions.

We are now to ſhift the ſcene a little, and to take notice of a new favourite, who began to engroſs King James's good graces, to whom Sir Francis Bacon was both a friend and counſellor. This was Mr. George Villiers, afterwards ſo well known to the world by the title of Buckingham. His riſe at Court was very ſwift and ſurprizing, to which the advice of his friend Bacon contributed not a little; and yet it muſt be allowed that this advice was ſuch, as is not uſually given in Courts, but of a ſtrain equally free and friendly, calculated to make the perſon to whom it was addreſſed, both good and great, and ſo equally honourable for the giver and the receiver (x) [W]. But while this gentleman was riſing, his predeceſſor Somerſet was falling, in which Sir Francis Bacon alſo had a ſhare, and a large one too, of which

[U] Is preſerved in his Works.] The caſe of this Owen was very remarkable, and the true reaſon of his being proſecuted, ſeems to have been, in order to awe the more violent ſort of Papiſts. This man had aſſerted, that if the King was excommunicated, it was lawful to kill him, which aſſertion the Attorney maintained to be high-treaſon, in which he was ſupported by the Lord Coke, who was even more forward in this buſineſs than the Attorney himſelf, and inclined to carry the thing higher, as may appear from the following paſſage in a letter, written by Sir Francis Bacon to the King upon this ſubject (53). 'The Judges deſired 'us to leave the examinations and papers with them 'for ſome little time to conſider (which is a thing 'they uſe), but I conceive there will be no manner of 'queſtion made of it. My Lord Chief Juſtice, to 'ſhew forwardneſs (as I interpret it), ſhewed us paſ-'ſages of Suarez, and others, thereby to prove, that 'though your Majeſty ſtood not by particular ſen-'tence, yet by the general bulls of Cœna Domini, 'and others, you were upon the matter excommu-'nicate, and therefore, that the treaſon was as de 'præſenti. But I that foreſee, that if that courſe 'ſhould be held, when it cometh to a public day, 'to diſſeminate to the vulgar an opinion that your 'Majeſty's caſe is all one, as if you were de facto, 'particularly and expreſsly, excommunicate, it would 'but increaſe the danger of your perſon with thoſe 'that were deſperate Papiſts; and that it is needleſs, 'commended my Lord's diligence, but with all put 'it by, and fell upon the other courſe (which is the 'true way), that is, that whoſoever ſhall affirm in diem, 'or ſub conditione, that your Majeſty may be deſtroyed, 'is a traitor de præſenti, for that he maketh you but 'tenant for life, at the will of another: and I put the 'Duke of Buckingham's caſe, who ſaid, that if the 'King cauſed him to be arreſted of treaſon, he would 'ſtab him; and the caſe of the impoſtreſs, Elizabeth 'Barton, that ſaid, if King Henry VIII. took not his 'wife again, Katherine Dowager, he ſhould be no 'longer King, and the like.' When this man came to be indicted for high-treaſon, at the bar of the Court of King's Bench, Sir Francis Bacon ſupported the charge againſt him by that ſpeech which is menioned in the text, of which the latter part is loſt, or at leaſt, has not hitherto been printed; and it is remarkable, that it is that very part of the ſpeech in which he maintained, that though the priſoner did not affirm ſimply, that it is lawful to kill the King, but conditionally only, that if the King be excommunicated, that it is lawful to kill him; yet this was treaſon. It was for this reaſon, that I cited in this note the foregoing paſſage from his letter to the King, becauſe it fully ſupplies the ſenſe and argument, though not the form of the ſpeech, and ſhews in what manner he made that out, which, for any thing I know, has not been obſerved before. At the beginning of this ſpeech there is ſomething very remarkable: this Mr. Owen, it ſeems, was but an obſcure man, and therefore the Attorney-General thought it requiſite, to take off the imputation of ſeverity in this reſpect, by ſhewing the true reaſon for this proceeding againſt him. His words are theſe (54): 'I have now ſerved 'his Majeſty, Solicitor and Attorney, eight years, 'and better; yet this is the firſt time that ever I gave 'in evidence againſt a traitor at this bar, or any 'other. There hath not wanted matter in that party 'of the ſubjects, whence this kind of offence floweth, 'to irritate the King. He hath been irritated by the 'powder treaſon, which might have turned judg-'ment into fury; he hath been irritated by wicked 'and monſtrous libels; irritated by a general inſo-'lency and preſumption of the Papiſts throughout the 'land; and yet I ſee his Majeſty keepeth Cæſar's 'rule, Nil malo, quam eos eſſe ſimiles ſui, & me mei; 'he leaveth them to be like themſelves, and he re-'maineth like himſelf, and ſtriveth to overcome evil 'with goodneſs. A ſtrange thing! bloody opinions, 'bloody doctrines, bloody examples, and yet the 'government ſtill unſtained with blood. As for this 'Owen that is brought in queſtion, though his per-'ſon be, in his condition, contemptible; yet we ſee 'by miſerable examples, that thoſe wretches which 'are but the ſcum of the earth, have been able to ſtir 'earthquakes by murdering of Princes; and if it 'were in caſe of contagion (as this is a contagion 'of the heart and ſoul), a raſcal may bring a plague 'into the city, as well as a great man: ſo it is 'not the perſon but the matter, that is to be con-'ſidered.'

[W] And ſo equally honourable for the giver and receiver.] It was immediately after this new favourite came to be diſtinguiſhed, that Sir Francis Bacon entered into a ſtrict and cloſe friendſhip with him, which which however we ſhall ſpeak as briefly as poſſible, as having occaſion to treat this matter much more at large, in other articles (y). The occaſion of this extraordinary event, was the unexpected diſcovery, of the deep concern that the Earl and Counteſs of Somerſet had, in the barbarous fact of poiſoning Sir Thomas Overbury, the firſt occaſion of which diſcovery, as I find it no where clearly mentioned but in one of the ſpeeches of Sir Francis Bacon, I ſhall take notice of here. Sir Thomas Overbury was poiſoned in the beginning of the year 1613, chiefly by the means of one Weſton, formerly an Apothecary's man, who had been put about him for this purpoſe. This Weſton was afterwards promoted by Sir Gervaiſe Elways, Lieutenant of the Tower, who was alſo privy to the murder; and this gentleman having in other reſpects a good character, being ſtrongly recommended to a certain nobleman by a friend of his, the ſhare he had in the ill uſage of Sir Thomas Overbury was objected, and this having led the Lieutenant to proteſt, that he had perſuaded Weſton from the deſign he had of poiſoning Sir Thomas, and had engaged him to let it fall; this again afforded ſuch light, that by purſuing it ſteadily the whole matter was found out (z). There never was an affair of this kind which made more noiſe in England than this, and the King ſhewed a very earneſt deſire of bringing all who were concerned in it to juſtice; ſo that the Earl and Counteſs of Somerſet were immediately committed, and the reſt of the offenders proſecuted with all imaginable ſeverity. It does not appear, that Sir Francis Bacon meddled at all with this affair at the beginning; for Richard Weſton, who was tried on the nineteenth of October, 1616, had the charge againſt him opened by the Queen's Attorney-General (a). This man at firſt refuſed to plead, and by that means endeavoured to obſtruct the courſe of juſtice; but the famous Lord Coke directing all the evidence there was againſt him to be publiſhed in open Court, he retracted his plea, and putting himſelf upon his trial, was found guilty, and received ſentence of death, which was afterwards executed (b). But the Earl of Somerſet, though a fallen Miniſter, had ſo many friends, that notwithſtanding this clear proceeding, they endeavoured, by miſrepreſenting what had paſſed at Weſton's trial, and by interrogating him at the gallows, to make the whole paſs for nothing better than an artificial contrivance to ruin that Nobleman. This attempt of theirs brought Sir Francis Bacon into the buſineſs; for, as Attorney-General, he was commanded by the King to proſecute the

which laſted with little, or no interruption, ſo long as they lived. Mr. Villiers came well recommended to the King; for he was introduced by the Queen, perſuaded by Archbiſhop Abbot, and other perſons of the firſt quality (55). When he had received the honour of Knighthood, and was made one of the bed-chamber, our author compiled, at his requeſt, ſuch a ſcheme of advice for his conduct, as perhaps was never before penned, and will hardly ever be amended (56). It is very large, and may be uſed very ſucceſsfully, in the education of young men of quality, as it contains every thing neceſſary to be known or attended to, by a perſon in great favour, and admitted to great offices in the ſtate. It was firſt printed in 4to, in the year 1661, and again in the Cabala (57), and very correctly in our author's works (58). I ſhall ſelect a paragraph or two at the beginning, to juſtify what is ſaid in the text, and to prove that this piece was written, not in the ſtile of a flatterer, but of a friend. 'You know,' ſays our author to Sir G. Villiers, 'I am no courtier, nor verſed in ſtate affairs: 'my life, hitherto, hath rather been contemplative 'than active; I have rather ſtudied books than men. 'I can but gueſs at the moſt, at thoſe things in which 'you deſired to be adviſed; nevertheleſs, to ſhew my 'obedience, though with the hazard of my diſcretion, 'I ſhall yield unto you. Sir, in the firſt place, I 'ſhall be bold to put you in mind of the preſent condition you are in: you are not only a courtier, but 'a bed-chamber man, and ſo in the eye and ear of 'your maſter, but you are alſo a favourite, the favourite 'of the time, and ſo are in his boſom alſo, the world 'hath ſo voted you, and hath ſo eſteemed you; for 'Kings and great Princes, even the wiſeſt of them, 'have had their friends, their favourites, their privadoes, in all ages, for they have their affections as 'well as other men. Of theſe they make ſeveral uſes, 'ſometimes to communicate and debate their thoughts 'with them, and to ripen their judgments thereby; 'ſometimes to eaſe their cares by imparting them, 'and ſometimes to interpoſe them between themſelves 'and the envy or malice of their people: for Kings 'cannot err; that muſt be diſcharged on the ſhoulders 'of their Miniſters, and they who are neareſt to them 'muſt be content to bear the greateſt load. Remember then what your true condition is: the King himſelf is above the reach of his people, but cannot be 'above their cenſures; and you are his ſhadow, if 'either he commit an error, and is loth to avow it, 'but excuſeth it upon his miniſters, of which you 'are firſt in the eye, or you commit the fault, or 'have willingly permitted, and muſt ſuffer for it, 'and ſo perhaps you may be offered a ſacrifice to 'appeaſe the multitude. But truly, Sir, I do not believe or ſuſpect you are choſen to this eminency, 'out of the laſt of thoſe conſiderations: for you 'ſerve ſuch a maſter, who by his wiſdom and goodneſs, is as free from the malice or envy of his 'ſubjects, as I think I may truly ſay, ever any King 'was, who has ſat upon his throne before him; but 'I am confident his Majeſty has caſt his eyes upon 'you, as finding you to be ſuch as you ſhould be, or 'hoping to make you to be ſuch as he would have 'you to be: for this without flattery I may ſay, your 'outſide promiſeth as much as can be expected from 'a gentleman; but be it in the one reſpect or other, 'it belongeth to you to take care of yourſelf, and to 'know well what the name of a favourite ſignifies. 'If you be choſen upon the former reſpects, you have 'reaſon to take care of your actions and deportment, 'out of your gratitude for the King's ſake; but if 'out of the latter, you ought to take the greater 'care for your own ſake. You are as a new riſen 'ſtar, and the eyes of all men are upon you; let 'not your own negligence make you fall like a meteor.' There is certainly great ſpirit and freedom in this Introduction, and it cannot be denied that the ſame ſpirit and freedom alſo runs through the whole piece. There might be lightneſs and indiſcretion in the King's choice of ſo young a favourite: but certainly, there was nothing ſtrange, nothing that could give offence in the endeavours of Sir Francis Bacon, to make him become his place, to enable him, of a young courtier, to become a good ſtateſman; and to turn the King's condeſcenſion to his own liking, to the benefit of his people. I have dwelt the longer upon this, becauſe the application of Sir Francis Bacon to this riſing ſtar, has been made one of the principal objections againſt our author's conduct; whereas, whoever ſhall conſider, what need Sir Francis Bacon had of the intereſt of Sir George Villiers; and, on the other hand, how neceſſary to Sir George Villiers, the councils were of Sir Francis Bacon, will eaſily diſcern that this was, in its beginning at leaſt, a very equal friendſhip, and that the King's Attorney-General, did not run himſelf into a haſty and an indecent dependance, upon a boy juſt come into favour at Court.

(56) As this piece was originally calculated to make a young man, who was already great, a Politician; ſo it may well be uſed, to render a man verſed in politics, who would that way aſpire to greatneſs.

perſons, who had been moſt buſy in this baſe undertaking, in the Star-Chamber. Accordingly he there brought a charge againſt Mr. Lumſden, a courtier and a gentleman of good family in Scotland, Sir John Holles, afterwards Earl of Clare, and Sir John Wentworth, upon which occaſion he made a moſt excellent ſpeech, which is not only preſerved among his other works, but was alſo inſerted by Mr. Wilſon in his Hiſtory. In conſequence of this proſecution, all the parties were moſt ſeverely puniſhed in that court (c) [X]. It was his wiſe and prudent conduct in this proſecution, that engaged his maſter King James, to entruſt him chiefly in the management of the trials of the Earl and Counteſs of Somerſet, as appears by his own letters to the King upon this ſubject, in which it is evident, that this affair was now become, in ſome meaſure, a matter of State; and the King, who from the beginning had taken a great deal of pains, as his manner was, to magnify his zeal for, and ſkill in, doing juſtice, continued now to intereſt himſelf therein to ſuch a degree, as drew very heavy imputations upon his character, and ought to be a warning to Princes, to leave matters of this nature to the free courſe of the laws, without any interpoſition whatever (d). After many examinations, and much unneceſſary ſtir about it, Frances, Counteſs of Somerſet was brought to her trial, on the twenty-fourth of May, 1616, and there pleaded guilty, upon which occaſion Sir Francis Bacon made a ſpeech, in which the beforementioned circumſtance, relating to the diſcovery of this whole affair was contained (e). The next day the Earl of Somerſet was brought to his trial, and Sir Francis Bacon, as Attorney-General, opened the matter very fully, and with much perſpicuity, and though the Earl defended himſelf with great art and ſkill, yet he was found guilty (f). It is true, that neither the Counteſs who confeſſed her guilt, nor the Nobleman who was convicted upon evidence, ſuffered, though all who had been their inſtruments in this black and barbarous affair did: but the mercy extended to the former, was in regard to her family, the moſt noble in the kingdom, and the [X] Were moſt ſeverely puniſhed in that Court.] The deſign of this proſecution, was to vindicate the juſtice of the nation, and to prevent the obſtructing of its courſe, which might have been the conſequence, if the methods taken by theſe gentlemen, and indeed by many others, ſuch as Mr. Sackvil, Sir Thomas Vavaſor, and the famous Sir Henry Vane, out of their too great affection for the Earl of Somerſet, had prevailed, and eſtabliſhed a notion, that Weſton died innocently, or at leaſt, that he had not accuſed the Earl. Sir Francis Bacon, in the opening of his charge (59), expoſed very fully the great danger of poiſoning, and why it was formerly accounted high-treaſon; becauſe, ſays he, it is an offence that evidently tends to the ſubverſion and diſſolution of human ſociety, which he aſſigns as one reaſon, why the King had taken ſo much pains in this matter. He next obſerves, that Sir Thomas Overbury, at the time he was poiſoned, was a priſoner of ſtate in the Tower, and conſequently, more immediately under the King's protection. He adds to theſe a third, that by the means of theſe three gentlemen, the honour of the King was deeply injured, by the aſperſions thrown upon his juſtice, for which no remedy could be had but here in the Star-Chamber. Having thus introduced the cauſe, he proceeded to the particular offences of the ſeveral perſons at the bar. As to Mr. Lumſden, he ſays, that in the time between Weſton's ſtanding mute, and his trial; he drew up a falſe and libellous relation, containing as many untruths as lines, and delivered it to Mr. Henry Gibb of the King's bed-chamber, that he might put it into his Majeſty's hands, with intent to ſlander the Chief Juſtice, of whom Sir Francis gives a great encomium upon this occaſion. As to Sir John Wentworth, he charges, that at the gallows he aſked Weſton, Whether he poiſoned Overbury or no? And with his giving this reaſon for his queſtion, that he deſired to know it, that he might pray with him. For Sir John Holles, he does not charge him with aſking any queſtions, but for acting as a kind of Confeſſor, by deſiring Weſton to diſcharge his conſcience, and to ſatisfy the world; to which he giving no anſwer, Sir John turned about his horſe and ſaid, He was ſorry for ſuch a concluſion. He farther charges him with another offence, prior in point of time, which was, that on the day the verdict was given againſt Weſton, he ſaid, If he were of the jury, he would doubt what to do. After having gone through theſe particulars, Sir Francis thus ſummed up his charge (60). 'Of the offence of theſe two 'gentlemen in general, your Lordſhip muſt give me 'leave to ſay, that it is an offence greater or more 'dangerous than is conceived. I know well, that as we 'have no Spaniſh Inquiſitions, nor juſtice in a corner; 'ſo we have no gagging of men's mouths at their 'deaths, but that they may ſpeak freely at the laſt 'hour; but then it muſt come from the free motion 'of the party, not by temptation of queſtions. The 'queſtions that are to be aſked, ought to tend to 'farther revealing of their own or others guiltineſs. 'But to uſe a queſtion in the nature of a falſe interrogatory, to falſify that which is re judicata, is 'intolerable; for that were to erect a court or commiſſion of review at Tyburn, againſt the King's 'Bench at Weſtminſter: and beſides, it is a thing 'vain and idle, for if they anſwer according to the 'judgment paſt, it adds no credit, or if it be contrary, 'it derogateth nothing, but yet it ſubjecteth the 'majeſty of juſtice, to popular and vulgar talk and 'opinion. My Lords, theſe are great and dangerous 'offences; for if we do not maintain juſtice, juſtice will not maintain us.' All this was juſt and decent, what aroſe from the nature of the cauſe, and what was fit for a man in his office to ſay upon ſuch an occaſion. Sir John Holles in his anſwer ſaid, 'That Mr. Attorney had ſo well applied his charge 'againſt him, that though he carried the ſeal of a good 'conſcience, he would almoſt make him believe that 'he was guilty; but he hoped that their Lordſhips 'would take the bird by the body, and not by the 'feathers.' But the Chief Juſtice Coke dealt with them a little more rudely (61), telling Mr. Lumſden, that he was the Earl of Somerſet's pimp, and that he could prove him to be ſo under the Earl's own hand: as for Sir John Holles, he ſaid his crime was very great; for that he had queſtioned the truth of a fact after a verdict, which was of ſo ſacred a nature, that the law could not allow a man to do it, though ever ſo much concerned in intereſt: and becauſe in his defence Sir John had made uſe of this expreſſion, that if any thing were determined againſt him, he did humbly ſubmit himſelf thereto: the Chief Juſtice ſaid, He thought, that by determining, he meant the Court were to give their cenſures againſt him by conſpiracy: 'For my own part, continued he, I talked with none 'other, nor I think did any of us, one ſpeak with 'the other before we came together here. Peradventure he thinks, as ſome have thought, that all 'the carriage of this buſineſs is but a conſpiracy 'againſt the Earl of Somerſet (62).' Upon the whole, the Court gave the following ſentence, viz. Mr. Lumſden, was fined two thouſand merks, impriſoned in the Tower for a whole year, and after, until he ſhould at the King's-Bench bar, ſubmit himſelf and confeſs his fault, and alſo produce his authors. Sir John Holles was fined one thouſand pounds, impriſoned in the Tower for the ſpace of a year. Sir John Wentworth fined one thouſand merks, impriſoned in the Tower for a year, and both were to make ſubmiſſion at the King's-Bench bar (63).

interceſſion of the Peers in her behalf; and the latter flowed from the King's tenderneſs towards a man, who had been once ſo high in his favour, and who is generally allowed to have been much leſs guilty than his wife. However, the ſparing of them has been always accounted one of the greateſt ſtains on King James's adminiſtration, and is a proof, that ill-timed mercy in a Prince, is often an act of ſeverity to himſelf, and was more eſpecially ſo in this caſe, becauſe the King had taken ſo much pains to make the juſtice of that ſentence appear, which afterwards he declined to execute (g). It muſt, notwithſtanding, be allowed, that there is no kind of reaſon to believe, Sir Francis Bacon had any hand at all in procuring the Earl of Somerſet's pardon, to whom, as he had no obligations, ſo he conducted himſelf towards him in this matter, with a laudable indifference, ſhewing a warm, but decent, diligence in the diſcharge of his duty, as Attorney-General, without any prejudice againſt either of the priſoners; ſo that in an affair which proved fatal to the Chief-Juſtice, he conducted himſelf with ſuch wiſdom and caution, as to deſerve the approbation of the King his maſter, and the general applauſe of the whole nation (b).

(g) See MONSON (Sir THOMAS).

(b) See an Explanation of this in the article of COKE (Sir EDWARD).

He was now truſted and employed by the King, not only in the buſineſs of his profeſſion, but in ſo many affairs of another nature, and of ſuperior conſequence to the ſtate, that he judged it would be for his own honour, and at the ſame time advantageous to the King's ſervice, that he ſhould be ſworn of the Privy-Council, which, though unuſual for a man in his ſtation, was, by the interpoſition of his friend, Sir George Villiers, brought about, and he accordingly took his place at the Board, on the ninth of June, 1616, at Greenwich, where the Court then was (i). His credit at this time was ſo great with the King, that his Majeſty depended chiefly upon his integrity and abilities, in the regulation of an affair that very nearly concerned himſelf, and was of the higheſt conſequence to the nation. There had grown a very high difference between the two Courts of Chancery and King's-Bench, as to the point of Juriſdiction, which ſeems to have ariſen in a great meaſure from the warmth and haughtineſs of Sir Edward Coke, then Lord Chief Juſtice, who, inſtead of endeavouring to bring matters to a fair hearing and amicable concluſion, did all he could to drive things to extremities, and to get the better of the Court of Chancery, by ſetting on foot ſome violent proſecutions at law. This, as might reaſonably be expected, occaſioned a very great noiſe, which was not a little heightened by a very unfortunate circumſtance, viz. that the Chancellor was very dangerouſly ill, when the Chief Juſtice fell upon him in this manner (k). The King proceeded in this affair with great coolneſs and caution, and referred it to the examination of thoſe, who he thought were moſt able and moſt willing to give him a right information, of which Sir Francis Bacon was one; and as far as at this day we can diſcern, his opinion went the fartheſt, towards ſettling the point [Y]. The concluſion of the matter was, that the King in perſon pronounced a kind of judgment in the Star-Chamber, in favour of the Lord

[Y] His opinion went the fartheſt in ſettling that point.] It may not be amiſs to give a ſhort account of the firſt riſe of this controverſy, which then occaſioned ſo much clamour, and has been more than once revived ſince. It was in few words this: one Mr. Courteney ſuing in Chancery to be relieved, againſt a judgment obtained at the Common-Law; an indictment for a Præmunire, grounded upon the ſtatute 27 Edw. III. cap. 1. was preferred againſt him and his agents, in the King's-Bench, at the end of Hillary term, 1615-6. Though the jury refuſed to find the bill, yet thereupon ſprung that contended queſtion, Whether by virtue of the ſaid ſtatute, and that of the fourth year of Henry IV., cap. 3. the Chancery, after judgments given in the Courts of Law, was prohibited from giving relief upon matters ariſing in equity, which the judges at law could not determine or relieve (64)? This affair, as has been obſerved in the text, making a great noiſe in the world, the King, as ſupreme Judge of the juriſdictions of his Courts, uſed the utmoſt care to inform himſelf therein, and referred the ſame to Sir Francis Bacon, and Sir Henry Yelverton, his Attorney and Solicitor; Sir Henry Montague, and Sir Randolph Crewe, his Serjeants at Law, and Mr. Walter, the Prince's Attorney, all eminent men in their profeſſion; who, upon a ſerious conſideration of the ſtatutes, and the occaſion of making them, and of the precedents ſince that time, did, in April 1616, preſent the King with their opinions and reaſons, why they conceived theſe ſtatutes did not extend to the Court of Chancery; conſonant to which reſolution, his Majeſty, upon farther advice, gave judgment in July following, and ordered the caſe, the certificate, and the tranſactions thereupon, to be enrolled in the ſame court (65). All the time this great buſineſs was depending, Sir Francis Bacon, beſides the pains he took in his office, and as a Commiſſioner in right thereof, wrote from time to time to the King upon this ſubject, and at laſt, when the affair drew near to a concluſion, drew up a memorial for the King's conduct in this matter, as alſo in another of no leſs importance, with which, as we ſhall have an occaſion to mention it in another place (66), we have not meddled here. This memorial, as the King followed it cloſely, ſo far as it concerns the preſent caſe, we ſhall inſert here (67).

'That about the end of Hillary term laſt, there 'came to his Majeſty's ears, only by common voice 'and report, not without great rumour and wonder, 'that there was ſomewhat done in the King's-Bench 'the laſt day of that term, whereby his Chancery 'ſhould be pulled down and be brought in queſtion 'for Præmunire, being the moſt heinous offence after 'treaſon, and felony, and miſpriſion of treaſon, and 'that the time ſhould be, when the Chancellor lay 'at the point of death.

'That his Majeſty was ſo far from hearing of this 'by any complaint from his Chancellor (who then had 'given over worldly thoughts), that he wrote letters 'of comfort to him upon this accident, before he heard 'from him; and for his Attorney, his Majeſty challenged him for not advertiſing him of that, of which 'it was proper for his Majeſty to be informed from 'him.

'That his Majeſty being ſenſible of this ſo great 'novelty and perturbation in his Courts of Juſtice, 'nevertheleſs uſed this method and moderation, that 'before he would examine this great affront and diſgrace offered to his Chancery and Chancellor, he 'would firſt inform himſelf whether the Chancery or 'Chancellor were in fault, and whether the former 'precedents of Chancery did warrant the proceedings, 'there, after judgment paſſed at Common Law (which 'was the thing in queſtion), and thereupon his Majeſty called his learned Counſel to him, and commanded them to examine the precedents of Chancery, and to certify what they found, which they 'did;

Lord Chancellor Egerton, with ſome pretty ſharp remarks on the conduct of his antagoniſt, who ſoon after loſt his maſter's eſteem, though he lived to recover and loſe it again (l). Sir George Villiers was all this time riſing in his Sovereign's favour by very ſwift degrees, in which perhaps he was not a little aſſiſted by the good advice that was given him by his friend Sir Francis Bacon, who certainly took a great deal of pains to ſerve him, and therefore had the greateſt right to expect, that in return he ſhould render him all the good offices that were in his power; in which, as from their letters it very clearly appears, he was not at all backward, but, on the contrary, promoted his intereſt with great warmth and ſincerity, agreeably to the character which is given of him by the Earl of Clarendon, than whom there are few who have ſhewn themſelves better judges of men (m). But however it does not appear, that Sir Francis Bacon relied entirely upon his aſſiſtance; but that, on the contrary, he addreſſed himſelf with much plainneſs and freedom to the King, repreſenting very fairly and ſtrongly, though with modeſty and decency, the nature and length of his ſervices, and the ſeveral reaſons he had to expect, that the King, in caſe of a vacancy, ſhould think of him for the cuſtody of the Seals, as a matter equally honourable for himſelf, and advantageous to his Majeſty's ſervice. It is not eaſy to conceive, how applications for favour can be conducted with dignity, or how a man can ſet forth his merits and ſervices, explaining at the ſame time his own fitneſs for any particular employment, and marking the inaptitude of others, without a mixture of meanneſs on the one hand, and of envy and injuſtice on the other. But the more difficult ſuch a taſk appears, the more his excellency muſt ſhine, who was able to diſcharge it, and to diſcharge it with honour to himſelf, without wrong to others, and with duty and benefit to the King his maſter. Yet this, as the reader will plainly ſee, Sir Francis Bacon did, at a time when the death of the then Lord Chancellor was daily expected, and, conſequently, when he might aſpire to that high dignity, without any breach of the friendſhip with which he had been honoured by that worthy perſon. It is true, the libellers of thoſe times, or, which is the ſame thing in milder words, the writers of ſecret hiſtory, report matters otherwiſe (n); but for the honour of his memory, his letter written upon that occaſion yet remains, to ſet the thing in its true light (o) [Z]. But the Lord Chancellor recovering, his application did not at that time take effect; and therefore he betook himſelf to the duties of his

' did; and by their certificate it appeareth, that the ' precedents of that kind were many and preciſe in ' the point, and conſtant and in good times, and ' allowed many times by the Judges themſelves.

' That after this, his Majeſty received from the ' Lord Chancellor a caſe, whereby the queſtion was ' clearly ſet down, and contained within the proper ' bounds of the preſent doubt; being, whether upon ' apparent matter of equity, which the Judges by ' the law, by their place, and oath, cannot meddle ' with or relieve, if a judgment be once paſt at Common Law, the ſubject ſhall periſh, or the Chancery ' ſhall relieve him, and whether there be any ſtatute of ' Præmunire or other, to reſtrain this power in the ' Chancellor? Which caſe, upon the requeſt of the ' Lord Chancellor, his Majeſty likewiſe referred to ' his learned Counſel (and the Prince's Attorney, Mr. ' Walter, was joined with them), who, upon great advice, and view of the original records themſelves, ' certified, the Chancery was not reſtrained by any ' ſtatute in that caſe.

' That his Majeſty again required his learned Counſel to call up the Clerks of the King's-Bench to ' them, and to receive from them any precedents of ' indictments in the King's Bench againſt the Chancery, for proceeding in the like caſe; who produced ' only two precedents, being but indictments offered, ' or found, upon which there was no other proceeding; and the Clerks ſaid, they had uſed diligence ' and could find no more.

' That his Majeſty, after he had received this ' ſatisfaction, that there was ground for that the ' Chancery had done, and that the Chancery was not ' in fault, he thought then it was time to queſtion ' this miſdemeanour and contempt, in ſcandalizing ' and diſhonouring his juſtice in that High Court of ' Chancery, in ſo odious a manner, and commanded ' his Attorney-General, with the advice of the reſt of ' his learned Counſel, to proſecute the offenders in ' the Star-Chamber, which is done, and ſome of them ' are fled, and others ſtand out and will not anſwer.

' That there reſteth only one part more towards his ' Majeſty's complete information in this cauſe, which ' is, to examine that which was done in open Court ' the ſaid laſt day of Hillary term; and whether the ' Judges of the King's-Bench did commit any exceſs ' of authority, or did animate the offenders otherwiſe ' than according to their duty and place; which in' quiry, becauſe it concerneth the Judges of a Court ' (to keep order and decorum), his Majeſty thinketh ' not ſo convenient to uſe his learned Counſel therein, ' but will commit the ſame to ſome of the council ' table, and ſome of his learned Counſel to attend ' them.

' This declared, or what elſe his Majeſty in his own ' high wiſdom ſhall think good, it will be fit time to ' have the certificate of the learned Counſel openly ' read.'

[Z] His letter writ upon that occaſion yet remains, to ſet the thing in its true light.] The ſcope of this letter is fully ſhewn in the text, and ſo much thereof as is neceſſary to give the reader a true notion of Sir Francis Bacon's conduct in this particular, follows (68): ' I hope I may be acquitted of preſumption if I think of it, both becauſe my father had ' the place, which is ſome civil inducement to my ' deſire (and I pray God your Majeſty may have ' twenty no worſe years in your greatneſs, than Queen ' Elizabeth had in her model after my father's placing), and chiefly becauſe the Chancellor's place ' after it went to the Law, was ever conferred upon ' ſome of the learned Counſel, and never upon a ' Judge; for Audley was raiſed from a King's Serjeant, my father from Attorney of the Wards, ' Bromley from Solicitor, Puckering from Queen's ' Serjeant, Egerton from Maſter of the Rolls, having ' newly left the Attorney's place. Now I beſeech ' your Majeſty, let me put you the preſent caſe truly. ' If you take my Lord Coke this will follow, firſt, ' your Majeſty ſhall put an over-ruling nature into an ' over-ruling place, which may breed an extreme; ' next, you ſhall blunt his induſtry in matter of ' finances, which ſeemeth to aim at another place; ' and, laſtly, popular men are no ſure mounters for ' your Majeſty's ſaddle. If you take my Lord Hobart, you ſhall have a Judge at the upper end of ' your Council Board, and another at the lower end, ' whereby your Majeſty will find your prerogative ' pent; for though there ſhould be emulation between ' them, yet as Legiſts, they will agree in magnifying ' that wherein they are beſt. He is no ſtateſman, ' but an œconomiſt wholly for himſelf, ſo as your Majeſty (more than an outward form) will find little ' help in him for the buſineſs. If you take my Lord ' Canterbury, I will ſay no more; but the Chancellor's place requires a whole man, and to have both ' juriſ-

his office, and to ſuch other employments as were impoſed upon him by the King his maſter. Various indeed they were, and thereby ſpeak the vaſt extent of his abilities in civil life: for beſides ſettling the juriſdiction of Courts, and the nature of the King's prerogative, which were things ſome way incident to his office and profeſſion (p): we find him frequently conſulted in affairs of ſtate and of the revenue, more particularly in a great diſpute between the Merchant-Adventurers, or, as we find them commonly called, the Old Company, and another company of merchants, with one Alderman Cockaine at their head, who by promiſing great things to the King, and greater to the nation, had procured to themſelves powers, which they were not able to manage ſo advantageouſly, as either they expected, or was expected from them (q). We find him likewiſe deeply engaged in Iriſh affairs (r), and acting in both, not as a buſy and forward man, fond of thruſting himſelf into every thing, but as an active and diligent ſervant to his Prince, who thought nothing a burthen, nothing a hardſhip, which it was in his power to perform for the benefit of the ſtate, or as an inſtance of his gratitude to ſo good and kind a maſter. He likewiſe ſhewed himſelf exceedingly careful and ſolicitous, in whatever related to the preferments, honours, or fortunes of Sir George Villiers, to whom he profeſſed an early friendſhip, and for whom however, if we may judge from his letters, he did nothing officiouſly, but rendered him ſuch ſervices only, as fell properly in the way of the Attorney-General: ſuch as the preparing his warrants for patents, and for the grants of land, in which, if beſides the bare duties of his function, he gave him ſome marks of particular friendſhip; it ought rather to be attributed to his affection for his perſon, and his regard for one who had ſhewed great willingneſs to ſerve him, than to a ſervile ſpirit and mean adulation of power, ſince he had never ſhewn any thing of that ſort with reſpect to Somerſet, who had enjoyed a much greater meaſure of power, than Sir George Villiers had hitherto done (s). The laſt act of Sir Francis Bacon, as Attorney-General, was of the ſame nature with the firſt, by which I mean, his proſecuting Mr. Markham in the Star-Chamber, for ſending a challenge to Lord Darcy, wherein he gained great reputation (t). So that in the courſe of upwards of three years, in which he held the poſt of Attorney General, which, as an able writer has obſerved, proves often a rock on which the greateſt lawyers ſplit; he behaved himſelf with ſuch prudence and moderation, and went through ſo many difficult and perplexed affairs, with ſuch evenneſs and integrity, that, for any thing appears, his conduct was never called in queſtion, nor has malice itſelf dared to utter of him the leaſt reproach (u). When this is conſidered, we need the leſs wonder at his ſo confidently expecting the high employment to which he was raiſed. It was a very natural elevation from the poſt he was then in; the good old Lord Chancellor deſired to have him for his ſucceſſor, and indeed there was no man of the profeſſion ſo fit for it at that time as himſelf. The manner in which it was done was every way great and gracious; for the Lord Viſcount Brackley, then Lord Chancellor, being worn out with age and infirmities, on the third of March, 1616-17, at a viſit which the King paid him, reſigned the Seals into his Majeſty's hands, whoſe tenderneſs at parting with ſo ancient and faithful a ſervant, made him ſhed tears (w).

Upon the ſeventh of the ſame month, the King delivered the Great Seal to Sir Francis Bacon, then in the fifty-ſeventh year of his age, with the title of Lord-Keeper, giving him at the ſame time theſe three cautions; firſt, That he ſhould not ſeal any thing but after mature deliberation. Secondly, That he ſhould give righteous judgments between parties. And, laſtly, That he ſhould not extend the royal prerogative too far. Theſe wiſe and grave admonitions were highly worthy of a good Prince; and happy had it been for the new Lord-Keeper, if they had been as conſtantly remembered, as they were graciouſly given and ſubmiſſively received (x). He went afterwards to viſit the late Lord Chancellor, as well to acquit himſelf of the debt of perſonal gratitude, which he owed to that worthy perſon, as to acquaint him with his maſter's gracious intentions, which were to give him the title of an Earl, with a penſion

'juriſdictions, ſpiritual and temporal, in that height, 'is fit but for a King. For myſelf I can only preſent 'your Majeſty with gloria in obſequio, yet I dare 'promiſe, that if I ſit in that place, your buſineſs 'ſhall not make ſuch ſhort turns upon you as it 'doth; but when a direction is once given, it ſhall 'be purſued and performed; and your Majeſty ſhall 'only be troubled with the true care of a King, 'which is, to think what you would have done in 'chief, and not how for the paſſages. I do preſume 'alſo, in reſpect of my father's memory, and that 'I have been always gracious in the Lower Houſe; 'I have intereſt in the gentry of England, and ſhall 'be able to do ſome good effect in rectifying that 'body of Parliament-men which is cardo rerum; for 'let me tell your Majeſty, that that part of the 'Chancellor's place, which is to judge in equity be-'tween party and party, that ſame regnum judiciale, '(which ſince my father's time is but too much 'enlarged), concerneth your Majeſty leaſt, more than 'the acquitting of your conſcience for juſtice: but 'it is the other parts of a moderator amongſt your 'Counſel, of an overſeer over your Judges, of a 'planter of fit juſtices and governors in the country, 'that importeth your affairs, and theſe times moſt. To 'conclude; if I were the man I would be, I ſhould 'hope, that as your Majeſty hath of late won hearts 'by depreſſing, you ſhould in this loſe no hearts by 'advancing, for I ſee your people can better ſkill of 'concretum than abſtractum, and that the waves of 'their affections flow rather after perſons than things, 'ſo that acts of this nature (if this were one) do more 'good than twenty bills of grace.'

for life, which though he did not ſurvive long enough to receive, yet they were made good to his ſon, who was created Earl of Bridgewater, by the firſt patent to which the new Lord-Keeper affixed the ſeal (y). Within eight days after Sir Francis Bacon was raiſed to this high honour, the King ſet out for Scotland, notwithſtanding his favourite, lately created Earl of Bucks, had oppoſed that journey as far as he durſt. By this means the Lord-Keeper was placed at the head of the Council, and intruſted with the management of public affairs in the King's abſence, which, if it proved an acceſſion of honour, proved alſo a ſource of much envy and malice. He was ſucceeded as Attorney-General, by Sir Henry Yelverton, who was replaced as Solicitor-General, by Sir Thomas Coventry. How much ſoever Sir Francis Bacon might gain in dignity by this promotion, it ſeems very doubtful whether he gained any thing in point of profit, ſince he quitted three very gainful offices, Firſt, that of Attorney-General, which, as he told the King himſelf, was worth to him ſix thouſand pounds a year (z); next, that of Chancellor to the Prince, which he likewiſe mentions in one of his letters (a); and, laſtly, his poſt of Regiſter of the Court of Star-Chamber. What the profits were of his new office is uncertain, but the fees granted him by patent were not large, being no more than five hundred forty-two pounds fifteen ſhillings a year, as Lord Keeper, three hundred pounds a year for his attendance in the Star-Chamber, threeſcore pounds a year for wine, and ſixteen pounds a year for wax (b). On the ſeventh of May following, which was the firſt day of the term, he went to Weſtminſter in great ſtate, and there took poſſeſſion of his high office, being attended by many of the nobility, and other perſons of diſtinction. Upon this occaſion he did, what, whether it was uſual or not, was certainly very decent and becoming, that is to ſay, he made a long and large ſpeech, of the nature and duty of his office, of what might be expected from him in it, and of the manner in which he meant to diſcharge it. In the opening of this ſpeech he took notice of the cautions given him by the King, which, however, he enlarged, and ſo made them the groundwork of his copious oration, which has been always eſteemed one of the fineſt in our language; and, which perhaps is no leſs for his honour, has been moſt eſteemed by thoſe, who from their learning in the profeſſion underſtood it beſt (c). In this ſpeech he laid down rules for his own conduct, for the conduct of the ſuitors to the Court, and the gentlemen at the bar. At this diſtance of time we cannot ſay what effect it had; but in all probability it muſt have raiſed his reputation very high, and himſelf tells us, that it reflected no ſmall honour on the King (d). He very ſoon experienced the truth of that ſolid obſervation, That the higheſt ſeats are the moſt expoſed: for within a little time after the King's ſetting out for Scotland, the Spaniſh match, was, by direction of his Majeſty, brought upon the carpet, and his Lordſhip had too much wiſdom and penetration, not to perceive the many and great difficulties, with which it was likely to be attended, which he hinted to the King in a letter, wherein he very prudently and honeſtly adviſed his Majeſty not to proceed therein, but with an united Council, expreſſing at the ſame time his juſt ſenſe of the misfortunes that had already attended, in various inſtances, diſcordancy of opinions. As that buſineſs proceeded, his diſlike increaſed; yet he did not declare himſelf openly againſt it, but contented himſelf with ſuch inſinuations, as he thought might have reſtrained and diſcountenanced it (e). In other affairs of no ſmall conſequence, he behaved as circumſtances required, with the gravity of a great officer of State, or with the freedom of an accompliſhed gentleman. Thus, in his ſet ſpeech to the Judges before the ſummer circuit, in 1617, and in his ſeveral ſpeeches to ſuch as were ſworn before him into offices of high truſt, he conducted himſelf with all imaginable gravity: but to qualify this, he ſoon after invited all the Judges to dinner, and in a friendly converſation ſatisfied them, that he had no intention to extend the power of the Court of Chancery beyond its ordinary limits, to the prejudice of other Courts; and therefore deſired them, in caſe they were at any time diſſatisfied with his proceedings, to acquaint him therewith, adding, that he made no doubt of their adjuſting things to their mutual ſatisfaction (f). He recommended to them likewiſe, their bringing him reports of their ſeveral circuits, that according to his command they might be certified to his Majeſty (g). In all other reſpects he was equally cautious and methodical, tranſmitting from time to time, clear and diſtinct accounts of whatever paſſed of any moment to the Earl of Buckingham, who wrote to him alſo in a very reſpectful ſtile, expreſſing not only his own admiration of his great parts and prudent conduct, but likewiſe the commendations given of them by the King (h); which makes it very improbable, that ever this favourite pretended to treat the Lord-Keeper in the manner which ſome pens have repreſented [AA]. But however, it muſt be allowed, that long after this, Sir Francis Bacon fell into ſome kind [AA] In the manner ſome pens have repreſented.] There is perhaps no country in the world in which exalted fortune does not beget envy; but at the ſame time, I believe, it may be truly ſaid that kind of envy riſes no where higher, or manifeſts itſelf with more violence and bitterneſs than with us in England. The Lord Keeper Bacon felt this very ſeverely; for no ſooner was he advanced to this high point of preferment in his profeſſion, than all tongues were opened againſt him, that either from intereſt or inclination wiſhed to have ſeen ſome other perſon ſeated in that high poſt. He was very ſenſible of this, and ſought by all poſſible means to guard againſt it, endeavouring always to conduct buſineſs ſuavibus modis, kind of disgrace, both with the King and the favourite; and this about a family concern of Buckingham's, which, to say the truth, shews a most shameful weakness in that government, as his own expression is, by the softest and gentlest methods, that to his utmost he might avoid giving provocations; which however had not altogether the force that might have been expected. For this there may be many reasons assigned; but I shall mention only a few. He was on bad terms with all Somerset's party, which was numerous and powerful; he was an opponent to the famous Sir Edward Coke, who had a great train of admirers and dependants; he was a constant friend to Buckingham, which drew upon him the ill will of such as hated that haughty favourite; and besides all this, he provoked many of that great man's dependants by stopping their grants at the Seal. However, very little evil was publicly divulged of him during his life-time, when it might have afforded room for apology or defence, but has discovered itself in libels, penned indeed by such as lived in his days, but not such as were most likely to be well acquainted with him, or the points of which they so confidently wrote. Sir Anthony Weldon, in his Court and Character of King James asserts, 'That Buckingham, to vex the very soul of Lord 'Chancellor Egerton in the last agony, sent Bacon to 'him for the seals; and that the dying Chancellor 'hated that Bacon should be his successor, and that 'the old man's spirit could not brook this, but sent 'the seals by his own servant to the King, and 'shortly after yielded up his soul to his Maker (69).' But this account contains two egregious falsities: for in the first place, though, as we have seen in the text, Camden says, the Chancellor resigned to the King himself; other authors agree, that it was the King sent for the seals, and not the Duke of Buckingham; and he sent for them, not by Sir Francis Bacon, but by Secretary Winwood, with this message, that himself would be his under-keeper, and not dispose of them while he lived to bear the name of Chancellor; nor did any person remove the seal out of the King's sight till the Lord Egerton died, which happened soon after (70). In the next place, the Lord Chancellor Egerton, as Dr. Tenison observes, was willing that the Attorney-General, Bacon, should be his successor, and ready to promote it: so far was he from conceiving any hatred against him either upon that or any other account. He had been a friend to Sir Francis Bacon even in the Queen's time, as appears from a letter of the latter to him, mentioned by Dr. Tenison, and this favour of his continued to the last (71): For Sir Francis Bacon writes as follows in a letter to Sir George Villiers, dated the 15th of February 1615 (72): 'My Lord 'Chancellor told me himself yesterday in plain terms, 'that if the King would ask his opinion, touching the 'person that he would commend to succeed him upon 'death or disability, he would name me for the fittest 'man. You may advise whether use may not be 'made of this offer.' And in a letter to King James dated January 29, 1614, he wrote as follows: 'It 'pleased the Lord Chancellor out of his antient and 'great love to me (which many times in sickness 'appeared most) to admit me to a great deal of freedom 'of speech with him this afternoon, which during these 'three days he hath scarce done to any (73).' Sir Anthony Weldon reproaches my Lord Bacon, as a very necessitous man, and one for that reason made Keeper by the Duke of Buckingham, to serve such turns as men of better fortunes would never condescend to. But this is a mere groundless and malicious insinuation: for he had enjoyed for a long time many profitable places, which preserved him from indigence; though, as Dr. Tenison observes, his great mind did not permit him to swell his purse by them to any extraordinary height; and in the Queen's time when he was in meaner circumstances, he did not look upon himself as in that estate of necessity, which tempteth generous minds to vile things. But let us hear himself in the letter to the Lord Chancellor Egerton, quoted by Dr. Tenison (74), 'My estate, says he, I confess a 'truth to your Lordship, is weak and indebted and in 'need of comfort; for both my father (though I think 'I had greatest part in his love of all his children) 'in his wisdom served me in as last comer, and myself 'in mine own industry, have rather referred and 'aspired to virtue than to gain, whereof yet I am 'not wise enough to repent me. But the while, 'whereas Solomon speaketh, that want cometh 'first as a wayfaring man, and after as an armed 'man, I must acknowledge myself to be in primo 'gradu, for it stealeth upon me; but for the second, 'that it should not be resisted, I hope in God I am 'not in that case; for the preventing whereof as I 'do depend upon God's providence all in all, so in 'the same his providence, I see opened unto me three 'not unlikely expectations of help; the one, my prac-'tice; the other, some proceeding in the Queen's 'service; the third, the place I have in reversion, 'which as it now standeth unto me, is but like ano-'ther man's ground butalling upon my house, which 'may mend my prospect, but it doth not fill my 'barn.' However, it must be owned, that the Earl of Buckingham was very instrumental in the Lord Keeper's preferment, which he acknowledged in his letter, written the same day that the Seals were presented to him; and surely, says Mr. Stephens (75), fewer lines did never contain a greater sense of gratitude, or expressed it in a more becoming manner, though by the original they seemed to have been hastily written, and may serve to confirm what had been told me, by one who lived in his latter times, that his first copies required no great labour to render them competent for the nicest judgments; it is as follows: 'It is both in care and business, that small ones float 'upon the tongue, and great ones sink down into the 'heart in silence; therefore I could speak little to 'your Lordship to-day, neither had I fit time, but 'I must profess thus much, that in this day's work 'you are the truest and perfectest mirrour and example 'of firm and generous friendship that ever was in 'court, and I shall count every day lost wherein I 'shall not either study your well doing in thought, 'or do your name honour in speech, or perform you 'service indeed.' In the same volume we have likewise his speech at the taking his place in Chancery, in performance of the charge his Majesty had given him, when he received the Seals in 1617. Sir Anthony Weldon has upon this occasion introduced another scandalous story with regard to Sir Francis Bacon, and tells us (76), that this great favourite (Buckingham) sent a noble gentleman and of much worth to him with this message, That he knew him to be a man of excellent parts, and as the times were, fit to serve his master in the Keeper's place, but he also knew him of a base and ungrateful disposition, and an errant knave, apt in his prosperity to ruin any that had raised him in his adversity; yet for all this, he did so much study his master's service, knowing how fit an instrument he might be for him, that he had obtained the Seals for him, but with this assurance, should he ever requite him as he had done some others to whom he had been bound, he would cast him down as much below scorn, as he had now raised him high above any honour he could ever have expected. Bacon, continues that author, was at that time Attorney-General, who patiently hearing this message, replied, I am glad my noble Lord deals so friendly and freely with me, and hath made choice of so discreet and noble a friend, that hath delivered his message in so plain language. But, says he, can my Lord know these abilities in me, and can he think when I have attained the highest preferment my profession is capable of, I shall so much fail in my judgment and understanding as to lose these abilities, and by my miscarriage to so noble a patron, cast myself headlong from the top of that honour to the very bottom of contempt and scorn. Surely my Lord cannot think so meanly of me. The gentleman replied, I deliver nothing from myself, but the words are put into my mouth by his Lordship, to which I neither add nor diminish; for had it been left to my discretion, surely, though I might have given you the substance, yet I should have apparelled it in a more modest attire; but as I have faithfully delivered my Lord's to you, so will I as faithfully deliver your's to his Lordship. You must understand, continues Sir A. Weldon, the reason of this message was his ungratefulness to the Earl of Essex, which every one could remember, for the Earl saved him from starving, and he requited him so as his apology must witness: were there not a great fault there needed no apology, nor could government, as it very plainly proves, that the private concerns of a particular perſon, were grown to be of as great conſequence as matters of State (i). The caſe then, to ſtate it in as few words as poſſible, was this: Sir Edward Coke had formerly rejected, with ſome marks of contempt and diſdain, a marriage that had been propoſed between Buckingham's elder brother, Sir John Villiers, and one of Sir Edward's daughters, by Lady Hatton: but now finding the power of this family ſo great, and being deſirous of coming again into favour, he applied himſelf to Secretary Winwood, and with great profeſſions of ſorrow for having offended the King, and of not being able to live if he was not reſtored to his good graces, he offered to do any thing that was required from him, and particularly to conſent to this marriage (k). As ſoon as the Lord-Keeper was informed of this, he wrote very freely and fully both to Buckingham, and to the King, againſt the marriage, which however, had not the deſired effect, but, on the contrary, drew upon him the diſpleaſure of the favourite and his maſter. It muſt likewiſe be acknowledged, as indeed it appears clearly by his letters, that the Lord-Keeper was chiefly moved to this oppoſition, from his apprehenſion of its bringing Sir Edward Coke again into favour, and there is no denying that this was a great meanneſs in him, and very unbecoming a perſon of his great abilities, as well as one in his high ſtation (l). But after all, this proves no more, than that even the greateſt men have their weakneſſes, and that the corruptions of Courts are capable of tainting the moſt noble minds. On the King's return from Scotland, which was in the beginning of the month of September 1617, the Lord-Keeper and ſome other members of the Council, were reprimanded for the concern they had in this affair: but it does not appear, that it went ſo far as to create a breach between his Lordſhip and the Earl of Buckingham; and indeed, conſidering all things, one can ſee no juſt ground why it ſhould, ſince, in the courſe of the whole diſpute, it very plainly appears, that it was not from any coldneſs or diſtaſte that his Lordſhip had taken, but rather from the exceſs of his fidelity and affection to Buckingham, that he had intereſted himſelf ſo much in this matter; and therefore, when the Earl had maturely conſidered it, he, of his own accord, thought proper to mitigate his Majeſty's diſpleaſure againſt the Lord-Keeper, and very ſoon procured, that is, within a fortnight after the King's return, a thorough reconciliation, for which the Lord-Keeper wrote Buckingham a letter of thanks, conceived in the ſtrongeſt terms poſſible (m). Towards the cloſe of the month, the marriage which had raiſed all thoſe diſputes, was ſolemnized, in conſequence of which, Sir Edward Coke was recalled to the Council table; yet it was not long that he continued in favour; for his great friend Secretary Winwood dying, things ſoon ran again into their old channel, and therefore the ſtories we meet with in ſome writers of thoſe times, may well be accounted, rather inſtances of Court malice, then repreſentations of any real facts (n) [BB]. This ſtorm once over, the Lord Keeper returned to his former province, of ſuperintending the King's affairs in general and could any age, but a worthleſs and corrupt in men and manners, have thought him worthy of a ſuch place of honour. Very hard language this of a man ſo eminent and well known, and this from a perſon of no character at all, or, which is worſe, of a very bad one. At preſent it ſhall ſuffice that we obſerve, there is not the leaſt degree of probability in the ſtory which he relates, at the ſame time that he pretends not to the leaſt ſhadow of evidence; ſo that we are to take a fact, which would ſcarcely deſerve credit, though ſupported by ever ſo good witneſſes, without any witneſs at all, and this againſt the light of one's own reaſon, and of a multitde of facts which may be alledged to diſcredit it: for whereas this is made to have been a ſudden promotion, in conſequence of a bargain with Buckingham, we have ſeen that it was ſo far from being ſuch a promotion, that it was long before in agitation with the King himſelf, upon whom it is evident enough Sir Francis Bacon chiefly depended. This ſtory makes Buckingham, even before he had acquired that title, an inſolent and overbearing favourite, which is directly contrary to what all the hiſtorians of thoſe times ſay, who commend him for his affability and generoſity at the beginning, by which, as he roſe in the King's favour, he grew likewiſe in eſteem with his ſubjects, purſuing therein a conduct very different from that of his predeceſſor, Somerſet, who really raiſed and diſgraced, brought into credit or drove out of the court, without the leaſt regard to decency, men of great merit or men of none, juſt as his intereſt required or his fancy dictated. It is not therefore at all probable, that the new favourite, who ſo well knew by what ſteps the old one became ſo very odious, ſhould immediately purſue his path; more eſpecially when he could not but very well know, that he was far enough from being abſolutely maſter of the King's good graces, out of which he had very near thrown himſelf a very little after this, by moſt imprudently diſcovering his averſion to the King's intended journey into Scotland.

[BB] Inſtances of Court malice than repreſentations of any real facts.] We have in the former note given the reader a ſpecimen of Sir A. Weldon's malice to Sir Francis Bacon, and of his ſmall regard for truth: in this we are obliged again to quote him, and quote him for the very ſame reaſon. He was informed of the quarrel between the Lord Keeper and Buckingham, while the latter attended his Majeſty in Scotland, and he could not but ſee, that, during his Majeſty's abſence, the Lord Keeper Bacon had the chief direction of affairs, which in ſome meaſure he loſt, while this quarrel ſubſiſted. Now let us hear the whole of this ſtory in his own language: 'Now was Bacon, ſays he, inveſted in this 'office, and within ten days after the King goes to 'Scotland. Bacon inſtantly begins to believe him'ſelf King, lies in the King's lodgings, gives au'dience in the great banquetting-houſe, makes all 'other counſellors attend his motions with the ſame 'ſtate the King uſed to come out to give audience to 'ambaſſadors: when any other Counſellors ſat with 'him about the King's affairs, would (if they ſat 'near him) bid them know their diſtance, upon 'which, Winwood, then Secretary, roſe, went a'way, and would never ſit more, but inſtantly diſ'patched one to the King, to deſire him to make 'haſte back, for his ſeat was already uſurped. At 'which, I remember, the King reading it to us, both 'the King and we were very merry; and if Buck'ingham had ſent him any letter, would not vouch'ſafe opening it, or reading in public, though it 'was ſaid it required ſpeedy diſpatch, nor would 'vouchſafe him any anſwer. In this poſture he lived 'until he heard the King was returning, and began 'to and more particularly the bringing the expence of the King's government, now called the Civil Liſt, into ſuch a compaſs, as that it might not exceed his ordinary revenue (o). We have many of the Lord-Keeper's letters on this and on other ſubjects of importance, both to the King himſelf and to Buckingham, in which there is nothing diſcovered of a ſupple cringing or low ſpirit, but quite the contrary; for he often ſtopped at the ſeal, patents and grants obtained by the intereſt of the favourite, and gives him his reaſons in very free and clear terms, which moſt evidently ſhews, that he was not of ſuch a ſervile temper, as his enemies have repreſented him (p); and though he muſt have been exceedingly occupied, by that prodigious variety of buſineſs which paſſed through his hands, yet, even at this time, we have a remarkable inſtance of his concern for the public, expreſſed in the care he took to procure a patent, which was inrolled in Chancery, for conſtituting two Reporters in the courts of Weſtminſter-Hall, with a fee of one hundred pounds per annum to each, which, how little fruit ſoever it may have brought forth, was certainly a thing well deſigned, and which might have proved highly advantageous, as well to the nation in general, as to the profeſſion of the Law in particular (q). Towards the end of this year, which had been ſo fruitful of extraordinary events to his Lordſhip, he was in ſome little danger of loſing his life. This fell out from the paſſion of an angry man, againſt whom he had made a decree in Chancery, viz. Gervaſe Lord Clifton, who publickly declared, that he was very ſorry he had not ſtabbed the Lord-Keeper in his chair, at the time he pronounced the decree (r). He was for this offence committed cloſe priſoner to the Tower of London, and the thing made the more noiſe, becauſe, but the year before, one Sir John Tyndal, a Maſter in Chancery, had been actually ſhot by one Mr. Bertram, a man of conſiderable fortune and very fair character, and this for making a report againſt him, that was perfectly agreeable to juſtice. There is ſeveral times mention made of this affair of Lord Clifton's, in the Lord-Keeper's letters, from which it is eaſy enough to diſcern, that though his Lordſhip profeſſes, that he neither hated him for what was paſt, nor feared what might happen from him in time to come, yet he did not care that he ſhould be enlarged ſuddenly, and without ſuch notice taken of him, as the nature of his crime deſerved (s). There is no certainty, though there may be a probability, that a proſecution was commenced againſt this angry Lord in the Star-Chamber: but however it was, to ſecure himſelf from the effects of thoſe misfortunes drawn on by his own ill conduct, he laid violent hands upon himſelf the next year, which ſhews how great danger the Lord-Keeper was in, from the reſentment of a perſon of ſuch ſtrong paſſions (t). In the very entrance of the ſucceeding year 1618, viz. on the fourth of January, Sir Francis Bacon had the title given him of Lord High Chancellor of England (u), which ſhews how effectually he had got over that coldneſs, which aroſe about the marriage beforementioned, and as to which it began already to appear, that he had formed a much better, or at leaſt a truer, judgment, than thoſe who had promoted it; and about the ſame time his friend the Earl of Buckingham was raiſed to the degree of a Marquis (w), by the ſame title; and, if we may judge

'to believe the play was almoſt at an end: he might 'perſonate a King's part no longer, and therefore did 'again re-inveſt himſelf with his old rags of baſeneſs, 'which were ſo tattered and poor at the King's coming to Windſor; that he attended two days in Buckingham's anti-chamber, being not admitted to any 'better place than the room where trencher ſcrapers 'and lacquies attended: there ſitting upon an old 'wooden cheſt (among ſuch as for his baſeneſs were 'only fit for his companions, although the honour 'of his place did merit far more reſpect) with his 'purſe and ſeal lying by him on that cheſt, myſelf 'told a ſervant of my Lord Buckingham's, it was a 'ſhame to ſee the purſe and ſeal of ſo little value 'or eſteem in his chamber, though the carrier without it merited nothing but ſcorn, being worſt 'among the baſeſt; he told me they had command 'it muſt be ſo. After two days he had admittance, at 'firſt entrance fell down flat on his face at the Duke's 'foot, kiſſing it, vowing never to riſe till he had 'his pardon; then was he again reconciled, and ſince 'that time ſo very a ſlave to the Duke, and all that 'family, that he durſt not deny the command of the 'meaneſt of the kindred, nor oppoſe any thing: by 'this you ſee, a baſe ſpirit is ever moſt concomitant 'with the proudeſt mind, and ſurely, never ſo many 'parts, and ſo baſe an abject ſpirit, tenanted together 'in any one earthen cottage, as in this one man (78).'

The very manner in which this libel is delivered, ſufficiently deſtroys its credit. The facts contained therein are ſo unlikely and improbable, that there ſeems to be no occaſion for refuting them; yet as they have been very unaccountably tranſcribed as well atteſted truths by ſome writers, I think it may not be amiſs, to ſhew how little appearance of truth there is in them. There are ſtill remaining abundance of Lord Bacon's letters to Buckingham, and many of his anſwers, not one of which bears any mark of meanneſs on the one ſide, or of haughtineſs on the other, but rather, I think, quite the contrary (79). It is indeed true, that the author of this book attended King James in his journey to Scotland, as one of the Clerks of the Green-Cloth; but it is not very probable that the King ſhould read the Secretary of State's letter in abuſe of the Lord Keeper, either to, or in the preſence of ſuch a Clerk. It was this man's misfortune to be diſgraced in this journey, and that for writing a libel on the people of Scotland, while they were endeavouring to outdo one another in careſſing the King's Engliſh ſervants, for which he was turned out, as a man unfit to be in the King's family, but had a ſum of money given him, and a ſmall penſion for life, which he gratefully returned by writing this book. This makes it improbable that he ſhould be ſo intimate at Buckingham's, as he pretends to be on the King's return (80). He contradicts himſelf alſo in this account, for in another part of his book, he ſays, that Buckingham behaved modeſtly ſo long as his brother Purbeck was about him; and it appears plainly, that this brother of his, then Sir John Villiers, was in greater credit with him then, than at any time afterwards (81). Add to all this, the unlikelineſs, that, after ſuch treatment, the Lord Keeper ſhould in three months time be made Lord Chancellor, by the intereſt of that very perſon, who, according to this account, had offered him ſuch an inſult as could not well be forgiven, or at leaſt, forgot on either ſide; and that no other perſon except this obſcure man, ever mentions any circumſtance that agrees with, or affords the leaſt credit to, this wild and improbable ſtory.

judge from their letters, their friendſhip at this time was as cordial as ever. Yet the Chancellor ſtill continued to uſe the ſame freedom as formerly, with reſpect to grants and patents which came recommended by the favourite, ſeveral of which he ſtopped at the Seal, and on ſignifying his reaſons to the Marquis of Buckingham, he was ſo far from reſenting any thing in the Chancellor's conduct, or expreſſing himſelf with any loftineſs upon ſuch occaſions, that, on the contrary, he thanked his Lordſhip by letter, telling him expreſsly, that he deſired nothing ſhould paſs the Seal at his inſtance or requeſt, but what was juſt and convenient (x). As the new year entered with an Act of Advancement, ſo the ſpring afforded frequent opportunities to the Chancellor, to ingratiate himſelf with his maſter by free and honourable counſels, which inclined his Majeſty to confer ſtill higher marks of his favour, and accordingly by letters patents dated at Wanſtead the eleventh of July 1618, Sir Francis Bacon was created Baron of Verulam in the county of Hertford; and in the preamble to thoſe letters it is recited, that his Majeſty was moved thereto, by the grateful ſenſe of the many and faithful ſervices rendered him by this worthy perſon, as well in the Court of Chancery, as in the Privy-Council, and elſewhere; and the witneſſes to the aforeſaid letters, are Charles Prince of Wales, the Duke of Lenox, the Marquis of Buckingham, Marquis Hamilton, the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, and others of the prime nobility (y). This new honour excited his Lordſhip to new ſervices, and it appears from his own writings, that he was very attentive to every thing that might conduce, either to the immediate benefit of his Majeſty, or to the general good of his ſubjects. He has indeed been cenſured for giving ſome oppoſition to the charity of Mr. Alleyne the Player; but it is very evident, that his Lordſhip meant no more therein, than to prevent an extravagant increaſe of licences in Mortmain, agreeable to the ſentiments he had expreſſed while Solicitor-General, on account of the foundation of Sutton's Hoſpital; and as at this diſtance of time, we have an opportunity of comparing his advice with the events that have followed, there ſeems but little room to take offence, either at his Lordſhip's opinions or proceedings (z) [CC]. The next affair of great moment, in which his Lordſhip had a particular concern, was the proſecution of the Dutch merchants, for tranſporting abroad vaſt quantities of gold and ſilver, in money, plate, and bullion, in which his Lordſhip proceeded with great caution, and due reſpect to juſtice. The firſt ſtep taken in it, was the Attorney-General's applying to the Chancellor, on the nineteenth of October 1618, for writs of Ne exeant Regnum, againſt ſeveral of thoſe merchants, on a ſuggeſtion of their offending in this matter; upon which he immediately wrote to the Marquis of Buckingham, expreſſing an

[CC] Little room to take offence, either at his Lordſhip's opinions or proceedings.] This imputation of his having no great affection to charitable foundations, is a very high reflection on his memory; and, though in itſelf very groundleſs, has been maintained with great warmth by many well meaning people, from unreaſonable prejudices, and for want of due information. When he was Solicitor-General, he oppoſed the erecting that hoſpital which is now called the Charter-houſe, purſuant to the will of Mr. Sutton the founder, and this in two capacities; firſt, in that of his profeſſion, for he was of counſel with Simon Baxter, nephew to Mr. Sutton, who claimed his eſtate as heir at law, together with Mr. Walter and Mr. Yelverton, afterwards Attorney-General and a Judge. Secondly, as Solicitor-General, he adviſed the King, in caſe the heir at law failed in his ſuit, to improve this charity of Sutton's, which he thought was but crudely digeſted, and therefore he compares it to a ſacrifice without ſalt. The defects he apprehended were, that by degrees this deſign might be corrupted, and ſuch perſons placed therein as poor, as the owner never intended; that the maſter would grow into a place of great profit, and be conſidered rather as a good preferment, than as the head and director of a charity; that the great revenue aſſigned by the founder, of near ſix thouſand pounds a year, would in the end make a few people rich, inſtead of affording a comfortable maintenance to many. In his diſcourſe upon this ſubject, as indeed in his diſcourſes upon all ſubjects, there are many curious and uncommon remarks, which, to an unbiaſſed reader, will fully prove, that he oppoſed this charitable foundation, from no other principle than that of an extenſive charity (82). Yet a certain writer has been pleaſed to aſſign three very unworthy motives for his behaviour on this occaſion: The firſt is, the comfortable expectation of a great ſhare of the revenues (83). But how could this be, ſince, as a Lawyer, he contended for the right of the heir at law, which would have veſted Sutton's eſtate in him; and in his advice to King James, he recommends three things; firſt, the erecting a college of controverſy againſt the Papiſts; ſecondly, an hoſpital for converts to the Proteſtant religion; and thirdly, the maintaining itinerant preachers in ſuch parts of the King's dominions as were infected with Popery. I ſhould be glad to know in which of theſe he would have placed himſelf. The ſecond motive to this oppoſition is ſaid to be, becauſe he was not named by Sutton, as one of the truſtees for the foundation (84); which very reflection was ſuggeſted by Mr. Laws, the executor, about the time of the trial. A reflection it is very juſtly called, for it could never be proved, and therefore cannot be anſwered; but one may have leave to ſuggeſt, that if he had really had a mind to have had a hand in the direction of this charity, he might very eaſily have ſucceeded, by employing his pen and his intereſt in the ſupport of it. The laſt motive for his oppoſition is ſaid to have been, that he and Sir Edward Coke could never agree, and therefore no wonder if they differed in this affair. I ſhould be glad to know what can be inferred from this difference. Was Sir Edward Coke a man always in the right, ſo that whoever differed from him muſt be neceſſarily in the wrong? Or can it be ſuppoſed, that Sir Francis Bacon, who was ſo wiſe a man, ſhould act ſo unpopular a part, as to oppoſe this charity merely becauſe Sir Edward Coke eſpouſed it? The reaſons himſelf aſſigned for his conduct very evidently prove the contrary, in as much as they have been judged very ſtrong, and very well grounded by men of the beſt underſtandings in ſucceeding times. As to the caſe of Alleyne the Player, he meant not to hurt or to oppoſe his charity, but to reſtrain it from eight hundred pounds a year to five, to make way for a grant of three hundred pounds a year to the two univerſities, which he judged might be of greater uſe to the public. The reader may inform himſelf farther upon this ſubject, by peruſing the letter itſelf, with ſome remarks upon it already inſerted in a foregoing article (85). Upon the whole, it may be juſtly affirmed, that if no other part of his conduct had been more liable to exception than this, few men's characters would have been more unſpotted.

unwillingneſs to grant thoſe writs in prejudice of the merchants, without being acquainted with evidence, and at the ſame time gave theſe ſalutary cautions; That his Majeſty would not grant to Sir Thomas Vavaſor, or Sir John Brittaine, the forfeitures accruing from this diſcovery, but rather reward them at diſcretion; and next, that his Majeſty would grant a commiſſion to his Lordſhip, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Edward Coke, and the Lord Chief-Juſtice of England, for examining into, and conducting this affair to his Majeſty's profit (a). Theſe notices were both kindly received, and readily complied with, by his royal Maſter; and the conſequences were, that the Attorney-General filed informations againſt one hundred and fourſcore of theſe merchants; but at firſt proceeded to trial againſt twenty only, of the richeſt and moſt remarkable, who were convicted and fined to the amount of one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds. Some time after, ſeveral more of theſe merchants were likewiſe brought to trial, and fined; the reſt of the proſecutions being ſtayed at the inſtance of Buckingham, who was moved thereto by letters from the States-General; and the ſeverity of the fines was afterwards mitigated to a third part, by the interceſſion of Sir Noel Caron, then Miniſter here from the republic of the United Provinces (b). While this buſineſs was depending, there fell out another affair, in which the Lord Chancellor had a pretty large concern, of which we ſhould have been able to give a better account, if all the letters written by the Lord Verulam about this matter had been preſerved. It was, in ſhort, this: Thomas Howard, Earl of Suffolk, Lord High-Treaſurer, being removed from this high employment upon a ſuſpicion of corruption, a commiſſion was granted for enquiring into his conduct, and upon the report of theſe Commiſſioners, there was a proſecution commenced againſt him in the Star-Chamber (c). If we may credit the writers of thoſe times, his Lordſhip was an honeſt, open-hearted man, but had a cunning, rapacious, and buſy wife, who by the help of one Sir John Bingley, an under officer to his Lordſhip, had driven ſeveral ſcandalous bargains, which brought the Earl under this proſecution, carried on with a great deal of rigour, and brought to a hearing on the nineteenth of November, 1619 (d). In pronouncing the judgment of the Court, Sir Edward Coke led the way, and having ſhewn his learning, by running through the proſecutions againſt Treaſurers in paſt times, for like offences, concluded for a fine of one hundred thouſand pounds, the impriſonment of the Earl and Counteſs in the Tower, and a fine of five thouſand pounds on Sir John Bingley, and commitment to the Fleet; the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Secretary Sir Robert Naunton, concurred with him in this judgment: but the Lord Chief-Juſtice Hobart thought this rather a ranſom than a fine, and therefore declared for thirty thouſand pounds on the Earl, and two thouſand on Sir John Bingley, with whom the reſt of the Court concurred (e). The Earl and Counteſs were both for ſome time committed to the Tower; but by the interpoſition of the Marquis of Buckingham were ſet at liberty, and the fine reduced to ſeven thouſand pounds, which was paid (f). It appears from the letters of the Lord Verulam that are ſtill remaining, that he was very aſſiduous in this buſineſs, that he had a principal hand in detecting the frauds and corruptions practiſed in the Treaſury, and that, at the time of paſſing ſentence, he approved the more moderate proceeding, and laboured to eſtabliſh in the minds of the Court and of the audience, an high opinion of the King's tenderneſs and mercy (g), for which he received his Majeſty's thanks, together with a full approbation of his conduct, by a letter from the Marquis of Buckingham (h). Such were the great tranſactions of theſe two years, for if we were to mention all the matters of importance which paſſed through his hands, and of which he has either left memorials in his letters, or that might be collected from records, it would ſwell this life into a volume; and therefore we touch only the moſt memorable accidents that we meet with in his memoirs, and that with a due regard to the times in which they happened, a circumſtance wherein we have met with great difficulties, from the many falſe and imperfect dates which occur in the hiſtories of that reign. While he was High Chancellor of England, he procured from the King the farm of the Alienation-Office, which was of conſiderable benefit, and proved a great part of his ſubſiſtence, after he loſt his office. He likewiſe procured York-Houſe for the place of his reſidence, for which he ſeems to have had an affection, as being the place of his birth, and where his father had lived, all the time he poſſeſſed the high office of Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal (i). Here, in the beginning of the year 1620, he kept his birth-day with great ſplendor and magnificence, as appears by a ſhort performance of the famous Poet Ben Jonſon upon that occaſion, in which, though the verſe be ſomewhat harſh, there is ſo much good ſenſe, and ſuch a vein of Poetry, as very well deſerves the reader's notice (k) [DD] One of the moſt remarkable tranſactions of this year, was the proſecution of the Attorney-General, Sir Henry Yelverton, in which the city of London was alſo involved; the offence with which he was charged, being the exceeding

The reader will obſerve, that the form of the poem implies a very beautiful fiction, the poet ſtarting, as it were, on his entering York-Houſe, at the ſight of the Genius of the place performing ſome myſtery, which, penetrating from the gaiety of his look, affords matter for the compliment (85).

ing his inſtructions in drawing a charter for this metropolis (l). This gentleman had the misfortune to incur the diſpleaſure of the Marquis of Buckingham, who, according to his nature, which inclined him to do much good to his friends, and much evil to thoſe he eſteemed his enemies, perſecuted him with great fury; and it ſeems, from a letter of Verulam's, that this diſpoſition of the Marquis had made ſome impreſſion upon himſelf, ſince he adviſes the King not to accept the Attorney's ſubmiſſion, as a ſatisfaction, and yet to make uſe of it as evidence: but in the ſame letter he ſhews, that ſuch violent methods were not ſuitable to his temper, ſince he concludes it, with recommending the Attorney to his Majeſty's mercy (m). In conſequence of this advice, an information was preferred in the Star-Chamber againſt the Attorney, and the Lord-Mayor of London, which ended in a heavy ſentence and a ſevere impriſonment. However he was afterwards reſtored to Buckingham's favour, by whoſe recommendation he was made a Judge of the Common-Pleas: but as this happened long after that Lord Verulam was removed from having any ſhare in public affairs, we ſhall take no farther notice of it here. The ſame cares, with reſpect to the King's buſineſs, and chiefly with regard to his revenue, ſtill employed and took up a great part of his Lordſhip's time, in which he ſeems to have agreed better with Sir Edward Coke, than could have been well expected, and always repreſents him as labouring heartily and effectually in the King's ſervice, which ſhews that he was very far from being of an unforgiving nature; and indeed his whole ſtudy ſeems at this time to have been directed, to keep all who were concerned in the King's affairs on good terms with each other (n). About this time, however, an attempt was made to the prejudice of his Lordſhip, which might have given him ſome warning of his fall. For one Mr. Wrenham, againſt whom he had made a decree, ſurmiſing he had wrong done him, preſented a libellous petition to the King againſt him, the ſuggeſtions of which were thoroughly examined, from whence it clearly appeared, that the Chancellor had acted as became him, and that he had in truth been very much injured by this Wrenham (o). Happy had it been for his Lordſhip, had he been always as ready and able to defend himſelf. But though he was fully acquitted of all blame on account of this matter, yet the effects of it ſtuck cloſe to him, and in the end proved his ruin, the induſtry of Wrenham producing thoſe complaints, of which we ſhall hear enough hereafter (p). In the midſt of ſo much difficulty, under the weight of ſo great a load of buſineſs, and notwithſtanding the diligence and attention ſhewn by him in the diſcharge of the ſeveral branches of his duty, he was ſo far from forgetting or neglecting his philoſophic ſtudies, that in the month of October 1620, he ſent the King his maſter the ripeſt fruits of them, in the moſt perfect and moſt important work that ever fell from his pen, and which of all others he valued moſt, his Novum Organum (q) [EE]. LORD BACON'S BIRTH-DAY.

Haile happie GENIUS of this antient pile!
How comes it all things ſo about thee ſmile?
The fire, the wine, the men; and in the midſt
Thou ſtand'ſt, as if ſome myſtery thou didſt!
Pardon, I read it in thy face, the day
For whoſe returnes, and many, all theſe pray:
And ſo doe I. This is the ſixtieth yeare,
Since Bacon, and thy Lord was borne and here;
Sonne to the grave, wiſe Keeper of the Seale,
Fame and foundation of the Engliſh weale.
What then his father was, that ſince is hee,
Now with a title more to the degree.

For 'twere a narrow gladneſſe, kept thine owne.
Give me a deep-crown'd bowle, that I may ſing,

[EE] Which of all others he valued moſt, the Novum Organum.] In order to give the reader a juſt idea of the value and importance of this work, we will firſt deſcribe the nature of it, and then mention the judgment paſſed thereon by ſome of the greateſt ornaments of the republic of letters. The deſign of the Novum Organum was, to execute the ſecond part of the Inſtauration, by advancing a more perfect method of uſing the rational faculty than men were before acquainted with, in order to raiſe and improve the underſtanding, as far as its preſent imperfect ſtate admits, and enable it to conquer and interpret the difficulties and obſcurities of nature. With this view it undertakes the care and conduct of the underſtanding, and draws out and deſcribes the apparatus and inſtruments of reaſoning; whence it appears to endeavour at a new kind of Logic, though greatly ſuperior to the common, which, through the abuſes crept into it, appears fitter to corrupt than ſtrengthen and improve the mind; for the ſcope and uſe of this new Logic, is not to diſcover arguments and probable reaſons, but arts and works. It is divided into two principal parts, viz. into a preparatory part, and one that is ſcientifical and inſtructive. The firſt part tends to prepare and purge the mind, and fit it to receive and uſe the inſtructions and inſtruments laid down in the ſecond; the mind, like a mirror, requiring to be levelled and poliſhed, or diſcharged of its falſe imaginations and perverted notions, before it can be ſet to receive and reflect the light of truth and juſt information; and the levelling part is of four kinds, with reſpect to the four different ſorts of idols or falſe notions, that poſſeſs the mind. Theſe idols are either acquired or natural, and proceed either from the doctrines and ſects of Philoſophers, the perverted and corrupt laws and methods of demonſtration, or elſe are innate and inherent in the very conſtitution of the mind itſelf. The firſt labour therefore is to diſcharge and free the mind from its ſwarms of falſe theories, which occaſion ſuch violent conflicts and oppoſitions; the next point is to releaſe it from the ſlavery of perverted demonſtrations; and the laſt is to put a check upon this ſeducing power of the mind, and either to pluck up thoſe innate idols by the root, or if that cannot be done, to point them out, that they may be thoroughly known and watched, and ſo have the depravities which they occaſion corrected. This levelling part therefore is performed by three kinds of confutations, viz. the confutation of philoſophies, the confutation of demonſtrations, and the confutation of the natural unaſſiſted reaſon. When thus the mind is rendered equable and unbiaſſed, the work proceeds to ſet it in a proper ſituation, and as it were, with a benevolent aſpect to the remaining inſtructions, whereby the buſineſs of preparing the mind is ſtill farther carried on, and the whole drift of this enſuing part, is only to poſſeſs mankind with a juſt opinion of the whole Inſtauration for a time, that they may as he could wiſh, and wrote him a letter thereupon, which certainly does honour to both their memories (s). He received alſo the complements of many learned men on the ſame ſubject, and had all the reaſon in the world to be ſatisfied with the general reception of a work, which coſt him ſo much time and pains.

(s) See the contents of this letter in note [EE].

The

may wait with patience, the iſſue and event thereof, upon ſolid aſſurances of ſome conſiderable benefit and advantage from it, when its ſcope ſhall come to be well underſtood; and thence it proceeds diſtinctly to obviate all the objections and falſe ſuſpicions which may be raiſed about it, through the prevailing notions and prejudices drawn from religious conſideration, thoſe of abſtract ſpeculation, natural prudence, diſtruſt, levity, &c. thus endeavouring to pacify and allay every wind of oppoſition. To render this preparation ſtill more compleat and perfect, the next thing is to raiſe the mind from the languor and torpidity it may contract from the apparent miraculous nature of the thing; and as this wrong diſpoſition of the mind cannot be rectified without the diſcovery of cauſes, the work proceeds to mark out all the impediments, which have hitherto perverſely retarded and blocked the way of true Philoſophy, and thus makes it appear no wonder at all, that mankind ſhould have been ſo long entangled and perplexed with errors. When the ways of removing theſe impediments are ſhewn, there follows a chain of arguments for eſtabliſhing a ſolid foundation of hope, for the better ſucceſs of genuine and ſerviceable Philoſophy in future: for it is hereby demonſtrated that though the interpretation of nature intended by the Inſtauration may indeed be difficult, yet much the greater parts of the difficulties attending it, are in the power of man to remove, as ariſing, not from the nature of the ſenſes and things themſelves, but only require that the mind be rectified, in order to their removal; and this firſt general part concludes, with an account of the excellence of the end in view. The preparatory part being thus diſpatched, the work proceeds to the buſineſs of information, the perfecting of the underſtanding, and the delivery of the art of working with this new machine in the interpretation of nature. This is laid down in three ſeveral branches, with regard to the ſenſe, the memory, and the reaſon, each whereof is aſſiſted in its turn. This work he addreſſed to his Majeſty, who, in his letter dated October 16, 1620 (86), tells him that he could not have made him a more acceptable preſent, and that for his part he could not expreſs his thanks better, than by informing him of the reſolution he had taken to read it through with care and attention, though he ſhould ſteal ſome hours from his ſleep, having otherwiſe as little ſpare time to read, as his Lordſhip had to write it, with many other gracious expreſſions, which fully demonſtrate how much the Chancellor was in the King's good graces, and how high an eſteem he had for his parts and learning. The famous Sir Henry Wotton, to whom his Lordſhip ſent three copies of this book, wrote him a large letter of praiſe in return, which, as we have no room for complements, we ſhall omit. He received the like tribute of commendation from ſuch as were the moſt learned, or ſo affected to be thought, in this and in the neighbouring nations: yet after all, this performance was rather praiſed than read, and more generally applauded than underſtood. This produced a kind of latent cenſure, a ſort of owl-like criticiſm that durſt not abide day-light. Honeſt Ben Johnſon produced this to the world a little after our author's death, when he very generouſly, as well as judiciouſly, gave this character of the Novum Organum (87): 'That though 'by moſt ſuperficial men, who cannot get beyond 'the title of Nominals, it is not penetrated or un-'derſtood, really openeth all defects of learning what-'ſoever and is a book,

Qui longum noto ſcriptori prorogat ævum.
To lateſt times ſhall hand the author's name.

We need not wonder at this, when we conſider the pains it coſt the noble Verulam, for Dr. Rawley aſſures us, that he had ſeen twelve copies reviſed, altered, and corrected year by year, before it was reduced into the form in which it was publiſhed (88). We muſt however allow that it is not abſolutely perfect, as appears from what a moſt ingenious and judicious writer has delivered upon it, with that modeſty, circumſpection, and good ſenſe, which is diſcernible in all his writings: The perſon I mean, is the late learned and excellent Mr. Baker of St. John's College in Cambridge, who allows that my Lord Bacon ſaw clearer into the defects of the art of reaſoning than moſt men did, and being neither ſatisfied with the vulgar Logic, nor with the reformations that were made; ſuitable to his vaſt and enterprizing genius, attempted a Logic wholly new and plain, which is laid down in his Novum Organum (89). 'The way of ſyllogizing, ſays he, ſeemed to him very 'fallacious, and too dependent upon words to be much 'relied on: His ſearch was after things, and therefore 'he brought in a new way of arguing from induction, 'and that grounded upon obſervation and experi-'ments:' But the ſame gentleman obſerves, 'that this 'plan, as laid by him, looks liker an univerſal art 'than a diſtinct Logic, and the deſign is too great, 'and the induction too large to be made by one man, 'or any ſociety of men in one age, if at all practi-'cable. For whatever opinion he might have of the 'concluſiveneſs of this way, one croſs circumſtance in 'an experiment would as eaſily overthrow his induction, 'as an ambiguous word would diſorder a ſyllogiſm; 'and a man needs only make a trial in any part of 'natural hiſtory, as left us by my Lord Bacon, to ſee 'how concluſive his induction was like to have been. 'To ſay nothing, that notwithſtanding his blaming 'the common logics, as being too much ſpent in 'words, himſelf runs into the fault he condemns, 'for what elſe can we make of his Idola Tribus, Idola 'Specus, Fori, Theatri; or of his inſtantiæ ſolitariæ, 'migrantes, oſtenſivæ, clandeſtinæ, conſtitutivæ, &c. 'but fine words put to expreſs very common and 'ordinary things? After the way of free-thinking had 'been laid open by my Lord Bacon, it was ſoon 'after greedily followed; for the underſtanding af-'fects freedom as well as the will, and men will pur-'ſue liberty though it ends in confuſion.' There is certainly a great deal of truth in what Mr. Baker ſays, with regard to the conſequences of Lord Verulam's Philoſophy, and the manner in which it has been proſecuted: But ſurely this ought not to be imputed to him, who, if I underſtand him at all, was of all philoſophical writers the leaſt addicted to free-thinking. Of this opinion is the famous Morhof (90), who beſtows the higheſt praiſes on the work of which we are now ſpeaking, making no ſcruple to declare, that he had found but very little in the books ſince written by Engliſhmen, the grounds of which he had not long before met with in Bacon, the extent of whoſe genius ſtruck him with admiration, as it muſt do every man who takes the pains to underſtand him; becauſe, though this new Logic of his be very difficult, and requires much ſtudy and application to maſter it, yet it leads to the knowledge of things and not of words. Mr. Voltaire, in his Letters concerning the Engliſh nation (91), remarks, 'That the 'moſt ſingular and the beſt of all his pieces, is that 'which is moſt uſeleſs and leaſt read, I mean, ſays 'my author, his Novum Scientiarum Organum, this 'is the ſcaffold with which the new Philoſophy was 'raiſed, and when the edifice was built, part of it 'at leaſt, the ſcaffold was no longer of ſervice. The 'Lord Bacon was not yet acquainted with nature, 'but then he knew and pointed out the ſeveral paths 'that led to it. He had deſpiſed in his younger years 'the thing called Philoſophy in the univerſities, 'and did all that lay in his power to prevent thoſe 'ſocieties of men, inſtituted to improve human reaſon, 'from depraving it by their quiddities, their horrors 'of vacuum, their ſubſtantial forms, and all thoſe impertinent terms, which not only ignorance had rendered 'venerable, but which had been made ſacred by their 'being ridiculouſly blended with religion.' There cannot be any thing more honourable for the memory of this great perſon, than the teſtimony of the writer before mentioned, who, it is certain, has not ſhewn too great a readineſs to praiſe or commend any body, and much leſs the Engliſh authors, whom, except Newton, he ſeems to applaud with reluctance. There is, however,

The King's affairs were by this time come to ſuch a paſs, that notwithſtanding all the labour that his Council had beſtowed in regulating his expences and revenues, a Parliament was not only expedient but neceſſary, and this in no man's judgment more than in that of the Chancellor, who was always deſirous of governing according to the Conſtitution, and who valued himſelf particularly upon his abilities in managing ſuch aſſemblies (t). When the calling a Parliament was reſolved upon, he was directed to conſult with the proper perſons, about the means moſt likely to render that meaſure ſafe and ſalutary for the King and kingdom; and accordingly taking to his aſſiſtance the two Chief-Juſtices, Montague and Hobart, and Serjeant Crewe, they, after mature deliberation, agreed upon four points, which the Chancellor repreſented in a letter to his Majeſty. The firſt was looking carefully into the grievances formerly complained of, and examining into ſuch things of a like nature, as might probably afford room for new complaints. The ſecond was, the ſettling a proclamation, explaining the cauſes which at that juncture moved his Majeſty to call a Parliament, ſo as to quiet and conciliate the minds of the nation. The third related to the admonitions that might be fitly given, as to the choice of members. The fourth referred to commonwealth bills, as his Lordſhip called them, a phraſe which I take to be equivalent to popular laws, as they are now ſtiled (u). The King was extremely well pleaſed with this advice, for which the Marquis of Buckingham returned him his Majeſty's thanks, and recommended to him the drawing of ſuch a proclamation, which he accordingly performed, and ſent it to his Majeſty, after it had received the approbation of Sir Edward Coke, the two Chief-Juſtices, and Serjeant Crewe. We have it ſtill extant in his Works, and it muſt be allowed, that never any thing of its kind ſurpaſſed it. However it did not entirely pleaſe the King, who thought it too long, and that it told the people too much of what ought to be reſerved for his Majeſty's ſpeech and his own, at the opening of the Parliament (w). It was therefore contracted, and only the ſubſtance of it retained, in the proclamation iſſued for calling the Parliament, on the ſixth of November following. But after all it was found impoſſible to put things in order by that time, which made another proclamation neceſſary, which was referred to his Lordſhip to draw, and ſo happily he ſucceeded therein, that the King declared he thought a word could not be altered in it (x). By this proclamation the meeting of the Parliament was put off to the thirtieth of January following, and in the mean time, ſeveral ſteps were taken to pleaſe the people, in order to render this meeting between the King and his great Council, more agreeable to all parties. Amongſt theſe, on the twenty-ſeventh of January, his Majeſty, by his letters patent of that date, raiſed Sir Francis Bacon Knt. Baron of Verulam, to the dignity of a Viſcount, by the ſtyle and title of Viſcount St. Albans in the county of Hertford. In the preamble to this patent, the King ſets forth, that as he thought nothing could adorn his government more, than raiſing worthy perſons to honour, or afford greater encouragement to virtue and public ſpirit, he, after mature deliberation, had thought fit to advance his dearly beloved and faithful Counſellor, deſcended from an ancient and honourable family, ſo much the more illuſtrious, by his ſucceeding his moſt worthy and prudent father in the office of Keeper of the Great-Seal, to which, through various offices of inferior dignity, from a juſt experience of his capacity and fidelity, he had by his Majeſty been led, and reflecting finally on the acceptable and faithful ſervices, which as well by his aſſiduity and integrity in the adminiſtration of juſtice, as by his care and prudence in the diſcharge of his duty as a Privy-Counſellor, and in the management of his revenue, without reſpect either to private advantage or vain breath of popularity, to a higher degree of nobility (y). At the ſame time this new dignity was granted to him and his heirs male, there was annexed to it a ſmall penſion out of the cuſtoms. The witneſſes to this patent, were more illuſtrious in ſome reſpects than thoſe to the former. For beſides the Prince of ever, one thing in his judgment of this work, which deſerves to be particularly conſidered, and that is, his compariſon of it to a ſcaffold, which it cannot be denied, is at once very juſt and very ſignificant: but then it is not very eaſy to know, what this great Critic means by repreſenting it as uſeleſs, and aſſigning that as a reaſon, why this treatiſe is now ſo little read or underſtood. The very contrary of this ſeems to be the fact: The new Philoſophy ſtands like a vaſt magnificent palace, in ſome places half finiſhed, in others the walls carried up to a moderate height, in ſome, juſt raiſed above the ground, in others, hardly marked out. What reaſon therefore for taking away the ſcaffold? Or rather, what reaſon to expect the work ſhould ever be finiſhed, at leaſt thoroughly and regularly, if the ſcaffold be taken away? The truth of the matter is, that ſeveral who have wrought upon this noble ſtructure ſince, have erected ſcaffolds for their own uſe, of their own contrivance, and when they have in ſome meaſure finiſhed the part they were about, taken them away, and concealed from the eye of the public their manner of working (92). Others again have attempted to raiſe ſcaffolds from the lights received from our author, and ſo far as they have copied them, have done this with great ſucceſs. But Lord Verulam's was a more noble deſign: He knew that the life of one man could not ſuffice for the finiſhing, even a ſmall part of this ſtately edifice; and therefore he ſpent ſo many years in conſtructing this ſcaffold, which might have ſerved for perfecting and compleating the whole work, if others had been as diligent in purſuing his plan, as he was ſtudious and careful in rendering it every way fit for the uſe which he deſigned. This is the true account, and the only true one, of the Novum Organum; and one may ſafely venture to aſſert, that if his deſign had been purſued with that ſteadineſs which it deſerved, the new Philoſophy had been by this time, not only more perfect than it is, but more perfect than it is ever like to be, unleſs the learned at laſt diſcern their error in this reſpect, and are content to make uſe of the helps he has left them, which, the more they are conſidered, the more they are tried, will be found more adequate to the great deſign of their author, than well can be imagined.

Wales,

Wales, there were the Viſcount Mandeville, Lord High Treaſurer; the Earl of Worceſter, Lord Privy-Seal; the Marquis of Buckingham, Lord High-Admiral; Marquis Hamilton, the Earls of Pembroke, Arundel, Rutland, Montgomery, Leiceſter, March, Holderneſs, and many others. He was likewiſe ſolemnly inveſted in this new dignity, the Lord Crewe carrying the robe of ſtate before him, which robe was held up by the Marquis of Buckingham, and the new Viſcount gave the King ſolemn thanks for all the favours he had beſtowed upon him, which he particularly recapitulated (z). On the thirtieth of January he opened the Parliament with a ſhort ſpeech, and made another larger at the receiving Sir Thomas Richardſon, whom the Commons choſe for their Speaker (a). The King had great hopes of this Parliament, from the general inclination ſhewn by the people, to enable his Majeſty to aſſiſt his ſon-in-law, who was not only deprived of the kingdom of Bohemia, to which he was elected, but alſo in great danger of utterly loſing his hereditary dominions; whence his Majeſty flattered himſelf, that knowing his neceſſities, they would immediately apply themſelves to the means of relieving them, without digreſſing into any diſagreeable enquiries after grievances. But in this he ſoon found himſelf miſtaken; for, like a true Houſe of Commons, they were reſolved to expreſs their loyalty to their Prince, by chearfully voting a ſupply, and to teſtify their zeal for the ſervice of their country, by examining diligently all the complaints that were laid before them (b). Theſe in a few days became numerous enough; ſo that early in the month of February, many of the Agents of the Marquis of Buckingham and his family, who had been buſy in obtaining patents, and very active in making a bad uſe of them, found themſelves in the utmoſt danger of being brought to a ſevere account (c). Nor was it long, before the Houſe ſaw cauſe to extend their enquiries farther, and to appoint a Committee, for examining into the proceedings of the Courts of juſtice, which exceedingly alarmed the Miniſters, and is thought to have given riſe to thoſe reſolutions, which made way for the ruin of the Chancellor, which ſo ſoon followed his advancement in title. For upon the fifteenth of March 1620-1, Sir Robert Phillips reported, from the Committee appointed to enquire into the abuſes in the courts of juſtice, that two charges of corruption had been brought againſt the Lord Chancellor (*). The firſt was in the caſe of one Awbrey, who finding a ſuit he had in Chancery to go on very ſlowly, he was adviſed to quicken it, by giving the Lord-Chancellor one hundred pounds. The poor gentleman being in great diſtreſs, took up this money of an uſurer, and when he had got it, he ſent it by Sir George Haſtings and Mr. Jenkins, to the Lord-Chancellor, going with them when they carried it. They took the money in to the Lord-Chancellor, at his lodgings in Gray's-Inn, and when they came out again, Sir George Haſtings told Mr. Awbrey that his Lordſhip was thankful, and aſſured him of good ſucceſs in his buſineſs, which however he had not (d). The other caſe was of one Mr. Egerton, and it came out to be, that he had mortgaged his eſtate for four hundred pounds, which he ſent by Sir George Haſtings and Sir Richard Young, who preſented it to the Lord-Chancellor, telling him, that it was in gratitude for the aſſiſtance he had given this gentleman when he was Attorney General. At firſt his Lordſhip refuſed it, ſaying it was too much; but at laſt he accepted it, as it was for favours paſt; and theſe gentlemen coming out to Mr. Egerton, told him, that his Lordſhip ſaid he did not only enrich him, but laid a tie upon him, to aſſiſt him in all juſt and lawful buſineſs. Sir George Haſtings and Sir Richard Young being examined, acknowledged the receiving and delivery of a purſe, but pretended that they knew not what was in it; but it could not be made appear to the Committee, that Mr. Egerton had at that time any cauſe depending, either in the Chancery or the Star-Chamber (e). Sir Robert Phillips, in making the report, proceeded not only with caution and decency, but with viſible reluctancy and tenderneſs towards the Lord Chancellor. The Houſe ordered a farther enquiry by the Committee, and on the ſeventeenth of the ſame month, Sir Robert Phillips reported ſome ſtronger circumſtances; Sir George Haſtings, who was himſelf a member, becoming a witneſs, and teſtifying poſitively to both facts. Sir Edward Sackville, and Mr. Finch, then Recorder of London, ſpoke in favour of the Chancellor, and endeavoured to extenuate the thing, though now it appeared plainly that there were cauſes depending in both caſes, and that Dr. Field, Biſhop of Llandaff was deeply concerned in the laſt mentioned buſineſs: Sir Edward Coke, his Lordſhip's old antagoniſt, preſſed for the ſending up of the complaint to the Houſe of Lords, but without any heat or bitterneſs (f). After the debate, the Houſe ordered, 'That the complaint of Awbrey 'and Egerton againſt the Lord-Chancellor and the Biſhop for corruption, for the 100, 'and 400 pounds, and the recognizance, ſhould be drawn up by Sir Robert Phillips, 'Sir Edward Coke, Mr. Noy, and Sir Dudley Diggs, and that the ſame be related to 'the Lords, without prejudice or opinion, at a conference, and that a meſſage be ſent 'to the Lords for this purpoſe, on Monday the nineteenth.' Accordingly, on that day the complaint was made to the Houſe of Lords, in the manner preſcribed by the Commons (g), and when it came to be debated, the Marquis of Buckingham preſented a letter from the Lord-Chancellor, who was then ſick, wherein he deſired four things of their Lordſhips. Firſt, that they would maintain him in their good opinion till his cauſe was heard. Secondly, that they would give him a convenient time, as well in regard of his ill ſtate of health, as of the importance of the charge, to make his defence. Thirdly, that they would allow him to except againſt the credit of the witneſſes againſt him, to croſs-

croſs-examine them, and to produce evidence in his own defence. And fourthly, that in caſe there came any more petitions of the like nature, that their Lordſhips would not take any prejudice at their number, conſidering they were againſt a Judge, that made two thouſand orders and decrees in a year (b). Upon which expoſtulatory letter, anſwer was ſent on the twentieth of March unto the Lord-Chancellor, viz. 'That the Lords received his 'Lordſhip's letter, delivered unto them by the Lord-Admiral. They intended to pro-'ceed in his cauſe now before their Lordſhips, according to the right rules of juſtice, 'and they ſhall be glad if his Lordſhip ſhall clear his honour therein, to which end they 'pray his Lordſhip to provide for his juſt defence.' The very next day there came up freſh complaints from the Houſe of Commons, which induced their Lordſhips to appoint a ſelect Committee to take examinations, and to report the proofs in reſpect to theſe and other inſtances of corruption in the Lord-Chancellor, which Committee reported above twenty ſeveral facts, in which he had taken bribes to the amount of ſeveral thouſands of pounds (i). It may be very eaſily conceived, that things were now grown too high to be got over, eſpecially in ſuch times, by any interpoſition from the court. However his Lordſhip applied to the Marquis of Buckingham, as appears by his letter of the twenty-fifth of March, to preſent another which was encloſed to the King, wherein he paſſionately laments his misfortunes, and with all poſſible ſubmiſſion intreats his Majeſty's favour. In conſequence of this letter he had an audience of the King, who received him, as appears by another letter of thanks, with great tenderneſs and compaſſion (k). To ſay the truth, there is the utmoſt reaſon to believe, that his maſter was very unfeignedly ſorry for his calamity, ſince he tells us himſelf, that the King ſhed tears on the firſt news of it; and it very evidently appears from the circumſtances before related, that he had every kind of aſſiſtance given him, and all the ſigns of friendſhip and protection afforded, that was either in the power of the Marquis of Buckingham, or even in the King his maſter, who actually procured a receſs of Parliament, in hopes that ſome means might be found to ſoften things a little (l). But that method, though probably dictated by himſelf, had a quite contrary effect; for the more time there was allowed to enquire into and examine this matter, the plainer the facts appeared, and the higher the clamour roſe againſt him. This it was, that very probably determined the Lord-Chancellor to depart from his firſt deſign, and inſtead of entering into a long and formal defence, to throw himſelf on the mercy of the Houſe, by an humble ſubmiſſion which he drew up in writing, and prevailed upon the then Prince of Wales, afterwards King Charles I., to preſent to the Houſe of Peers, which he accordingly did on the twenty-fourth of April, when this matter came again under their Lordſhips conſideration. There never was perhaps any piece of this kind, penned with more beauty of ſtyle or ſtrength of expreſſion, which ſhews that even in the depth of miſery, he was able to command his thoughts and his pen too, ſo as to expreſs himſelf with great force and freedom (m) [FF]. This ſubmiſſion of his being read, as alſo the report of the Lords Committees, containing the collections of his corruptions and the proofs, they ſent a copy of the former but not of the latter, by Mr. Baron Denham, and Sir Thomas Coventry, then Attorney-General, to the Lord-Chancellor, with this meſſage from their Lordſhips, viz.

[FF] Expreſs himſelf with great force and freedom.] There is no great wonder in this ſudden and dreadful fall of the Chancellor St. Albans. He was attacked in a conſtitutional way, in conſequence of a regular inquiry ſet on foot in the Houſe of Commons, and conducted, not only with calmneſs and juſtice, but with great decency and tenderneſs. It does not appear that this was either contrived or carried on by any particular perſon, or encouraged or ſupported by any faction, though there did not want warm ſpirits enough in the Houſe: but they ſeem to have had other perſons, and other things in their view, and to have been forced out of their way in taking notice of this; for, as his Lordſhip truly obſerves, he was at the opening of this parliament in the greateſt credit of any man with both Houſes; but at that time it ſeems no man's credit was too ſtrong for juſtice, and of this he was ſo ſenſible, that he determined to try how far a moving and ſubmiſſive letter might prevail in his favour, which he reſolved to ſend, rather than venture upon a dangerous defence: this letter was dated the twenty-ſecond of April, 1621. He deſired firſt of their Lordſhips a benign interpretation of what he ſhall write, ſince words that came from waſted ſpirits and an oppreſſed mind, are more ſafe in being depoſited in a noble conſtruction, than in being circled in any reſerved caution. He tells them then, that in the midſt of a ſtate of as great affliction, as he thinks a mortal man can endure (honour being above life), he ſhall begin with the profeſſing of gladneſs in ſome things: the firſt is, that hereafter the greatneſs of a Judge or Magiſtrate ſhall be no ſanctuary or protection of guiltineſs, which, in few words, is the beginning of a golden world; the next, that after this example, it is like that Judges will fly from any thing that is in likeneſs of corruption (though it were at a great diſtance), as from a ſerpent, which tendeth to the purging of the courts of juſtice, and the reducing them to their true honour and ſplendour: He obſerves, that he underſtood that ſome juſtification had been expected from him, and therefore he had choſen one only juſtification inſtead of all others, out of the juſtification of Job; for after the clear ſubmiſſion and confeſſion which he ſhould then make to their Lordſhips, he hoped he might ſay and juſtify with Job in theſe words, I have not hid my ſin as did Adam, nor concealed my fault in my boſom: That it reſted therefore, that without fig leaves, he ſhould ingenuouſly confeſs, and acknowledge, that having underſtood the particulars of the charge, not formally before the Houſe, but enough to inform his conſcience and memory, he found matters ſufficient and full, both to move him to deſert his defence, and to move their Lordſhips to condemn and cenſure him: That he would not trouble their Lordſhips by ſingling thoſe particulars which he thought might fall off; Quid te exempta juvat de millibus una? nor prompt them to obſerve upon the proofs, where they come not home, on the ſcruple touching the credit of the witneſſes: Neither would he preſent to their Lordſhips, how far a defence in diverſe things might extenuate the offence, in reſpect of the time and manner of the gift, or the like circumſtances, but only leave thoſe things to ſpring out of their own noble thoughts and obſervations of the evidence and examinations themſelves, and charitably to wind about the particulars of the charge here and there, as God ſhould put it into their minds, and to ſubmit himſelf wholly to their pity and grace: That having ſpoken to their Lordſhips as Judges, he ſhould viz. That they did not conceive his ſubmiſſion to be full enough, for three reaſons. 1. His Lordſhip confeſſeth not any particular bribe or corruption. 2. Nor ſhews how his Lordſhip heard the charge thereof. 3. The confeſſion, ſuch as it is, is afterwards extenuated in the ſame ſubmiſſion, and therefore their Lordſhips have ſent him a particular of the charge, and do expect his anſwer to the ſame with all convenient expedition. Unto which meſſage the Lord-Chancellor anſwered, that he would return the Lords an anſwer with ſpeed. And on the twenty-fifth of April, the Lords conſidered of the Lord-Chancellor's ſaid anſwer, ſent unto their meſſage of the day before, and ſent a ſecond meſſage unto his Lordſhip to this effect, by the ſaid Mr. Baron Denham, and Mr. Attorney-General, viz. The Lords having received a doubtful anſwer unto the meſſage their Lordſhips ſent him yeſterday, therefore they now ſend to him again, to know of his Lordſhip directly and preſently, Whether his Lordſhip will make his confeſſion, or ſtand upon his defence? Anſwer was returned by the ſaid meſſengers, viz. The Lord-Chancellor will make no manner of defence to the charge, but meaneth to acknowledge corruption, and to make a particular confeſſion to every point, and after that an humble ſubmiſſion; but humbly craves liberty, that where the charge is more full than he finds the truth of the fact, he may make declaration of the truth in ſuch particulars, the charge being brief, and containing not all circumſtances. The Lords ſent the ſame meſſengers back again to the Lord-Chancellor, to let him know, that their Lordſhips had granted him until Monday the thirtieth of April, by ten in the morning, to ſend ſuch confeſſion and ſubmiſſion, as his Lordſhip intended to make (n). Accordingly on that day, the Lord-Chancellor ſent a very full and particular confeſſion and ſubmiſſion to the Houſe, in which he acknowledges moſt, but extenuates ſome, of the many inſtances of corruption with which he had been charged, and ſo once more threw himſelf entirely upon the mercy of his Peers (o) [GG]. The Lords having heard this paper read, the following members of that illuſtrious aſſembly, viz. the Earl of Pembroke, Lord-Chamberlain, the Earl of Arundel, the Earl of Southampton, the Biſhop of Durham, the Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield, the Lord Wentworth, and Lord Cromwell, the Lord Sheffield, the Lord North, the Lord Chandois, and the Lord Hunſdon, were ſent ſay a few words to them as Peers and Prelates, humbly commending his cauſe to their noble minds and magnanimous affections; that their Lordſhips were not ſimply Judges, but parliamentary Judges, and had a farther extent of arbitrary power than other courts, and if their Lordſhips were not tied by ordinary courſes of courts, or precedents in points of ſtrictneſs and ſeverity, much more in points of mercy and mitigation; and yet if any thing which he ſhould move might be contrary to their worthy ends of introducing a reformation, he ſhould not ſeek it: That his humble deſire was, that his Majeſty would take the ſeal into his hands, which would be a great downfal, and might ſerve, he hoped, in itſelf for an expiation of his faults; therefore if mercy and mitigation were in their Lordſhips power, and did no ways croſs their noble ends, why ſhould he not hope of their favour and commiſeration? 'Your 'Lordſhips, ſays he, will be pleaſed to behold your 'chief pattern, the King our Sovereign, a King of 'incomparable clemency, and whoſe heart is inſcru-'table for wiſdom and goodneſs. Your Lordſhips 'will remember, that there ſat not theſe hundred 'years before a Prince in your houſe, and never 'ſuch a Prince, whoſe preſence deſerves to be made 'memorable by records and acts mixed of mercy and 'juſtice: Your Lordſhips are either Nobles (and 'compaſſion ever breathed in the veins of noble 'blood), or reverend Prelates, who are the ſervants 'of him, who would not break the bruiſed reed, 'nor quench the ſmokeing flax; you all ſit upon one 'high ſtage, and therefore, cannot but be more ſenſible 'of the changes of the world, and of the fall of any 'of high place; neither will your Lordſhips forget 'that there are vitia temporis, as well as vitia ho-'minis; and that the beginning of reformations 'hath the contrary power of the pool of Bethſeda, 'for that had ſtrength to cure him only that was 'firſt caſt in; and this hath commonly ſtrength to 'hurt him only that is firſt caſt in; and for my part, 'I wiſh it may ſtay there, and go no farther. Laſtly, 'I aſſure myſelf, your Lordſhips have a noble feeling 'of me, as a member of your own body, and one 'that in this very ſeſſion had ſome taſte of your 'loving affections, which I hope was not a lighten-'ing before the death of them, but rather a ſpark 'of that grace, which now in the concluſion will 'more appear. And now therefore, my humble ſuit 'to your Lordſhips is, that my penitent ſubmiſſion 'may be my ſentence, and the loſs of the Seal my 'puniſhment, and that your Lordſhips will ſpare my 'further ſentence, but recommend me to his Ma-'jeſty's grace and pardon for all that is paſt.'

[GG] Once more threw himſelf entirely on the mercy of the Peers.] In almoſt all the accounts hitherto publiſhed of the Viſcount of St. Albans, there has been not only a veil drawn over theſe tranſactions, (which was needleſs and to no purpoſe) but great pains have been likewiſe taken to inſinuate, that he was rather ſuſpected than guilty; that he might be more properly ſaid to be given up than convicted; and on the whole, that he ought to be conſidered as a court ſacrifice, and not as a victim to public juſtice. But let us conſider whether this be right? An author who takes upon him to tranſmit the actions of great men to poſterity, ought to be ſure to have no ſervile complaiſance, no party-views in favour of a court. And why? Becauſe this is inconſiſtent with that regard for truth,' which is neceſſary, and indeed, almoſt the one thing neceſſary for an Hiſtorian. But if this be ſo, ought not the ſame regard to be always paid to truth, or can there be any merit in ſacrificing courts, kings, and nations, to any favourite character of a man, great in reſpect to parts, or high in reference to his ſtation? Surely there is not, and therefore it is more than time that the world ſhould be undeceived in this matter. It would take up a great deal of time to go through the whole charge and defence, or rather apology: We will therefore take the firſt article of each, and leave it to the reader's judgment, after ſeeing what was ſaid againſt him, and what he was able to ſay for himſelf, whether this great man was ſuſpected only, or whether he was really guilty (93).

The Commons, at a conference with the Lords, which was reported by the Lord-Treaſurer, then Viſcount Mandeville, formerly Sir James Montague, and Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench, ſtated their charge thus (94). 'The caſe of Edward Egerton 'is this: There being diverſe ſuits between Edward 'Egerton and Sir Rowland Egerton in the Chancery, 'Edward Egerton preſented his Lordſhip a little after 'he was Lord-Keeper, with a baſon and ewer of the 'value of 50 pounds and upwards, and afterwards he 'delivered in to Sir George Haſtings and Sir Richard 'Young, 400 pounds in gold; Sir Richard Young 'preſented it his Lordſhip, who took it and poiſed 'it, and ſaid it was too much; and returned anſwer, 'that Mr. Egerton had not only enriched him, but 'had laid a tie upon his Lordſhip to do him favour 'in all his juſt cauſes. The proofs for this are the 'teſtimony of Sir George Haſtings, and the teſti-'mony of Mereſil, a Scrivener, thus far, that he 'took ſent to him the ſaid Lord-Chancellor, and ſhewed him the ſaid confeſſion, and told him, that the Lords do conceive it to be an ingenuous and full confeſſion, and demanded of him, Whether it be his own hand that is ſubſcribed to the ſame? and Whether he will ſtand to it or not? Unto which the ſaid Lord-Chancellor anſwered, My Lords, It is my act, my hand, my heart. I beſeech your Lordſhips to be merciful to a broken reed. The which anſwer being reported to the Houſe, it was agreed by the Houſe, to move his Majeſty to ſequeſter the Seal (p). And the Lords intreated the Prince's Highneſs, that he would be pleaſed to move the King; whereunto his Highneſs condeſcended, and the ſame Lords which went to take the acknowledgment of the Lord-Chancellor's hand, were appointed to attend the Prince to the King, with ſome other Lords added. And his Majeſty did not only ſequeſter the Seal, but awarded a new commiſſion unto the Lord-Chief-Juſtice, to execute the place of Chancellor or Lord-Keeper, as Speaker in the Lords Houſe. was on the firſt of May, as appears by a very particular account of the whole tranſaction drawn up by the King's order, and inrolled in Chancery, that his Lordſhip delivered up the Great-Seal with the greateſt

'took up 700 pounds for Mr. Egerton, Mr. Egerton 'a piece: Thereupon, after diverſe hearings, I made 'my award with the advice and conſent of my Lord 'Hobart; the award was perfected and publiſhed 'to the parties, which was in February: Then ſome 'days after the three hundred pounds mentioned in 'the charge, were delivered unto me; afterwards 'Mr. Edward Egerton flew off from the award: Then 'in Midſummer Term following, a ſuit was begun 'in Chancery by Sir Rowland to have the award 'confirmed, and upon that ſuit was the decree made 'mentioned in the article. The ſecond article in the 'charge, viz. in the ſame cauſe he received from 'Edward Egerton four hundred pounds; I confeſs and 'declare, that ſoon after my coming to the Seal, being 'a time when I was preſented by many, the four 'hundred pounds mentioned in the ſaid charge, was 'delivered unto me in a purſe, and, as I now call to 'mind, by Mr. Edward Egerton; but as far as I can 'remember, it was expreſſed by them that brought it, 'to be for favours paſt, and not in reſpect of favours 'to come (95).'

It is very evident from his own account of the matter that there was too much ground for this complaint, as indeed there was for moſt of the reſt. The laſt article of the charge was, that he had given way to great exactions by his ſervants, both in reſpect to private ſeals and otherwiſe, for ſealing of injunctions, to which he gave no other anſwer than this, I confeſs it was a great fault of neglect in me, that I looked no better to my ſervants. It is very remarkable, that this large and long confeſſion was ſcarcely known to any of our Hiſtorians, who, when they ſpeak of the Chancellor's ſubmiſſion, mean by it that paper, the ſubſtance of which is given in the former note: His Lordſhip concluded all with the following moſt humble and ſubmiſſive prayer.

'This declaration I have made to your Lordſhips 'with a ſincere mind, humbly craving, that if there 'ſhould be any miſtake, your Lordſhips will impute it 'to want of memory, and not to any deſire of mine 'to obſcure truth, or palliate any thing; for I do now 'again confeſs, that in points charged upon me, 'though they ſhould be taken as myſelf have declared 'them, there is a great deal of corruption and neg-'lect, for which I am heartily ſorry, and ſubmit 'myſelf to the judgment, grace, and mercy of the 'court: For extenuation I will uſe none concerning 'the matters themſelves, only it may pleaſe your 'Lordſhips, out of your nobleneſs, to caſt your eyes 'of compaſſion upon my perſon and eſtate; I was 'never noted for an avaricious man, and the Apoſtle 'ſaith, That covetouſneſs is the root of all evil. I 'hope alſo that your Lordſhips do the rather find me 'in the ſtate of grace, for that in all theſe particulars, 'there are few or none that are not almoſt two years 'old; whereas thoſe that have an habit of corruption, 'do commonly wax worſe, ſo that it hath pleaſed 'God to prepare me by precedent degrees of a-'mendment to my preſent penitency: And for my 'eſtate, it is ſo mean and poor, as my care is now 'chiefly to ſatisfy my debts; and ſo fearing I have 'troubled your Lordſhips too long, I ſhall conclude 'with an humble ſuit unto you, that if your Lordſhips 'proceed to ſentence, your ſentence may not be 'heavy to my ruin, but gracious and mixed with 'mercy, and not only ſo, but that you would be 'noble interceſſors for me to his Majeſty, likewiſe for 'his grace and favour (96).'

The humble ſubmiſſion and confeſſion of me the Lord-Chancellor.

'Upon adviſed conſideration of the charge de-'pending into my own conſcience, and calling my 'memory to account, ſo far as I am able, I do plainly 'and ingenuouſly confeſs, that I am guilty of cor-'ruption, and do renounce all defence, and put myſelf 'upon the grace and mercy of your Lordſhips. The 'particulars I confeſs and declare to be as followeth: 'To the firſt article of the charge, viz. In the cauſe 'between Sir Rowland Egerton and Edward Egerton, 'the Lord-Chancellor received three hundred pounds 'on the part of Sir Rowland Egerton, before he had 'decreed the cauſe. I do confeſs and declare, that 'upon a reference from his Majeſty of all ſuits and 'controverſies between Rowland Egerton and Edward 'Egerton, both parties ſubmitted themſelves to my 'award by recognizances reciprocal in 10,000 marks decency, as well as with the higheſt ſigns of gratitude to the King, for the many favours conferred upon him, and of the utmoſt ſorrow, for his own abuſes of thoſe acts of his Sovereign's kindneſs (q). This being reported to the Peers the next day, they reſolved to proceed immediately to ſentence; and thereupon ſent the Gentleman-Uſher, and Serjeant at Arms attending the Houſe, to ſummon his Lordſhip before them, from which however he excuſed himſelf on account of ſickneſs, profeſſing that otherwiſe he would willingly have attended them. The Lords reſolved to proceed notwithſtanding, and ſent a meſſage to the Commons to that purpoſe (r). Accordingly, on the third of May 1621, the Commons being come to the bar of their Lordſhips Houſe, their Speaker, Sir Thomas Richardſon delivered himſelf in the following manner. 'The 'Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes, of the Commons Houſe of Parliament, having made 'complaints unto your Lordſhips, of many exorbitant offences of bribery and corruption 'committed by the Lord Chancellor, underſtand that your Lordſhips are ready to 'give judgment upon him for the ſame; wherefore I, their Speaker, in their name, do 'humbly demand and pray judgment againſt him the ſaid Lord Chancellor, as the nature 'of his offence and demerits do require.' The Lord Chief Juſtice anſwered, 'Mr. Speaker, 'Upon complaint of the Commons againſt the Viſcount St. Albans, Lord Chancellor, 'this high court hath thereby, and by his own confeſſion, found him guilty of the 'crimes and corruptions complained of by the Commons, and of ſundry other crimes 'and corruptions of the like nature. And therefore this high Court having firſt ſum-'moned him to attend, and having his excuſe of not attending by reaſon of infirmity 'and ſickneſs, which he proteſted was not feigned, or elſe he would moſt willingly have 'attended, doth nevertheleſs think fit to proceed to judgment, and therefore this high 'court doth adjudge, That the Lord Viſcount St. Albans, Lord Chancellor of England, 'ſhall undergo fine and ranſom of forty thouſand pounds, that he ſhall be impriſoned 'in the Tower during the King's pleaſure, that he ſhall for ever be incapable of any 'office or employment in the State or Commonwealth, that he ſhall never ſit in Par-'liament, or come within the verge of the Court (s).' Such was the iſſue of this great affair, and ſuch the ſentence paſſed upon this noble perſon, whereby he had ſcarcely any thing left him of his honours except the bare titles, and even theſe he is ſaid to have ſaved by the tenderneſs of the Biſhops. It appears, however, that this was entirely owing to a ſtrict and ſteady purſuit of juſtice; though there want not ſome who have refined upon this matter, and attributed the ſeverity of this ſentence to the evil arts of a great Miniſter, the weakneſs of the King, and too great ſubmiſſion in the Viſcount St. Albans, in ſupport of which, the opinions of ſome conſiderable perſons may be cited, as well as ſome paſſages from his own writings (t) [HH]. After a ſhort confinement in the Tower

[HH] The opinions of ſome conſiderable perſons may be cited, as well as ſome paſſages from his own writings.] It muſt be allowed, that, conſidering the extraordinary length into which this life has already run, one ought to be tender of entering far into any controverted points: but when I reflect on the importance of ſetting this matter in its true light, and remember, that hitherto nothing has had a place in theſe memoirs which did not deſerve it, I cannot refrain from ſtating fairly to the reader, and from the beſt authorities, what has been offered in his excuſe. Such as have written critically, or rather politically, of the occurrences of this reign, have endeavoured to repreſent Buckingham, as the great object of the people's hatred, and of the Parliament's ill-will, one whom at any rate they meant to deſtroy, and to get at whom they were conſtrained to fall upon the Lord Chancellor, who might have delivered himſelf by a prudent and circumſpect defence, if he had not devoted himſelf entirely to the King's commands; and conſequently would inſinuate, that he was reſtrained from this courſe, and abandoned by King James to the fury of the Houſe of Commons, in order to obtain his own ends, and more particularly to ſcreen and ſecure his favourite. The project is far from being ill laid, conſidering the temper of the times, the power of the Miniſter, and the maxims of King James's government. We may add to this, that the Lord Viſcount St. Albans himſelf inſinuates in ſome of his letters, that he fell a ſacrifice; that at the beginning of his troubles, as we have ſeen in the text, he at firſt denied things, and after more charges were brought in, deſired that the Lords would not be prejudiced againſt him by the increaſe of complaints, but conſider, that he had ſat in a court, where a multitude of decrees and orders were made in a year, and that it was after all this he made his ſubmiſſion and that particular confeſſion, which has been taken notice of in the preceding note. Yet perhaps this ſtory had never gained ſo much credit, if it had been picked up and pieced together only from caſual expreſſions and phraſes of ambiguous meaning. But the truth is, that we have a long and formal detail of this matter, from one who might certainly be preſumed to know a great deal of it: viz. Mr. Buſhel, who was his Lordſhip's ſervant at that time, and who having ruined himſelf by engaging in the working of mines, upon pretence of following his Lord's philoſophical theory on that ſubject, endeavoured, while a priſoner in the Fleet, to apologize for his own conduct, by publiſhing a ſpeech, which he aſſerts his maſter intended to have made to that Parliament in which he was undone, upon this ſubject, and for procuring the eſtabliſhment of a Royal Academy of Sciences, on the plan delivered in a work of his, entitled, his new Atlantis, which ſpeech of his, though it may contain ſome thoughts of Lord Bacon's, is allowed by the learned Dr. Teniſon to be in a great meaſure fictitious, and not only unworthy of that noble perſon, but ſuch as it was impoſſible for him to have drawn. It is at the cloſe of this ſpeech, and in order to account for its not being ſpoken, that Mr. Buſhel mentions his maſter's fall, which, he ſays, intervened before it could be ſpoken, and thereupon undertakes to give us all the circumſtances of that extraordinary event from his own knowledge, which, if it could be depended upon, muſt be admitted to be a thing extremely worthy our notice: but I at preſent produce it with a view to gratify the inclination of the ingenious reader, of ſeeing whatever has been advanced on this ſubject on either ſide. In this light too, Mr. Buſhel's account is a matter of ſome conſequence, ſince it is the fulleſt and moſt circumſtantial that has been hitherto given. Having, as I ſaid, mentioned his Lord's deſign of propoſing ſeveral projects to the Parliament for the public ſervice, he then proceeds thus (97). 'Before this could be 'accompliſhed to his own content, there aroſe ſuch 'complaints againſt his Lordſhip, and the then fa-'vourite at court, that for ſome days put the King 'to this Quere, whether he ſhould permit the fa-'vourite of his affection, or the oracle of his coun-'cil, to ſink in his ſervice; whereupon his Lordſhip 'was

'was sent for by the King, who, after some discourse, 'gave him this positive advice, to submit himself to 'his House of Peers, and that (upon his princely 'word) he would then restore him again, if they, '(in their honours) should not be sensible of his me-'rits. Now, though my Lord saw his approaching 'ruin, and told his Majesty there was little hopes 'of mercy in a multitude, when his enemies were 'to give fire, if he did not plead for himself: yet 'such was his obedience to him from whom he had 'his being, that he resolved his Majesty's will should 'be his only law, and so took leave of him with 'these words, Those that will strike at your Chan-'cellor (it is much to be feared), will strike at your 'crown, and wished, that as he was then the first, 'so he might be the last of sacrifices. Soon after, '(according to his Majesty's commands) he wrote a 'submissive letter to the House, and sent me to my 'Lord Windsor to know the result, which I was loth, 'at my return, to acquaint him with; for alas! his 'Sovereign's favour was not in so high a measure, but 'he (like the phœnix) must be sacrificed in flames of 'his own raising, and so perished (like Icarus) in that 'his lofty design. The great revenue of his office 'being lost, and his titles of honour saved but by 'the Bishops votes, whereto he replied, that he was 'only bound to thank his Clergy; the thunder of which 'fatal sentence did much perplex my troubled 'thoughts, as well as others, to see that famous Lord, 'who procured his Majesty to call this Parliament, 'must be the first subject of their revengeful wrath, 'and that so unparalleled a master should be thus 'brought upon the public stage, for the foolish mis-'carriage of his own servants, whereof (with grief of 'heart) I confess myself to be one. Yet shortly after, 'the King dissolved the Parliament, but never re-'stored that matchless Lord to his place, which made 'him then to wish, the many years he had spent in 'state policy and law study, had been solely de-'voted to true Philosophy: for, (said he) the one, 'at the best, doth but comprehend man's frailty, 'in its greatest splendour; but the other, the 'mysterious knowledge of all things created in the 'six days work.' Mr. Stephens, in his introduction, having observed, that the last article in the charge against his Lorship was, that he had given way to great exactions by his servants, and that he confessed, it was a great neglect in him that he looked to them no better, tells us, that he mentions this the rather, because those writers who excuse the master, lay the greatest blame upon his servants, and there is no doubt but that some of them were very guilty, and that their Lord had that opinion of them, which it is reported his Lordship in the time of his troubles signified, in passing through a room where many of his retinue rising up to salute him, he said, Sit you down, my masters, your rise hath been my fall (98). We are told likewise by Rushworth in the first volume of his Historical Collections: 'That he treasured up 'nothing for himself or family, but was over indul-'gent to his servants, and connived at their takings, 'and their ways betrayed him to that error: they 'were profuse and expensive, and had at their com-'mand whatever he was master of. The gifts taken 'were for the most part for interlocutory orders: his 'decrees were generally made with so much equity, 'that, though gifts rendered him suspected for in-'justice, yet never any decree made by him was 'reversed as unjust, as it has been observed by some 'who were well skilled in our laws. To this we 'may add, what he alledges by way of excuse, that 'great part of the gifts, &c. were made as presents, 'in cases where no suits were depending, or a good 'while before they were begun, or after they were 'ended (99). Upon this occasion, says Mr. Stephens, who can forbear to observe and lament the weakness and infirmity of human nature? To see a man so far exalted above the common level of his fellow-creatures, to sink so far below it; to see a man, who, like Seneca, gave admirable rules for the conduct of life, and condemning the avaricious pursuit after riches, and what is unlike Seneca, condemning them in his own person and yet be defiled thereby. To see a man applauding Sir George Villiers, whilst very young, for despising money where it crossed reason of state or virtue, to take money in his mature age, in opposition to both, and to his own destruction: Above all, to see a great master of Reason and Philosophy, who had been a credit and ornament to the Reformed Religion, to abate the lustre of his example, by submitting to a temptation which many of the Heathen Philosophers had the power to resist. But as his Lordship had the misfortune to be made a memorial for the greatest and the wisest to take heed lest they fall; so hath he the good fortune (which he observes attended three famous writers fallen under the like circumstances) to have the remembrance of this calamity looked on by posterity as a little picture of night-work, remaining amongst the fair and excellent tables of his acts and works. The same gentleman also tells us, that the Marquis of Buckingham, in a letter which he wrote to Sir Lionel Cranfield, soon after the accusing the Chancellor, says, That he hoped that God, who had given that great Lord many other gifts, had also preserved him from being guilty of such crimes; yet that he likewise hoped that the House of Commons would wave their application to the Lords, and go their direct way to the King, who both could and would do them justice (100). Dr. Heylyn likewise in his life of Archbishop Laud (101), and Mr. Elsing, in a MS. discourse concerning Parliaments, considered the giving up of this great Minister to the Parliament, as a false step made by the King, and a leading card to others soon after. Yet the Committee seemed to be of another opinion, when they told the Peers, that they followed ancient precedents, which shewed that greater persons had been accused for the like crimes, in Parliament, intimating that they not only went in the way, but also trod in the high road of justice (102). Such writers therefore as reflect on the King's conduct in this particular, seem to have a view to that sort of Machiavelian policy, which admits of no constraint from the laws either of God or man, which, to say no more of it, is a policy to be abhorred by a free people; and the truth is, that King James did not suffer either in fame or in peace, by giving up St. Albans to the justice of a Parliament, but by screening others from it. And whoever reads our history with discretion will see, that not giving up ministers to legal prosecutions, has done ten times more mischief to the Crown, than suffering them to fall under sentences rather too severe; which, however, generally speaking, the Crown has power to correct or mitigate, and that usually with the approbation of the people. But as his Lordship must have known himself best, and was abundantly inclined, as well as every way capable, to say what might best excuse him, let us hear him to Dr. Andrews Bishop of Winchester (103), setting forth the thoughts that kept him in best humour with himself. He observes in that letter, that amongst consolations, it is not the least to represent to a man's self like examples of calamities in others; and as it savours of vanity to make ourselves highly in our conceit, so on the other side, it is a good sound conclusion, that if our betters have sustained the like events, we have the less cause to be grieved; that in this consolation he had not been wanting to himself, and as a Christian, he had tasted through God's great goodness of higher remedies: having, therefore, through the variety of his reading set before him many examples both of ancient and latter times, his thoughts, he confessed, had chiefly staid upon three particulars, as the most eminent and the most resembling, all three persons that had held chief place of authority in their countries, all three ruined, not by war, or by any other disaster, but by justice and sentence, as delinquents and criminals, all three famous writers, insomuch as the remembrances of their calamity, is now to posterity but a little picture of night-work, remaining amongst the fair and excellent tables of their acts and works, and all three (if that were any thing to the matter) fit examples to quench any man's ambition of rising again, since they were every one of them restored with great glory, but to their further ruin and destruction ending in a violent death. These men were, Demosthenes, Cicero, and Seneca, persons that he durst not claim ſentence reſtrained him from coming within the verge of the Court, the King thought fit to diſpenſe therewith for ſome time, that his Lordſhip might have the better opportunity to take care of his health, and to purſue the proper meaſures of putting his debts into ſome courſe of payment (u). The Parliament being prorogued in ſome heat, his Majeſty was pleaſed to conſult his Lordſhip, as to the propereſt methods of reforming the courts of juſtice, and taking away other grievances which that Parliament had enquired into; and he thereupon drew up a memorial, which is ſtill extant in his works (w). On the thirteenth of September, the King ſigned a licence for him to remain for ſix weeks at Sir John Vaughan's houſe at Parſon's Green, or at London, as his occaſions ſhould require. On the twentieth of the ſame month, his Majeſty ſigned a warrant to Sir Thomas Coventry, then Attorney-General, for the aſſignment of his fine to ſuch perſons as he ſhould name, in order to make him the more eaſy as to his debts. On the twelfth of October the King ſigned a warrant for his pardon (his parliamentary ſentence excepted), which however met with ſome ſtay at the Seal, then in the cuſtody of the Lord-Keeper Williams (x). His licence being expired, he would willingly have had it renewed, which however he could not obtain; and therefore was obliged to retire to his ſeat at Gorhambury, at which time probably that accident happened, which has been mentioned affinity with, except the ſimilitude had contracted it; that when he caſt his eyes on theſe examples, he was carried on farther to obſerve how they bore their fortunes, and principally how they employed their times, being baniſhed and diſabled for public buſineſs, to the end that he might learn by them, and that they might be as well his counſellors as his comforters. Whereupon he happened to note how differently their fortunes wrought upon them, eſpecially in that point at which he moſt aimed, which was the employing of their times and pens, 'In Cicero, ſays he, I ſaw 'that during his baniſhment (which was almoſt two 'years) he was ſo ſoftened and dejected, as he wrote 'nothing but a few womaniſh epiſtles, and yet in 'mine opinion, he had the leaſt reaſon of the three 'to be diſcouraged; for that although it was judged, 'and judged by the higheſt kind of judgment in form 'of ſtatute or law, that he ſhould be baniſhed, and 'his whole eſtate confiſcated and ſeized, and his 'houſes pulled down, and that it ſhould be highly 'penal for any man to propound a repeal, yet his 'caſe even then had no great blot of ignominy, for 'it was thought but a tempeſt of popularity which 'overthrew him. Demoſthenes, contrariwiſe, though 'his cauſe was foul, being condemned for bribery, 'and not ſimple bribery, but bribery in the nature 'of treaſon and diſloyalty, yet nevertheleſs took ſo 'little knowledge of his fortune, as during his ba-'niſhment he did much buſy himſelf and intermeddle 'with matters of ſtate, and took upon him to coun-'cil the ſtate (as if he had been ſtill at the helm) 'by letters, as appears by ſome epiſtles of his which 'are extant. Seneca, indeed, who was condemned 'for many corruptions and crimes, and baniſhed into 'a ſolitary iſland, kept a mean, and though his 'pen did not freeze, yet he abſtained from intruding 'into matters of buſineſs, but ſpent his time in writing 'books of excellent uſe for all ages, though he might 'have made better choice ſometimes of his dedi-'cations. Theſe examples confirmed me much in 'a reſolution (whereunto I was otherwiſe inclined), 'to ſpend my time wholly in writing, and to put 'forth that poor talent, or half talent, or what it 'is that God hath given me, not as heretofore, to 'particular exchanges, but to banks or mounts of 'perpetuity, which will not break.' Theſe thoughts ſeem to have dwelt much upon his Lordſhip's mind, ſince he repeated them very nearly in the ſame words to the King, in a letter to him while under his misfortunes (104). But to ſum up the whole matter fairly, and to do juſtice to truth, let it be at whoſe expence it will. Buſhel was a very ſtrange man, and has told ſo many improbable ſtories of his maſter, and ſo many ſilly ones of himſelf, that what he ſays deſerves no credit, farther than as it agrees with other evidence (105). The Chancellor himſelf never pretended to be abſolutely innocent, but only that he was leſs guilty, than from the charge brought againſt him might be thought. His Lordſhip ſeems to have had a very particular notion of bribery: he thought it muſt be connected with injuſtice, and therefore if his decrees were upright, he perſuaded himſelf that he was not guilty of that offence, notwithſtanding he had taken money, or preſents of great value, and this diſtinction runs through all his writings on this ſubject; ſo that he was willing to own corruption, though he did not think it amounted, ſtrictly ſpeaking, to the taking bribes (106). This accounts for what Mr. Ruſhworth ſays, and for the reflections made thereupon by Mr. Stephens. As to his being made a ſacrifice by the King, he meant no more by it than this, that his Majeſty had it in his power to ſave him by diſſolving the Parliament, but he did not think that his Majeſty did him any injuſtice, otherwiſe he would not have ſaid, as he did when he reſigned the ſeals, Rex dedit, culpa abſtulit, that is, the King gave, and my own faults have taken away, with many other expreſſions to the ſame purpoſe (107). The moſt candid, and the beſt informed of our hiſtorians, ſtate this matter ſo as to acquit the King of any ſeverity. Camden writes thus (108): 'The Chan-'cellor being convicted of bribery pretends, as if 'being weary of honour, he would reſign his place, 'being much loaded with calumnies.' Wilſon, ſpeaking of his ſubmiſſion, ſays, 'His great ſpirit was 'brought low, and this humiliation might have raiſed 'him again, if his offences had not been ſo weighty 'as to keep him down (109).' He had ſaid before, 'His crimes were bribery and extortion, which were 'proved and aggravated againſt him with ſo many 'circumſtances, that they fell very foully upon him '(110).' He ſays afterwards, which ſhews that he was not prejudiced againſt the man (111), 'He was 'a fit jewel to have beautified and adorned a flouriſh-'ing kingdom, if his flaws had not diſgraced the 'luſtre that ſhould have ſet him off.' Biſhop Hacket, in his Life of the Lord Keeper Williams, has given a large, true, and candid account of this matter. We learn from him, that the King, in the beginning of the Parliament, had ſaid before all the members, Spare none, where you find juſt cauſe to puniſh. This encouraged the Parliament to attack ſuch as were concerned in monopolies and impoſitions, and together with theſe vermin, ſays my author, the Lord-Chancellor was queſtioned without pity to his excellent parts. The conſequence of this was, that ſuch as were afraid of being brought to juſtice, endeavoured to frighten Buckingham and prejudice the King againſt the Parliament, inſinuating, that he had better take as much or more by his prerogative, than to wait for a ſmall exhibition of money from them, which would cauſe the ruin of his moſt loyal and faithful ſervants (112). But Dean Williams having prepared an antidote to this poiſon, the Parliament were ſuffered to ſit and to go on as it had begun: 'Yet, continues our Prelate, they were 'prorogued at Eaſter from the 27th of March to the '18th of April, the Marquis having his eye therein 'upon the Lord-Chancellor, to try if time could 'mitigate the diſpleaſure, which in both Houſes was 'ſtrong againſt him. But the leiſure of three weeks 'multiplied a pile of new ſuggeſtions, and nothing 'was preſaged more certain than his downfall (113).' Thus, in a larger, than a note might ſeem to allow, but in as narrow a compaſs as it was poſſible for me to bring it, I have given the reader the beſt teſtimonies on both ſides, and with great pains have ſet that in a true light, which others have laboured to obſcure. As to ſuch faults in this great man as are imputed only in libels, I do not think them worthy of preſerving, but as I believe them begot by malice, ſhall leave them to periſh in oblivion.

as a proof, that his ſpirits did not ſink with his fortunes. The Prince coming to London, ſaw at a diſtance a coach followed by a conſiderable number of people on horſeback, and upon enquiry, was told it was the Lord St. Albans attended by his friends; on which his Highneſs ſaid with a ſmile, Well! do what we can, this man ſcorns to go out like a ſnuff (y). He had indeed very little reaſon to complain of the Court, ſince his misfortunes roſe entirely from himſelf, and he met with nothing under them, that could heighten or increaſe his ſenſe of them. The King was gracious to him, not only as far as his circumſtances would then give him leave, but to a degree that offended many. The Prince willingly undertook whatever he deſired for his ſervice, and Buckingham ſeems to have been as hearty, and more reſpectful in his friendſhip to him after, than before his fall. Theſe circumſtances may be collected from their reſpective writings, and thoſe of Lord Bacon to them (z). Public hiſtories may contain miſinformations, ſecret hiſtories are frequently full of wilful miſtakes, but facts from private letters can never miſlead us. There was indeed ſome miſunderſtanding between Viſcount St. Albans and the Marquis of Buckingham; but it is very plain, that though offence was taken by the former, it was never meant him by the latter. The caſe was this: after his Lordſhip's fall, the Marquis of Buckingham had a mind to York-Houſe, and made ſome overtures to his Lordſhip for his term in it, which he took ill, and expoſtulated upon it very freely, which was ſo far from provoking the Marquis, that he anſwered him not only with great decency, but alſo with all the marks of concern, that could be expected from their long friendſhip (a). It is alſo evident, that his kindneſs towards him was not confined to bare expreſſions; for very ſoon after this, he procured for him the diſcharge of that part of his ſentence which afflicted him moſt, viz. his being reſtrained from coming within the verge of the Court, which he called an impriſonment, nor was he wanting in any thing elſe, that could well be expected from him. Theſe favours had ſo far ſettled the mind, and raiſed the ſpirits of Lord St. Albans, that he ſoon applied himſelf again to his ſtudies with equal diligence and vigour; ſo that in the ſpring of the ſucceeding year, he publiſhed his Hiſtory of King HENRY VII., which he dedicated to Charles Prince of Wales, a work, which, though not abſolutely free from faults, is certainly as well performed as any thing of that kind in our language (b). It is true, that after this, his troubles bore very hard upon him, as appears clearly from a very long, very humble, and very paſſionate letter written to the King upon that ſubject, which is without date: but this was owing chiefly to his own circumſtances, which would not allow him to ſettle things to his wiſh, and in ſome meaſure alſo to the King's, which would as little permit him to relieve his Lordſhip in proportion to his wants, or to the kindneſs which he ſtill retained for him. Yet however uneaſy his condition might be, he was, or might have been, far enough from neceſſity, ſince he had a penſion from the Crown of twelve hundred pounds a year, and retained his grant from the Alienation-Office, worth ſix hundred pounds a year more, beſides his own eſtate, which was worth ſeven hundred pounds per annum, all which taken together, might certainly have preſerved him from indigence (c). He was however greatly in debt, which ſeems to have been the heavieſt part of his load, and towards the ſatisfaction of this, we are told, he paid eight thouſand pounds after his fall. And yet at his death, he died in debt upwards of twenty-two thouſand pounds (d). So that at the time of his writing this letter, he might well be ſuppoſed to owe thirty thouſand, a ſufficient cauſe of uneaſineſs to himſelf, and therefore may be juſtly eſteemed that miſery which touched him ſo deeply. His Lordſhip alſo lived at a great expence even after his fall, notwithſtanding what ſome writers, who, as they lived in or near his time, ought to have known better, have reported to the contrary. Theſe things therefore taken together, might very well weigh him down, and keep him low, ſo as to occaſion continual applications to his Majeſty, and to his friends at court (e), which though it might ſeem to be attended with great diſturbance and diſtraction of mind, yet of ſuch a ſingular conſtruction was his Lordſhip's temper, and ſo thoroughly were all paſſions wrought to obedience, that though he was very well able to expreſs his ſolicitude about matters that concerned his intereſt, diſcovered his reſentments with becoming freedom, and willingly paid a juſt tribute of thankfulneſs for the benefits he received, he ſuffered none of theſe to hurry his thoughts to the prejudice of his ſtudies, which he always regarded as the principal occupation of his life (f). We have an inſtance of this, which will always do honour to his memory, reported by Dr. Rawley, whoſe fidelity is unqueſtionable. One day his Lordſhip was dictating to that Doctor, ſome of his experiments in his Sylva. The ſame day he had ſent a friend to Court, to receive for him a final anſwer, touching the effect of a grant which had been made him by King James. He had hitherto only hope of it, and hope deferred; and he was deſirous to know the event of the matter, and to be freed one way or other from the ſuſpenſe of his thoughts. His friend returning, told him plainly, that he muſt thenceforth deſpair of that grant, how much ſoever his fortunes needed it. Be it ſo, ſaid his Lordſhip, and then he diſmiſſed his friend very chearfully, with thankful acknowledgments for his ſervice. His friend being gone, he came ſtraightway to Dr. Rawley, and ſaid thus to him, Well, Sir, yon buſineſs won't go on, let us go on with this in our power; and then he dictated to him afreſh for ſome hours, without the leaſt heſitancy of ſpeech, or diſcernable interruption of thought (g). year 1623, was a great prejudice to his affairs, and taught him, by experience, that no body about the court had ſo warm and ſo ſincere an inclination to promote his requeſts; which, together with his former difficulties, brought down his hopes to ſuch a degree of humility, that, upon the death of Mr. Murray, he ſolicited the King to ſucceed him, as Provoſt of Eaton-college, to which this anſwer was given, That the King could not value his Lordſhip ſo little, or conceive he limited his deſires ſo low; in which however he ſhould have been gratified, if his Majeſty had not been engaged for Sir William Beecher, his agent in France (b). While the Marquis of Buckingham was abroad with the Prince of Wales, he was created Duke; and at his return, ſaw himſelf in ſuch plenitude of power, as never any ſubject had enjoyed in this kingdom, being at once the favourite both of the poſſeſſor and heir of the crown, and, which was no leſs ſingular, in as great credit with the people. The Viſcount of St. Albans preſented his Grace at his return, with The Advancement of Learning, tranſlated into Latin, and ſo much augmented and enriched, that it might with equal juſtice have paſſed for a new performance, which his noble patron not only kindly received, but continued likewiſe to do him very many, and thoſe very important ſervices, more eſpecially in procuring him conſiderable ſums of money, and from time to time freſh marks of royal favour (i). In acknowledgment for theſe, he dedicated to him a Latin tranſlation of his Eſſays, which he alſo augmented and poliſhed to the higheſt degree of perfection (k). A new Parliament having been called, in which the Houſe of Commons ſhewed great zeal for his Majeſty's ſervice, his Lordſhip turned his pen to a new ſubject, and compoſed a treatiſe, intitled, Conſiderations of a war with Spain (l), which he preſented to the Prince of Wales, and afterwards to the Queen of Bohemia. He likewiſe drew up Heads of a Speech (m), for his friend Sir Edward Sackville, upon the ſame ſubject, and theſe ſervices were ſo well received, that upon an application to the King for a full pardon, he eaſily obtained it. In the warrant directed for this purpoſe to the Attorney-General, his Majeſty took notice of his Lordſhip's having already ſatisfied juſtice by his ſufferings, and that himſelf being always inclined to temper juſtice with mercy, and likewiſe calling to remembrance his former good ſervices, and how well and profitably he had ſpent his time ſince his troubles, he was graciouſly pleaſed to remove from him that blot of ignominy which yet remained upon him, of incapacity and diſablement, and to remit to him all penalties whatſoever, inflicted by that ſentence (n). This was one of the laſt acts of his government; for he died very ſoon after, and, in conſequence of this pardon, his Lordſhip was ſummoned to the ſecond Parliament in the ſucceeding reign, though his infirmities would not allow him to ſit therein. He received alſo ſome comfort, from the great reſpect ſhewn him by foreigners of diſtinction, particularly by the Marquis D'Effiat, the French Ambaſſador, who cauſed his Eſſays to be tranſlated into his own language, and, upon his firſt viſit, compared his Lordſhip to the Angels, of whom he had heard and read much, but had never ſeen them; to which the Viſcount St. Albans very modeſtly and wiſely replied, That if the charity of others compared him to an Angel, his own infirmities told him he was a man (o). This nobleman contracted ſo cloſe a friendſhip with him, that they correſponded conſtantly ever after, and his Excellency eſteemed it a particular honour, to be ſtyled in thoſe letters his ſon: he likewiſe deſired and obtained his picture, which he carried into France. Theſe honours did not hinder the Viſcount St. Albans from thinking of, and preparing for, his end; which he foreſaw was drawing on, though he was ſo happy as to eſcape the great plague, in the ſpring of the year 1625. Having ſufficiently eſtabliſhed the fame of his learning and abilities, by his writings publiſhed by himſelf, he committed by his Will ſeveral of his Latin and Philoſophical compoſitions, to the care of Sir William Boſwel, his Majeſty's agent in Holland, where they were afterwards publiſhed by Gruter. His Orations and Letters he commended to Sir Humphrey May, Chancellor of the duchy, and the Biſhop of Lincoln (who had been his ſucceſſor in the Court of Chancery, and acknowledged the honour of that truſt) the letters to be preſerved but not to be divulged, as touching too much on perſons and matters of State (p). By this judicious care of his, moſt of his papers were preſerved, and the greateſt part of them at different times have been printed and publiſhed, collected into volumes, and ſtand immortal monuments, not to his own honour only, but to that of his age and country, nay, and even of Human Nature alſo, if the teſtimony of the beſt judges may be allowed: for as his merit deſerved, ſo it has received the univerſal praiſe of all true friends to knowledge (q) [II]. [II] So it has received the univerſal praiſe of all true friends to knowledge.] If one ſhould attempt to collect and digeſt into order the various characters beſtowed, and the ample commendations afforded the Viſcount of St. Albans by firſt-rate writers only, it would demand a volume; and alas! I have ſcarcely a page to ſpare. But let me make the beſt uſe of this little room I can; and as Dr. Rawley, who was his Lordſhip's amanuenſis, rejected many of the Cambridge verſes on his Lord's death, becauſe he knew that great man conſidered rather weight than number; ſo let the order and the choice of thoſe names I mention on this occaſion, atone for my mentioning a few only out of a multitude, and that multitude too compared with the herd of mankind, deſerving to be ſtyled the few. I will begin with his contemporaries, ſuch as knew him beſt, and knew him with all his failings; who yet could not but admire the ſplendour of his parts, and of thoſe great qualities which rendered him ſo truly the glory of his age and nation. Sir Walter Raleigh (114), that true judge of men and things; of ages paſt and preſent; diſcourſing of the great men of ſummer of 1625, brought him very low; but the ſpring reviving his ſpirits, he made a little excurſion into the country, in order to try ſome experiments in Natural Philoſophy, in

of his time, ſaid, 'That the Earl of Saliſbury was 'an excellent ſpeaker, but no good penman; that 'Lord Henry Howard was an excellent penman, but 'no good ſpeaker; Sir Francis Bacon, alike eminent 'in both.' The judicious and penetrating Ben Jonſon thought, that Engliſh eloquence aſcended till the time of the Viſcount St. Albans, and from thence went backward and declined: he, who was not too apt to praiſe, was profuſe in his praiſes of Bacon, cloſing them with theſe admirable reflections (115): 'My conceit of his perſon was never increaſed toward him by his place or honours: but I have and 'do reverence him for the greatneſs that was only 'proper to himſelf, in that he ſeemed to me ever by 'his works one of the greateſt men, and moſt worthy of admiration that had been in many ages: in 'his adverſity, I ever prayed that God would give 'him ſtrength, for greatneſs he could not want; 'neither could I condole in a word or ſyllable for 'him, as knowing no accident could do harm to 'virtue, but rather help to make it manifeſt.' Archbiſhop Williams, to whoſe care the Viſcount St. Albans committed his Orations and Epiſtles, expreſſed his ſenſe of that confidence repoſed in him in theſe words (116). 'Your Lordſhip doth moſt worthily, therefore, in preſerving theſe two pieces 'amongſt the reſt of thoſe matchleſs monuments you 'ſhall leave behind you; conſidering, that as one 'age hath not bred your experience, ſo is it not fit 'it ſhould be confined to one age, and not imparted 'to the times to come; for my part therein, I do 'embrace the honour with all thankfulneſs, and the 'truſt impoſed upon me with all religion and devotion.' The famous Sir Henry Wotton, on receiving from him the Novum Organum, wrote to him thus in return (117). 'Your Lordſhip hath 'done a great and everlaſting benefit to all the children of Nature, and to Nature herſelf in her utmoſt 'extent of latitude, who never before had ſo noble 'nor ſo true an interpreter, or (as I am readier to 'ſtyle your Lordſhip) never ſo inward a Secretary of 'her cabinet.' But one of the nobleſt, and perhaps the moſt noble, teſtimony in honour of his great abilities, was the letter written to him not long after his fall by the Univerſity of Oxford, on their receiving from him his book de Augmentis Scientiarum, the firſt paragraph only of which ſhall be here tranſcribed (118). 'Right honourable, and what in nobility is almoſt a miracle; moſt learned Viſcount! 'Your honour could have given nothing more agreeable, and the Univerſity could have received nothing 'more acceptable than the Sciences; and thoſe ſciences which ſhe formerly ſent forth poor, of low 'ſtature unpoliſhed, ſhe hath received elegant, tall, 'and by the ſupplies of your wit (by which alone 'they could have been advanced) moſt rich in dowry. 'She eſteemeth it an extraordinary favour to have a 'return with uſury made of that by a ſtranger, (if ſo 'near a relation may be called a ſtranger) which ſhe 'beſtows as a patrimony upon her children; and ſhe 'readily acknowledgeth, that though the Muſes are 'born in Oxford, they grow elſewhere: grown they 'are, and under your pen, who, like ſome mighty 'Hercules in learning, have, by your own hand, further advanced thoſe pillars in the learned world, 'which, by the reſt of that world, were ſuppoſed 'immoveable.' Neither were the beſt judges in the ſucceeding age leſs ſenſible of, or leſs inclined to celebrate, his worth. Thus, for inſtance, the famous Mr. Francis Oſborn, whoſe talent lay not much in commending, and who in many places of his works ſhews he was under no prepoſſeſſion in favour of our author, allows him to have been the moſt univerſal genius he had ever ſeen, or was ever like to ſee had he lived ever ſo long. He tells us, that he was ſo excellent, ſo agreeable a ſpeaker, that all who heard him were uneaſy if he was interrupted, and ſorry when he concluded; but what he thought, and very juſtly too, moſt remarkable, was his underſtanding all ſubjects to the bottom, for which he endeavours to account in the following manner (119). 'Now this general knowledge he had in all things 'huſbanded by his wit, and dignified by ſo majeſtical a carriage he was known to own, ſtruck ſuch 'an awful reverence in thoſe he queſtioned, that 'they durſt not conceal the moſt intrinſic part of 'their myſteries from him, for fear of appearing 'ignorant or ſaucy: all which rendered him no leſs 'neceſſary than admirable at the Council-table, 'where, in reference to impoſitions, monopolies, '&c. the meaneſt manufactures were an uſual argument, and, as I have heard, did in this baffle the 'Earl of Middleſex, that was born and bred a Citizen; yet without any great (if at all) interrupting 'his other ſtudies, as is not hard to be imagined, 'of a quick apprehenſion, in which he was admirable.' Dr. Peter Heylyn repreſents the Viſcount St. Albans as a man of a ſtrong brain, and capable of the higheſt performances, more eſpecially of framing a body of perfect Philoſophy (120). 'Pity 'it was, ſaid he, he was not entertained with ſome 'liberal ſalary, abſtracted from all affairs both of 'court and judicature, and furniſhed with ſufficiency 'both of means and helps for the going on in his deſign, which, had it been, he might have given us 'ſuch a body of Natural Philoſophy, and made it ſo 'ſubſervient to the public good, that neither Ariſtotle, nor Theophraſtus amongſt the Ancients, nor 'Paracelſus, or the reſt of our later Chymiſts, would 'have been conſiderable.' Our famous Poet, Abraham Cowley, has juſtly celebrated the mighty diſcoveries of the great Lord Bacon, and in a poem, too long to be inſerted here, done him all the juſtice that might be expected from one vaſt genius to another (121). Biſhop Sprat beſtows on him the higheſt praiſes when he ſays, that his books contained the beſt arguments in the defence of Experimental Philoſophy, and the beſt directions for promoting it. To ſay the truth, his character is ſo clear, ſo curious, and ſo remarkably worthy of the great man it celebrates, that I cannot help ſetting down a part of it, though it ſhould oblige me to be ſhorter in other citations (122). Thus then he ſpeaks: 'But methinks, 'in this one man I do at once find enough occaſion 'to admire the ſtrength of human wit, and to bewail the weakneſs of a mortal condition; for is it 'not wonderful, that he who had run through all 'the degrees of that profeſſion, which uſually takes 'up men's whole time, who had ſtudied, and practiſed, and governed the Common-Law, who had 'always lived in the crowd, and borne the greateſt 'burden of civil buſineſs, ſhould yet find leiſure 'enough for theſe retired ſtudies, to excel all thoſe 'men who ſeparate themſelves for this very purpoſe? 'He was a man of ſtrong, clear, and powerful imaginations; his genius was ſearching and inimitable, 'and of this I need give no other proof than his 'ſtyle itſelf, which as, for the moſt part, it deſcribes 'men's minds as well as pictures do their bodies, ſo 'it did his above all men living; the courſe of it 'vigorous and majeſtic; the wit, bold and familiar; 'the compariſons, fetched out of the way, and yet 'the moſt eaſy; in all, expreſſing a ſoul equally 'ſkilled in men and nature.' The incomparable Mr. Boyle * ſpeaks often of our author in his works, and always with honour; he ſtyles him ſometimes an illuſtrious, at others, an admirable and excellent Philoſopher; and, which is a higher commendation than any phraſe could have expreſſed, he often imitates him, and profeſſes a deſire of treading in his paths. Dr. Power, one of the moſt active and judicious among the firſt members of the Royal Society, in a learned treatiſe of his †, places at the head of his chapters, the Latin text from the Lord Verulam's work, to ſhew, that all the honour he had claimed was to have proſecuted his views. Biſhop Nicolſon, ſpeaking of the authors who have written concerning the reign of Henry VII., gives this character of his Lordſhip's performance on that ſubject (123). 'But this good 'work was moſt effectually undertaken and compleated by the incomparable Sir Francis Bacon, who has 'bravely ſurmounted all thoſe difficulties, and paſſed 'over thoſe rocks and ſhallows, againſt which he took 'ſuch pains to caution other leſs experienced hiſtorians. 'He has perfectly put himſelf into King Henry's own 'garb and livery, giving as ſprightly a view of the 'ſecrets of his Council, as if himſelf had been Prein which journey he was taken ſo ill, that he was obliged to ſtay at the Earl of Arundel's houſe at Highgate, about a week, and there he expired, on the ninth of April 1626, being

'ſident in it. No trivial paſſages, ſuch as are below 'the notice of a ſtateſman, are mixed with his ſage 'remarks; nor is any thing of weight or moment, 'ſlubbered over with that careleſs haſte and indiffe-'rency, which is too common in other writers. No 'allowances are given to the author's own conjecture 'or invention, where a little pains and conſideration 'will ſerve to ſet the matter in its proper and true 'light. No impertinent digreſſions, nor fanciful com-'ments diſtract his readers; but the whole is written 'in ſuch a grave and uniform ſtile, as becomes both 'the ſubject and the artificer.' I ſhall add to theſe authorities but two more from the learned of our own nation, but they are two ſuch as might alone have ſecured immortality to any author they had commended. The firſt of theſe was Mr. Addiſon, who in one of the Tatlers, in which he vindicates the Chriſtian religion, by ſhewing that the wiſeſt and ableſt men in all ages have profeſſed themſelves believers, ſpeaks of our author thus (124): 'I ſhall 'in this paper only inſtance Sir Francis Bacon, a man, 'who, for the greatneſs of his genius and compaſs of 'knowledge, did honour to his age and country, I 'could almoſt ſay to human nature itſelf. He poſſeſſed 'at once all thoſe extraordinary talents, which were 'divided amongſt the greateſt authors of antiquity; 'he had the ſound, diſtinct, comprehenſive knowledge 'of Ariſtotle, with all the beautiful lights, graces, 'and embelliſhments of Cicero. One does not know 'which to admire moſt in his writings, the ſtrength 'of reaſon, force of ſtyle, or brightneſs of imagi-'nation. This author has remarked in ſeveral 'parts of his works, that a thorough inſight into 'Philoſophy makes a good believer, and that a ſmat-'tering in it naturally produces ſuch a race of 'deſpicable infidels, as the little profligate writers of 'the preſent age, whom (I muſt confeſs) I have al-'ways accuſed to myſelf, not ſo much for their want 'of faith, as their want of learning. I was infinitely 'pleaſed to find among the works of this extraor-'dinary man, a prayer of his own compoſing, which, 'for the elevation of thought and greatneſs of ex-'preſſion, ſeems rather the devotion of an angel than 'of a man. His principal fault ſeems to have been 'the exceſs of that virtue which covers a multitude 'of faults: This betrayed him to ſo great an indul-'gence towards his ſervants, who made a corrupt uſe 'of it, that it ſtripped him of all thoſe riches and 'honours, which a long ſeries of merits had heaped 'upon him.' The ſecond is that ſhort character of his writings, given us by the pen of the moſt noble John Sheffield, Duke of Buckinghamſhire, who aſ-ſerts (125), That all his works are for expreſſion as well as thought, the glory of our nation and of all latter ages. This reſpect paid to his extraordinary merit by his countrymen, did not either commence more early, or extend to greater diſtance, or riſe to a higher degree at home than abroad. The famous Conde de Gondamar, ſo long Ambaſſador here from his Catho-lic Majeſty, wrote him a very handſome letter upon his misfortune, in which he aſſures him of the King his maſter's interpoſition, if he judged it any way convenient for the reſtoring his condition (126). So well was his character known in Spain and ſo much regarded, though his conduct had been always op-poſite to that of the Spaniſh faction in the court of King James. Dr. Rawley tells us, he had ſeen a letter to the then Lord Cavendiſh, afterwards Earl of Devonſhire, from Italy, wherein it was ſaid, that my Lord Bacon was more and more known, and his books more and more delighted in; ſo that thoſe men who had more than ordinary knowledge in human affairs eſteemed him one of the moſt capable ſpirits of that age (127). The elegant Mr. Voiture gives this character of the Latin works he had ſeen of the Viſ-count St. Albans (128): 'I find every thing perfectly 'fine that you have ſent me of Bacon, but do you 'not think that Horace, who ſaid

'Viſum Britannos hoſpitibus feros,

'would be much aſtoniſhed to hear a barbarian talk 'in this manner, and to ſee that there is not perhaps 'at this day a Roman, who ſpeaks ſo good Latin as 'this Engliſhman? And would not Juvenal ſay with 'greater reaſon than ever,

'Nunc totus Grajas noſtraſque habet orbis Athenas?'

The learned Grotius, in a private letter to a friend of his (129), highly commends his Lordſhip's life of Henry VII., as a work written with admirable judgment; and in this opinion the no leſs learned Conringius fully agrees. But the character of his writings in general, afforded by ſo exquiſite a judge of all the numerous ſubjects on which they were written, I mean the celebrated Baron Puffendorf, does ſtill greater honour to his memory (129) 'The late 'moſt wiſe Chancellor of England, ſays he, was the 'chief writer of our age, and who carried as it were 'the ſtandard that we might preſs forward, and make 'greater diſcoveries in Philoſophic matters, than any 'of which hitherto our ſchools had rung. So that 'if in our time any great improvements have been 'made in Philoſophy, there has been not a little 'owing to that great man.' The accurate and ju-dicious Francis Buddeus, (that I may mention ſome of the authors of our own time) applauds the Viſcount St. Albans extremely (130): He ſtiles him a new light in Philoſophy, one who firſt united ſpeculation and prac-tice, and opened a paſſage to thoſe mighty diſcoveries that have been made ſince his time. He indicates alſo the ſeveral parts of his great Body of Science, which have been commented on and explained by the learned Philoſophers of Germany; and thereby ſhews, that the memory of this admirable man expanded more fragrantly abroad for many years than here in his native country, where foreign approbation too fre-quently teaches us to revere the names of thoſe, who in their lives wanted common reſpect, though this was not, ſtrictly ſpeaking, the caſe of our author; and yet, as himſelf foreſaw, in ſome ſort it was: for though there ne-ver wanted ſome amongſt the moſt learned in this iſland who underſtood and applauded his writings, yet un-doubtedly it was their being tranſlated into Latin that procured both them and their author the praiſe they deſerved. The laſt authority I ſhall cite on this ſubject ſhall be Mr. Voltaire (131), who very juſtly ſtiles him, the father of Experimental Philoſophy, and enters into abundance of very judicious reflections on his diſcoveries and writings, owning at the ſame time, that what ſurprized him moſt was, to find the Doctrine of Attraction, which is looked upon as the foundation of another Philoſophy, expreſsly ſet down in Lord Bacon's, in words not to be controverted or miſtaken. I ſhall not take upon me to decide how far this may be juſt or not, but leave it to the ſearch and deciſion of the learned and ingenious reader: only give me leave to ſay, I have always ſuſpected the Novum Organum has been ſo little commended by the Moderns for two reaſons; firſt, that it requires a deep head and a ſtrong attention to become fully maſter of it, and ſo has been thoroughly underſtood by few; ſecondly, that thoſe few who have fully penetrated it, uſed it to raiſe ſtructures of their own, and not to finiſh Bacon's palace of wiſdom. It was peculiar to this great man to have nothing narrow and ſelfiſh in his compoſition: he gave away without concern what-ever he poſſeſſed, and, believing other men of the ſame mould, he received with as little conſideration. Nay even as to fame he had the like notion; he was deſirous to enjoy it, but in the ſame way; not from his knowledge, but from his free and liberal com-munication of that knowledge; ſo that it may be truly and without flattery ſaid, his worſt qualities were the exceſſes of the moſt exalted virtues.

To the memory of ſuch a man, of what importance is it, if James Howell (132) has ſet down ſome vul-gar tales mixed with many miſtakes? If the foreign dictator in our hiſtory, Rapin (133), has treated him harſhly on the credit of Weldon, and other libellers, who knew no way of eſcaping oblivion, but by aſ-ſaſſinating great names, condemning thereby their own to immortal infamy? Or if POPE, forgetting at once the diſtance and reſemblance of their characters, ſuf-fers his petulant muſe to ſay, being Eaſter-day (r), and was privately buried in the chapel of St. Michael's church, within the precincts of Old Verulam. In the chancel of which church, his faithful friend, and indefatigable ſervant in his troubles, Sir Thomas Meautys, cauſed a neat monument of white marble to be erected, with his Lordſhip's effigies ſitting in a contemplative poſture, with an inſcription written by Sir Henry Wotton (s), every way worthy of that excellent writer, and of that admirable man to whoſe honour it is dedicated [KK]. The moſt eminent ſcholars of the univerſity of Cambridge ſhewed their concern for his death, and the juſt ſenſe they had of the honour reſulting to that noble ſeminary of learning, from his receiving his education there, by compoſing verſes in ſeveral languages on that occaſion, which were afterwards printed (t). The ſame juſtice, poſterity has alſo rendered to his memory; inſomuch that it may be truly ſaid, his own prophecy has been fulfilled, and that after flying through foreign countries for a time, his reputation ſtands now fixed at home, where all admire the ſtrength and beauty of his genius, and, in favour of its efforts, would willingly forget, a man ſo endowed was not altogether exempt from failings.

[Notwithſtanding the length and copiouſneſs of the preceding article, Lord Bacon was ſo illuſtrious a man, and ſo many things have been written concerning him, by different authors, that we cannot avoid making an addition to the ſubject. Several incidents, not heretofore taken notice of, with regard to the early part of his life, are related by the induſtrious Dr. Birch, in his memoirs of Queen Elizabeth; and ſome farther particulars may be collected from other publications. Out of theſe we ſhall endeavour to ſelect ſuch facts and obſervations as may ſerve to throw farther light on our great Philoſopher's hiſtory and character.

Mr. Bacon was choſen to repreſent the county of Middleſex in the Parliament which met in February, 1592-3 (u). This, conſidering the narrowneſs of his fortune at that time, muſt be regarded as a proof of the general eſteem and reputation in which he was held: And no ſooner did he appear in the Houſe of Commons than he began to diſtinguiſh himſelf as a ſpeaker. He took a part in the debates which aroſe concerning the ſubſidies then demanded; and though he aſſented to them, yet, becauſe he was not for having them paid under ſix years, urging the neceſſities of the people, the danger of raiſing public diſcontentment, and the impropriety of ſetting an evil precedent againſt themſelves and their poſterity, the Queen was highly offended with him: So dangerous was it in thoſe days for a man to deliver his ſentiments with any freedom in Parliament. Her Majeſty's diſpleaſure on this account was ſo great, that though he took no ſmall pains to explain his conduct, and to ſolicit the return of her favour, by writing for that purpoſe, to the Lord Treaſurer Burghley, and the Lord Keeper Puckering, ſhe continued her reſentment a long time, and it appears to have been the principal cauſe of her rejecting the ſolicitations made for his promotion (w). Mr. Bacon's having incurred the Queen's anger muſt have been the more ſenſibly felt by him, as his circumſtances were now exceedingly perplexed. Indeed, his anxiety from the ſituation of his affairs, and from the failure of the expectations of preferment, was ſuch as to have an ill effect upon a conſtitution of body naturally not firm, and weakened ſtill more by the intemperance of his night ſtudies (x). His great friend and patron, the Earl of Eſſex, exerted himſelf to the utmoſt, to reſtore him to the good graces of her Majeſty, and to procure for him a valuable ſettlement. The ardour with which this

His glory cannot be blaſted by ſuch envious flaſhes as theſe. His failings did hurt only to his cotemporaries, and were expiated by his ſufferings: but his virtue and knowledge, and, above all, his zeal for mankind, will be felt while there are men; and conſequently, while they have gratitude, the name of Bacon, Verulam, or St. Albans, can never be mentioned but with admiration!

[KK] To whoſe honour it is dedicated.] This elegant tomb was erected to the memory of his Lordſhip, by one bound to him by a variety of ties: for Sir Thomas Meautys was not only his Secretary, and moſt faithful ſervant, but his couſin and heir, and had likewiſe married his grand niece (135). His Lordſhip is repreſented ſitting in his chair in a contemplative and his uſual poſture, one hand ſupporting his head, the other hanging over the arm of the chair, and underneath this inſcription, often, but ſometimes very incorrectly, tranſcribed; and therefore added here with a tranſlation expreſſing its true meaning, and ſo more fully explaining the intention of its ingenious author, one of the correcteſt writers of his time.

generous nobleman proſecuted the matter will be apparent from one of his own letters to Mr. Bacon: 'Yeſterday I had, ſays his Lordſhip, a full audience, but with little 'better ſucceſs than before. The points I preſſed were an abſolute Αμνηστια, and an 'acceſs, as at former times. Againſt the firſt ſhe pleaded, that you were more in fault 'than any of the reſt in Parliament; and when ſhe did forgive it, and manifeſt her 'receiving of them into favour, that offended her then, ſhe will do it to many, that 'were leſs in fault, as well as to yourſelf. Your acceſs, ſhe ſaith, is as much as you 'can look for. If it had been in the King her father's time, a leſs offence than that 'would have made a man be baniſhed his preſence for ever. But you did come to the 'court, when you would yourſelf; and ſhe ſhould precipitate too much from being 'heavily diſpleaſed with you, to give you near acceſs, ſuch as ſhe ſhews only to thoſe, 'that ſhe favours extraordinarily. I told her, what I ſought for you was not ſo much 'for your good, though it were a thing I would ſeek extremely, and pleaſe myſelf in 'obtaining, as for her own honour, that thoſe excellent tranſlations of hers might be 'known by them, who could beſt judge of them. Beſides, my deſire was, that you 'ſhould neither be a ſtranger to her perſon nor to her ſervice; the one for your own 'ſatisfaction, the other for her Majeſty's own ſake, who, if ſhe did not employ you, 'ſhould loſe the uſe of the ableſt gentleman to do her ſervice of any of your quality 'whatſoever. Her humour is yet to delay. I am now going to her again; and what 'I cannot effect at once, I will look to do ſæpe cædendo. Excuſe my ill writing. I 'write in haſte, and have my chamber full of company, that break my head with talk-'ing (y).' This letter appears to have been written either in the latter end of Auguſt or the beginning of September, 1593.

It is ſaid (p. 453.) that Mr. Bacon in 1594, preſſed very earneſtly to be made Queen's Solicitor. But it is evident that before this the Earl of Eſſex uſed his utmoſt endeavours to procure for him a higher poſt, that of Attorney General. A conference which the Earl had with Sir Robert Cecil upon the ſubject, and which we ſhall inſert in a note, will ſerve ſtill farther to diſplay, in a very ſtriking light, his Lordſhip's zeal for his friend [LL]. But though Sir Robert Cecil ſeemed thus averſe to promoting the intereſt of his relation, yet, whether ſtimulated by this converſation, or by whatever motives, it is certain that he wrote in his favour to Sir Thomas Egerton, juſt then raiſed from the Attorneyſhip to be Maſter of the Rolls; from which letter, however, it is apparent that Sir Robert had no farther view than to Mr. Bacon's hereafter obtaining the poſt of Solicitor General (z). Whether Sir Robert Cecil was even ſo far ſincere, may be doubted: For in an interview which, nearly a twelvemonth afterward, Lady Ann Bacon had with the Lord Treaſurer and his ſon, though they made ſtrong profeſſions of kindneſs to Mr. Bacon, her Ladyſhip ſeemed to think that theſe pro-

[LL] His Lordſhip's zeal for his friend.] As the Earl of Eſſex and Sir Robert Cecil were returning in a coach together, from the examination of Dr. Lopez in the Tower, in February 1593-4, Sir Robert began of himſelf, ſaying, 'My Lord, the 'Queen has reſolved, e'er five days paſs, without 'any farther delay to make an Attorney General. 'I pray your Lordſhip to let me know whom you 'will favour.' The Earl anſwered, 'That he won-'dered Sir Robert ſhould aſk him that queſtion, 'ſeeing it could not be unknown to him, that reſo-'lutely againſt all whoſoever he ſtood for Francis 'Bacon.' 'Good Lord,' replied Sir Robert, 'I 'wonder your Lordſhip ſhould go about to ſpend 'your ſtrength in ſo unlikely or impoſſible a matter;' deſiring his Lordſhip to alledge to him but one only precedent of ſo raw a youth to that place of ſuch moment. The Earl, very cunningly working upon him, ſaid, 'That for the Attorneyſhip, which was 'but an ordinary office other than the Prince's 'favour, he could produce no pattern, becauſe he 'had not made any ſearch for that purpoſe; but 'that a younger than Francis Bacon, of leſs learn-'ing, and of no greater experience, was ſuing and 'ſtriving with all force for an office of far greater 'importance, greater charge, and greater weight, 'than the Attorneyſhip.' 'Such an one,' the Earl ſaid, 'he could name to him.' Sir Robert's an-ſwer was, 'That he well knew, that his Lordſhip 'meant him; and that admitting, that both his 'years and experience were ſmall, yet weighing the 'ſchool which he ſtudied in, and the great wiſdom 'and learning of his ſchoolmaſter, and the pains 'and obſervations he daily paſſed in that ſchool, 'he thought his forces and wiſdom to be ſufficient 'to ſway that machine; alledging with all, his 'Father's deſerts in theſe his long and painful travels 'of ſo long an adminiſtration to merit a mark of 'gratitude in the perſon of his ſon. And with 'regard to the affair of Mr. Francis Bacon, he de-'ſired his Lordſhip to conſider of it.' 'If at leaſt, 'ſaid he, your Lordſhip had ſpoken of the Solicitor-'ſhip, that might be of eaſier digeſtion by her Ma-'jeſty.' The Earl upon this anſwered, 'Digeſt me 'no digeſtions; for the Attorneyſhip for Francis is 'that I muſt have; and in that will I ſpend all my 'might, authority, and amity, and with tooth and 'nail defend and procure the ſame for him againſt 'whomſoever; and that whoſoever getteth this office 'out of my hands for any other, before he have it, 'it ſhall coſt him the coming by, and this be you 'aſſured of, Sir Robert; for now do I fully declare 'myſelf. And for your own part, Sir Robert, I 'think ſtrange both of my Lord Treaſurer and you, 'that you can have the mind to ſeek the preferment 'of a ſtranger before ſo near a kinſman; for if you 'weigh in a balance the parts every way of his com-'petitor and him, only excepting five poor years of 'admitting to a Houſe of Court before Francis, you 'ſhall find in all other reſpects whatſoever no com-'pariſon between them (136).' It is hinted, in the preceding converſation, that Sir Robert Cecil was younger than Francis Bacon; upon which the author of the Britiſh Biography judiciouſly obſerves, that either the Earl of Eſſex was miſtaken in Cecil's age, or that the common accounts which make him ſome years older than Bacon, are erroneous (137). Robert Cecil's birth is generally placed about 1550; but, as the exact time cannot be aſcertained, it may be worthy of conſideration how far the intimation given above renders it probable that he was born a good deal later than hath uſually been imagined. It is a ſurprizing inſtance of prejudice and diſlike in Sir Robert Cecil, that he ſhould repreſent his couſin, Mr. Francis Bacon, who had then entered into the thirty-fourth year of his age, and had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his great abilities, as a raw youth.
